THE STORY OF THE TABLET OF AHMAD

By A. Faizi

Part I

THERE ARE TWO TABLETS each bearing the name of Ahmad: one in Persian and the other in Arabic. The latter is the one used throughout the Bahá'í world, which the beloved Guardian characterized as being imbued with a special potency.

The Persian Tablet is quite a long one and is written to Ahmad of Káshán. Hájí Mirzá Jání, who was the first one to embrace the Báb's Faith in Káshán, in whose house the Báb sojourned¹ some days and who was finally martyred in Tíhrán, had three brothers. One was never moved by his brother's faith, no matter how much the latter endeavored to teach him. He remained a Muslim and died as such. The second was called Ismá'íl, entitled by Bahá'u'lláh *Dhabih*² (sacrificed) and also Anís (companion); the third one who went to Baghdád was called Ahmad. He remained with the Ancient Beauty and had the honor to be amongst those who were chosen by Him as one of the companions in His exile to Istanbul. But unfortunately in the storms of tests and trials this Ahmad departed from the right path and sided with Azal. He then caused much suffering for the Blessed Beauty, His family and friends. In order to warn this man against such evil deeds and the detrimental consequences for the nascent Faith, Bahá'u'lláh sent him this long Persian Tablet full of exhortations, elucidations of the divine power and advice as to how a true seeker should act and behave. Ahmad remained heedless, unmoved and unchanged, but when he found out that he could no more live in Turkey, he returned to 'Iráq where he found his old associates and resumed his iniquitous life with them. One of his worst habits was to insult people and curse them in the most bitter and vile language. In one of his disputes with his evil friends, he lashed them with his sharp tongue and the victims, to get rid of him, killed him one night.

Selections from this Persian Tablet appear in the Gleanings.³

Ahmad Begins His Search

As to the Ahmad in whose honor the well-known Tablet is revealed, he was born in Yazd (circa 1805) to a very noble and rich family. His father and uncles were the chieftains of the town, but Ahmad even at the age of fourteen showed a great inclination towards mysticism and endeavored to find new paths to truth. When he was fifteen, he had already started his investigations during which he heard from some of the people that there are saints or holy men who know special prayers which if read and repeated so many times and in accordance with certain rituals would definitely enable the reader to behold the countenance of the Promised Qá'im (The Messiah).

This flared up the fire of his ever-growing longings. He began to practice an ascetic life with long prayers, successive days of fasting and secluding himself from people and from the world. His parents and relatives never approved of such practices, nor did they permit him to continue this seclusion which was contrary to their ways of life and ambition. Such opposition could not be tolerated by a man like Ahmad who was wholeheartedly searching and striving to reach his heart's desire — reunion with his eternal Beloved. Therefore one day early in the morning, he made a small bundle of his clothes and belongings and under the pretext of going to a public bath, departed from his father's home and set out on his way to search for God's manifestation.

In a beggar's outfit he roamed from village to village, and wherever he found a "pir" — spiritual leader — with great devotion and rectitude of conduct he sat at his feet in the hope of finding a path to the mysterious worlds of truth. He invariably begged such people for the special prayer, the reading of which would draw him near the court of his Beloved. Whenever someone would suggest to him any practice, he was so ardent in his search that he would invariably carry out the instructions with absolute sincerity no matter how time-consuming or arduous those practices were. But all of this was of no avail.

Losing hope and faith in such pursuits, he made his way to India, a land so well known for its mystic teachers and hermits with special powers and spiritual gifts. He reached Bombay and took up his residence there, still looking for someone to give him a glimpse of the glorious court of the Promised One.

He heard that if one would perform a specific ablution, put on spotlessly clean white garments, prostrate oneself and repeat the following verse of the Qur'án, "There is no God but God" twelve thousand times, he would definitely attain his aim and heart's desire. Not once, but several times Aḥmad prostrated himself for hours to repeat the above-mentioned verse 12,000 times, but still found himself in darkness.

In his dismay he returned to Persia, but did not go to his own home town of Yazd. He settled in the city of Káshán and started his own craft of cloth-making in which he was an expert. In no time he became a very successful businessman; but still in his inmost heart he was restlessly searching.

A Stranger Points the Way

"Knock, and it shall be opened unto you." "Ask, and it shall be given you." No true seeker ever returned from His door of mercy deprived or unanswered.

It was here in Káshán that the rumors about One claiming to be the Promised Qá'im were heard by him. Ceaseless in his efforts and sincere in his search, he asked many people in many different ways. No one ever gave him a clue.

Then one day an unknown traveller arrived in this town and stayed in the same inn where Aḥmad had established his successful business. A certain inner urge drew Aḥmad close to this unknown man. In their conversation, the traveller was asked about the already spreading rumor. "Why do you ask this question?" he inquired. "I want to know if it is true. If it is, I shall follow it, with all my might," was Aḥmad's rejoinder.

The traveller with a smile of triumph on his face, instructed him to go to Kḥurásán and find a certain famous learned man called Mullá 'Abdu'l Kḥaliq who would tell him the whole truth.

The very next day Aḥmad was on his way to the province of Kḥurásán. The owners of the neighboring shops were very much surprised when they did not find Aḥmad at his work as usual. "What passed between him and the unknown traveller?" they asked one another, and no one knew the right answer.

Aḥmad crossed deserts and mountains on foot, and his heart overflowed with joy and longing. Every step he took he found himself nearer to the time when all his efforts would yield the desired fruits — his reunion with his Beloved in the search of Whose presence he spared no effort and found no sacrifice too great.

He reached Mashhad, Kḥurásán, exhausted and so ill that he had to stay in bed. After two months' struggle to overcome his weakness, he mustered the last ounces of his strength and courage and went directly to the door of the desired house. Here are his own words as related to his friends and companions of these days, "When I reached the house, I knocked at the door and the servant of the house came forth. Holding the door ajar, he asked me, 'What do you want?' 'I must see your Master,' I answered. The man went back into the house and then the Mullá himself came out. He admitted me to his house and when we stood face to face I explained to him all that had happened to me. When I finished, he at once grasped my arm and told me, 'Do not say such things here!' and he pushed me out of his house. There was no end to my sorrows. Heartbroken and utterly astounded I said to myself, 'Are all my efforts in vain? To whom shall I turn? Whom shall I approach? . . . But I will never leave this man. I will persist till such time as he will open his heart to me and will guide me to the right path of God. It is incumbent upon the one who searches to drain the bitter cup of hardship.' The next morning I was at the door of the same house. I knocked harder than the previous day. This time the Mullá himself came to the door and the moment he opened it, I said, 'I will not go away. I will not leave you until you tell me the whole truth.' This time he found me earnest and true. He became sure that I had not been at his door to spy or cause difficulties for him and his friends."

Aḥmad was then instructed to attend the evening prayers at a certain Mosque where the same Mullá led the congregational prayer followed by a long sermon. He was also told to follow the Mullá after the sermon was over. The next night Aḥmad tried his utmost to find the Mullá after the prayer and the sermon, but crowds of people surrounded him and Aḥmad did not have the slightest chance to even approach him. The next day when the two met again Aḥmad was instructed to go to another Mosque at night and a third person would be there to show him the way. Accordingly Aḥmad was at the Mosque at sunset and as promised, after the evening prayers, a certain person came to him and beckoned him to follow. Without hesitation or fear Aḥmad followed. Now the three men started to walk like shadows in the darkness of the night, through narrow and obscure lanes. Aḥmad, a complete stranger, never wavered nor faltered nor fled. He took every step with great determination and was ready for any outcome.

At last they reached a certain house. They knocked at the door very gently and it was opened immediately. The new-comers went in very quickly. They passed through a covered passageway, reached a small courtyard, climbed a few steps and were at the door of an upper chamber where a very dignified figure was sitting. The Mullá approached that revered personage with great humility and absolute reverence and courteously whispered, "This is the man I told you about," and indicated Aḥmad, who had been standing at the threshold with utter respect and high expectation. "Welcome. Please come in and be seated" said the man. Aḥmad then entered the room and sat down on the floor.

The host was no less a person than Mullá Šádiq (Truthful), one of the early believers during the Báb's ministry and very distinguished for his erudition, audacity and steadfastness. During Bahá'u'lláh's ministry the same Mullá Šádiq (Truthful) displayed such great ardour and zeal that he was entitled 'Ašdaq (the most truthful) by Bahá'u'lláh.⁴

A Treasure Is Found

Aḥmad who for twenty-five years had been wandering in the valleys of search and had nowhere found even a drop to quench his thirst, now found a path to the main spring. With parched lips and an insatiable longing he drank in the sweet scented stream of the verses of God through His new Manifestation. Three sessions were sufficient and he embraced the Faith with all his heart and soul. So elated, exalted and over-enthusiastic he looked, that 'Ašdaq exhorted him to return to his family in Káshán and insisted that he should not mention the Faith to the people, not even to his own wife.

Those days were days of extreme danger to the nascent Cause of God. The few followers recruited from the poor people of the world were forever the targets of many atrocities. Even the air was imbued with suspicion, spying and slander. Therefore the friends had to be very careful, lest the slightest unwise deed or even a foolish word would ignite a never-ending conflagration that would consume the believers in its flame.

'Ašdaq, knowing how Aḥmad had suffered, felt that he had no money to go back home; therefore, he gave him some small gifts for his family and the sum of three tumans ($1) and again advised him to be very wise. Commenting upon his return to Káshán, Aḥmad has said: "When I reached Káshán, everyone asked what had happened that I had left everything so abruptly. I told them: 'My longing for pilgrimage was too great to resist, and I was right.' What else could take me away from my work, my house and my family except that innermost yearning? The instant I heard these words from the traveller there was no more patience left in me."

In Káshán he resumed his work, but longed to teach the Faith. He heard rumors that a certain man by the name of Ḥájí Mirzá Jání had changed his faith and had become the follower of a new obscure religion. He searched for him and when the two found each other, there was no end to their joy and excitement. They become fast friends, constant companions and the first and only Bábis of that town.

One day Ḥájí Mirzá Jání went to Aḥmad and with great enthusiasm and uncontrollable excitement asked him: "Would you like to visit the countenance of your Lord?" Aḥmad's heart leapt up. With much joy and ecstasy he immediately got up from his seat and asked, "How and when?" Ḥájí explained to him how he had arranged with the guards to have the Báb in his house as a guest for two or three nights. Therefore at the appointed hour Aḥmad went to Ḥájí's house. When he entered, his eyes fell on a face the beauty of which surpassed heaven and earth. A young Siyyid was sitting with such meekness, grandeur and majesty that one could not help but behold the light of God in His countenance. Some of the divines and dignitaries of the town were seated on the floor around and the servants stood at the door.

One of the Mullás faced the Báb and said, "We have heard that a certain young man in Shíráz has claimed to be the Báb. Is it true?" "Yes", answered the Báb. "And does he reveal verses, too?" said the same man. The Báb responded, "And We reveal verses, too."

Ahmad has further said: "This clear and courageous answer was sufficient for anyone who had ears to hear and eyes to see and find the whole truth immediately. His beautiful face and His powerful words and presence sufficed all things. But when they served tea and a cup was offered to the Báb, He immediately took it, called the servant of the same Mullá and very graciously gave it to him. The day after, the very same humble servant came to me and with great sorrow deplored the stupidity of his master. A little explanation as to the station of the Báb brought him to our fold and our number grew to be three."

This small nucleus started to grow and the number of the adherents increased. This angered the divines who used all their cunning to stop the flow of the already powerful stream of life. They instigated the cruel ignorant mob to plunder, confiscate and kill all those who bore the name of the Báb. Every day they would go to a house, so enraged that they would break its doors and windows, destroy the building and plunder and loot the contents. In the evening one would find the bodies of people dead in the streets and lanes and even scattered over neighboring mountains and plains. This continued and Ahmad's house was no exception. Ahmad then had to hide in a tower for forty days and the friends used to take him food and provisions.

Journey to the Abode of Peace

Finding life unbearable in Káshán and hearing that Baghdád had become a point of attraction, he decided to go there.

"And God calleth to the Abode of Peace (Baghdád) and He guideth whom

He will into the right way."⁵

In the darkness of the night, Ahmad emerged from his hiding place and scaled the walls of the city to make his way to Baghdád. He travelled on foot, full of love, enthusiasm and eagerness to behold the countenance of the One Whom God would make manifest. As he was walking, he came across another man travelling in the same direction. Afraid of being molested further, Ahmad tried to ignore the stranger, uttering not a word, but the man persisted in walking by his side. Taking great care never to even allude to the Faith or the purpose of his journey, Ahmad and his fellow-traveller reached their destination. On arrival in Baghdád, they separated and Ahmad immediately set out searching for the House of Bahá'u'lláh. When he found the House and entered therein, he found, to his utter astonishment, that his companion was there, too. He then understood that his friend was also a Bábi and had been on his way to attain the presence of the Blessed Beauty.

A Flame of Fire

The Story of the Tablet of Aḥmad
By A. Faizi

Part II

Aḥmad in Presence of Bahá'u'lláh

It was a breathtaking experience for a man like Aḥmad who all through his life had been searching for this immense spiritual Fountainhead. When for the first time he glanced at the youthful countenance of Bahá'u'lláh — a Face full of charm, freshness of color and penetrating powers, he was overwhelmed. He came to his senses only through the mirthful remark of the Ancient Beauty, "He becomes a Bábi and then hides in the tower!"

Bahá'u'lláh allowed him to remain in Baghdád and have his residence very close to the House. Aḥmad immediately installed his small clothmaking machine and was the happiest man in the world. What else does one expect? To live at the time of the Supreme Manifestation of God, adore Him, be loved by Him and be so close to Him in heart and soul and even in residence.

When once asked about the events of the years he spent in such close proximity to Bahá'u'lláh, with tears in his eyes he said, "How innumerable, how great and how immensely mighty were the events of those years. Our nights were filled with memorable episodes. Joyful and at times sorrowful were our experiences, yet beyond the power of anyone to describe. For example⁶ one day as the Blessed Beauty was walking, a certain government officer approached Him and reported that one of His followers had been killed and his body thrown on the river bank. The Tongue of Power and Might replied, "No one has killed him. Through seventy thousand veils of light We showed him the glory of God to an extent smaller than a needle's eye; therefore, he could not more bear the burden of his life and has offered himself as a sacrifice." When the caliph's decree was conveyed to Bahá'u'lláh and He had to leave Baghdád for Istanbul, He left the town on the thirty-second day after Naw-Rúz for the Riḍván Garden. On that same day the river overflowed and only on the ninth day was it possible for His family to join Him in the Garden. The river then overflowed a second time, and on the twelfth day it subsided and all went to Him. Aḥmad begged Bahá'u'lláh to be amongst His companions in exile, but Bahá'u'lláh did not accede to this request. He chose a few people and instructed the others to stay to teach and protect the Cause emphasizing that this would be better for the Faith of God. At the time of His departure, those who were left behind stood in a row and all were so overcome with sorrow that they burst into tears. Bahá'u'lláh again approached them and consoled them saying: "It is better for the Cause. Some of these people who accompany me are liable to do mischief; therefore I am taking them with Myself." One of the friends could scarcely control his anguish and sorrow. He addressed the crowd reciting this poem of Sa'dí:

"Let us all rise to weep like unto the clouds of the Spring Season. On the day when lovers are separated from their Beloved, one can even hear the lamentations of stones."

Bahá'u'lláh then said, "Verily this was said for this day." Then He mounted His horse and one of the friends placed a sack of coins in front of the saddle and Bahá'u'lláh started to distribute the coins to the bewailing poor who were standing by. When they ran to him and pushed one another, He plunged His hand in the sack and poured all the coins out saying, "Gather them yourselves!"

Aḥmad saw his Beloved disappear from his sight headed for an unknown destination. Little did he know that He was like unto the sun rising towards the zenith of might and power. Sad at heart and utterly distressed in soul, he returned to Baghdád, which to him seemed devoid of any attraction. He tried to make himself happy by gathering the friends and encouraging them to disperse and teach the Faith which had just been declared. Though actively serving the Cause, he was not happy. All that could keep him happy was nearness to his Beloved.

The Tablet is Revealed

After a few years he once again left his home and work and set out on foot towards Adrianople, the city of his love and desire.

When he reached Istanbul he received a Tablet from Bahá'u'lláh, now well known as "The Tablet of Aḥmad". He describes receipt of this Tablet as follows: "I received the Tablet of 'The Nightingale of Paradise' and reading it again and again, I found out that my Beloved desired me to go and teach His Cause. Therefore I preferred obedience to visiting Him."

He was specially commissioned to travel through Persia, find the old Bábi families and convey to them the new message of the Lord. Hence such glorious reference to the Báb in this Tablet. The task was arduous beyond description and therefore such exhortations as, "Be thou a flame of fire to My enemies and a river of life eternal to My loved ones and be not of those who doubt." The path to be pursued by him would be full of blood, thorns and hardships to be borne, but followed by such soul stirring promises of victory as "And if thou art overtaken by affliction in My path, or degradation for My sake, be not thou troubled thereby."

With this divine amulet in his possession — a small piece of paper which had been "invested by Bahá'u'lláh with a special potency and significance", and clad in the simple garments of a mendicant, Aḥmad made his way back to Persia. He entered the country from the district where the Báb had been imprisoned and martyred and crossed this region like unto the breeze of life. Many of the Bábis were thus enabled to see the sun then shining from Adrianople and even many of the Moslems embraced the Faith wholeheartedly.

"Glad Tidings of the Nearness of God"

Aḥmad became the embodiment of his own Tablet. Such persistence, undaunted spirit, tenacity and steadfastness as his are hardly to be found in any annals of the Cause. When he found a contact, although he suffered "afflictions and degradations", he would return again and again to finish that which had been left half discussed.

For example, when he was travelling throughout the Province of Khurásán, he went to the house of a very well-known Bábí family, the head of which was no less a person than Furúghí⁷ — one of the survivors of the Ṭabarsí upheaval. Aḥmad went in and gradually opened the subject and in very frank, vigorous and emphatic terms explained that the One to be manifested by God was none other than Bahá'u'lláh Whose light was then shining from the horizon of the "Remote Prison" — Adrianople.

Furúghí, who had so audaciously fought in Ṭabarsí, started a fight here too. The discussion became more intense as the hours went by. Furúghí became very angry, attacked Aḥmad, breaking one of his teeth and threw him out of the house.

Aḥmad left broken-hearted; but, undaunted, he later returned, knocked at the door and told them that he would not go until such time as the subject was fully discussed and some definite conclusions reached.

We must bear in mind that the Bábís were in such great danger that even a piece of paper bearing the verses of the Báb found in any house was enough for the house to be demolished and the inhabitants to be sent to prison or even to the field of martyrdom. Therefore many of the friends hid their books and writings in the walls of their houses. When Aḥmad went to Furúghí's house for the second time to resume the discussion, he said emphatically that the Greatest Name BAHÁ had very often been mentioned by the Báb in all His writings. Furúghí challenged the truth of this statement. To prove to Aḥmad that he was wrong, he tore a part of the wall down and brought out a bundle containing the writings of the Báb, and promised not to say a word against the explicit texts. Aḥmad says, "The very first one we opened referred to the name of Bahá." As promised, Furúghí and all the members of his family accepted the Faith of Bahá'u'lláh and became zealous defenders and very outstanding in its propagation and protection.

"A Flame of Fire"

After crossing all the lands of Khurásán, Aḥmad decided to go once more to Baghdád to convey the message of love and greetings on behalf of Bahá'u'lláh to all the friends of that very important city, but unfortunately on the way he again fell sick and could not reach Baghdád. In addition in Ṭihrán, some of the divines of Káshán recognized him and lodged complaints against him at the court of the King, who was ever ready to inflict hardship on the adherents of the new Faith. He was consequently arrested and committed to the hands of a certain young officer who was ordered to investigate the case and if he was sure that his victim had gone astray, to put him to death immediately.

The young officer did not wish to molest Aḥmad and therefore insisted that he should recant his Faith. Aḥmad says, "At that moment I was at the height of my faith and enthusiasm and never for one moment even thought of recanting." Ever ready to lay down his life in the path of the Cause, he served with such self-sacrifice he insisted that he was not a Bábí, but a Bahá'í, a follower of the Supreme Manifestation. He was detained and while in prison he heard of the sudden and severe illness of the officer's wife. In great fright and in extreme distress, the officer came to Aḥmad and said, "Should my wife recover, I will release you," and after three days the young man, heedless of the dire consequences to himself, took Aḥmad to the gate of Ṭihrán and set him free.

"A River of Life Eternal"

Released like a bird, he first went to the villages where some sifters of wheat were Bábís. They received him with the utmost love and courtesy. They offered him hospitality and he guided them to the right path of God and in great rejoicing Aḥmad left them and made his way to the Province of Fárs, the capital of which was Shíráz.

He lived in this Province for about a quarter of a century. He became the constant companion of the wronged and afflicted ones. He consoled them during times of persecution and gave them hope and vision of the ever-widening horizons of victories and triumphs.

It was through the old people of this district of Persia that this humble servant, the writer, came to hear the distant echoes of a glorious dervish living amongst the villagers and that he had been to them an angel of protection, guidance and mercy. Such rumors set me to search about him and then I found out that this adorable individual was our precious Aḥmad — a name now mentioned throughout the world with so much love and devotion.

Aḥmad received many of the travelling teachers who passed through this part of Persia and feasted with them in his humble abode, mentioning God, His Faith and recounting the experience of the many teachers who had been in those days quickening many souls.

One of the most touching incidents as related by himself was the following: "One day a man barely clad and almost barefooted came to the door of my house. He was utterly exhausted and worn out. His clothes were stiff and brownish with a mixture of dust and perspiration. He happened to be Ḥájí Mírzá Ḥaydar-'Alí.⁸ I immediately helped him to take off his clothes. I washed them and spread them in the sun to dry while he rested, waiting for the friends to come for a meeting."

"Steadfast in My Love"

The years passed by full of eventful days, but when the waves of persecution spread all over Persia, the friends in their love and admiration for Aḥmad endeavored to protect him against fatal attacks and after long consultations, they suggested to him that he immediately leave that forlorn and forsaken corner of the country for a more populated center. Wherever Aḥmad went, the friends suggested the same thing to him. He was so well known through the length and breadth of the country that his mere presence would cause agitation amongst the bigoted Muslims whose first arrows would be aimed at Aḥmad himself. After changing many places of residence many times, he settled in Ṭihrán. He never wavered, nor was he ever anything but that "flame of fire" and "the river of life eternal". After having lived one century always enjoying good health, he passed on to the presence of his Beloved in 1905 in Tīhrán.

As to the family of Aḥmad, he had two children: a son called Mírzá Muḥammad and a daughter Khánum Guhar. When Aḥmad's house was confiscated, Mírzá Muḥammad, his wife and children left the city of Káshán for Tīhrán. He, his wife and small daughter died on their way to Tīhrán. The traces of their graves — if any — are lost forever.

There remained only their son, Jamál, aged five. The mule drivers who used to take food from Provinces to Tīhrán, not knowing that Jamál was a son of Bábís, took pity on the forsaken and homeless child and placing him on one of the loads brought him to Tīhrán. In that great capital the poor child was left all alone and no one even told him of his glorious ancestry or of the Faith in the path of which the family had borne so many afflictions and untold hardships. He was left in this state until his aunt Khánum Guhar⁹ also went to Tīhrán. When Aḥmad reached the capital, he came to know of his grandson whom he loved very much. He took him under the wings of his own love and protection and Jamál grew to be an excellent Bahá'í. His most outstanding characteristic was his iron determination and his indefatigable energy. Nothing could ever deflect this man from the straight path of God, though to him it had always been narrow and strewn with thorns, blood and multifarious plights and calamities. Towards the end of his life, Aḥmad entrusted the original Tablet to Jamál who in turn, out of the purity of his heart and his devotion to the Faith of God offered it as a gift to Hand of the Cause, Trustee of Ḥuqúq, the son and brother of two illustrious martyrs, Jináb-i-Valíyú'lláh Varqá.¹⁰ When Jináb-i-Varqá, according to the instructions of the beloved Guardian attended the opening ceremony of the Temple in Wilmette during the Inter-continental Conference of the year nine (1953) he brought this most precious Tablet as his offering to the archives of the Bahá'ís of the United States. Now the beloved friends of that country are the trustees of this great gift of God to humanity.

9. As to Khánum Guhar, the glorious daughter of Aḥmad, she was a very active Bahá'í. The story of such a daring woman's history has only been briefly recorded. Such a mirror-like heart is rarely to be found.

For example, during the lifetime of Bahá'u'lláh there were some outstanding teachers who were almost worshipped by the friends. One of them, who had so many exalted letters from the Blessed Perfection, often went to Khánum Guhar's house and she respected him so much as to clean his shoes. It seems that such titles and extraordinary respect had turned the heads of some of them. They thought of assuming an independent rank in the Faith of God. One such person went to Khánum Guhar's house after the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh. When the hostess brought tea and sweets and stood at the door with folded hands in absolute respect and homage she found that the man had not taken any of the refreshments. He seemed to be gloomy and pensive. Khánum Guhar asked for the reason. "I must go to the Holy Land", he said, "and see to the affairs of the Cause myself. The Faith is left in the hands of a young man." He pronounced the last phrase with indignation and pride. Upon hearing these words, Khánum Guhar raised her voice saying, "Do you think Bahá'u'lláh did not know Whom to appoint after Himself?" She then entered the room and collected the tray of tea and sweets and in a very emphatic tone ordered the haughty and arrogant man to immediately leave the house. She then went to the neighboring Bahá'í families and advised them to be most careful about him till such time as they should receive definite instructions from the Most Great Branch.

The following example illustrates her purity of heart. She heard that a very young girl belonging to a Bahá'í family was in bed with severe illness. She went to her bedside and prayed to God saying, "O, my Lord I have had my share of life. Please take me and leave this child for her parents." The very same night she died and the patient became well.
