O thou who art firm in the Covenant!

Thy letter has been received. Praise be unto God, it indicates that through the presence of Jináb-i-Fáḍil a new book has been opened. It is my hope that the friends may receive at every moment a new spirit and so arise to act as they should have to.

I was very glad to learn that after the death of Mr Parmerton thou hast moved forth according to the call of the Teaching Committee; that thou hast severed thyself from the earthly world and those who live thereupon; that thou hast turned thine attention to the Kingdom of Abhá; that thou hast made the whole of the globe of earth thy home, and thou hast been spreading the breaths (teachings).

Offer thanks unto God that thou hast been thus confirmed; that consequently thou hast become favoured by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá; that thou art supplicating assistance and confirmation for the friends of God, and thou lovest all of them! Be thou assured that thou wilt be confirmed.

I supplicate God’s blessing upon thy revered sister and all thy family.

Unto thee be the Glory of Abhá!

Recent Tablets referring to the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár

To the maid-servant of God, Irene C. Holmes—Unto her be the Glory of God, the Most Glorious!—Care of Mr Roy C. Wilhelm.

HE IS THE MOST GLORIOUS!

O thou who art heavenly!

If, with the consultation of the Executive Board and its approval, thou shouldst polish the stone I laid in the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár and engrave on it, its story, so that it may become the corner-stone of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, it would be permissible. On the condition, however, that it would be with the approval of the Executive Board; because I have referred all the affairs of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár to the Convention. I hope that through the bounties of God, Mr Roy Wilhelm, Mr Remey, Mr Latimer, Mrs Corinne True and thou, all will be confirmed in the service of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.

Unto thee be Abhá Glory!

Translated by Rúhí M. Afnán, Haifa, Palestine, 25 June 1921.

Through the revered maid-servant of God, Mrs Corinne True, Chicago—to ____—Unto be greeting and praise!

HE IS GOD!

O thou who art a servant at the Threshold of God.

Thy letter has been received. From its flowers of significance the fragrance of truthfulness and straightforwardness was perceived. It is my hope that thou will remain in faith and in the Covenant firm and steadfast.

Thou hast touched upon the question [XII:13:219] of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár. The importance of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár cannot be confined within any measure or limit; because it is the first divine institution in that vast continent, and from this Mashriqu'l-Adhkár which is now in the process of construction, a hundred-thousand Mashriqu'l-Adhkárs will be born in the future. Therefore, it is very important. As its cost of construction, however, will amount to a huge sum of money, its construction cannot be accomplished in a short time.

Every meeting (in the Cause) whose formation is permitted and sanctioned by 'Abdu'l-Bahá is accepted and favoured by God, otherwise, it produces no result and bears no fruit, nay rather, it gives rise to the distraction of minds. I have no difference with anybody. I am busy in servitude to the Threshold of Bahá'u'lláh. Everybody who agrees with me, I feel attached to him.

Eternal life is characteristic of the human soul. The sacred souls are in the utmost harmony and joy with one another in the world of eternity. ... Strive thou as far as thou art able in the Divine Mine so that thou mayst discover heavenly jewels.

... Thou hast asked about the third Tajallí, which is about sciences, arts and industries. By these sciences and arts are meant those which are useful and are studied in Europe and America, such as geometry, chemistry, geography, all mathematics and other useful sciences.

In Persia, however, in that time such sciences had prevalence which were mere imaginations, but their names were great. They had termed them Hikmat-i-Ishráqí (a system of old philosophies). The people would busy themselves in the studying of these sciences and would take pains for thirty to forty years. At the end they would realize that their studies consisted of mere superstition and pure nonsense. Those helpless souls (students) would become disappointed and discouraged.

... I supplicate God to bestow upon thee great assistance and confirmation and to enable thee to enter the Kingdom of God; to be established in the school of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and to learn wisdom and servitude towards His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh. This is the divine school, this is the enlightened school and this is the heavenly school.

Unto thee be greeting and praise!

Latest tablet to Dr Dīyá’ M. Baghdádí

To his honour Dr Dīyá’ Afandí Baghdádí—Upon him be Bahá’u’l-Abhá!

HE IS GOD!

O thou who art firm in the Covenant:

Your letter has been received. You have written that some of the waverers had written to me letters and that I had written answers to them; that some have taken this as a proof that association with the waverers is permissible. This is the essence of error! For ‘Abdu’l-Bahá corresponds with all the people, even with the enemies. This emanates from his mercy and not for their merit.

One of the women of Chicago² has written me a letter. In the first sentence she asked, “Why do the friends associate with a person who is wicked?” In the second sentence she asked, “Why should the blessed souls shun the wicked souls?” In the first sentence she wrote this and in [XII:14:234] the second she wrote that. In short, an answer has been written and is enclosed in your letter. Read this to the Spiritual Assembly—the House of Spirituality—then give it to her and know this as the standard. Undoubtedly the unworthy souls must be shunned otherwise the morals will be entirely corrupted.

Upon thee be Bahá’u’l-Abhá!

Recent tablet from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

The maid-servant of God, Mrs Mary Hall, Chicago—Upon her be the Glory of God, the Most Glorious!

HE IS GOD!

O thou dear maid-servant of God!

Thy letter was received and the contents became known. I ask God to confer upon you new life. Thou hadst asked some questions; that why the blessed and spiritual souls, who are firm and steadfast, shun the company of degenerate persons. This is because, that just as the bodily diseases like consumption and cancer are contagious, likewise the spiritual diseases are also infectious. If a consumptive should associate with a thousand safe and healthy persons, the safety and health of these thousand persons would not affect the consumptive and would not cure him of his consumption. But when this consumptive associates with those thousand souls, in a short time the disease of consumption will infect a number of those healthy persons. This is a clear and self-evident question.

Likewise, if a thousand magnanimous persons associate with a degraded one, the perfection of those souls will not affect this debased person. On the contrary, this mean person will become the cause of their going astray. Therefore His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh says in the Tablets: “Soon will a foul odour be spread, shun it, so commandeth the Omniscient and the Wise. That is, in that [XII:14:234] city a stinking odour will soon be spread. You should avoid it. So are ye commanded by His Holiness the Knower and the Wise.” That foul odour is that of Violation. Also in the Tablet of Advice He says: “Now do not neglect your Sower, Protector and Educator; and do not choose and prefer others to Him, lest foul and poisonous winds should pass over you.”

His Holiness Christ says that the owner of the garden does not leave the dried tree, but certainly cuts it and throws it into the fire, because the dried wood is worthy and deserving of fire.

Again His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh says: “Then, O ye trees of the blessed garden of my bestowal, protect ye yourselves from the poison of the treacherous souls and the stinking winds, which are the association of the polytheist and the negligent ones. So that the trees of existence, through the bounty of the Worshipped (God) be not deprived of the blessed breaths and breezes of love.”

In the Persian Hidden Words He says: “O my son! The company of the wicked increaseth sorrow and the fellowship of the righteous removeth the rust of the mind.” And also He says: “Beware O Son of Dust! Walk not with the wicked and confederate not with him, for the companionship of the wicked changeth the light of Life into the fire of remorse.” This is the admonishment of His Holiness Christ and the advisements of His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh.

But your other questions are the proofs of this statement, and there is no need of answering. I pray for thee that thou mayest reach to such a condition that it may become the cause of attaining greatest bestowals. Read thou carefully thy first question. Thou seest that it is this same desire—that is why the friends associate with a reproachable person, and do not expel him.

Upon thee be the Glory of the Most Glorious!

“The candle of the Testament has illuminated all horizons in spite of the people of discord.”

Tablet to one of the Persian Bahá'ís

HE IS ABHÁ!

O thou who art firm in the Covenant!

The radiance of servitude shining from the Candle of the Testament has illumined all horizons in spite of the people of discord; and the renown of the Grandeur of the Blessed Perfection hath caused such an outcry throughout the world that it hath made the limbs of all nations quiver.

All the religions of the world have the loud cry of “Woe unto us” on their lips, and the cry of “Woe to our Faith”, which is raised by the ignorant, is heard in the East and West. The Power of the Blessed Cause has such effulgence that it has become apparent to all peoples, and all the nations and creeds have acknowledged and confessed the greatness of the Cause of God.

Had it not been for the injuries inflicted by the party of conceit (the náqidín), the world of existence would have been in this day an exalted garden. But the people of conceit, being heedless of this Cup of Wine mixed with Káfúr (a fountain intended to be drunk by the true and firm believers), have imagined that they can upset the Standard of the Testament, and that they can disappoint the delivered nations. They have poured forth seditious rumours on the lips and tongues of all people, and they have made calumniating statements, hoping by this means to darken the Light of the Sun of the Divine Covenant, and to mingle the contents of the Pre-Existent Cup of the Testament with the bitterness of Violation.

Far, far distant be it from them to do this!

Jesus Christ—May my soul be a sacrifice to Him!—had only a few followers at the time of His departure. Then, after His departure, all the kings of the world, philosophers of all nations, learned men of all races and wise men of all creeds, arose to suppress and degrade His Cause; but, finally, all the standards hoisted by those numerous nations were upset, and the Banner of Jesus Christ was fluttering on the loftiest mountain.

Now, praise be to God! that hundreds of thousands of souls have assembled under the Standard of the Covenant through the assistance of the Blessed Perfection. I declare by the Educator of the visible and invisible, it will be evidently witnessed that the descendants of the violators will think their descent as a disgrace, and will disown their fathers and forefathers, just as Akrama, the son of Abú-Jahl, kept clear of his father; and Khálid, the son of al-Walíd, left his father.

As these darkened souls (náqidín) have imagined that the Power of the Divine Testament is but a power of man, and that the Edifice of the Covenant is as one of the baseless foundations of the material world, they are plotting to destroy this Divine Edifice with all intrigues and machinations.

Praise be to God! that the power of Nero, the great Roman emperor, proved impotent to withstand the Cause of Christ; while these weak souls are plotting to resist the Power of the Covenant of God. “Wherefore, take example from them, O ye who have eyes.”

The final result of all the influence, insolence, deception, intrigue and machinations planned by the people of conceit (náqidín) will be this: to cause the few drops of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s blood to be shed, and thus be delivered from this narrow and degraded world, to soar up to the Court of the Greatest Mercy in the Shadow of the Kingdom of Abhá!

O my God! Let this draw nigh unto me and give me to drink from this cup [XII:14:236] which is overflowing with Thine Ancient Choice Wine; cause me to taste of the sweetness of this manifest prosperity, and crown me with the diadem of this great Favour. I yearn for this state! I thirst after this Fountain of Life! And “they who act unjustly shall know hereafter with what treatment they shall be treated.” They desire to cause my death, although the endurance of the material body, of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is a strongly fortified fortress for their protection, and every knowing man testifies of this.

Unity through firmness in the Covenant—the only path to Bahá’í unity

... [XII:14:236]

“One thing I ask of you for your own good, and that you must do if you wish to gain the blessing. It is this: To stand firm in the faith, without any wavering. Whatever troubles may come to you or to any of the believers, do not let your faith be affected by them in the slightest degree, but stand as firm as a rock. Be like Mary Magdalene, whose faith was so strong that it was never shaken, even for a moment, when Christ was put to death; but with steadfast faith in him she went to his discouraged disciples and renewed and rekindled in their hearts the wavering light of their faith by reminding them of the promise their Lord had made to them of his constant presence, and showing them that it was really of little consequence whether he was with them in the body or not. She so encouraged and strengthened them by her words that their faith was confirmed; they became strong as lions and went out teaching in all directions, and by the power of God working through them, the knowledge of God spread all over the earth. Now in the eternal Kingdom their names shine as the most brilliant stars. Even here on this earth their names are remembered with love and reverence by millions. So the best thing I can desire of you is to stand firm in the faith, even if you hear of the most great troubles and sorrows—even if you were to hear that I had been killed or crucified, as Christ was 1,900 years ago, let not your faith be in any wise troubled or shaken. Arise for the work of God and His Cause, and you shall see His mighty power working in you, and you will conquer all things; and remember, whether I am on earth or not, my presence will be with you always. But work as if you were all but one soul and one spirit living in different bodies.”

“The subject of the Covenant is a very important one”

Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Verily, the Lord hath manifested Himself in this new and wonderful age with the greatest bounty and mercy, which hath never been preceded and whereof the eye of existence hath never seen the like; and it is His Great Covenant and New Testament, as appointed by the trace of His Supreme Pen, through which, and according to clear ordinances and explicit statements, the matter was plainly shown and the branches (sons), twigs (relations), kinsmen and beloved were commanded to obey the “appointed Centre of the Covenant”. But the Covenant of God and His Testament is a bounty to the righteous and a curse to the wicked. (p. 438.)

Strive so that the odour of violation cease and all come under the protection of the Covenant. (p. 150.)

From the Tablets of Abdul-Baha Abbas.

The subject of the Covenant is a very important one. It is referred to in all the Holy Books; in the Hindu, in the Zoroastrian, and more clearly found in the Old and New Testament of the Gospels and of the Qur'án.

These Covenants referred to in the Holy Books, focalize in the great Covenant of the Bahá'í dispensation, namely, the Covenant witnessed by Bahá'u'lláh in His day.

How have the Covenants become manifest in the days of Bahá'u'lláh?

To illustrate this we will say that just as a certain tree, even before it bears its particular fruit, is known by its former fruit that it is an apple or a pear, or some other fruit, and when that special fruit appears on its branch, it witnesses thereto. Likewise the Covenants taken in former ages were identified by the one established in the great day of Bahá'u'lláh. Hence Bahá'u'lláh was the witness of the Covenants given in former ages by the Lord. The Centre of these Covenants entered into by the people of former ages with the God of Might and Power and witnessed by Bahá'u'lláh is the beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Therefore all the former statements pertaining to the Covenant including the emphatic utterances of the blessed witness, refer to the Centre, namely 'Abdu'l-Bahá. All references to the Testament or Covenant mean especially the Book of the Covenant.

In this His last book, the blessed Bahá'u'lláh has covenanted with his branches (Aghṣán), twigs (Afnán), and the relatives, as well as all the Bahá'ís in the world, that they must turn to the One "Whom God has willed", that is the Centre of the Covenant, 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

This is the meaning of the Mystery of God, according to the terminology of the One who has given the Mystery of God, or he whom God has willed; but who, according to himself, is known as 'Abdu'l-Bahá (the servant of God).

He whom God has willed is the fruit of the tree. Hence Bahá'u'lláh is the trunk, the branches, the root, all except the fruit, which is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The colouring, the shape, the form, taste and all the attributes of the tree are in the fruit.

"Hence in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh the bounties of Bahá'u'lláh, the manifestation of His power, His words, have been spread throughout the world by this great soul. The effects of His words have been realized from this great life. This is the meaning of the statement of Jesus Christ—"I shall come in the glory of my Father!"

"I am with you always"

Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

I say unto you that anyone who will rise up in the Cause of God at this time shall be filled with the Spirit of God, and that He will send His hosts from heaven to help you and that nothing shall be impossible to you if you have faith. And now I give you a commandment which shall be for a covenant between you and me—that ye have faith; that your faith be steadfast as a rock that no storms can move, that nothing can disturb, and that it endure through all things even to the end; even should ye hear that your Lord has been crucified, be not shaken in your faith; for I am with you always, whether living or dead, I am with you to the end. As ye have faith so shall your powers and blessings be. This is the standard—this is the standard—this is the standard.

"Now is the separation, O longing ones!"

Words of Bahá'u'lláh.

Chanted in commemoration of the Ascension of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

HE IS GOD!

The nightingale of separation (perching) on the branch of the horizon (of the word) is warbling (saying): Verily, this is a separation, O longing ones!

The bird of fidelity is singing from the tree of eternity, saying: Now is the separation, O longing ones!

The dove of parting is cooing from the Sadrat¹ of separation, saying: O longing ones, the separation has come!

Say: Verily, the time of union is over and the separation has come through Divine decree; and this is a separation, O longing ones!

The tears are flowing from the eyes of the people of eternity from among the Supreme Concourse on account of this separation, O longing ones!

The breeze of joy has ceased to blow from the garden of Light on account of this separation, O longing ones!

By God, Verily, the faces of those that are occupying high balconies have turned pale on account of this separation, O longing ones!

The joy of life of everything between the heaven and the earth has changed on account of this separation, O longing ones!

The huris² tinged their eyes with tears of blood, when they heard the announcement of this separation, O longing ones!—and they will not adorn themselves with the robes of eternity when they hear the announcement of this separation, O longing ones!

Verily, this is a sorrow with which no sorrow in the kingdom of spirituality can be compared, for the breezes of separation have blown, O longing ones!

Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to early American Bahá’ís

Farewell words to the first party of American pilgrims, ‘Akká, 1898, from “An early pilgrimage”.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá turned suddenly to us, and raising his voice in a tone so poignant that it pierced every heart, he stretched his hands above us and said: “Now the time has come when we must part, but the separation is only of our bodies, in spirit we are united. Ye are the lights which shall be diffused; ye are the waves of that sea which shall spread and overflow the world. Each wave is precious to me and my nostrils shall be gladdened by your fragrance. Another commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another even as I love you. Great mercy and blessings are promised to the people of your land, but [XII:16:254] on one condition; that their hearts be filled with the fire of love, that they live in perfect kindness and harmony like one soul in different bodies, like one soul in different bodies. If they fail in this condition the great blessings will be deferred. Never forget this; look at one another with the eye of perfection; look at me, follow me, be as I am; take no thought for yourselves or your lives, whether ye eat or whether ye sleep, whether ye are comfortable, whether ye are well or ill, whether ye are with friends or foes, whether ye receive praise or blame; for all of these things ye must care not at all. Look at me and be as I am; ye must die to yourselves and to the world, so shall ye be born again and enter the kingdom of heaven. Behold a candle how it gives light. It weeps its life away drop by drop in order to give forth its flame of light. ... The time has come when we must part, but the separation is only of our bodies; in spirit we are united forever.”

From Utterances of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to Pilgrims in 1905.

“If you should receive news in America that I have been thrown into the sea or carried away to an unknown place, if you should receive word that I have been tortured and killed—change not, grieve not; nay, rather, be more firm, be more rejoiced, and let your steadfastness grow and increase. For our meeting-place is the Kingdom of God. There shall we meet. I am always in great danger. Perhaps in an hour a telegram may come and everything here be changed. Therefore, hold fast to the Cause of God; be firm, whether I am in this world or not. Wherever I may be—here or in the next world—I will always ask assistance for you.”

Extract from a Tablet from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá dated 30 December 1905.

“If thou question regarding the trials and difficulties of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá—that is a sea boundless, full of storms and surging. But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is in perfect peace and composure and in complete joy and happiness and tranquillity; nay, it is for him a ready banquet and an adorned feast. I hope that at the end of this feast and banquet the overflowing chalice of martyrdom will come around to him, and then will he be intoxicated by that wine.

“But as to you. You must not look at the catastrophes of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Consider power and strength, and withstand the world for the sake of the love of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Bear the persecution of the enemies and the blame of those who oppose. Under all conditions My soul and My life shall abide with you in this world as well as the world above.”

“The Master and his whole family narrowly escaped crucifixion”

Letter from Major W. Tudor-Pole.

London, England,
2 December 1921.

To the Star of the West,

We have not cabled to you this week in any official way, as the news from Haifa will have reached you direct by cable as soon as it came here, and our hands have been pretty full in doing all in our power to make the arrangements which are referred to in the enclosed memorandum.¹

The writer, on behalf of the English friends, and on his own behalf, would like to join with the American friends in prayer and praise for a great and noble life wonderfully lived and finally crowned by a peaceful passing into the Wider Realms. Probably there is no one who knows so well as the present writer that the Master and his whole family narrowly escaped crucifixion on the Mount of Carmel two days before we entered Haifa in August 1918. This tragic event was only frustrated by the unexpectedly swift advance of Allenby’s troops, which forced the Turkish authorities out of Haifa before they even had time to carry out their terrible threat, or to take the Master and his family with them into the hills as hostages. Knowing all the facts at first hand, I can join with the friends throughout the world in thanksgiving that the last few years of the Master’s life were spent in comparative peace and tranquillity, and that his passing over was not marred by any tragic or untoward events.

Shoghi Rabbani and his sister will be returning to Haifa towards the end of the present month, and they will be accompanied by Lady Blomfield, and by Ḍiyá'u'lláh Aṣgharzádiḥ.

We have not yet received any further details from Haifa beyond the first cablegram, dated 3 pm, 28–11–21, as follows: “His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ascended to Abhá Kingdom. Inform friends. (signed) Greatest Holy Leaf”, but we expect further news hourly and daily, and shall be only too glad to share with you all that is received.

Although it is perhaps early days to discuss the matter, I anticipate that the [XII:16:253] American friends will be considering the production of a Memoir, and if the present writer, or any of the other friends in London who have recently been in the East, can be of service in helping you with the material for this volume, we shall be pleased. We are, of course, not satisfied with the references that have been made in the Times, Morning Post, Daily Mail, and other papers to the event, but we have done the best we could, and so far as the New York World was concerned, writer saw their representative here late last night, and he hopes that the cable that was sent out to New York was of an accurate and satisfactory character.

The pressure here is so great that at the moment we cannot enter into further details, much as we should like to do so—this is simply a note to assure the American friends that we are one with them in profound sympathy, as is indeed the case with friends throughout the world. Yours in faith and friendship,

W. Tudor-Pole.

The Ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá¹

Account from newspapers and letters, received and translated by Dr Ḍiyá’ M. Baghdádí, December 1921, Chicago.²

“THE MOST GREAT CALAMITY—THE DEPARTURE OF THE PERSONIFICATION OF HUMANITARIANISM, ‘ABDU’L-BAHÁ ‘ABBÁS.”

His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás departed from this earthly world and ascended to the Most Glorious Abhá Kingdom, 28 November at 1:30 am, 1921, at Haifa, Palestine. The funeral was on Tuesday, 29 November at 9 am.

The funeral procession of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá—The momentous hour.

When the clock struck nine, Tuesday morning, 29 November 1921, the wide street, Allenby Road, was congested with the crowds from its starting place to the summit of Mount Carmel. The hearts were throbbing, the breasts heavy, the tongues dumb. Quietness and homage prevailed and the throng was a solid mountain. In the front ranks of those who came to pay the last tribute of love and farewell were Sir Herbert Samuel, the Governor-General of the Holy Land, and the members of his staff, who came from Jerusalem to attend the funeral. Mr Sims, the Governor of Phoenicia, the Consuls of all the Governments, the Mu- [XII:17:261] slim, the Christian and Jewish religious leaders, his relatives and his followers, who were burning with their grief, shedding their tears, throwing themselves on his casket, giving their last kisses to it—those kisses so filled with heat and yearning that they would restore life and bring back the soul to the stilled body if life could be restored and the soul could be brought back. Then, when they withdrew from that thrilling stand and painful scene, their sobs and moans were raised. Their cries and tears burst forth as the casket, with what it contained of Wisdom, Eloquence and Knowledge, was carried on the palms of the hands of the men.

The casket was of plain white wood covered with precious Persian shawls. The procession moved, surrounded by the crowd of onlookers and encircled by the sorrowful hearts. In the fore ranks was a company of police and their officers; then the Muslim and the Christian Boy Scouts with bands and flags; then the personal guards of the Consuls; then the leaders of the various Muslim sects were in front of the casket, chanting heart-touching hymns. Behind the casket marched the Governor-general and his staff with utmost dignity. The procession proceeded with perfect order until it arrived half way up the summit of Mount Carmel; then all stood silent, immovable, as if birds were perched upon their heads.

Notwithstanding the uphill climb none showed any signs of fatigue until they arrived at the Tomb of the Báb. It was then 10:20 am. The casket was placed on a dais near the high and majestic Tomb which commanded the most beautiful view on Mount Carmel. The Governor-general and his staff, the learned and the leaders of all sects made a ring by standing around the casket. When all the people in the procession had arrived at the Tomb, it made a scene such as Haifa had never witnessed before.

Eulogies given by the leaders and the poets of the Muslims, Christians and Jews of the Holy Land.

Yusúf Afandí al-Khaṭīb, a famous Muslim orator, was the first speaker. He said: “O Arab and Persian gentlemen: Why do I see you gathered here? What are you contemplating and of what are you thinking? Is it of death, or the living dead? Every day caravans of dead men pass before your eyes, yet you do not pay attention to them. Then for whom are you weeping? Is it for the one who was great yesterday and today in his departure is greater? Is it for the one whom you call your guide and philosopher? There should be no weeping for the one who departed to the eternal world. Then weep for the loss of bounty and courtesy! Mourn for the loss of knowledge and generosity! Weep for yourselves because you are the losers! As to him whom you have lost, he is no other than one departed from your mortal world to the immortal and everlasting realm. Weep for one hour for the one who has wept for you for eighty years. Look right and left, East and West, and tell me the true news. What a vacancy has taken place in nobility and dignity; what a pillar of peace has tottered; what a fluent and eloquent tongue has become silent! Ah me! Calamity is devoid of a grief-stricken heart and weeping eye; it has left you young people to mourn your elders, and made you elders to mourn your youth! Woe unto the poor, for charity has left them! Woe unto the orphans, for their merciful father has gone away from them! Would that Sir ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás could be redeemed by precious souls, for then they would be sacrificed to him! But this is the will of God, and nothing can stop it. Which one of his perfect deeds can I mention to you when they are greater than can be mentioned and more than can be counted! It is sufficient to say [XII:17:262] that in every heart he has left a glorious trace and on every tongue a beautiful mention. One who leaves behind him such a glorious history and eternal memory is, indeed, not of the dead! O family of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! Console yourselves with patience, because it is impossible for an oriental or an occidental to comfort you and not find himself in more need of consolation!”

Ibrahim Effendi Nassar¹ (one of the most celebrated Christian writers) was the second speaker. He said: “I wept for the departure of my Master and anyone like me will weep for the departure of his Master.’ For whom is this mourning and shock? What is this weeping and crying? What has happened to the people? Has a mountain sunk into the earth? Or has the earth quaked? No; not this, nor that. It is that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the great soul of bestowal, has departed. ‘They took him out and all are weeping. It is like the shock of Moses when Mount Tôr¹ fell.’ O what a calamity is this! It is a national loss and an universal ordeal, for the roots of the heart are cut out and in such a thrilling moment the garments are rent asunder. O my burning heart! In the passing away of the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the mountain of charity and generosity has fallen! The echo of his departure sounds in all parts of the world. Therefore humanity is painfully suffering; the tongues are repeating the mentioning of his abundant bounties; the eyes are weeping, and the hearts are bleeding! Ah me! ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lived about eighty years and the miracle of his life was like the lives of the prophets. He has trained, taught, assisted, rescued and guided the souls to the straight path. He brought upon the people great glory. O people, listen: ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is not dead, nor is the light of Bahá’u’lláh extinguished. Far from it. His rays will ever remain shining. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the beloved of Bahá’u’lláh, has lived a life from which emanated the significances of the mortal. Therefore, the spiritual took the place of his physical life. And he ascended from this world to the Paradise of the Lord as a pure angel accompanied by his good deeds and his sublime attributes. Yea, O my people! You are taking the body of the great one whom we have lost to its last resting-place, but rest assured that your ‘Abdu’l-Bahá will remain forever living among you in the spirit, in his words, in his sayings, in his qualities and in all the essences of his life. We are bidding farewell to our physical ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, as his physical body disappears from our sight, but our spiritual ‘Abdu’l-Bahá will never leave our minds, our thoughts, our hearts, and his mention will never depart from our lives. O ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! O thou great and generous one! Thou art resting now. Thou didst bestow life upon us, guided us and taught us. Thou hast lived among us, great, with all that the word greatness means. Verily, we glory in thy deeds and thy sayings. Thou didst raise the station of the East to the highest pinnacle of glory. Thou didst perform and complete thy efforts. Therefore thou hast gained the crown of Majesty. O ye branches of the Tree of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! I come to you. I am the sorrowful one. I ask my Lord to bestow upon you a beautiful comfort and to console us by protecting you.”

Professor Muḥammad Murád Muftí, Muslim Judge of the Judicial Law and the Muslim Chief of Haifa, was the third speaker. He said: “When nations lose one of their great men, whether he is great in his knowledge or great in his generosity or great in his politics or great in his principles and his benevolence, they comfort themselves in this: that there must come out from among their sons a genius who will become a successor to that great departed man. But the calamity of the world of [XII:17:263] humanity in the loss of the benevolent ‘Abdu’l-Bahá cannot be compared to any other calamity, because his vacancy will never be filled by any of the people. I do not like to exaggerate in praising this great personage, because his generous hands in the path of service to humanity and his philanthropic deeds none can deny, save one whose eyes God has blinded. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was great in all the stages of his life. He was genius itself, high in character and had the best reputation. He was famous in the East of the earth and in the West. He possessed this exalted station through his untiring work and he gained the highest place in the hearts through his help to the helpless, his rescue of the hopeless and his comfort to the afflicted. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was a great, learned and remarkable professor. Even if his physical body has disappeared from the eyes, his immortal deeds will never disappear from the minds. Even if the physical ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has passed away, his name will never pass away. O thou benevolent one who art departed! Thou hast lived greatly and thou hast departed great! This big and majestic procession and this overwhelming gathering is only a brilliant proof of thy greatness in life and in death. But who is to help the poor after thee, O thou whom we have lost? Who is to assist the hungry and the distressed? Nay, rather, who is to succour the widows and the orphans after the departure of the one who is the embodiment of goodness, kindness and humanitarianism? Then rest thou comfortably in thy resting-place. Thou knowest what is the end of the life of one possessed of such qualities. Verily, he is a miracle in his deeds and eternal in his work. May God inspire thy family and relatives with beautiful patience in this great calamity.”

Professor ‘Abdu’lláh Afandí Mukhlis̄ (one of the distinguished, learned Muslims) was the fourth speaker. He said: “Have you seen the sun set, the disappearance of the moon and the falling of the stars? Have you heard of the crumbling of the thrones, the levelling of the mountains? Have you felt the thrilling and dreadful tragedies that are caused by the accidents that occur in experimental innovations that make the souls and the hearts and the bodies tremble? All such tragedies cannot be mentioned in comparison with our most great calamity for which it behoves us to rend our hearts. ... Yea, the sun of knowledge has set; the moon of virtues has disappeared; the throne of glory has crumbled, and the mountain of kindness is levelled by the departure of this benevolent one from the mortal world to the immortal realm. I do not need to explain the sublimity of the great one whom we have lost or to enumerate his great qualities, for all of you who are just are witnesses and can testify to what has been given him of personal beauty, beauty of his character, greatness of his heart, vastness of the sea of his knowledge and generosity. Alas! who after him will feed the hungry, clothe the naked, rescue the distressed, guide those astray, help the widows, assist the orphans and satisfy those who thirst for knowledge from his pure fountain and beautiful rose-gardens? Nay, rather, who will after him address the meetings, stand in the pulpits, use the pen and paper? All are left without their only banner, their incomparable hero and their shining moon. I beg your pardon if I fail in doing my duty as far as faithfulness is concerned or if I am unable to pay the generous one who has departed what he deserves of the best and highest praise, because what my tongue utters has emanated from a tender memory and broken heart. Indeed, they are wounds and not words; they are tears and not phrases.

And you, O Bahá’í gentlemen! This is [XII:17:265] not your calamity alone. Nay, rather, it is a blow to Islám, and a calamity for the whole world, of the past and the present. The teachings of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá are spread in the East of the earth and in the West and the Bahá’ís, who are very numerous, join with us in this commemoration. O, I can well imagine what the Bahá’ís are going through today when they receive the shocking news by cablegrams. O how they are seeking patience, but are not finding it; asking for consolation, but cannot gain it, and looking for comfort, but cannot find the way. Therefore the sacred countries of H̄ijáz, Egypt, Damascus and Persia that have produced this precious jewel and priceless pearl, is sharing with the Holy Land its grief and sorrow for the generous one who has departed and now is resting in the heart of Mount Carmel, the dwelling-place of Elijah and Joshua and the rest of their prophet brethren. May God send upon us and unto you reward and recompense, bestow upon us and unto you patience for this calamity. “This calamity has made all previous calamities to be forgotten. But this calamity will never be forgotten.”

Shaykh Yúnis Afandí al-Khaṭīb (a noted Muslim poet) was the fifth speaker. He recited a poem that he composed: “God has ordained the departure of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, who is the Lord of virtues, perfections and wisdom. The people are weeping and mourning because of the separation from the one who was the eye of all time. He planted favours in his sublime rose-garden. They grew and bore sweet fruits. The creatures are the collective witnesses of his perfections and deeds that surpassed everything. ...”

His honour Bishop Bassilious (the leader and head of the Greek Catholic Church of Haifa) was the sixth speaker. The Bishop spoke in the praise of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, especially mentioning his remarkable, majestic personality and his matchless philanthropic deeds toward the poor.

Wadí’ Afandí Bustání (one of the brightest Christian youths and poets) was the seventh speaker. He recited a poem that he composed: “In the souls and in the minds thou art immortal. One like thee, who has all perfections, virtues and honours, is eternal. ... [XII:17:265] For thy departure they are weeping in grief. In their hearts thou art, and thou art their hope. In their eyes thou art ever present, and so is thy father, Bahá'u'lláh. 'Akká has embraced him (Bahá'u'lláh) in its delightful place, Bahjí; and Haifa has opened its bosom for thy tomb, 'Abdu'l-Bahá. O 'Abdu'l-Bahá, son of Bahá'u'lláh! Men die, but their names live. O 'Abdu'l-Bahá, O son of Bahá'u'lláh! May my soul be a sacrifice to one like thee. Thou art the all-wise, and all else beside thee are only learned. What can the poets say in thy day? Thou hast dawned in the West—then its morning appeared. They have seen thy light from afar and we are flooded with thy effulgence. O 'Abdu'l-Bahá, O son of Bahá'u'lláh! Thou wert just as God wanted thee to be and not as others wished. Thou hast departed in the Holy Land wherein Christ and the Virgin Mary lived. The land that received Muḥammad; the land the dust of which is blessing and wealth. The land we consecrate, even if it oppresses. Therein is a paradise and a heaven. The tombs of the saints shall not be degraded; the souls will be their sacrifice. We shall be sustained by this Tomb and the One it contains. The covenant of love and devotion will remain forever between us. ...”

Mr Salomon Bouzaglo (one of the most progressive Jewish leaders in Haifa) was the eighth speaker. He spoke in French. He said: “It is very strange in this infidel, faithless and absolutely materialistic age that there should appear such a great philosopher as the one whom we mourn, 'Abdu'l-Bahá. It is he who speaks to the hearts and consciences, satisfies the thirsty souls with his teachings and principles which are known to be the best foundation for all religions. He knew how to convince, with his words and explanations—the greatest orthodox of the age. As to his life, it was the living example of self-sacrifice, preferring the good and the welfare of others to his own. Blessed are those who were near him, for they have read in him the greatest page of religious and social philosophy. Since the days of Aristotle until this day all philosophers and social reformers have been fanatically using every means to uphold their own sectarian and limited theories, and woe unto whomsoever disagreed with them. But here with 'Abdu'l-Bahá there is no prejudice of any kind. All men are brothers. Here is found the essence of humanitarianism and the best principles of all the religions. The Jewish, Christian and Muslim prophets who were seeking to establish such a spiritual brotherhood are in this day stretching their arms to embrace the Prophet 'Abdu'l-Bahá and his sacred principles. The philosophy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is plain and simple, but it is big and comprehensive. It conforms to every human taste and by its virtues all prejudices and superstitions vanish. ... The philosophy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is original. It is logical, reasonable and scientific. It is clearly evident that the age needs such a philosophy. In spite of our dependence upon the power of inventions, discoveries and scientific researches, human hearts are singing the melodies of universal peace. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and before him Bahá'u'lláh, have carried on their shoulders this glorious work—the establishment of universal peace. There are two factors, two things that always separated or differentiated the East from the West. On one hand you see the West striving to discover the secrets of nature, to bring out the hidden things and make science grow by all that it can, through inventions and discoveries. On the other hand, you see the East as the dawning-place of the great prophets, the founders of religions and law-givers. They spread and grow and the hearts and the souls become filled with their spiritual lights. Therefore the East and the West are rivals. The first is exalted [XII:17:266] by its religions, and the second by its inventions. Both are essential for the life of our body politic. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has departed at Haifa, Palestine, the Holy Land, wherein the prophets appeared throughout centuries and ages, and this fact has been demonstrated today in the departure of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. We are not the only ones who are weeping for him in whom we take pride. Nay, rather, there are many in Europe and America and in all the world who thirst for his universal principles which are conducive to real brotherhood, who are weeping, too, for missing 'Abdu'l-Bahá. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has departed after remaining some forty years in the Turkish prison city 'Akká. Baghdád, the capital city of the 'Abbásid kings, also had witnessed his and his father's imprisonment. As to Persia, the ancient cradle, it had rejected its children! Does not it seem that there is a divine wisdom in all these affairs in specializing the Holy Land to be, as it always has been and always shall be, the source of higher and more spiritual idealism?"

Shaykh As'ad Shuqayr (a most prominent Muslim scholar and statesman) was the ninth speaker. He said: "The ancient and modern Muslim Arabs have been accustomed to hold ceremonies to eulogize their departed ones for certain purposes: (1) To teach some good lessons to those who are present and can hear; (2) To awaken the heedless and the negligent; as the prophet Muḥammad once said to Omar, 'Death is a sufficient teacher'; (3) To encourage the hearers to follow in the steps of the departed one and to characterize themselves with his excellent morals and good deeds; (4) To comfort his family and his people by mentioning of his sublime qualities; then the hearts will sympathize with them and this will lighten some of the heavy burden of the painful calamity; (5) That every thoughtful soul may gain according to his capacity and insight; it should be evident that every creature voluntarily lives and goes about; thinks, assists, teaches and administers; often, with the assistance of his Creator, he investigates the Manifestations of his perfection. Then the end comes. I am grieved over such eulogies. The Master, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, is considered one of the inhabitants of 'Akká because these inhabitants lived with him for more than forty years. His meetings were meetings of learning wherein he explained all the heavenly books and traditions. His philosophy includes all philosophy, ancient and modern. His philanthropies to the widows and orphans were never interrupted. Whenever a friend of his passed away he never forgot the survivors with his charity and generosity. He had so great a station; yet he never failed to help the distressed! In the winter season he met with the learned and notables of 'Akká at the home of Shaykh 'Alíy-i-Mírí, and in the summer the meetings were held in a court in the Fákúrah¹ (near the home of Bahá'u'lláh). In both of those meetings the attendants found him a book of history, a commentary on all the heavenly Scriptures, a philosophy of the pages of contemporary events that pertain to scientific or artistic topics. Then he moved to Haifa, and then went to Europe and America where he gave comprehensive and eloquent addresses and exhortations. His intention was to bring about unity among religions and sects and to remove the severe strife from their hearts and from their tongues, to urge them to take hold of the essence and let go the nonessential. He did that by presenting his message in a scientific manner. A group of Persians and others criticized him and found fault with his ideals in pamphlets they published and spread. Nevertheless, without paying any attention to their criticism and oppositions, nor being hurt by their hatred and enmity, he [XII:17:267] went forward and proclaimed his teachings. It is the law of God among His creatures—a law which will not be changed—that the originator and declarer of principles must inevitably have those who agree and praise and those who disagree and reject."

Muḥammad Afandí Şafádí (a highly educated Muslim poet) composed and read a poem:

"On Sunday night heaven was opened and the spirit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá flew with its glory.

It was received and entertained by the prophets.

He was washed by the Water of Paradise.

All the people reverently walked for him, even the Kings and their Governors.

O Mount Carmel, thou art now more proud than the heaven, for thou hast become the holiest mountain.

'Abdu'l-Bahá, thou art now missed by those thou didst care for; thou didst cure their ailments and thou wert their remedy.

I shall weep with tears for thee as long as I am living; how often thou didst wipe them with thy hands;

It is befitting that the creatures should weep for thee, because in thy departure they have lost their moon and intelligence.

God is great: Adam, Moses, Christ and Muḥammad have sung praises to thy soul, yearning for its meeting.

If I could, I would have composed a poem of the jewels of the stars for the praise of the people of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.”

“The beloved Master knew beforehand when he would leave us”

Letter from Munavvar Khánum, daughter of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, to Ruth Wales Randall, Boston.

Haifa, Palestine, 22 December 1921.

My beloved sister,

Though overwhelmed by grief, yet we are confirmed in the Covenant, assured of His nearness and loyal to His blessed Cause and to His Love.

We are spending these wonderful days of our greatest sorrow in utmost resignation to His holy will—for we know death can never separate us from Him nor can it affect our strong faith in Him.

We beg our beloved sisters and brothers and implore them to arise with us in perfect union and love to serve Him—obeying every single command in His Holy Testament with utmost devotion. For, dear sister, today is the day in which we must prove our sincerity, love and loyalty. For I feel we especially who have lived with Him, and you who have seen and known Him personally—as well as all the Bahá’ís in general, have a great responsibility now. Therefore we must first throw away the self and sacrifice everything for the sake of His Cause—we must wish for nothing but the welfare of the Cause.

The beloved Master knew exactly beforehand when he would leave us. The reason I know this so certainly is on account of a dream which he had about two weeks before the end (the dream was that Bahá’u’lláh appeared to him and said: “Destroy this room in which you are” the “room” being his blessed body), and also because he requested us to send for Shoghi Effendi to come back from Oxford, England, “for a very great and important reason,” as he said. He also gave us many hints of his approaching departure.

On Saturday, 26 November, he had fever, which left him entirely by the next morning. As soon as he felt the fever he called me and said: “This is very serious. This is the beginning now.” On Sunday (the 27th) he seemed quite natural and at 5 pm received several visitors. The last of these was an Englishman and he gave him a present of Persian handkerchiefs. He retired to rest about 8:30 and at mid-night was resting quietly. At a quarter past one he felt difficulty in breathing and at 1:30 am, Monday morning (the 28th), everything was over. There was not the least agitation or agony. It was so calm that we could not realize that he was going. The funeral took place on Tuesday, the 29th, at 9 am. Everyone who could possibly do so came from ‘Akká and Haifa and walked in the procession. The High Commissioner, Sir Herbert Samuel, came up especially from Jerusalem to attend and insisted on walking the whole way to the Tomb of the Báb, where is the present resting place of the body of our Beloved One. The Governor of Jerusalem, the Governor of Haifa and many [XII:18:276] people of all faiths—Muslims, Christians, Jews and Druses—were present, a representative of each of these great faiths gave an address beside the Tomb. These speeches were really the embodiment of His own teaching. These men spoke so highly of the beloved Master and said so much that there was nothing left for the Bahá'ís to add.

He has written His last instructions enclosed in an envelope addressed to Shoghi Effendi—therefore we cannot open it until he arrives, which will be, we hope, about the end of this month, as he is now on his way here.

Dear sister, we ought to prepare ourselves in order to obey every single word which these instructions contain—and if we are assisted from the Kingdom of Abhá to do this then His departure will be no loss to the Cause but rather a gain, as His spirit will now be free to help us universally!

Best greetings from my aunt, my mother and sisters to you and to all the dear friends, with great appreciation of your letters of condolence and sympathy. Yours affectionately in His Name, (Signed) Munavvar.

P.S. You can send copies of this letter to friends for they would like to hear about it all and no time to write to each separately now.

“The shock of his death was indeed as an earthquake”

Letters from Louise Bosch to Ella G. Cooper.

Haifa, Palestine, 5 December 1921.

Beloved sister in God,

Your cablegram to the holy household was received, and the one to my husband, too. Both were appreciated and later on you will hear more about it.

This is not the moment that I want to engage in writing, but inasmuch as you have cabled my husband saying that you were longing for news, I make an effort to write you. I have not written to Geyserville (California), to Tahiti, or to Switzerland, and I know not what our friends there will think of us for not writing and telling them all about this great occurrence and happening.

As it is, I do not even know what to write you. I can only tell you that with the departure of our Lord our former state of spirit has departed also, and as far as I myself am concerned I feel as though I were a new born babe, in a new world of which I know at present nothing.

Our beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá passed from this earth early Monday morning. It was at half-past one o'clock—that is to say, one and one-half hours after midnight on Sunday. He had no illness in bed. His departure from this world was a rather sudden occurrence. It was half an hour before he closed his benign eyes forever that he said to Rúhâ Khánum [his daughter], who was alone in the room with him, “I am dying.” There was no one else in the room with him, as all were in their respective beds asleep, no one imagining on awakening that such could be the case. Notwithstanding the fact that our blessed 'Abdu'l-Bahá was not so well that day, and in truth had not been well for a long time, but in consideration of his work which he did each day, and the care that he took to carry out his work every day, and the attention which he paid to matters great and small, [XII:18:277] and the visitors which he received up to the last, and his inquiries after the welfare of the pilgrims present and the sick in the village, and the requirements of the holy family—in short, notwithstanding the fever which 'Abdu'l-Bahá had that day and several days previous, which fever would come and go and was designated as malarial—the members of the household were not aware of the approaching

Oh! our divine Lord went as he came; he went out of the world as he came into it “as a thief in the night”. He made no one any trouble nursing him; he did not wish any soul to give up even one single night’s sleep for him. Rúḥá Khánum, as I said, was all alone in the room with him when he said to her, “I am dying,” and she quickly searched her mind what to do to retain his precious life. Assuredly she could not even lose a single second to go out of the room to call for help, much as she had that impulse, but tried some remedies that were at hand left by some physicians who had been in that day to see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The holy family, of course, had often supplicated him to allow them to bring in a physician, which was granted, but merely for their sakes, not for his! Even on that Sunday (the night on which he left us) when a physician who had been called made an injection of quinine, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said afterward to Rúḥá Khánum, “I am the physician of the world!” He did not want that injection, but to please his family he, like a lamb that unto his shearers is dumb, allowed them to do with him what they wanted. What a lesson! His minutest acts were great lessons to the world. So, for instance, when John [Mr Bosch] and I first arrived here I saw that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had a cold. Remembering how ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s cold in Montreal became better from a simple remedy (Homeopathic) I had begged him to take, I persuaded him to take a new one I had with me. I spoke several times about it to Rúḥí Afandí and impressed it upon him that it was surely efficacious. As ‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not get better, he sent one day (no doubt urged by Rúḥí through my pleadings) for that remedy. It surely did help his cold, and for several days he was better. Some days after ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had deigned to take my medicine, I asked him how much he had taken. His reply, which I did not comprehend then but which I comprehend now, was this: “I took your remedy six times—for your sake.” I know now that this means: “Even as I have pleased you and granted your request, so even must you grant the request of others and do their will and wishes.”

After Rúḥá Khánum had given him some medicine, she awakened the holy mother. The others, also Dr Krug, were sent for. He happened to be (as a pilgrim) on the grounds. He and his wife were lodged, and still are at the present time, in the room which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had built for himself as an addition to his house—the room to which a stairway leads, in the garden near the entrance. So Dr Krug was not far and could come quickly; but alas! ‘Abdu’l-Bahá breathed only a few times more and all became still within his holy temple.

At first we were as dumb and speechless, bewildered. We stood or kneeled before the bed. We gazed upon his face and could not trust our eyes. At last the bewilderment subsided and the trust asserted itself. Was it true that his eyes would open no more? Would he not open his eyes to look upon us again? Would he not open his lips to say that he was not dead? We asked the doctors if he was dead. They said yes, the heart had ceased to beat; they said it was useless to try to revive him—it could not be done. Then, after awhile, the [XII:18:278] mosquito netting over the bed was let down, and this covered from our eyes the earthly remains of our Lord. We got up and went into the adjacent room, and the door of the room out of which we came was closed.

But before this, the blood of the wounds of this blow had begun to flow, and the hurt and the pain and the moans increased with every minute. We five European pilgrims were in the room together with the holy family, and the holy mother held my husband’s hand and the Greatest Holy Leaf held mine. After a time we went back to the Pilgrim House, leaving the holy family alone. It was still night—no moon at all. Not long afterward the dawn broke, and at last the sun rose with great effulgence over the scene of this memorable night. Then we went over to the holy household again. We found them nearly exhausted from excessive grief.

After a little more time, many callers came and all wept bitterly. After that new callers came and during the day and night for four or five days. It is an Eastern custom and duty to receive and see them all, to feed them, and to have them stay over night. It was a painful duty for the holy mother and her four daughters—not to speak of the now very feeble Greatest Holy Leaf—to see and to talk with, and to be embraced, kissed and bewailed by all these visitors. But they went through this, too, the same as through everything else. Throughout the days, Tablets were chanted to the visitors.

The sons-in-law and the grandsons and the six Persian pilgrims from Persia, and all the other Persians who had been like courtiers at the court of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, were all busy and engaged with the preparations for the interment, and how they could walk and talk and see, with their eyes blind from tears, was a miracle. It seemed that so much weeping was never done since the world began.

The holy funeral took place on Tuesday morning, the casket being borne on the shoulders of men, up and up and up Mount Carmel, until the sacred spot of the Tomb of His Holiness the Báb was reached, and there ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was temporarily buried.

I cannot tell and write you everything in this letter—it is too much. You will read elsewhere of the addresses of the clergy and people on Mount Carmel. I could write books on the procession up the way to the Tomb of the Báb. Also photographs were taken by Curtis Kelsey and Dr Krug and you will get some later.

Ella, when those speeches were made at the Tomb of His Holiness the Báb—the casket containing the holy remains of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá being outside, with the bright sunlight shining upon it—and those thousands of souls listening, that was the earthquake of which it speaks in the Holy Scriptures, and that was the rending of the veil in the temple! They said such things of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that the earth of the hearts of the people, which had hitherto been stony, was put in motion, and the veil that was before the eyes of their purely human spirits was rent asunder, and they began to know who it was who had dwelt among them. These speeches were made by Muslims and others who were not believers. There has been since a great demand for literature, and the people are greatly aroused and shaken everywhere. The Holy Spirit descended upon many who had hitherto been purely of the human spirit. All existence has taken on a new garment, for the shock of his death was indeed as an earthquake—it could not be described as anything else.

The grief of the holy family is indescribable. They cannot be consoled at all. They say that nothing can console them except the hearing of the news [XII:18:279] of the unity of the believers everywhere. Between their tears they endeavour to explain what unity is. They have, among themselves, and in that portion of the world in which they move and live, perfect unity. That word has taken on a new aspect for me since the departure of our Lord. Unity is something else than what I thought before. Now that I know what it is, I hope to be able to carry it out, to execute it. It isn’t to teach, as so many think—that’s nothing. A Persian teacher here said yesterday that a time is coming when not any believer would breathe a single breath for himself. That is unity! This wonderful teaching which we have learnt is only now beginning to be understood, and this is that which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá meant when he said that if we knew what would take place after his departure we would pray for his departure every day.

The holy family awaits the arrival of Shoghi Effendi Rabbání from England. Until that time nothing will be undertaken regarding the reading of the Testament of our Lord, the Centre of the Covenant of God. He left a letter addressed to Shoghi Effendi, and this letter he gave for safe-keeping to the holy mother, and gave the order to write to Shoghi to come home. They asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá if they should cable Shoghi to come, but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said no, a letter would do. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said this about two weeks before his departure.

Many instances testify to the fact that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá knew the date of his departure from this world. Also he had a dream in which the Blessed Perfection [Bahá’u’lláh] told him that “this house will be destroyed”. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá slept in the addition, in the room before mentioned. When the Krugs came ‘Abdu’l-Bahá gave his room to them, and it was made ready for them. When they came ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said to them, “I have given you my room.” They felt badly, thinking they had put ‘Abdu’l-Bahá out of his room. When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá perceived their apprehension, he consoled them by saying that Bahá’u’lláh had told him in a dream to go out of that room. So then they were satisfied to stay there.

When delicacy seemed to dictate to me to leave here soon after the funeral of our Lord, I mentioned it to the daughters, but the holy mother replied that we should stay until after Shoghi’s arrival and the reading of the Testament, for, she said, a living carrier is better than the dead mails, and the news has to be carried by the one or by the other sooner or later anyway. And so we were glad for this extra permission to stay here, but we expect to leave soon after Shoghi’s arrival. Lady Blomfield will come along, also of course Rúhángíz [Shoghi’s sister], who was in college. They may arrive this week, perhaps on the 10 or 11 December.

O Ella, we did not have much of a visit with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá during the thirteen days that John and I were here. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, however, sent once for us and gave us a talk. Praise be to God, that we have that! Then one evening John went to the Persian meeting which our Lord was in the habit of addressing, and, in order to favour John, and because of a remark John made to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had every sentence translated, and so John has that wonderful talk, too.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá could not come every day to meals; it rained several times and the weather was bad. Then the Krugs arrived, and soon afterward requested ‘Abdu’l-Bahá not to trouble himself to come over to meals on account of us all. Doctor Krug presented this request from the purely medical standpoint and wished to save ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s strength, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá granted their request. He said; [XII:18:281] “Very good.” Little did they dream that we would see him no more at all at the Pilgrim House. It was three days before the blessed departure that they made the request, and thus we had no more the pleasure of seeing him come. It was because of the stairway, which apparently was fatiguing to him to climb. Also, he ate so little every time he came.

Tomorrow it will be one week since we carried our blessed Lord’s earthly temple to Mount Carmel. John had the great privilege that day to assist in carrying the coffin into the room in which our Lord lay, and John also assisted in placing the holy body into the coffin. This is John’s everlasting bounty for his services rendered to the Cause, and because of the privilege he had of lifting the holy body of his Lord, John can never be the same being any more. And he is and looks different, too. The holy mother said that we could never in this life appreciate the privilege of having been here at just this time. She said that in our presence here all the other American friends were also present, and in Johanna [Hauf, of Stuttgart] all the German friends were present.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá is buried under the floor of the room of the Tomb of the Báb [XII:18:282] which faces the avenue going down to the landing; that room, I mean, which used to be an assembly room. Only two days before, we all had the feast there and were served fine tea and cakes and fruit and candy. It was the feast of the 26 November which is called, I think, the day of the appointment of the Centre of the Covenant, or ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s day. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá stayed at home, and he was not with us in body. Afterward the Krugs went in to call upon the holy family, and thus they saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and he said to them, “I was with you in spirit, though not in body.” No one thought then or conceived the idea that he would pass out of the body that night.

But now I must assuredly close and finish this letter, although there remains so much more to say. We hope to go verbally over all the details if it is our destiny to reach California again.

The holy family says that although the Lord is not here any more except in spirit, yet all are welcome here the same as before. To see the friends and to receive them is one of the joys of their restricted lives here. But I told them that no doubt soon the doors of travel would open to them, and their life's desire to go to Persia may now soon be fulfilled.

Yesterday one of the Persian teachers said that if it were not for the closing of the doors of suicide and the opening of the doors of martyrdom, many Persian believers would now find life unendurable. As the expenditure of life through martyrdom is accepted before God, so we may soon hear of many Persian Bahá'ís killed; they will throw themselves recklessly into the stream of the consequences of fearless open teaching.

We will send you as soon as we can obtain them some of the newspaper articles. All else for the future.

Love to your mother and all the friends.

In Bahá

Alláh-u-Abhá!

Haifa, Palestine, 9 December 1921.

Dearest Ella,

Enclosed please find the Arabic newspaper which contains the speeches made at the holy burial of our Lord and Master on 29 November. He was buried at 9 am—that is to say, the procession started from the holy household at 9 am.

This particular newspaper brings all the speeches that were made by the Muslim clergy, as well as a speech made by a Frenchman who is a newspaper correspondent. These speeches are remarkable, inasmuch as the believers had nothing at all to do with these speeches or with any newspaper articles regarding the passing away of our Lord; no, rather all this is the testimony of outsiders and opposers. So you must realize what this means, when even the opposers came and testified to the greatness of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and to the sublimity of his life, and the purpose of his work, and the magnitude of his aims. The ladies of the holy household were very much pleased with all the speeches when they heard about them, and when they afterward read¹ them [XII:18:283] they said, repeating the Arabic proverb, "The virtue is quite true when it is testified to by the enemy."

Dear Ella, were I to wait until some of the boys had translated this newspaper into English it would no doubt take several years. They have been accustomed to translate tablets and supplications, but that is past now for the present, and they are busy doing other things. So I thought I'd leave it to your brightness of mind to find a way to have it translated, perhaps at the University of California.

As soon as I had mentioned this the other Westerners here thought that they, too, ought to send a copy each one to their respective friends at home to see how best they could have it translated. Mrs Krug will send one to Anne Boylan of New York, and Johanna one to Germany.

The ladies said that the outsiders and the opposers had said and published so much in honour of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that nothing whatever remained for the believers to say. It was as though the Holy Spirit spoke out of those clergymen and people, as though they had received open vision right then and there. And many, many other souls began to know more or less suddenly who it was who had been here and gone. Even one of the daughters said to me that it was now as though she had never before known ‘Abdu’l-Bahá (her holy father), as though it were only now that she began to realize who he had been. So you might know what the feelings of others must be if that holy woman feels that way about our Lord. It is sure that I feel as though I had never known or seen him, Mrs Krug is a flaming torch; she is as though intoxicated with the wine of the love of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had always favoured her much, as her heart is pure and clean like that of a child, and she is not at all selfish, but always had much love for everybody. As far as I am concerned, I am not a flame of fire, but rather ill.

The ladies said that by what the outsiders and the opposers had said and published it could be seen what the ascension of our Lord had done for them, how it had affected them, and how they were feeling from it now. They said they hoped that no one would stop coming here now that our Lord is not here any more, but that the friends all over would realize that they are always welcome here, and that it always would be a great happiness to the holy household to receive and welcome them. During their first days of mourning they cried many times for the friends, and wished that all, all, could be present, that all, all could be here together at the same time, all the friends and believers and near and dear ones, from the Occident and the Orient. They said often”

“O how sorry we feel for the grief of the believers all over the world when they hear the sad news. How disappointed the friends will feel!” From their own sorrow they judged the sorrow of the others. They are holy women, and it is such a privilege for me to learn to know them better every day.

Shoghi sent a cable saying that he cannot be here (on account of passport difficulties) until about Christmas, so we shall not get away from Haifa until the New Year or so, and we do not know when we shall be back home. We shall not endeavour to go to Jerusalem or to Lebanon.

Much love to you and mother and all. More later.

Love,

(Signed) Louise Bosch.

“You must not injure yourselves or commit suicide”

Letter from Ahmad Tabrízí to Dr Dîyá’ Baghdádí.

Haifa, Palestine,
29 November 1921.

My dear brother,

I am grieved to announce to you in brief that the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, has ascended to the Kingdom by his own will. In some of his writings and Tablets which are not yet made public, he clearly stated in regard to his departure. Also in his talks to the friends, in the meetings and even to the strangers and visitors he made similar remarks. Soon I will write you and send you the details.

His latest advices and admonitions to the friends are to the effect that they must be in perfect unity and harmony.

He said: “There shall not be any separation among the believers because Bahá’u’lláh has appointed the House of Justice to be the authority. In the future many false traditions and untrue statements will appear, but the men of the House of Justice will with great power stop the mouths of the liars. All difficult problems must be referred to the House of Justice.”

Mírzá Abu’l-Ḥasan Afnán (a noble gentleman from the family of the Báb, for many years living near ‘Abdu’l-Bahá), realizing the approach of the most great calamity—the Master’s ascension—could not wait to see it, and therefore he drowned himself here, in the sea.

The Master, in advising us and all the friends, said: “You must not injure yourselves or commit suicide. ... It is not permissible to do to yourselves what Mírzá Ḥasan Afnán did to himself. Should anyone at any time encounter hard and perplexing times, he must say to himself, ‘This will soon pass.’ Then he will be calm and quiet. In all my calamity and difficulties I used to say to myself, ‘This will pass away.’ Then I became patient. If anyone cannot be patient and cannot endure, and if he wishes to become a martyr, then let him arise in service to the Cause of God. It will be better for him [XII:18:281] if he attains to martyrdom in this path. Arise ye in service to the Cause of God as the Apostles arose after the departure of Christ.”

The Master has left a will which is His Covenant, written with his own blessed hand. As soon as it is read, I shall write to you what it contains. It is the hour of firmness and the moment of steadfastness. Blessed are those who are faithful to the Cause and loyal to the Covenant.

Your brother,

Ahmad.

“The beauty of the Beloved disappeared and the hearts are melted by this great calamity”

Letter from Muḥammad Sa’íd Adham to the Star of the West

Alexandria, Egypt, 1 January 1922.

Dear Bahá’í friends,

You must have heard the sad news of the departure of our beloved ‘Abdu’l-Bahá from this ephemeral world to the Kingdom of Abhá.

The news came to us as a thunderbolt that breaks the mountains and shakes the very fibre of the hearts. We could do nothing but weep—until wearied by weeping the tears stopped flowing. Our hearts are broken, and whenever we meet those who have not yet heard the news, the tears gush forth like a fountain; but the fire of our sorrow cannot be extinguished. Our only hope is that God may confirm us in His Cause and grant us favour and patience in this great calamity. Those who have been privileged to be in His divine presence and in whose hearts His love has grown firm, know that His departure is the greatest loss that can be imagined, and that patience is impossible save through His kindness and bounty. Our sorrow is beyond expression, and as I am a stranger to English, this adds to the difficulty of expressing myself on such a sad occasion.

The friends here all have the same feeling and the fire of sorrow is blazing in their breasts. Since then it is very noticeable that there is more love, more firmness, more unity, more tolerance and more desire for service. All this is observed in the faces of the friends, and the more so as the violators appear and endeavour to play their personal intrigues on the pages of some of the daily papers. The friends here have unanimously agreed not to pay the slightest attention to them, never to associate with them and never to listen to their words, for in reality they are the bitter enemies of our Beloved and of the Cause.

For thirty years the violators have tried to harm the Cause of Bahá’u’lláh and have denied the Centre of the Covenant, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá—and this denial shall never be forgotten. The violators aspire only to leadership and authority, and try to use the Cause to accomplish their wicked ends, and to them it is not a question of faith and service. Bahá’u’lláh gave an explicit command, which they have absolutely refused to obey. He commanded all to turn to the Centre of the Covenant, and this they have foolishly and maliciously refused to do, and in so doing they have violated the first and most essential command of Bahá'u'lláh, namely, that after the departure of Bahá'u'lláh they should turn to the Centre of the Covenant, "He whom God hath purposed", 'Abdu'l-Bahá. By the word of Bahá'u'lláh and the very existence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, He ('Abdu'l-Bahá) was a divine being and not only a material son of Bahá'u'lláh. Jesus Christ had brothers and sisters, but no mention of them was recorded in the New Testament. The violators supposed that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was a material son [XII:19:292] like unto them. So it lies with you now, in America, who know this question very well, to prevent any communication between the friends and the violators, and not to admit the violators to your meetings.

The departure of 'Abdu'l-Bahá took place at Haifa on Monday, 28 November 1921, at 1:30 am, after an attack of bronchitis lasting about three days, during which time the Master met visitors as usual. In the afternoon of the last day (Sunday, 27 November) three of the notables visited him, remaining with him from 2 to 5 pm. He talked with them in his customary way and walked to the door with them, where they begged him, for the sake of his health, not to tire himself any longer. 'Abdu'l-Bahá then talked to the family about his departure, encouraging them and exhorting them to continue his work.

Among the utterances of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was this: "From this day the Cause has begun, and the friends are now stronger to bear the responsibility of the Cause." He also said that he had many friends all over the world, while when Jesus Christ departed he had only a few. He spoke up to a few moments before he drew his last breath. Doctor Krug was present when he closed his eyes. Our friend Joseph Hebeqa, who was sent from Alexandria to Haifa on behalf of the friends, relates that Doctor Krug was so affected that he did not speak, but sat by himself meditating and sobbing, and went to the Tomb, where he would kneel and sob, bowing his forehead to the ground, and owing to his illness it was necessary at times for the friends to help him rise again to his feet. This shows how deep is the grief of the friends, when one like Doctor Krug, who was at one time an unbeliever, is thus affected. Surely the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá will ever be an inspiration and an example to the friends all over the world.

The burial took place on Tuesday, 29 November, the procession starting at 9 am. Sir Herbert Samuel, the High Commissioner of Palestine, accompanied by the high officials, arrived in a special train, starting from Jerusalem at midnight, in order to attend the funeral in time. The funeral, as described in an Arabic paper¹ at Haifa, was miraculous and beyond description. All the people of Haifa attended the funeral and all were bowed in grief and wept all the way from his house to the Tomb on Mount Carmel.

When the casket containing the holy body of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was placed before [XII:19:293] the house, the air was rent with the weeping of the family and friends. The friends then all advanced toward the casket and kissed, with flowing tears, the shawl laid over the casket. When this was over the funeral proceeded with pomp and greatness. Men of all creeds and societies, as well as the great men of the city, without exception, were present and followed the big train of the High Commissioner.

When they reached the Tomb, after walking for one hour and twenty-five minutes, the casket was laid down before the Tomb of the Báb, until the rest of the procession reached that place. Then about nine speakers spoke spontaneously, declaring his greatness and comparing it with the prophets of the past, and testifying to the sorrow and the great loss which they felt in his passing. The speakers were all strangers—not Bahá'ís, as the Bahá'ís could only weep on this occasion. They were representatives of all the religions of the country, Muslims, Christians, Jews, et al. and poets of different creeds. Some of the speakers were heads of their religion. I cannot describe how I was affected by the reading of these ovations. Sir Herbert Samuel, after listening to the last speaker, who was a Jew and who spoke in French, shook hands with him as he had understood what he said. The others had spoken in Arabic. When this was over Sir Herbert Samuel, holding his hat in his left hand, knelt down and kissed, for the last time, the shawl that covered the casket, and all those who were present did the same. The burial took place in the central room where the Master used to sit.

As soon as the friends here received the news of the ascension of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, telegrams were sent to Haifa, and Joseph Hebeqa, whom the Bahá'ís of Alexandria sent to Haifa, was the first of the friends to arrive from abroad. Upon his return he related to us the details mentioned in this letter. Joseph Hebeqa had not seen 'Abdu'l-Bahá before, although he had made preparations to visit him the week previous to his ascension, but, unfortunately he was detained. He believed in the Cause during the time of the war, and we tried to perfect his faith. The ascension of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and his presence in Haifa, on this great occasion, confirmed his faith and has had a wonderful effect upon him. After his visit of five days in Haifa, he was quite another being, and returned to us like a flaming torch, and in his confirmation he has found real consolation.

Since we received the news of the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, we have been [XII:19:294] animated by a strong spirit, which, during the life-time of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, seemed to be chained, but has now been let loose, and we feel a strong spirit urging and inspiring us to greater service. And, too, we have a great secret in our hearts, of which the people of the world have as yet been deprived. I do not mean to convey the impression that we are in a better spiritual condition since the departure of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but I mean to say that we feel more keenly His spiritual power and inspiration, and it is overwhelming, and His Holy Spirit is now acting through the firm believers.

The friends in Cairo kept openly three days of mourning, when the learned people of the Muslims and other notables, as well as Persians, who are not believers, called to console the friends.

In Alexandria we had continual meetings at my home for several days, during which time one of the violators knocked at my door, desiring to see me and to console me in my grief for the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, it being an Eastern custom for the people to call, on the occasion of death, and offer their sympathy. The friends who happened to be present at that moment all agreed not to allow him in and insisted that word be sent to him that we would not see him. This, at first, might seem strange, to turn a man away from the door on such an occasion, but any believer who has ever heard of the violators and of their attitude toward the Centre of the Covenant, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and who knows the trouble they tried to make for him, will certainly uphold our action in thus turning a violator away. A few days after this we had a telegram from the family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in reply to all cables sent from Egypt to Haifa, which read thus:

“The beauty of the Beloved disappeared and the hearts are melted by this great calamity. Our only hope is to raise the banner of the Covenant, and with all righteousness, unity and servitude we serve His sublime threshold.”

A few days later the great violator addressed the Bahá'ís through the columns of the Arabic newspapers, calling upon them to follow him, according, as he stated, to the will of Bahá'u'lláh, pretending, in his call, that although he had been separated from his brother by God's destiny, yet the filial relationship and hearty sensations were strong in his heart, and he tried outwardly to show sorrow for the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. One of his only two followers in Alexandria confirmed his call on a page of the same paper, but the House of [XII:19:295] Spirituality in Cairo replied and contested both statements, stating in effect that this violator is not recognized at all by the Bahá'ís, and since he has violated the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh for thirty years, he is not considered among the Bahá'ís, and has not the authority to speak in their behalf, for all the affairs of the Bahá'ís are now directed by the Houses of Spirituality, all over the world, whose members are elected and who will come under the control of the House of Justice, and they are the only representatives of the Bahá'ís. And this violator is not a Bahá'í in the true sense of the word and according to the dictates of Bahá'u'lláh. This reply was given especially for the benefit of the public, to give them correct information and to prove to them that the violators are not Bahá'ís and were cut off thirty years ago by their disobedience to the command of Bahá'u'lláh to turn, after His departure, to the Centre of the Covenant, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and by their harmful actions to the Cause.

The reply produced the desired effect and we, individually, spread it among the inquirers and thus enlarged the circle of its influence.

Again they wrote an objection to our reply and published it, but after the reply given by the House of Spirituality none of the friends have entered, or will they enter, into any controversy with them through the newspapers. The people must understand and know by their own knowledge that the violators are unfaithful and weak in their reasoning, and this is plainly evident in the writings of the violators.

We, the friends in the East, hope that the friends in the West will give a blow to the violators by totally avoiding them and never associating with them or accepting them in their meetings, because they are the only kind of people who could harm the Cause more than all other people put together, for the simple reason that their aim is to break the unity of the friends by putting doubt in the hearts of those who are not firm in their faith.

We are hoping to hear from the West that which will add confirmation to the friends in the East. This is what is expected from America. We all pray that Bahá'u'lláh may confirm us in raising high the banner of the Covenant at all times and in all regions.

Faithfully in the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh,

Muhammad Sa'íd Adham,

Teacher 'Abbásiyya School, Alexandria, Egypt.

XII:19, 2 March 1922 [XII:19:301]

Letter from 'Abbás Adíb to Dr Dīyá' M. Baghdádí

Damascus, Syria,

4 January 1922.

My dear uncle,

Oh! what a calamity has befallen us by the departure of our beloved Master. Several times in meetings during the year, up to the time I left Haifa, he said: "I have completed my work and duties in this world and what is left will be done by the friends. I want to rest. The actions of the náqidín and others so injure me that if my heart be pierced with a spear it will be much easier to bear than these actions. Suppressed sorrows will kill a man. If one should relate his sorrows to a friend, [XII:19:302] the sorrow will be removed from his heart and he will be at ease; but if one shall keep it and does not speak it to others it will work in him, make him sick and kill him. You do not know what is happening. I do not say anything." Such words were uttered by 'Abdu'l-Bahá many times.

A certain person was such a great stumbling block in the path of the Beloved that he said to Bahádur: "My soul has reached my lips because of his deeds" He continued: "I want to rest for six months. The doctor does not allow me to work, read and write."

To begin with he dismissed Mírzá 'Azízu'lláh Bahádur and Ibn-i-Aşdaq, the latter to stay in Shíráz under the care of Mírzá Báqir Khán; next he dismissed Shaykh Muḥammad ‘Alí, his son and Siyyid Muṣṭafá of Rangoon. A little later he dismissed Jináb-i-Fáḍil and Şubḥí, the latter was told that when his services would be needed he would be called—meantime to go and teach in Persia. Not a pilgrim was left in Haifa.

On Friday night, 18 November, the Beloved had a cold. That morning Mírzá Abu’l-Ḥasan Afnán dismissed his servant and said he was going away. He wrote a supplication to the Beloved. Then the Afnán went to the seashore, about two hours walk, and threw himself into the sea. Some fisherman nearby took him out and notified the authorities. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sent his automobile. I went with the Afnáns and Dr Luṭfu’lláh and helped to bring his body home. The next day when we carried the body from his house, the Beloved approached and assisted in carrying, the casket to the carriage. I am sure the Master told him about His departure from this world and that because of it he threw himself into the sea.

Another incident: Ten days before this a Bahá’í Turk named Dr Sulaymán Ra’fat Bey, whose home is in Beirut, came to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The day after his arrival a telegram came stating his brother had died. The shock overcame him. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá opened the windows, washed the face and head, rubbed the chest of the doctor, gave him some water mixed with spices, patted him on the back, embraced him, and consoled him. During this talk the Beloved said: “Don’t be sorry. My departure from this world is very near.” (Dr Bey did not mention this until after the departure of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, not quite a fortnight later.) The next morning the Master sent him to Beirut with Ahmad Bey Yazdí and Munavvar Khánum ...

On the morning of 26 November, I left for Damascus. I arrived that night and communicated the news of the good health of the Master to the friends and my father. On Sunday, at a meeting, we spoke of it. Monday noon a telegram came saying the Beloved had departed from this world. ...

I heard that on Sunday, the 27th, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sat in the garden under the apricot tree. He called Ismá’íl Áqá and asked for some fruit—tangerines, sweet lemons and oranges. He ate some and distributed the others among the friends who were present. He rubbed his hands together and said: “Finished, finished, finished.” He arose and went to his room. That night he did not go to the meeting. At midnight he awoke, called the Greatest Holy Leaf, said good-bye to all and at 1:30 am ascended to the Kingdom of Abhá. Immediately, everybody was notified and the weeping and wailing commenced.

A few days after the ascension, a Muslim said to one of the Afnáns: “Sometime ago, His Excellency, saw me and inquired about my work. He paid me a few pounds and said, ‘This will be the last time we meet.’ It did not occur to me that he meant he would ascend so soon ...”

As to the náqidín, they surely gloated over the ascension of our Beloved. Muḥammad ‘Alí came to the house of mourning. Khusraw saw him and told him to wait for permission. The Great- [XII:19:303] est Holy Leaf sent this word to them by Rúḥí Afandí: “Our Beloved does not allow and does not like you to come in, and if you come in you will add to our sorrows.” He went away and wrote an article in the newspapers calling the Bahá’ís to turn to him, quoting extracts from the Covenant of His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh. The Bahá’í Assembly of Cairo answered him, and exposed his claim to leadership. ...

Kindly give my love and greetings to Zínat Khánum, Parvín and Ḥubúr Khánum. Shaykh ‘Abdu’r-Raḥmán al-Hindí is present and greets you.

Your sincere nephew,

‘Abbás Adíb

Requiem tablet revealed for Lillian Kappes

Tablet Maghfarat (Requiem) for the maid-servant of God, Miss Kappes—Upon her be Bahá'u'l-Abhá!

O my God and my Helper!

Verily, I place my forehead in the dust and raise my hands toward heaven and call upon Thee with a heart whose waves surge in Thy remembrance, and with tears that are falling in Thy love, and a spirit which is moving by Thy goodness and favour and a soul that is increasingly thirsty, seeking the wine of Thy forgiveness and Thy pardon, and we are saying:

O Forgiver of sins and O faithful Bestower of pardon and Protector from misfortune and Compassionate to the creatures! Verily Thy maid-servant was a stranger, alone, a unique one in Thy path; and far from her native land in the path of Thy love she was certainly approaching toward Thee and was seeking the glad-tidings of Thy favour and goodness. Then the hearts of Thy friends became saddened by her death.¹ The tears of the pure and of Thy chosen ones were flowing and from the hearts of Thy servants wailing and weeping arose, sympathy was established for Thy maid-servant and consolation for Thy friends whose hearts were burning and whose tears were flowing. The hot fire of sorrow was aflame within their vitals; they were weeping as a mother weeps for her dead child. In this way they were seeking consolation and favour for her, with burning hearts and with breasts filled with the marks of grief for this great calamity.

O my God! Grant to her life immeasurable, excellence and companionship with the birds of Paradise in the eternal world. She is leaving this unreal world and arriving at Thy Holy Presence in the world eternal and she has become purified from the stain of sins, liberated and saved from the world. O God illumine her face with the light of Thy mercy and make fragrant her nostrils with the perfume of the garden of Thy unity and make her eyes radiant by beholding the Divine Face of her Lord, and appoint for her a place in the true station of nearness by Thy mercy; and open the gates unto her, putting her in communication with the Holy Leaves among the maid-servants and companions and aid her to reach the Kingdom of Mysteries in radiant Light.

Verily Thou art the Forgiver and the Kind! Verily Thou art the Lord of Mercy and Forgiveness!

She entered in unto Thee and into the path of Thy favour and goodness. I ask of Thee to bestow upon her a benevolent station; to accept her efforts and grant to her signs of favour and a station of kindness and pardon. O God! she had faith in Thee and in Thy Verses and was attracted by Thy fragrances and was reading Thy Words and Verses and giving the glad-tidings of the dawn of Thy pure unity and she called upon Thy Name in Thy regions.

She left her native land and remained apart from family ties and brothers, enduring every trouble and distress and was content to accept the bitterness of separation for the love of teaching the children. And with enthusiasm educating the girls she lived in distant cities during long years and periods and was patient in every difficulty. Morn and eve she was endeavouring to clarify the intellects of the innocent children of good families and failed not in giving out daily that which was required of her in that distant region. She gave her hand unwearied every night and [XII:19:308] day and at evening-tide and morning-tide to the service of the friends and taught the little ones who drew nourishment from the breast of Thy favour until her body gave out, her strength failed, her body disintegrated and her form dissolved. Then, supported by Thy favour, she returned to Thee, eager to behold Thee near

Dawn prayer of Bahá'u'lláh¹

“O God, verily I ask Thee, by Thy Name, by which Thou hast heard the call of the passionate lovers, the cry of the yearning ones, the loud voices of the near ones, the tender sigh of the sincere, and ordained the hope of the desiring ones and granted them what they desired by Thy Bounty and Benevolence, and by the Names by which the Sea of Forgiveness rolled before Thy Face and the Cloud of Generosity showered upon Thy sincere servants, to write (appoint) for him who advances toward Thee and fasts by Thine order, the recompense of those who speak not save by Thy permission and who give up what they have in Thy Cause and Love.

“Thou seest me, O my God, holding to Thy Name, the Holy, the Shining, the Precious, the Greatest, the Highest, the Abhá! And clinging to the Train of Thy Robe, which is being grasped by all those of the life to come and the present one.”

The New Day

Do you know in what day you are living? Do you realize in what dispensation you are alive? Have you not read in the Holy Scriptures that at the consummation of the ages there shall appear a day which is the sun of all the past days?

This is the day in which the Lord of Hosts has come down from heaven on the clouds of glory! This is the day in which the inhabitants of all the world shall enter under the tent of the Word of God. This is the day whose real sovereign is His Highness, The Almighty. This is the day when the East and the West shall embrace each other like unto two lovers. This is the day in which war and contention shall be forgotten. This is the day in which nations and governments will enter into an eternal bond of amity and conciliation. This century is the fulfilment of the Promised Century.

The East shall become illumined, the West perfumed and the children of men shall enter beneath the all-embracing canopy of the oneness of the world of humanity.

The foundation of divine religion is love, affinity and concord. Praise God that this cycle is the period of illumination! Minds have made great progress; intelligences have been unfolded; the means of unity and agreement are brought about; communication between the races of men is rapidly established. Now is the time that all of us may embrace the law of peace and treat each other with honesty and straightforwardness. Let the religious prejudices be wiped away. Let the law of racial supremacy be discontinued. Let political expediencies be done away with. Let the love of country [XIII:1:7] be superseded by the love of the world. Let us all deal with each other with infinite kindness. We are all the servants at the one Divine Threshold. We are all receiving the rays of truth from the same Sun of Reality. We must all believe in all of the prophets. We must all acknowledge the divine authority of all the heavenly books. We must wash our hearts free of all human prejudices. We must serve God. We must propagate the oneness of the realm of humanity. We must be the cause of the appearance of the perfections of the world of man. We must not be like the beasts of prey. We must not allow carnage and bloodshed. We must regard the blood of man as sacred. We must not shed the holy blood of man for the paltry earth. We must all agree upon one fundamental principle—that principle is the oneness of the kingdom of humanity.

In this age, Bahá'u'lláh has breathed the Holy Spirit into the dead body of the world. Consequently every weak soul is strengthened by these fresh divine out-breathings. Every poor man will become rich, every darkened soul will become illumined, every ignorant one will become wise, because the confirmations of the Holy Spirit are descending like unto torrents. A new era of divine consciousness is upon us. The world of humanity is going through a process of transformation. A new race is being developed. The thoughts of human brotherhood are permeating all regions. New ideals are stirring the depths of hearts and a new spirit of universal consciousness is being profoundly felt by all men.

The Bahá'í revelation—the religious need of the time

Charles Mason Remey

In this day the religious formulae of the past—superstitions, creeds and dogmas—no longer ease the conscience of the world nor bring satisfaction to the mind of the individual adherent of these systems of thought. Humanity is in need of a spiritual power and knowledge with which to meet and solve the problems and conditions of this new day and age. Hence, the general changing and unsettled condition of the religious world which is causing a large and an increasing number of progressive people to quit thinking within the prescribed limits of the religious thought of the past, and to search diligently for those universal fundamental truths of the spiritual realm of life and being, the knowledge of which truths is the religion of God.

The Bahá'í Movement offers to the world an all-inclusive, universal, spiritual teaching, so broad that people of all races and of all creeds find place therein. It is essentially a religious movement, a spiritual teaching, free from the limitations of sect and “-ism”, and constructive in its building upon the true faith of the individual and upon the pure teachings of the past, thus increasing love and devotion to God and creating within each soul the desire to manifest the light of these divine attributes through brotherly service to one's fellowmen.

Object

The object of the Bahá'í Revelation is the religious unification [uniting] of all people. The teaching has come into the world to fulfil all divine teaching of the past. It stands as the goal toward which truth has always worked, through its appearance in the prophets sent unto various peoples of the past ages, and it is the beginning of that age of divine enlightenment and peace, the coming of which has been the theme of all revelations of the past—The Kingdom of God on earth. Thus the Bahá'í Movement establishes the universal religion which is the foundation of inter-religious, inter-racial and international brotherhood and peace. It offers to mankind a practical basis of unity, one which is in direct line with the great world needs of this age, and it is paving the way for the great universal civilization which will evolve as people of all religions, races and nations [XIII:1:10] unite both spiritually and materially into one great world people.

Divine Revelation

Man, being finite, can not comprehend the essence of the Infinite God, which is beyond any and all human conception. However, through the manifestation of the Spirit of God or “The Word”, that power which has spoken to the world through the prophets and chosen ones of the past, humanity learns of God, knows His attributes, and is quickened by His Spirit.

Mankind needs and seeks spiritual guidance. This divine guidance has come to humanity through the instrumentality of the Manifestations of God or the prophets or Revelers of Truth. These chosen souls have been the founders of the great religious world-movements. They have manifested the Spirit of God to the people of the world, and through them men have known God and have become quickened by the life of The Kingdom.

The oneness of the Manifestations

Though the personalities of the prophets differed, yet the divine power which spoke through each one was the same in spirit and reality. Each prophet revealed God and the law of the divine kingdom in proportion to the needs of the age to which he ministered, and in terms and parables familiar to its people.

In their purity, all religious teachings are in perfect accord; all teach the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man. Human differences, imaginations and superstitions have been the causes of religious division, dissension and disintegration, but true spirituality has ever been the source and mainspring of man's unity in religion and advancement in civilization. Each of the great world civilizations has had its conception and birth in a spiritually active religion, and the downfall of civilizations has been brought about by spiritually lifeless religions, shrouded in forms and in superstitions.

The new Revelation

As the former ages have had certain spiritual or religious needs, so this present and coming universal age, upon the threshold of which the world now stands, has its own peculiar spiritual and religious needs. The world is now ready for the spiritual unity and harmony of its people. The universal religion now comes, in order that the universal civilization may be realized.

The prophets of the past foresaw this latter-day religious need, and they also foresaw the coming of two great teachers and prophets who would minister to the whole world, and fulfil the Covenant of God in establishing the universal religion or the Kingdom upon earth.

The Hebrew prophets dwelt at length upon the coming of the "Ancient of Days", and the glory of His epoch; Jesus, the Christ, spoke many times of His second coming and the establishment of His Father's Kingdom upon earth; the prophet Muḥammad taught that the Mihdí would come, followed by the Manifestation of God who would establish the Kingdom; Zoroaster taught of the triumph of light over darkness, of truth over ignorance, and His followers expect the Promised One whom they call Sháh-Bahrám, to accomplish this victory; Gautama, the Buddha, foretold the coming of the great fifth Buddha, who would bring enlightenment to all the world; the Hindu holy books mention another incarnation of Krishna, or the Divine Spirit, whose mission would be universal enlightenment; while the poets and prose writers of all times have depicted the beauty and the perfection of the utopian or millennial age, to be realized when The Great World Master appeared on earth to establish God's rule among the nations. In reality all testified to One who was to come. These [XIII:1:11] promises of the prophets of old are now realized in the coming of the Bahá'í Revelers and in the movement which they have established, the people of the various religions find the fulfilment of the sacred teachings of the past, and also the solution of the great latter day problem of religious unity. The Bahá'í teaching confirms and completes all religious teachings which have gone before, and offers a practical philosophy which meets the present day spiritual needs of humanity.

The Báb

On 23 May 1844, there arose in Shíráz, Persia, a young man, 'Alí Muḥammad by name, who declared Himself to be the Báb, or the forerunner of "He whom God would manifest"—a great teacher, who was soon to appear with manifest signs of divine power, through whose teachings the religious unity of all peoples would be accomplished.

Through his purity of soul and spiritual wisdom the Báb drew unto himself many followers who in turn promulgated his doctrines with so much fervour that within a short time many believed and joined his ranks.

The Báb was met early in his career of teaching by great opposition on the part of the Muslim clergy and, at their instigation, was placed under military surveillance. In spite of this he continued his teaching, exhorting the people to holiness and sanctity of living, in order that they might be fitted to meet the Promised One, shortly to appear, and to become as mirrors which would reflect his spiritual perfection. Thus the first two years of his ministry passed, at the end of which time, he was seized, by the order of the opposing clerical authorities, and thrust into prison.

The Báb's imprisonment lasted four years, during which time he taught his followers through letters and epistles smuggled by faithful friends past the guards of the prison. This was followed by a trial in which he was condemned to death upon the charge of heresy. With one of his followers, he suffered martyrdom in the cause of Truth in the city of Tabríz, Persia, on 9 July 1850.

The mission of the Báb being that of precursor of "He whom God would manifest", the institutions and ordinances which he established were for the time being only. With the appearance of the Promised One, the followers (Bábís), were commanded to turn their faces unto him, when he, who was to come, would reveal his teachings, divine laws and ordinances, thus completing the foundation of the Kingdom on earth.

The Báb was not alone in being persecuted by the Muslims, for with his martyrdom came upon his followers troubles of the most dire nature. Over twenty thousand of these willingly gave up property, family and life rather than deny or recant their faith. As late as 1901, there were one hundred and seventy souls martyred in this Cause at one time in Persia.

Bahá'u'lláh

During the days of the Báb's ministry, while his cause was being promulgated by his followers throughout Persia, there were many believers who never met with him in person. Among these was Bahá'u'lláh, a young man of noble family, who warmly espoused the Cause, publicly upholding and teaching it in Ṭihrán. In 1852, shortly after the Báb's martyrdom, when the persecution of the Bábís was at its height, Bahá'u'lláh, with others of the new faith, was imprisoned in Ṭihrán, and later on with a number of the followers was sent in exile to Baghdád in 'Iráq, Arabia.

During the exile in Baghdád Bahá'- [XIII:1:12] u'lláh, through his teachings and spiritual insight, gradually brought calmness and assurance to the believers. As the movement gained strength the clerical authorities began to show fear. This led to an international arrangement made between the Turkish and Persian government by which Bahá'u'lláh with a band of the followers was ordered to a more distant exile in Constantinople. In April 1863, on the eve of his departure from the land of 'Iráq, Bahá'u'lláh declared himself to be the One whose coming the Báb had foretold, "He whom God would manifest".

From Constantinople the exiles were sent to Adrianople, where they remained until 1868, when they were finally sent to the fortified town of 'Akká, a penal colony on the Mediterranean just north of Mt. Carmel in Syria. There, in the land of Carmel, where "the coming of the Lord" in this latter day had been foretold by the prophets, Bahá'u'lláh lived and taught; many travelling from great distances to receive instructions from him, while others received teaching through his writings.

With the coming of Bahá'u'lláh the mission and teachings of the Báb were fulfilled and completed; so from that time on the movement became known as the Bahá'í Movement, and the believers, hitherto called Bábís, became known as Bahá'ís, this new name being a derivative of Bahá. In the spring of 1892 the mission of Bahá'u'lláh being finished, he passed quietly from this world.

'Abdu'l-Bahá

During Bahá'u'lláh's ministry his revelation was complete, yet his cause was not explained nor established in the world in general. To this end he, in his testament, as well as in various parts of his teachings, commanded his followers upon his departure to turn their faces toward his eldest son, 'Abbás, more widely known by this title, "'Abdu'l-Bahá", whom he had chosen as their spiritual guide: "The Centre of The Covenant" of God to the people of the world, the expounder of his teachings, the one who would establish this great movement and to explain and demonstrate it before the world—the one upon whose shoulders his mantle would fall.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was born in Ṭihrán, Persia, on the 23 May 1844, the day upon which the Báb first declared his message. During all the trials and vicissitudes of the mission of Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was at his right hand promulgating his cause and serving his followers. He was the first of all to recognize Bahá'u'lláh as the Promised One and to voice the mighty message of the coming mission of the "Lord of the ages".

'Abdu'l-Bahá wished to be known as the servant of humanity. He sought no higher station than this, yet when one understands all that this means one realizes the combination of humility and exaltation which it implies. He made but one claim for himself, as to his spiritual station, that of service in the path of God. He signed himself "'Abdu'l-Bahá 'Abbás", which, being translated, is "'Abbás, the Servant of Bahá". 'Abdu'l-Bahá was acknowledged by the Bahá'ís as their spiritual leader, and the one to be emulated in the teaching of this great faith in the world. He, through his example, brought the spiritual life of Bahá'u'lláh within the reach of his followers, the Bahá'ís. He was the first fruit of the consummation of God's Latter Day promise to the world, and he was the centre from which the light was radiated to the world; therefore he in his mission lived and exemplified his title of "The Centre of the Covenant".

'Abdu'l-Bahá's life was one of active service to humanity. There was no element in the daily life of this world too small to receive his attention. The great motive power manifesting through him was not of this world but was of [XIII:1:13] God. He worked to serve God, yet by serving God he served mankind. From his early childhood until his 64th year he was an exile and a prisoner; yet the light of his life and teachings reached and penetrated to the far corners of the earth. For forty years 'Abdu'l-Bahá was a prisoner in the fortress of 'Akká—held there by the Sultán of Turkey for no other reason than that his teaching was bringing enlightenment and freedom of thought to all who came within the radius of its power. With the fall of the old despotic regime of Turkish government and the establishment of a constitutional rule, which occurred in the summer of 1908, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was liberated from prison, and became free to come and go as he willed. During the summer and fall of 1911 he visited England and France, where he spent some months in teaching; and in 1912 he spent eight months in America, travelling and teaching from coast to coast, visiting many cities and towns where he had friends and where there were those to listen to his explanations of religious questions and seeking that vitalizing spiritual force which so characterizes his presence.

Upon this tour, in both America and Europe, the pulpits of many Christian churches of various sects and cults, institutions of learning, and the platforms of philosophical and humanitarian movements of various types sought 'Abdu'l-Bahá and welcomed his message of the Oneness of the World of Humanity. The people who heard him were rejoiced by the spirit which he radiated, and those who came within the field of his spiritual love and power, were strengthened and inspired.

'Abdu'l-Bahá had the power of really penetrating the souls of men, of understanding the needs of each individual soul, and of ministering to them in the most beneficial manner. He was the spiritual physician of humanity. Many beautiful and touching incidents are related in the East of the way in which, through long suffering and kindness, he won the hearts of those who, because of their prejudices, formerly were his enemies. Caring for the sick and protecting the oppressed formed a large part of his daily duties. One of the titles applied to him in the Orient was "father of the poor".

'Abdu'l-Bahá's power was that of love. In going into his presence something within one's soul seemed to respond to his soul. Thus a spiritual bond was made which was most far-reaching, for it was of the nature of divine love and always remained with one. Through his life and example, he taught people the life and the way of the Kingdom. He had a message for every one, and as one met and contacted with him in spirit it was as if a new force were added to one's nature. The power of the love of God was brought very close to those who came in contact with 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

From many countries people of different beliefs went to 'Abdu'l-Bahá to receive spiritual help, and upon leaving him returned to their various homes to share with others the joy and assurance of his spiritual message and to follow in his path of service. He was the perfect life, and as the people contacted with him they found in him the centre of this spiritual light of this new day and age. From that centre was flowing the regenerative Bahá'í spirit, which is making things anew, re-establishing religion, reviving faith in God and uniting humanity in the one universal brotherhood of God's kingdom.

On 28 November 1921, his glorious service finished in the body, he ascended to the Kingdom of Abhá, leaving a Will and Testament—The Book of the Covenant—in which he appointed his grandson, Shoghi Effendi Rabbání [XIII:1:14] Guardian of the Cause and Head of the House of Justice, a body of men to be chosen from the believers because of their spiritual qualifications for wisdom and divine knowledge.

Growth of the movement

The movement under the Báb was practically confined to the Islamic countries. During the ministry of Bahá'u'lláh the message was taken to various other countries of the Orient and under the ministration of 'Abdu'l-Bahá it spread around the world. There are not only centres of Bahá'í teaching in China, Japan, Burma, India, Persia, Turkistán, Caucasia, the Turkish countries and in Egypt, but there are strong Bahá'í centres in Prance, Germany, England and throughout the United States and Canada. This growth has been a comparatively slow but steady one. It is not limited by religious nor racial conditions, which is proven by the many heterogeneous elements which this Cause is assimilating and fusing into one element, which is the world type of man.

The universal principles of Truth, which the Bahá'í Movement is teaching, are already clearly seen in the way in which this teaching appeals to people of all religions, races and nationalities. When a soul becomes touched by the Bahá'í Spirit he becomes a citizen of the world, quite freed from the limitations of his former environment, while his social and religious prejudices inherited from forebears and environment are changed into a desire to do something toward world brotherhood through tangible service to his fellowmen. In the Bahá'í meetings—notably those in the East—one sees Christians, Jews, Muslims, Zoroastrians, Hindus and Buddhists mingling as brothers and eating at the same tables. It has been the writer's privilege to travel extensively and to attend many such reunions. He has spent much time in the Oriental countries and has seen the spiritual blending of the Orient and Occident, which process is being brought about by the love and devotion of the Bahá'ís, one for another. These people are really demonstrating the power of divine love, for with them it is so powerful as to overcome all religious and racial antipathy and is producing real brotherhood and peace.

Charles Mason Remey

The Bahá'í Writings

The collective writings of the Báb are known as The Bayán.² These treat chiefly of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh, containing exhortations to the people calling them to purify themselves and prepare to meet the Promised One that they might be fitted to serve him.

Bahá'u'lláh wrote many treatises in the form of books and epistles in which He demonstrates the oneness of the spirit of all of the former religious teachings; also treating of the present teachings in its relation to the religions of the past. A number of these writings were in reply to special questions asked by men of learning and were therefore written from various points of thought, Muslim, Jewish, Christian, etc.

The writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá are many and are chiefly in the form of letters or Tablets, explanatory of the spirit and the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. In 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life of service to humanity is his method of teaching, through which means he gives life, vigour and a penetrative force to his words. His verbal teaching, much of which is reported and circulated in manuscript and in printed form, consists of explanations, given to various inquirers, regarding the Cause and its doctrines, together with exhortations to the followers and certain principles and truths, the pursuance of which is conducive to the best secular as well as spiritual welfare of mankind.

Eternal life is the state of soul of spiritually quickened man. All souls exist as entities after the separation from the material body. However, from the spiritual standpoint, this mere existence is not "life". Only those souls who are awake to the glory of God can be said to be divinely awake and alive and of the life eternal. This spiritual awakening is from God. It is His gift and greatest bounty to man. By virtue of the truth and spirit revealed to humanity through the Prophets and Manifestations, man's soul is awakened from slumber, and, though in the world, yet he lives in a higher realm from which he receives divine strength and force.

According to the Bahá'í teaching heaven and hell are conditions of the soul. The soul which lives in God is in that divine state called heaven, while one not yet awakened to the glory of God is in a state of darkness, or hell. The coming of the Kingdom of Heaven on earth has been the one theme of Christ and the Prophets. All have spoken of this epoch in different terminology, but in reality they all spoke of the one great age of divine enlightenment—a time when faith should replace unbelief, and when divine knowledge should replace ignorance and superstition, and the Bahá'í Cause teaches that the world is now in the early dawn of that new day and age.

Social reforms, laws and ordinances

In addition to the purely spiritual teachings of Bahá'u'lláh, he ordered certain changes in the manners and customs of people, through the observance of which the world in general will be helped both materially and spiritually. He exhorts the Bahá'ís to be tolerant, and in no way to separate themselves from other people, nor denounce those of other beliefs. All men are free to believe as they wish, but all are advised to unite in faith and to lay aside the prejudices and superstitions of past ages. [XIII:2:37] Warfare should be abolished and international questions settled by arbitration. A universal language is favoured as a means of bringing people together in unity. Legislation should be representative. The Bahá'ís should be peaceful and law-abiding citizens. Their thought should be humanitarian before all else. Faith without works is not acceptable. One's worship should be supplemented by a pure and useful life in the world. Men and women should marry. Asceticism is discouraged. Monogamy is taught. Harshness and hatred are to be overcome by gentleness and love. Man should not use intoxicants as a beverage. Opium and kindred drug habits are denounced as is also gambling.

Bahá'u'lláh forbade mendacity, slavery, cruelty to animals and many other abuses which our western civilization has already remedied, so it is hardly necessary here to mention them. The following of these ordinances is already producing its good effect in the many Bahá'í centres throughout the world, and good fruits are coming therefrom.

Mashriqu'l-Adhkár

Prayer supplemented by a pure and useful life in this world form the elements of true worship. Faith without works is not acceptable. Every man should have an occupation which conduces to the welfare of humanity, the diligent pursuance of which is in itself an act of worship.

In this Cause there is no priesthood nor clergy. Each soul approaches God in prayer without sacred rite nor ceremony. Temples open to all people of all religions are to be provided for reading, meditation and prayer. These are to be surrounded by hospices, hospitals, asylums, schools, universities, etc., the whole group of buildings to be known as a "Mashriqu'l-Adhkár", which translated from the Arabic literally means "The dawning point of the mentions (of God)". In these institutions is symbolized both the spiritual worship and the humanitarian service as taught by Bahá'u'lláh.

A few years ago in the city of Ishaqábád in Russian Turkistán a Mashriqu'l-Adhkár was built. At present the Bahá'ís throughout the world are uniting in the work of building the first Mashriqu'l-Adhkár in America, which is to be erected upon the shore of Lake Michigan near the city of Chicago.

Of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár to be built in Chicago, 'Abdu'l-Bahá has spoken as follows:

"Now the day has arrived in which the edifice of God, the divine sanctuary, the spiritual temple, shall be erected in America.

"The accessories of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár are numerous. Among them are the school for orphans, the great college for the higher arts, hospital, home for the cripples and hospice. The doors of these places are to be opened to all sects—no differentiations. When these accessories are completed, and, by God's help and aid, the departments fully systematized, it will be proved that the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár is to human society a great bounty and a great blessing.

"In brief, through the unlimited bounties of God, I am hopeful that the beloved ones of God in America may be aided and confirmed in founding this mighty and solid foundation and gradually annex thereto its accessories.

"When these institutions, college, hospital, hospice and establishments for the incurables, university for the study of higher sciences and giving post-graduate courses, and other philanthropic buildings are built, its doors will be opened to all the nations and religions. There will be absolutely no line of demarcation drawn. Its charities will be dispensed irrespective of colour or race. Its gates will be flung wide open to mankind; prejudice toward none, love for all. The central building will be devoted to the purpose of prayer and worship. Thus, for the first time, religion will become harmonized with science, and [XIII:2:38] science will be the handmaid of religion, both showering their material and spiritual gifts on all humanity. In this way the people will be lifted out of the quagmires of slothfulness and bigotry.”

Education

Through a broad and liberal education along scientific, material and intellectual lines, balanced by a knowledge of man’s moral and spiritual duties and relation to God, the Bahá’ís believe that the superstitions of the past will disappear and with them the prejudice and ignorance which have always made for man’s limitation. The Bahá’í Movement stands strongly for the freedom and education of women, even going so far as to teach that it is more necessary for parents to educate their girls than their boys. Women being the mothers and the early teachers of the children of the race, it is more necessary that they be educated than men. In the Orient, where the condition of ignorance and general degradation among the women is so widespread, the condition of the Bahá’í women is so far superior to that of the women in general in the countries in which they live as to be one of the clear demonstrations of the awakening of these peoples and their freedom from their former religious institutions which denied educational advantages to women. Particularly in the Muslim countries are the women denied culture and education by the established rule of theology, but now through the dawn of this new day and age all these limitations of the past are disappearing before the light of Truth.

Peace

Religious differences have been the chief cause of warfare, while religious sympathy and understanding have always made for peace and prosperity. Prior to the beginning of the Bahá’í Movement, little or nothing was being taught or written about peace, arbitration, universal language, suffrage nor other universal institutions. During the past three-quarters of a century, however, the world has awakened to the necessity for all of these institutions for which the Bahá’í Cause stands; and now the most enlightened people are realizing that the lack of spiritual or religious understanding, with the accompanying lack of moral perception, is the real cause of our human ills and the cataclysmic conditions through which the world is now passing.

While Bahá’u’lláh’s teaching was ahead of the world of his day, the world of today is realizing more and more the value of that teaching. The supply and the demand are now meeting, from which better conditions will result.

The Bahá’ís believe in a federation of all the nations, both large and small, and the establishment of a world parliament for the judicial settlement of international disputes. In treating of this matter of peace between the nations, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says:

“A tribunal will be under the power of God, and under the protection of all men. Each one must obey the decisions of this tribunal, in order to arrange the difficulties of every nation.

“About fifty years ago in the Book of Aqdas, Bahá’u’lláh commanded the people to establish the Universal Peace and summoned all the nations to the Divine Banquet of international arbitration so that the questions of boundaries, of national honour and property and of vital interests between nations might be decided by an arbitral court of justice.

“Remember these precepts were given more than half a century ago—at that moment no one spoke of universal peace—nor of any of these principles, but Bahá’u’lláh proclaimed them to all the sovereigns of the world. ... They are the spirit of this age; the light of this age; they are the well-being of this age.”

Science and religion

The imaginations and superstitions of the religious systems of the past, are against common sense and science, for these are but the thoughts of men of the [XIII:2:39] ages. The universal basic spiritual truths of religion, upon the contrary, accord with science. When men understand the true principles of religion no conflict will be found between them and the material sciences.

Evolution of man

According to the Bahá'í teaching, spirit or life force is of five kinds: vegetable, animal, human, and divinely spiritual life of the soul, and the Infinite unknowable Spirit of God. Man was created man, a species apart and above the vegetable and animal conditions. Through the spiritual influences of the Manifestations of God's Word, or the Prophets, man becomes characterized by the divinely spiritual qualities, and adds to his human nature the spiritual nature, or the life eternal.

The Bahá'ís see true religion itself as a scientific fact, for to them the true philosophy of religion is the statement or the science of the higher spiritual laws of that plain of being known as The Kingdom of God. Through the working of these divine laws and a knowledge thereof, humanity arises from the state of spiritual ignorance which characterizes the so-called "natural" or savage man, and becomes quickened by the process of the higher life. Thus, through a knowledge of the basic principles of religion, and through the wisdom which the living spirit of religion instils into the soul, the true religious man is freed from the thralldom of ignorance and superstition, which imprisons the soul, and he finds ample opportunity and scope for the development of the highest and noblest virtues peculiar to that plain of being known as The Kingdom of God.

Oriental-Occidental unity

One of the greatest obstacles to overcome before universal brotherhood and peace can come is the natural lack of confidence and understanding between the Oriental and Occidental peoples. The Orient has always been the source of the world's spiritual inspiration, while in the Occident has appeared the fruition of this inspiration in the form of a highly evolved civilization. Through the Bahá'í teachings this chasm between the East and the West is bridged, and for the first time in history Oriental and Occidental are meeting on a common ground of sympathy and understanding.

Economic questions

Co-operation is the basic principle upon which all institutions should be founded. The co-operation of all for the good of all. Laws should be so regulated that it will be impossible for one man to enrich himself at the expense of another. Through the proper adjustment of political and commercial relations between individuals and nations all will live in harmony, happiness and in plenty.

The House of Justice

Bahá'u'lláh arranged for the guidance and the welfare of his cause by appointing 'Abdu'l-Bahá "The Centre of His Covenant", to whom the people turned for guidance. And 'Abdu'l-Bahá arranged that after him the people should turn to Shoghi Effendi, whom he appointed "The Guardian of the Cause and Head of the House of Justice"—a body of men chosen from the believers because of their spiritual qualifications for wisdom and divine knowledge.

The business affairs of the Bahá'í Movement will then be conducted by these assemblies of consultation. In addition to the local Houses of Justice, there will be a general assembly of consultation composed of representatives from all parts of the world. This will be known as "The Universal House of Justice".

The method of teaching

The teaching is given without money and without price. Teachers are usually self-supporting, giving their time and services, the recompense for which is the joy and satisfaction of serving in the cause of Truth, but in rare instances [XIII:2:45] persons of means have been known to provide travelling and living expenses enabling certain speakers and teachers for a time to extend the field of their labours. Teaching consists of first living the principles of the Cause in one's inner life and then speaking to others. Unless a teacher lives the life of which he preaches his words will have no effect upon the hearts of others.

All Bahá'ís are servants of the Cause and are supposed to promulgate the teachings, each in his own sphere—each working according to his ability. Some are able to go about through the world teaching and preaching, while others carry on their religious work in conjunction with their material affairs. The Bahá'ís in no way form a close[d] sect or cult. They do not separate themselves from other people. Their work is ever outward and in the world where they are diffusing spiritual knowledge and serving humanity.

In the following words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá he instructs teachers how they should teach:

“The intention of the teacher must be pure, his heart independent, his spirit attracted, his thought at peace, his resolution firm, his magnanimity exalted and in the love of God a shining torch.

“Should he become as such, his sanctified breath will even affect the rock; otherwise there will be no result whatsoever. As long as a soul is not perfected, how can he efface the defects of others?

“Unless he is detached from aught else save God, how can he teach severance to others?”

The days of divine springtime

A talk by 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the Shrine of the Báb, Mount Carmel, at a feast given by Áqá Díyá'u'lláh of Ishqábád, 28 November 1920.

... the Master said: “Springtime is the time of buds and blossoms and flowers, but the season of fruits is after the springtime. The days of the Manifestations of God are like the season of the spring.

“In the time of the Manifestation Moses, the buds and flowers which appeared were turned into fruits some time after Moses' departure. Similarly in the days of His Holiness Christ, his words and utterances produced fruit afterwards. At the time of His Holiness the Prophet, (Muḥammad) he planted the tree of Ṭúbá with his own hand, but that tree also produced fruits afterward.

“Now we hope that the fruits of man's existence will appear in these days (or seasons). In the Qur'án it says: ‘Before long God will bring forth people whom He loves and who love Him.’ When they said to His Holiness Christ: ‘Your followers do not behave according to discipline and rules.’ His Holiness Christ answered them: ‘These are the days of marriage and not the days of discipline. The days of rules and discipline will come afterwards.’ This means that the fruit of the trees will be gathered in summer and not in the spring. There were some people who appeared at Khurásán, and in reality revived the religion of His Holiness the Prophet, otherwise his religion would have been utterly destroyed. These people were souls who were severed from all desire save service.

“Now also our hope is that in these days the Holy Cause may yield its fruits. That the friends of God may become so self-sacrificing that the Cause may bring forth much fruit. The days are passing, before long a whirlwind of dust will place everybody in their graves.

“As long as we are living we must be all the time thinking of the promotion of the Word of God, so that the heavenly life may illumine all the world and may change this world of dust into paradise and change this wilderness of thorns into a rose garden.”

A glimpse of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as the Gardener

Pasadena, California.

15 November 1921.

My Dear Miss Buikema,

I have not forgotten that you accorded to me the great privilege of seeding you some words regarding our recent visit to the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, that you might use them perhaps to advantage in the Star of the West. I am so happy to be able to share with the friends the wonderful; impressions which we received there and to send you, for publication, the accompanying photograph. This picture was taken in the garden surrounding the Shrine of Bahá’u’lláh at Bahjí on the morning of 1 May of this year for Mr French and me.

We had spent two days in the presence of our Master in Bahjí, accompanying him at morn and evening into the Shrine to pray and supplicate at the Holy Threshold. On this particular morning, Sunday, the first of May, as we passed through that beautiful garden brilliant with early spring flowers, I begged the Master to grant us the favour of pausing for a photograph in order that I might bring back to the friends in America this glimpse of him as he stood among his flowers. How near it brings him! To me, no picture¹ which we have ever had is quite so typical. Truly, he is the Gardener, and in the hearts he is planting only seeds of Love.

During the three days which we passed in his presence at Bahjí, the strongest impressions which I received all bore upon the necessity of Obedience and Reverence. It may be too much to expect that all will be equally reverent, for that only comes with a deeper perception of the station of the Centre of the Covenant. But even those who are attracted superficially to the Bahá’í teachings must recognize the justice of the commands of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and that all human and spiritual welfare must lie in obedience to those commands.

I asked one question which will be of interest to all the Assemblies and the answer an infallible guide. It had distressed me greatly that, in some places I had seen and known of, extraneous matter was being introduced into the regular Bahá’í meetings until these meetings had lost their spiritual illumination, growing thereby into intellectual pastimes rather than into an humble and reverent attitude toward the Words of the Messengers. When I mentioned these things to the Master he looked up with that inimitable smile and said: “Ask them where in the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh they find these things.”

The answer was so sweet, so courteous and so final that I leave it with the friends to ponder upon, hoping that it may bind us more and more closely together in pursuance of the Light which is to be found only in the pure teachings.

Faithfully yours in the service of the Centre of the Covenant of God.

Nellie S. French.

Happiness from the Bahá’í viewpoint

Reprinted by permission from the June issue of the Boycroft magazine.

The Bahá'í Cause now encircling the world is a movement for unity of religions, universal peace and a universal language. Its founders, the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá have brought to humanity a message which transforms for its followers this earth world into a spiritual Rose-garden.

To present to you some of their thoughts on happiness is the purpose of this compilation of quotations. Asked the ultimate goal of a human life 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied that it assuredly was not to eat, nor to sleep, nor to dress, nor to repose on the couch of negligence. Rather it is to find one's way to eternity and understand the divine signs; to receive wisdom from the Lord of Lords and to move steadily forward like a great sea.

Speaking with a group of friends he said: "To see the joy of divine gladness on your faces is the cause of my happiness for when I see you happy, I am happy also. The divine messengers come to bring joy to this earth, for this is the planet of tribulation and torment and the mission of the great masters is to turn men away from these anxieties and to infuse life with infinite joy.

"When the divine message is understood all troubles will vanish. Shadows disappear when the universal lamp is lighted, for whosoever becomes illumined thereby no longer knows grief. He realizes that his stay on this planet is temporary and that life is eternal. When once he has found reality he will no longer retreat into darkness.

"Reflect on the tribulations the divine messengers endure in each age—exile, prison, the cross, decapitation; yet they ever remain tranquil.

"Behold the apostles of Christ! They had many trials. The friends of Bahá'u'lláh in Persia have undergone unspeakable calamities. Their possessions were seized and destroyed, their children captured, their lives sacrificed; yet at the hour of martyrdom they danced with joy, for they were completely detached from the life of this world. Trials have never prevented men from knowing the happiness of the beyond. Nay, rather, this is the path." [XIII:5:102]

"The world needs more happiness and illumination. The star of happiness is in every heart, we must remove the clouds so that it may twinkle radiantly. Happiness is an eternal condition. When it is once established, man will ascend to the supreme heights of bliss. A truly happy man will not be subject to the shifting eventualities of time. Like unto an eternal king he will sit upon the throne of fixed realities. He will be impervious to outward, changing circumstances, and through his deeds and actions impart happiness to others. A Bahá'í must be happy, for the blessings of God are bestowed upon him.

"Every soul must strive to impart to mankind that joy and happiness the nature of which is permanent."

"This is the day of happiness. In no time of any manifestation was there the cause for happiness as now. A happy state brings special blessings. When the mind is depressed the blessings are not received."

"Laugh and talk, don't lament and talk. Laugh and speak."

"Laughter is caused by the slackening or relaxation of the nerves. It is an ideal condition and not physical. Laughter is the visible effect of an invisible cause. For example, happiness and misery are super-sensuous phenomena. One cannot hear them with his ears or touch them with his hands. Happiness is a spiritual state. But happiness is caused either by looking at a beautiful picture, or witnessing a delectable panorama, or associating with the person whom you love, or listening to a good voice, or solving an intellectual problem. All these are the motives of happiness, but the real cause is spiritual.”

“What is necessary is divine joy. Divine happiness is the speaker of the heart. ... The soul of man must be happy no matter where he is. One must attain to that condition of inward beatitude and peace; then outward circumstances will not alter his spiritual calmness and joyfulness.”

From 1868 to 1908 ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was a prisoner in ‘Akká, Palestine. His teachings of universal peace and brotherhood were too far in advance of his time. But as he said, “Every morning when I awoke I praised God there was another day to serve Him in His prison. Every night I thanked Him that He had permitted me to serve His Kingdom one more day in His prison. I was in a Turkish prison forty years but every day was a day of perfect joy.”

“My happiness,” he said, “comes from the Kingdom of Abhá! My joy is from the Delectable Paradise! My health is gained through the rays of the sun of Reality. My spirituality descends from the world of lights. My enkindlement is obtained from the Fire of the Love of God. My attraction is vouchsafed from the mainspring of all truths. My life is maintained through the fraternization of all mankind, the progress of the Cause of God and the unity of the friends.”

A fortune that bestows eternal happiness

Knowledge, purity of thought and love

Talks given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá on Mount Carmel to a group of college students during their summer vacation. Recorded and translated by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab.

“True happiness is found in purity of thought. Whenever I look into your radiant faces I am made most happy because your thoughts are pure. You must live in such a manner that whenever I think of you I may be made joyous; whenever I behold your shining countenances I may become happy; whenever I hear good news of you my heart may be filled with delight. [XIII:5:103]

“Man must so live that he may become beloved in the sight of God, beloved in the estimation of the righteous ones and beloved and praised by the people. When he reaches this station the feast of eternal happiness is spread before him. His heart is serene and composed because he finds himself accepted at the threshold of His Highness, the One. His soul is in the utmost felicity and bliss even if he be surrounded by mountains of tests and difficulties. He will be like unto a sea on the surface of which one may see huge white waves, but in its deeps it is calm, unruffled and undisturbed. If he trusts his happiness to worldly objects and fluctuating conditions he is doomed to disappointment. Should he gain a fortune and anchor his happiness to that he may hypnotize himself into a state of so-called joy for a few days, and then that very fortune will become a mill-stone around his neck, the cause of his worry and melancholy.

“But if he lives in accordance with the good-pleasure of the Lord he will be favoured at the court of the Almighty. He will be drawn nigh unto the throne of Majesty. He will be respected by all mankind and loved and honoured by the believers. This fortune bestows eternal happiness. The tree of this fortune is ever green. The autumnal wind does not sear its leaves nor does the frost of winter rob it of its perennial freshness. This is a happiness which is not followed by any misery but is always a source of gratefulness and blessedness. The most great, peerless gift of God to the world of humanity is happiness born of love—they are the twin sisters of the superman; one is the complement of the other. Everything that contributes to the sum total of this human happiness is a gift on the part of God, and that thing which does not add to the aggregate of this ideal felicity must be, little by little or all at once eliminated.

“Therefore, it becomes self-evident that the first bestowal to the world of humanity is happiness, that kind of happiness which is unalterable and ideal. If, by happiness physical enjoyment of material things is meant then the ferocious wolf is made happy because he kills the innocent lamb and satisfies his hunger for a few hours. This is not happiness. Happiness is a psychological condition created in brain, mind and heart, the effect of which works out from the centre to the circumference. For example, after many days and nights of reflection the philosopher unravels a seemingly unsolvable problem. As the result, a wave of supreme happiness surges through his being. The philanthropist comes to the assistance of thousands of half-starved, half-clothed, afflicted people of a nation. In his deed he wins much contentment. An engineer spans a large river with a suspension or cantilever bridge, or an architect makes the design of an edifice. Each finds true enjoyment in his work.

“It is related that Náşirí Ṭúsí was well versed in the science of astronomy. Many nights he walked on the roof of his house watching the stars. Whenever he happened to discover the true position of a planet or to locate the place of a constellation he became so enraptured with the joy of a new idea that he would get up and dance and sing, saying: ‘Where are the kings? Where are the monarchs of the earth? What is true felicity? Let them come and see what real happiness means, what ideal bliss really is.’

“It is for this reason that Bahá’u’lláh in all his Tablets has made it incumbent upon all to study sciences and arts, encouraging everyone in the acquirement of learning and a liberal education for the eternal happiness of mankind lies in these (things).

“Praise be to God that for the present you are all well and happy! I have met you and associated with you this hour. You are living on the slope of Mount Carmel, are near to the Holy Tomb of the Báb, inhaling the fragrance of its rose garden, are looking at the unique [XIII:5:104] panorama and are enjoying the gifts of heaven. This is the ultimate hope of the lovers of truth, to be in the neighbourhood of the Most Eminent Mercy!”

In the evening there was a large meeting. When the Master entered the room he looked over the bright faces of the Bahá’í students and exclaimed with delighted heart:

“God be praised! How wonderful are these students! I am looking forward with great hope to their future. In reality they are beneath the shade of the Blessed Perfection and they are being animated with the spirit of the Holy Land. For this reason they are superior to many other students. Their mettle will become known in the future. They are now in the process of refining; when they come out of the crucible their brightness will become manifest. The word of God is the refining which will polish them, suffering them to become as tested gold.

“Every single assured and firm believer will consider himself the servant of all the friends of God, nay, rather, the servant of the world of humanity. The honour of man depends upon this. The everlasting glory of mankind lies in this. For this reason his holiness Christ says: ‘The last shall be first; the least among you in the Kingdom is the greatest.’ Whosoever desires to walk in the path of the Kingdom, so that he may reach the court of the Almighty, he must be a true servant. The path of God cannot be compared with the paths of men. The humbler man is in the path of God the more exalted is he; the greater his meekness and submissiveness the more beloved is he; the more he is surrounded with tests and trials the vaster the tranquillity and composure of his spirit. Nay, rather, in the path of God humility is honour, trouble is rest, affliction is bestowal, poverty is wealth, indigence is sovereignty and lowliness is nobility. Truly, I say, whosoever is the real servant of the believers of God is their assistant and helper.

We must all walk in this divine path.”

The Writings of Bahá'u'lláh

Horace Holley

As taught us all in the schools, literature tends to become either a classification according to its form—the novel, drama, essay and poem—or according to its historical continuity. Both methods externalize the reality of literature away from our personal experience. We are inclined to know the author by his work rather than the work by its author. We are inclined even to glorify the work at the expense of the creator from whom it came. The student unconsciously begins to conceive the poem, say, as being the poet refined to the utmost degree, the poet translated temporarily and accidentally to a higher condition, much as though the man were to his own production just as the oyster is to its pearl. Since the poem exists above and beyond our own capacity, we feel that it exists above and beyond the human character of the poet. But any person who has ever actually felt the creative impulse within his own consciousness realizes that the work produced, even at its best, renders only a fraction of the significance that impulse contained. During creation, the author feels an infinite resource opened within him, a resource which the work created never satisfactorily records. The work itself, then, represents merely the author's power of responding to the impulse, not the capacity of the impulse itself. In other words, literature is the record of what the infinite impulse has been able to effect in and through certain limited lives. [XIII:5:105]

This distinction between creative impulse and sensitive instrument is vital. Every literary work is like a telescope which can be held up to the eye at either end. According as we experience literature through the limitations of minds to respond, or the unlimited capacity and appeal of the creative impulse itself, we are led to believe that writing, like a tower, can never rise above a certain height, or we believe that, like a fine musical instrument, its power grows forever with the touch of the hand by which it is played.

It is actually as though the individuals capable of producing literature were themselves each one a definite number of notes on the entire, indefinite scale of the instrument. Authors differ vastly as to what notes sound through their work, and what notes remain silent. In one we have aesthetic sensitiveness without moral discrimination; in another able logic without feeling of beauty. The whole of literature is far from being literature as a whole. The whole of literature, historically, is nothing more than a long series of limited parts, and literature as a whole can no more be imagined from grouping together these parts than could a sound man be imagined by one who knew only different forms of disease.

But to externalize literature is to miss even the ability to perceive this fact. It is to miss even the true humility characteristic of the creator, by which the creator tends to belittle poems even while glorifying poetry. The creative mind is well aware that if somehow the silent notes could be made to sound, all that literature has done in the past would seem by comparison nothing. He is impatient of his own work, knowing that its excellence is merely the power of commanding a small field. But without knowing what literature is in its essence, our reading continually goes astray. We travel the road of experience, but we travel backward. We scale the creative power by what has actually been created, rather than what has been created by the creative power; which is to measure the heavens by the highest visible hill.

Thus it seems to most students that Shakespeare is and must be supreme in literature for all time. Shakespeare, it seems, sounded all the available notes on the keyboard of life. One by one he brings every type of man and woman upon the stage, where one by one their inmost secrets are exquisitely, completely told. The gesture of good and evil, power and weakness alike he rendered in all its deepest significance.

But with the decay of personal experience, the very power of estimating values passes away. We expect nothing beyond Shakespeare, because we stand within the superficial completeness of the work and not within the profound incompleteness of the man. We do not even follow Shakespeare himself to his own consummation, his own self-estimation as a mind transcended by power unencompassed on every hand. But I recall that his old age, in the person of Prospero, deliberately broke the wand by which all those dear enchantments had been raised. Even about this mind the darkness fell. Master of motives within the range of his own experience, Shakespeare at last paid reverent homage to motives outside its ken. Breaking the magician's wand seems, to the lesser mind, merely as though the poet withdrew from poetry in the weakness of old age; but to the mind capable of standing beside Shakespeare himself the broken wand signifies nothing less than his recognition that all human drama had begun to crumble away with the perception of a greater and a beyond. Triumph is the glory of the lesser mind; humility is the glory of the great. Shakespeare's old age cannot be taken as the guttered candle, the empty lamp—it was the opening of a weary student's window at dawn, when the rising sun shames the candle to his own gladdened eyes. Shakespeare knew [XIII:5:146] within himself the silent notes, and where he could not invoke masterful music he left the instrument to less sensitive hands.

Not in quantity of work, not even in what the world calls quality, therefore, does the essence of literature lie. Shakespeare surpassed other men merely by combining in himself certain qualities other men share among themselves. There is no one element in Shakespeare not manifested since his time by many poets. He possessed no notes beyond our capacity severally to possess. But where all minds are dumb, he is dumb. What all men seek, he also sought, with an inquiry more poignant, more insistently phrased. The essence of literature consists in its power to reveal. Shakespeare's revelation is the perplexity of human life when actuated by motives resident in the personal, the outer layer of thought.

So much it is desirable to say by way of approach to the writings of Bahá'u'lláh. By minds limited to the customary closed circle of experience, these writings can be read over and over without understanding. The supreme benefit of reading them, indeed, is to learn merely how they are to be read. A lifetime might well be spent pondering them word by word, if real understanding came pure and full at the end. For in Bahá'u'lláh we have a mind whose response to the infinite creative impulse begins precisely where the "literary" effort stops. Apparently, Bahá'u'lláh has not that masterful intimacy with "life" itself for the revelation of a new dominion over the generations. The truth is, however, that Bahá'u'lláh taking "life" for granted, stands outside "life" itself for the revelation of a new motive. He does not sound the Shakespearian notes, because he sounds the notes that have been silent in us all. No comparison between Bahá'u'lláh and other writers is possible. The closest similarity to Bahá'u'lláh's writings are the utterances of Jesus. By those who love them Jesus' utterances are not comparable with literary productions. They are absorbed into the yearning spirit as from a source deeply hidden within, that the spirit may be re-actuated and transformed.

But there is a subtle distinction even here. Jesus' message was that to the infinite power surrounding our consciousness an infinite response can be made. Jesus made himself the Way for human experience to travel—every painful furlong of the Way, from the birth of the spiritual child into the indifferent flesh to the resurrection of the spiritual man at the hands of the flesh furious at its own threatened subordination. Thus the words of Jesus are the manifestation of the Christ—the power of men to respond infinitely to the infinite power of God. But Bahá'u'lláh's message does not repeat the message of Christ—it completes that message. Whereas Christ planted his words as seeds within the soul, Bahá'u'lláh's writing fertilizes those seeds as by the shining of the sun in spring. He manifests the surrounding, controlling Infinite of universal spirit just as Christ manifested the response on the part of consciousness to that Infinite control. Christ was Religion working up to its source through the painful experience of reluctant humanity; Bahá'u'lláh is Religion self-subsistent, unchanging, the beginning as well as the end of the Way.

Thus in the writings of Bahá'u'lláh there is an influence not dwelling elsewhere in literature or philosophy. That influence permeates and proceeds from a literary and philosophic form, but the power of the influence well-nigh shatters the cup of speech. Here is Truth, in distinction to facts; Reality in distinction to logic; immovable Power in distinction to emotion. Our categories and our systems fail to contain this writing, as engineers would fail to dam the sea. Our critical faculties even prevent us from approaching its outpouring effect, for its very purpose is to create [XIII:5:107] new faculties as standards in the mind. It is a Mystery, but not secretive; a Revelation, but not argumentative; Love, but not enticement. In numberless passages the flame burns visibly forth and the wine intoxicates. It is a spiritual geography for the searching mind, a home for the heart outworn. But alas, even in the abundance of mid-spring, the dead tree stands unmoved.

“Revelation is a fire from which proceed two effects: It creates the flame of love within the faithful, but produces the cold of heedlessness within those that hate.”

“The proof of the sun is its light which shines forth encompassing the world; and the evidence of the shower is the bounty renewing the earth at its fall.”

XIII:5, August 1922 [XIII:5:107]

The sun of reality becomes truly manifest with the passing of the cloud of the body

A tablet by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the great scholar, Abu'l-Faḍl.

When in 1892 Bahá'u'lláh after fifty years of glorious teaching in Persia, in Baghdád, in the most great prison of 'Akká, passed into the unseen world his disciples were prostrate, even the saintly Abu'l-Faḍl. It seemed as if nothing could console them. 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote twice to Abu'l-Faḍl but he was so grief stricken that he sent no answer. The spiritual radiance reflected from the mirror of Bahá'u'lláh's earthly temple was so life-giving even Abu'l-Faḍl was desolate when the physical mirror was broken. Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote him the following marvellous tablet. It has a deep significance for all his friends today. Editor.

O thou father, mother and brother of Faḍá'il¹ (virtues)!

It has been a long time since the fragrance of significances from the rose-gardens of the heart of that fountainhead of knowledge has reached the nostrils of the longing ones or the flame of the heat of the vibrations of yearning have reached the meadows of the hearts of the true friends. Although at the commencement of the burning anguish caused by the separation of the Beloved of the Horizons (Bahá'u'lláh), a letter was sent, yet the acknowledgement of its receipt has not appeared, nor has the sign of acceptance been made manifest. It is evident that this distress and depression are due to the severity of the grief for the separation of the Beloved of the Horizons and this inactivity is due to the effect of the great calamity. But the lights of the Sun of Reality have no setting, nor have the waves of the great sea any quiet or calm. The bounties of the Abhá, the most glorious Kingdom are uninterrupted and the splendours of the Empyrean heaven are permanent. The clouds of the April of bestowals are overflowing and the artery of the love of God is pulsating in the body of the world. The confirmations of the most glorious, Abhá companion are incessant and the grace of his holiness the Most High is continuous. Though that most luminous Sun has set in the lower horizon, which is the horizon of beings, yet it has risen and shone forth from the highest horizon. Though, until the present time, the eyes of mankind on account of veils have been deprived, blinded and covered, now that veil which in every dispensation and age has been the cause of denial is being removed. For in all dispensations when the Manifestation of His Oneness ap- [XIII:5:108] peared from the horizon of beings the greatest excuse of the people was this: they said, "Thou art only a human being like us." ... "He is only a human being like you." In short, they considered the appearance of those Manifestations of Oneness the cause of falsehood and ground for rejection. But after the ascension (of the Manifestation) they became believers and assured, for then they did not regard the physical, human person; therefore, they became aware of the power, evidences and proofs of God. They became the manifestation of, "Thy sight today is iron-sight."

Thus, should you kindly reflect upon this it would become evident that in all ages the ascendancy of the Word of God has been after the ascension of the Dawning Points of Lights to the supreme horizon. For the people, naturally, are more inclined and more attracted to believe in the invisible. In all times, in the day of the Manifestation they rejected him, evinced pride, found excuses, and in the abode of superstitions they built their nests. When they looked upon Him as a person who had appeared in a human temple and physically resembled them they became veiled from the divine bounty.

When the eyes of Satan looked upon the body of dust and the earthly talisman of his holiness Adam he became deprived of sight and blind to that boundless treasure which is the greatest bestowal of God and the noblest human characteristic. "Thou hast created me from fire and thou hast created him (Adam) from clay," he said. Now, the purpose is this, that in the Book of Íqán (Bahá'u'lláh) considered the human temple as a cloud and the Divine Reality as the sun;—"and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." He interpreted and explained the verse from the Gospel in the foregoing manner.

Therefore, now is the time to become ablaze and aflame. This is the hour of proclamation and attraction. This is the hour for you, like unto the sea, to be surging; like unto the clouds, to be flashing with lightning; like unto the dove of the garden of faithfulness to break forth into songs and melodies; like unto the birds of the heaven of eternity to be ever singing and warbling.

O, ye nightingales of the rose-garden of guidance! O, ye messengers¹ of the home of bounty! It is the time of rejoicing and acclamation. It is the hour of songs and anthems. Sit ye not with hearts distressed and sleep ye not with hearts broken. Soar ye to the apex of sublimity. Start ye singing in the rose-garden of guidance. Seek ye the abode of the Merciful and the melodies of the rose-garden of His Holiness, the Beneficent.

If in this Divine spring-time ye do not sing in what season will ye sing and become familiar and well-acquainted with the roses of significances?

O thou Abu'l-Faḍl. Where is the blaze of the fire of thy tree? Where is the effulgence of the light of thy love? Where are the waves of thy knowledge? Where is the breeze of the rose-garden of thy assurance? Where are thy melodies which cheer the ears? Where are thy fragrances which perfume the nostrils of the people of the world? Where is the attraction of thy heart? Where is the expansion (dilation) of thy breast? Where are the glad-tidings of thy spirit? Where is the glow of thy fire and where is the flame of thy torch? Forsake inactivity even though in these days inertness from the graveness of anxieties is commended and praised. Then come out from the corner of oblivion; seek the summit of acceptance; soar in this Abhá, most glorious space; enter into the rose-garden of the Cause of God by thy arising to diffuse the [XIII:5:109] fragrances of His sanctity and to elevate His word with such rising that the pillars of polytheism will totter, the hearts heedless to the Lord of Lords will tremble, the centres of knowledge will be uplifted, the standards of assurance will be spread abroad, the banners of explanation will wave and the sails of life will be hoisted in the ark of safety on the sea of creation.

Meditation and its effect upon conduct

Mary Hanford Ford

The human being is a creature who is ordinarily governed by impulses which rise within him comparatively unwatched and unguarded. If he feels happy or melancholy, angry or patient, his action reflects the conditions of his being, and if one reproach him for faults which might disappear with a little self-control he is apt to reply—“Well, I am made that way, and I can’t help it.”

He is only conscious of the physical impulse which prompts a certain nervous expression and he has not yet learned that there are two of him and that if he would become acquainted with his greater self, the soul or reality, life might be very different, and the disagreeable elements of his temperamental man could easily disappear.

There is a wave of psychological study passing over the world which has many excellent results and which is causing many persons who never gave much thought previously to the existence of the “inner man” to perceive something of this interesting individual, who presently becomes vastly more important as an element of personality than is indicated by that mysterious and baffling term, “the subconscious”. The subconscious is in fact the true self, the soul, or as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá often calls it, the reality.

There is no part of his wonderful teaching which is more clear and convincing than that relating to the soul in its contact with life, the body, and God. As we follow it we realize that the soul is the avenue through which we know God and receive the Holy Spirit, that it is always a distinct entity becoming more luminous and powerful as we turn to God and control the animal man in us. It often surrounds us like an aureole in our earlier stages of development, but as we progress, and reflect its light, it leaves us free even in our waking hours and carries on its own activity. The subconscious, in other words, is the true thinker and revealer in us, through whom words become real prayer, and impulse becomes intuition and veritable guidance.

But how is this possible? We ask anxiously, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s reply is, through prayer, meditation and deeds, because without the deeds which express the results of meditation and prayer these remain only delightful experiences of the soul, and do not transform life. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says in the great address on meditation in the Paris Talks—the one who cannot meditate is still in the animal kingdom!

Many persons are not aware of the difference between concentration and meditation, which is very positive. Through concentration we enter the psychic or mental world, we hypnotize, we develop the personal will. But in meditation we enter the Abhá kingdom by temporarily eliminating the personal will. In this state we penetrate the consciousness of the reality, and can receive the divine commands through the Holy [XIII:5:110] Spirit, and if we are strong enough to obey the commands we receive our impulses are overcome, we obtain eternal life and become rational beings instead of merely animals who walk erect.

Many believers are only mental believers. They have never taken time to abstract themselves from the turmoil of the outer life and hear the “still, small voice” which is only audible to the inner ear. Bahá’u’lláh says: “We speak one word and by it we intend one and seventy meanings—each one of them we can explain.”

These one and seventy meanings are not simply shades of mental and spiritual interpretation but often facts of life which we can only understand through prayer and self-control. The individual who is no longer capable of anger, envy, ambition or revenge, who does not feel such impulses, who is made ill by indulgence in gossip and scandal, and therefore no longer tolerates them has entered the spiritual path and is beginning to know eternal life.

These are some of the results of real meditation, when it is sought as a means of purifying the outer man, not merely as a spiritual pleasure and intoxication. The latter is delightful but not educating, and people who form the habit of meditation without deeds sometimes fall into serious nervous trouble. Meditation lights a fire within us which demands fuel, the fuel of growth and thoughtful activity, and if we refuse to feed it with these, it is liable to burn up its own oven! And this, of course, is not particularly agreeable or advantageous for the oven. However, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says: “The test of existence is motion. An object which has in itself the power of motion lives; if motion is withheld growth ceases. That is mortality. ... If the reality of man is not confirmed by the divine power there is no doubt whatsoever but that it will stop along the path of human progress, and after its stop there will be a fall.”

The confirmation of this divine power comes to us through meditation and its resultant deeds. And one sees the great advance daily among those who are seeking spiritual truth. Sight comes into the eyes, happiness to the heart, and though outward circumstances may not be what one desires, the light and happiness are not diminished. Such light and such happiness are from within and are not dependent upon exterior happenings.

Can we change human nature?¹

A Bahá’í conversion.

All programmes for world peace, for economic right and justice depend for their execution upon the creation of a new heart in our race of human beings, “the establishment of the Kingdom of God first in the hearts of men and then upon earth.” To educate this new humanity is the supreme need of the century. Because Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá are able to train that new type of men and women by the divine elixir of their life and teachings they have made this century radiant with the hope of a new world-society in which dwelleth righteousness.

An instance of this power is recorded by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab when he was living at Haifa. It is an account of the conversion of a Russian highwayman who visited ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the Holy Land in 1914. “Before he accepted this revelation he was well-known in all those parts as a dangerous character whose very name struck terror to the heart of the members of the community. It may be an exaggeration, but I have heard from several persons that, in his former whirlwind desperado life he killed about two hundred people. Physically he is a giant, tall and powerfully built. Well, when this man embraced the Bahá’í Cause and learned of its lofty and spiritual principles a most miracu- [XIII:5:114] lous transformation occurred in his life. It was more than miraculous. We have no word for it in the dictionary. Whereas formerly he was ferocious, he became meek. He was a wolf; now he became more gentle than a lamb. He was a satan; he became a radiant angel. He walked among the people as a standing miracle. They looked at him, rubbed their eyes, and could not believe. Mystery of mysteries! Wonder of wonders! What divine alchemy had changed the base metal of this man into pure gold!

“By and by they came around and asked the reason—not from him, but from others. He did not have to open his mouth to teach the Cause. This singular and instantaneous transformation of his character was the greatest act of teaching. Then all of a sudden it dawned upon the minds of many citizens of the town what a truly marvellous miracle had transpired in their midst. They became Bahá’ís, and today are the most wonderful body of true, noble Bahá’ís in all Russia. ... Let the agnostics and materialists who deny the religion of God and negate the good it has rendered study the psychology of this case!”

Speaking of such spiritual rebirth, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá once said: “Ordinarily a moral teacher strives day and night until a person abandons one of his many evil attributes. But as soon as the guidance of God and the faith of God dawn from the horizon of a heart that person is a changed man. All his evil characteristics are transformed into praise-worthy attributes. Whereas formerly he was a coward, he becomes courageous. Whereas before he was debased, he becomes sanctified and holy. Even in his intelligence, his knowledge, his sagacity and his mentality he is a different man.”

A visit to Bahjí by the way of the sea

“The spell of the Holy Land.”

Nellie S. French

As I sit at my desk wondering which of the deep and lasting impressions of our visit to the Master, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, during the days of the Ridván in May 1921, I should commit to paper for the good pleasure of the friends, I am so insistently drawn to the incidents of the journey and the arrival in the presence of the Master, that I must begin with those at least, and let the rest take care of itself. Not a thousandth part of what is really implanted and constantly growing in my mind and heart could possibly find expression, for there are no words with which to make those impressions clear to the reader, nor indeed was I myself conscious of all that I was imbibing, nor of the doors of knowledge which were being opened before my face at the time.

Five days of patient waiting in Haifa, for the time when we might go had given us a beautiful insight into the loving service and devotion of the friends there, and were preparation for the crowning event of our pilgrimage. We took the little train at about five-thirty on Friday afternoon, occupying a railway carriage of the most primitive type in company with what might have been a party of labouring “commuters” returning to ‘Akká for the night. The train travelled slowly, but as it ran along the very edge of the Mediterranean the cool sea breeze soon rose, to the discomfort of the other travellers, and one by one the wooden shutters of the car were raised, entirely shutting out all light and air and the fresh sweet breeze of the sea.

We seemed not to be of special interest to our travelling companions, though I confess I was intensely interested in them, to know what they knew of the wonderful story of the ages which had been, and was being, enacted in their very midst, and I would have given much to know the language of the country. We reached the station of ‘Akká, a short distance from the city walls, just as the sun was sending its last horizontal rays across the sea, bathing the valley of “Achor” in its last crimson rays. Starting on foot toward Bahjí, where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was sojourning, in the little house adjoining the Shrine of Bahá’u’lláh, we left the calm blue sea beating its ceaseless rhythm on the sandy beach behind us, and turned our faces toward the plain. Never shall I forget the sight which lay before us! A light shower had fallen, leaving everything fresh and green, with that indescribable fragrance which only a shower in a dry land can produce. Over the Lebanon mountains there lay the last glow of the sunset and far away in the distance here and there curls of smoke rose to indicate some little hamlet gathering its people for the evening meal. All was still and a peace reigned quite unbroken save for the sound of the waves which grew fainter and fainter as we progressed. Then out of the twilight came little groups of pilgrims, Persians for the most part, who had travelled for weeks to spend a few hours in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá! They were very quiet, walking with the even, slow gait of those eastern peoples: each carrying a small bundle of belongings. They seemed not even to be conversing as we approached them, but when we were near they stopped, and I saw on the faces of those men a joy not of this world, as they greeted us in the name of God, and seemed to impart to us without words the sense of fellowship and sympathy.

Our path led further and further into the country, past the distant walls of the prison town, over the battlefield of the ages. It was rather a rough road in places, and the hour and the still of the night coming down kept each one wrapt in his own thoughts. Finally in the distance there appeared a light; it seemed [XIII:5:117] a long way off, for we were forced to go slowly and to pick our way, but night had entirely closed in when we came to a stop before the low doorway of a little one-story house. One of the young men, secretary of the Master, came out to meet and greet us, and for a few tense moments we were kept waiting in the hall of the house before we were told that we might enter the Master's room.

How strange it seems to be trying to express the sensations of those moments! I cannot say what was most deeply impressed on me at the time for everything was so new and I was so utterly unprepared for all that I was to see, even though I had listened to many accounts of visits of pilgrims before it became my own blessing to go. 'Abdu'l-Bahá rose as we entered the room and stretching out his hands he bade us welcome and seated us beside him quite as if we had always been known to him, removing for us once and for all time the feeling of diffidence which was only natural when stepping into that majestic presence. Here indeed was majesty, but the surroundings were of the simplest that I had ever seen. Here was hospitality, a hospitality which might have been used toward persons of great distinction; and here was dignity, a dignity which is only born of heavenly knowledge and which walks with the Lord of men!

Each phase of the Master's manner sank deeply into my heart as each new impression was born within me, a new sense of how we should be to be worthy to deliver to the world the teachings of the Cause of God which he came to establish and to fulfil.

How small we seemed, how weak and immature, how unworthy and how fruitless! To have been ushered into that presence and to have gone empty-handed, to have been accepted of him, and to have had nothing to offer but our humble willingness! Oh the shame of it! And yet he welcomed us as if we had been deserving children returned for our reward!

As I think of the opportunities which he has made possible for us, of the example which he came to set for us, nothing, with the help of the Power of the Covenant, is impossible. I wonder how we can ever fall short of the greatest reverence of which humanity is capable, of the greatest delicacy for which all things of the Spirit call! It is time that we should be adorning ourselves with those attributes which will make worthy exponents of the Cause. Let these words of his be our constant inspiration and reminders:

"I desire for you distinction. The Bahá'ís must be distinguished from others of humanity. But this distinction must not depend upon wealth—that they should become more affluent than other people. I do not desire for you financial distinction. It is not an ordinary distinction that I desire; not scientific, commercial, industrial distinction. For you I desire spiritual distinction; that is, you must become eminent and distinguished in morals. In the love of God you must become distinguished from all else. You must become distinguished for loving humanity; for unity and accord; for love and justice. In brief, you must become distinguished for all the virtues of the human world; for faithfulness and sincerity, for justice and fidelity, for firmness and steadfastness, for philanthropic deeds and service to the human world, for love toward every human being, for unity and accord with all people, for removing prejudices and promoting international peace. Finally, you must become distinguished for heavenly illumination and acquiring the bestowals of God. I desire this distinction for you. This must be the point of distinction among you.”

This must not be of profession only, but by actually making these words part of our every day life. Upon us depends the greatest of all responsibilities. That we may be worthy!

A beautiful message from the Holy Land

Rúhâ Khánum

The Bahá'í Community, Persian Colony,
Haifa, Palestine, Ridván 1922.

Dear sisters and brothers in the Cause of God,

At last I am pleased to be able to answer your very kind letters and to thank those friends, who sent messages of loving sympathy to us in the first days of our crushing sorrow.

Until now I have been broken down with grief, my heart was sore distressed, my eyes were overflowing with bitter tears; I could not collect my thoughts sufficiently, I had no power to write to those dear friends, who had sent such affectionate words of consolation to me in my overwhelming loss.

Now we can comfort our hearts with the assurance that, though our beloved Master is no longer in his mortal body, yet his eternal Spirit is present with us for evermore. Whilst here on earth his humanity was as a cloud, which hid his divine Spirit from us. That veiling cloud is now removed, and we feel the intensity of his spiritual Guidance.

As the Master said after the Ascension of Bahá'u'lláh:

“The Light of the Sun of Truth will never set. The waves of the Sea of Truth will surge for all time. The divine rain from the Kingdom of Glory will never fail. Inspiration from the Realm of the Supreme will not cease for evermore.

“Life-giving showers are constantly flowing from the clouds of Mercy. Help is still being poured out from the Heavenly Land, and aid from the Supreme Lord is being given without ceasing. Though that Glorious Sun (Bahá'u'lláh) has set in the horizon of this world, it has risen in radiant splendour in the divine sky of celestial grandeur.

“The eyes of the people were veiled by his earthly body from seeing the Light of the Sun of Truth. ...

“As that veil has been withdrawn, it is now the time to proclaim the Word of God, to send forth the lightnings of the Spirit, to chant the melodies of Faithfulness in the Rose-Garden of God the Beloved.

“Oh Nightingales of the Garden of Virtue! Now is the day to sing the beautiful harmonies of Heaven!

“Let your heart be no longer troubled, neither sit idle in sorrow and mourning, but arise; wing your flight into the Celestial atmosphere, singing the triumphant hymns of holiness in the garden of Love, always with your heart fixed on that Divine Home of the Radiant Beloved, towards which we are all as pilgrims, making our Pilgrimage!

“In this day of the Spiritual Springtime if we do not arise in the glorious work of establishing the Unity of the Kingdom, at what season should we choose to begin? Verily now is the appointed time.”

These words apply equally to our days, when our hearts bear the burden of the agony of parting with our Beloved Master.

Now my friends, I implore you, let us each and all stand together in a vast army of Light, steadfastly and loyally determined to vanquish the Powers of Darkness on the pitiful battlefield of the World.

Let us remember the disciples of His Holiness the Lord Christ—how after his Ascension they, though few in number, stood faithfully together, united in [XIII:5:119] soul and heart and mind, striving to accomplish that work, for which their Lord had suffered.

Thanks be unto God, that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has left many friends, who are ready to give up all their days, their comfort and earthly happiness, to spread the teachings of the Bahá’í Cause, which, when known and understood by the noble and pure-minded, will change the heart of the world.

We have been consoled and comforted by the visits of many dear friends from all parts of the world. They have been our great support in these sorrowful days. We are very glad to have one of these friends, Lady Blomfield, still with us. She accompanied our beloved Shoghi Effendi and his sister when they returned from England. She was just like a very kind mother to them in the hour of their deepest sorrow; and ever since she has been here, she has been occupied with many useful works, connected with various matters, necessary to the good of the Cause. We are all extremely sorry that she is leaving us in the immediate future, to continue her work in Europe on her return journey to London.

I am sure we shall achieve much more in these days, than in the earth life of the Master, because the agony of the parting has so softened our hearts, that our one aim and desire is to give joy to his blessed Spirit.

When the Shepherd is gone, the sheep must stand closer together to protect each other from the attacks of wolves.

Therefore let us not be depressed. I know that if we turn our whole hearts to God, we shall surely hear the music of the voice of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá singing therein. Listen in the night season, we shall hear him say: “I am with you, fear not, neither be cast down by sorrow!”

Hearken at morn: He is saying: “Arise for the service of the Cause of God, and the spreading of His Truth.”

Listen at noontide, you will hear him say: “Faint not, though the flame of your sorrow be burning hot, for soon you shall be refreshed by the cooling breeze of God’s Mercy.”

Listen at twilight—his voice is saying: “Be happy, rest and trust in me, for I love you, and I will never leave you nor forsake you, my children. Be united! Be patient! Be hopeful, be faithful!”

I am sure our Beloved desires for us all, joy, happiness of heart and an abundant baptism of the Holy Spirit.

Therefore let us prepare our souls to receive this great and glorious Gift in these, our wonderful days—which the Prophets and Saints in past ages longed to see! They were deprived of this blessing, to which we have attained!

I am thankful to say that we have glad tidings from Persia, where the friends are arising in renewed strength and unity to serve the Cause with faithfulness and loyalty.

It is ever thus, when our Beloved passes from earth into the wider world, those, whose sorrow is overwhelming, find relief in striving to accomplish all he would wish to have done.

I am glad to say that our dear Protector of the Cause, Shoghi Effendi, is now resting from the work which was so immense. He felt it necessary to go into retreat, in order to pray, and concentrate and meditate on the glorious and difficult task entrusted to him, and to gain the strength needed for its fulfilment.

Shoghi Effendi is precious to all the Bahá'í friends, for he is our leader, bequeathed to us by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. [XIII:5:120]

Concerning him a Persian friend has quoted: "When the rose has faded and its garden is destroyed how shall we inhale its fragrance? Nowhere, but from the attar which is its essence!"

I conclude my letter by asking all the dear friends to pray for the family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that they may receive power to transmute the agony of the parting into determination to help Shoghi Effendi in his work, for indeed we all miss the Master more and more every day! He was all the world to us, our spiritual and our earthly father, our comfort, our hope, our companion and our guide in all the affairs of our daily life.

The only joy we have is when, from all countries we hear the good news of the unity of the dear friends and the growth of the Divine Cause.

The Greatest Holy Leaf, my mother and my sisters join me in love and Bahá'í greeting to you all, and in assuring you that we always pray at the Holy Shrines for the dear friends, that they may be assisted and strengthened in the path of Servitude so that they may accomplish a great work in the spreading of the Divine Cause in this Day, for "Now is the appointed time".

Ever your loving friend and spiritual sister in the service of the Cause of God.

Miss Genevieve Coy

A record of spiritual experience.¹

Miss Coy's experience illustrates the appeal of the Bahá'í teachings to the highly trained university scientist. 'Abdu'l-Bahá so perfectly unites science and religion that the most sceptical modern scholar is won by his heavenly logic and his creative words. Miss Coy first heard of the Bahá'í movement while teaching and studying in one of our great American universities. As a specialist in psychology she thought how delightful it would be to collect material on the psychology of the spiritual transformations effected by the Bahá'í teachings. With this critical spirit of the scientific investigator she began to question the Bahá'ís as to their inner experiences and to read the writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Bahá'u'lláh which they said were the fountain source of that newness of life which she saw shining so brightly in their lives and faces. The result of this investigation she records in the following bit of spiritual autobiography which she wrote at the request of the present writer:

"For five years before I heard of the [XIII:5:122] Bahá'í movement my whole attitude toward life had been sceptical and materialistic. I thought that I had absolutely no religious faith left in me. The very words, 'God', 'spirit', 'faith', came to have an utterly disagreeable connotation to me. I lost my faith in everything and everyone. The moral standards of my early youth simply vanished, and I was left with no standards of living, save a strangely unavoidable devotion to my work. For the rest—dying seemed better than living; life looked utterly black to me, and I would gladly have disappeared from existence.

"And yet, down under all that black despair there was the faintest suggestion of some voice of hope that would not be utterly silenced by my own selfishness. But it was too faint to help much. And then, when it seemed to me that I had come to the end of the road, and that there was only darkness ahead—then the light came! I heard the story of the lives of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I learned how these teachers had helped ordinary men and women to live beautifully and joyfully, and I was filled with an intense desire to know more of how they would help me to live the things I had dreamed of doing. All during the following days and nights those two great names rang in my ears, and a glory, as of a new dawn, seemed to fill my heart wherever I went. I read the books they had written. I talked with men and women who had come to love them; and then, like a gift from an unseen hand, came the realization that this glorious new vision was for me, as well as for the others.

“Now I know that there is no true living except as one lives ‘in God, and for God’. Nothing is of any importance save to do God’s will, as it is revealed by Bahá'u'lláh. And the most wonderful thing of all is that through reading and meditation and prayer power comes to one really to make one’s life over, so that one may live joyfully, in service to one’s brothers.

“My attitude toward life has been so changed that I could not possibly go back to the old standards. I know that I am in God’s hands and that no real harm can ever reach me. I know that He will help me to serve Him and His children. I know that I have come into my Father’s home, and that henceforth I must strive to live as one of the children of the Most Glorious. Because of this, the two prayers that I pray most earnestly are these: ‘Strengthen me to serve Thy beloved and to help those who need Thee’, and ‘May my service be acceptable to Thee, and my actions a praise to Thee’.”

The need of a universal programme

“Universality is of God,” writes ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, “and all limitations are earthly.”

“We know in part and we prophesy in part; but when that which is perfect is come that which is in part shall be done away.”

All our human thinking and social programmes, our prescriptions for the world’s illnesses have been partial, fragmentary. Peace conferences find no effective solution. Prejudice, strikes, preparations for war continue to grow and spread. How can civilization be saved?

A universal society of nations with a universal limitation of armaments is a remedy. A universal language is another. But the illness of the world is too serious to be cured by any one remedy. “The world of humanity,” says ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, “will not be transformed into the heavenly paradise through the promotion of one, single principle. Every progressive principle which is the cause of the advancement of the world of humanity is like a simple element. A simple element does not produce a composite life. But when the elements are associated together then a being is brought into existence.

“The Cause of Bahá'u'lláh and his heavenly teachings include all the elements and principles of perfection. Among these (principles) are: the highest efficiency in the educational system, the oneness of the world of humanity, the conformity of religion with science and reason, equality of rights among the children of men, the breaths of the Holy Spirit, equality of men and women, the sweeping away of the prejudices existing among the various religions, heavenly morals, the fragrances of the Merciful, universal peace, etc. The Cause of Bahá'u'lláh combines in it all these principles.”¹

A programme outline

Compiled from the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

The independent investigation of truth.

The promotion of the oneness of the world of humanity.

The instruction of mankind in the knowledge of human brotherhood.

The inculcation of the primordial oneness of all phenomena.

The upraising of the standard of the solidarity of the human race.

The spread of the precepts of spiritual civilization.

The teaching of the synthesis of the heavenly philosophy.

The conformity of religion with science and reason.

The elucidation of the essential oneness of the divine religions.

The explanation of the continuity of prophetic revelation.

The abandonment of racial, denominational, worldly and political prejudices, prejudices which destroy the foundation of mankind.

The readjustment of the economic relations between capital and labour so that each individual member of the world of humanity may enjoy the utmost welfare and prosperity.

The organization of the arbitral court of justice so that all the nations of the world may thus remove all traces of enmity and hatred.

The up-building of the principles of one universal auxiliary language. [XIII:6:132]

The betterment of morals.

The inculcation of divine love through the power of religion.

The essential necessity of the confirmation of the Holy Spirit.

“If a person desires to work for the progress of the world of humanity he must turn his face to the Kingdom of Abhá (the most Glorious). That divine power may then assist him in all his undertakings and the penetration of the word of God will change this nether world into the mirror of the realm on high.” “Every plan is in need of a power for its execution. Today the penetrative power in the world of existence is the confirmation of the Kingdom of Abhá. Every plan and system which is assisted by this power will be established in the world of humanity and will be realized among men.

The Star of the West will seek to present month by month the great principles of this universal programme and their application to world conditions. These principles and the divine dynamic, the Holy Spirit within and behind them are the Cause of God in the world of today. The Star of the West will seek to record the majestic progress of this Cause in all nations and religions and to reflect from the mirror of its pages the rays of that Sun of Righteousness which has arisen with universal healing on its beams.

The spirit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Horace Holley

Part I

The divine power, in its fullness, penetrates the universe at all times, but each existent being shows forth this power only to its own degree. Stone, plant, animal and man—all are sustained by the one power, without which nothing could ever exist. In the same degrees that stone, plant and animal receive the power, it is received also by man, for man's physical being is the sum of all that nature contains. So long as man is content with these degrees of existence, man cannot be distinguished from nature either in origin or end; he would be considered merely as nature in the state of self-awareness, a mirror in which for a certain period nature can be seen and known. Man is immersed in nature, though his thought is not confined.

When we stand upon the shore of the sea, and watch the inrolling waves, it seems as though the ocean were moving and advancing upon the shore, but this motion and advancement are illusions of the eye, for each drop of the sea continues ever in the same place. It is a motion we attribute to the sea, which in the sea itself is only agitation. And thus the constant change and movement of life on the surface of nature; it is the illusion of life, not progressiveness of being. For nature as a whole lives, through the divine power, but the existence of each production of nature is merely lent and then withdrawn. The tree lives, but the leaves that are put forth by the tree wither and fall. Today we see a man, and the man shares in the common thought; but tomorrow we see another man in his place, and the actions and thoughts of the first are repeated. The continuity of men is but the continuity of leafage, not the continuousness of the tree from season to season.

But man is immersed in nature as the ship is immersed in the sea, and the force of the wind which produces only agitation in the sea, produces true movement and progress in the ship. But the ship that is deprived of sails, and is rudderless, then shares only the agitation of the sea, the end of which vessel is destruction. So man, when deprived of those faculties that exist above nature, and independent of nature, lives in the agitation of nature and dies like the foam on the wave. By his thought he may perceive this, and become aware of it, but by thought it cannot be prevented or changed.

Now, as when a plant is removed into a dark place, far from the light of the sun, its forces gather dumbly into the roots, and its leaf withers, its flower fades and its fruit is destroyed; and the plant itself, by no effort or exertion of its powers can overcome the lack of the sun; but when placed once more in the light its forces are liberated and the plant seems again to live from within; so are those faculties in man that respond to the divine. Neither will, nor thought, nor desire, which are the forces of man, can move upward from the roots of being in the darkness of nature, for man depends upon his spiritual existence upon the life and light of the divine. Nature is the shadow of God, and in that shadow man is a plant that sleeps. [XIII:6:134]

That which brings the divine light unto the dumb and deeply hidden spiritual forces of man is the Manifestation of God. Into the shadow of nature the Manifestation comes, but of that darkness he has no part, for in the Manifestation of God the spiritual faculties are perfected and mature. The divine light enters his being without shadow or interruption, and from the being of the Manifestation of God it is reflected to all the horizons. Into the darkness of the world of nature the Manifestation of God brings a clear light, as a mirror which has been lowered into a deep pit can reflect the light of the sun and thereby banish the pit's darkness. The light which the Manifestation of God mirrors forth to banish the darkness of nature in man is the Holy Spirit.

Now the Holy Spirit is a force which surpasses in energy and influence any force which man of himself can produce or imagine. As the sun is more powerful than anything upon the earth, and all the forces of the earth are but shadows or emanations of the sun, so the Holy Spirit is more powerful in the world of being than any human faculty. The Holy Spirit is a universal and divine power, which cannot be known by any faculty in its universality. Rather does it awaken and inspire all the faculties of the dormant soul, as the sun in springtime awakens and inspires the faculties that sleep in the earth.

Just as when, in winter, all the trees of the forest are locked in sleep, and none has leaves or signs of vitality, and in this condition we can judge them only by their relative size or perfection of form; but when the spring comes those that have life hidden in the root put forth leaves and buds and those that have no life remain as they were, so that then we can distinguish the living tree from the dead tree; even so during the spiritual darkness before the coming of the Manifestation of God all the souls are dormant, and we judge the value of people by their outer possessions, their personal activity or their commanding influence over the other dormant souls. But when the power of the Holy Spirit descends, then those souls that have life show forth the quality of life, and those that have no life remain in the death of nature even as they were. That is why John the Baptist cried in the wilderness—that is, the wilderness of spiritual ignorance—“Repent ye, for the Kingdom of God is at hand!” For he would warn the souls that what they thought was life was in reality the illusion of life, and what they considered the light of existence was in reality the shadow of deprivation. Thus when Christ manifested, bringing the Holy Spirit to mankind, the souls that yearned for the reality knew the Spirit in him, and gave the Spirit entrance into their hearts, while the souls that were wholly immersed in nature remained in the outer darkness that nature is.

Entering the heart wherein it is invited, the Holy Spirit brings life and light; light to discern the true spiritual Self; life that animates and inspires the spiritual faculties to conscious activity. Now the seed is small and inert and apparently dead, yet the tree is hidden within it, and when the tree comes forth it is immense and visibly living and active. And no man can discover the tree that is within the seed, but the sun discovers it and brings it forth; and in this way the Holy Spirit discovers the soul within the body, and brings it forth into the light of the divine. This life which the soul receives through the penetrating energy of the Holy Spirit differs from the life of the body as the life of the tree differs from the life of the seed; received from outside nature, the life of the soul is not subject to nature’s decrees. It is the “new life”, the “second birth”, the “resurrection” which has been recorded in all the Holy Books; and because this life can be acquired only [XIII:6:135] through the Holy Spirit, therefore the coming of the Manifestation of God to the world of men corresponds to the “day of resurrection” of which tradition never quite lets go. Moreover, because all men reveal their inner, spiritual condition by their acceptance or rejection of the Holy Spirit, just as the trees reveal their degrees of vitality in the spring, the time of the Manifestation likewise corresponds to the “day of judgement” so caricatured in the common interpretation. But the spiritual “judgement” is that which the soul renders within and upon itself, through the degrees of its knowledge or ignorance. The sun does not judge the tree, nor does God judge any man.

Now the mystery of the Manifestation of God is this: that the Holy Spirit reveals to men their own true self; so that in heeding and obeying the Manifestation a man heeds and obeys his own spirit which desires to awake and to predominate in him; and in rejecting and persecuting those who reflect the Holy Spirit, a man rejects and persecutes his own reality.

This rejection of the Holy Spirit is due to our being content with the existence we receive as a gift from nature, without effort or thought of our own, and our lives while they endure are as the spending of a treasure we have not earned, and the wasting of a substance we cannot restore. Intent upon the shadow, and habituated to the shadow, we are repelled by the light, and relying upon the being which nature temporarily animates, we permit all our desires to stay imprisoned in this narrow cage. No death is more strait than the false life of the body, and resurrection from this death is resurrection indeed.

Now the power of the Holy Spirit is directly evidenced in the life it establishes within the seeking soul, which power has no likeness, equal or comparison; but the Holy Spirit, through a reflection and an indirect power, also predominates over the world’s material destiny.

For the sun which produces leaves and buds in the living tree, likewise produces decay and consumption in the dead tree; and the Holy Spirit evokes life within the animal soul of man as well as within the spiritual, each man being aroused and stimulated according to the nature of his own predominant desire. Therefore, in the day of the Manifestation, humanity is stirred by invisible forces which penetrate to its very depths. Dormant or slumbering desires awaken and inactive wills become active. Strange, unwonted movements arise among the people, spreading mysteriously like an infection, some for good and some for evil. The observer thinks that each of these movements has a personal leader who is its source and cause, but this is not so. It is the mutual recognition of like minds, and their grouping around the point of greatest influence. Thus those who are slaves suddenly receive a vision of freedom; the downtrodden arise with a new hope; the poor become dissatisfied with their poverty; the rich become dissatisfied with their wealth; the basis of society, which is habit formed by accepted standards of thought and feeling, suddenly being swept utterly away. The consequence is that those who have power, influence, wealth, position and authority begin to feel that this is threatened with destruction. The groping of humanity for the new life and light such people consider to be anarchy, since it overflows the ancient channels of custom and denies the barriers of tradition. Thus, if power, influence, wealth and authority are a man's highest desire, he clings to it all the more frantically the more its position is undermined. During the days when their property, influence and position were secure these same people might have ruled, controlled or taught with a certain apparent benevolence, but this is turned into savage hate and violent oppression through fear [XIII:6:136] of loss. Thus attachment to material things, betraying them, becomes the cause of their rejecting the Holy Spirit; and this applies to those predominant in the accepted religion, art, science and philosophy as well as those predominant in industry and other practical affairs. For the Holy Spirit to be known must be sought above all that is. To prevent the operation of the new forces, the deniers of God direct their violence against one and then another group which they consider to be the source and cause, arriving by a sure instinct at the persecution of those most imbued with the Holy Spirit, and if possible, of Him who is its centre and perfect cause. Thus it was in the day of Christ; and those who understand the genius of history underneath its changing appearances can trace the same character and quality of events in the day of all the prophets and messengers.

But this rejection, increasing violence on the one hand and faith on the other, fails of its purpose from the first, being unwittingly but agents that carry out the mysterious purposes of the Divine Will.

For there appears another mystery in the coming of the Manifestation: that the Holy Spirit both creates and destroys. That which it creates is the life of the inner being; that which it destroys are the veils of attachment to outer being; it destroys the foundation of injustice, ignorance and hate, and this in reality is a divine blessing though in appearance it is hardship and punishment. Had the people in the time of Christ realized the purpose of the Holy Spirit in and through his life and teaching, its power would have expressed its predominance through construction rather than through destruction, for material things are not evil in themselves but are evil only as they attract and delude the soul from its true direction. As a small piece of iron near the compass will deflect the needle from the true pole, so one personal desire retained within the soul diverts the soul's vision downward.

But as the Holy Spirit is brought into the world from outside the world, so is it afterward withdrawn into its own sphere. Then its influence becomes wholly secondary: that is, its spiritualizing effects are measured by the degree in which it was received consciously into the hearts of people. Even though known and accepted consciously by a very few, a certain measure of spirituality, knowledge, justice, kindness and freedom can be observed in the world which previously did not exist. For the power of the Holy Spirit, perfect and unconditioned in itself, becomes imperfect and conditioned in its effects. Religion, which in the day of the Manifestation is a secret essence distilled in the heart, gradually becomes again a matter of outward things, prescribed thoughts and natural desires. But when religion again becomes a matter pertaining to the world of effects, then the people who had rejected its power in the world of causes willingly participate in the religion, for by now religion has become one with their own capacity and desire. Thus, since they believe in property, they strive to increase the property of the churches; since they believe in laws and prohibitions, for the sake of material stability, they strive to perfect the definitions and limitations of the creeds; since they are animated by personal ambition, they make religion subserve¹ a vast superstructure of offices, titles, honours, functions and positions, and spend their lives mounting from one to another of these rungs of illusion; and since they delight in the intoxication of the senses, hence the elaborate rites, ceremonies, sacraments, observances and festivals of their religion, the wearing of purple and red, the chanting, the burning of incense; and since ambition is essentially competitive, hence the feuds and struggles among the different religions and creeds, poisoning the stream of love and inspiration at its very source, which is the cause [XIII:6:137] of all warfare and strife in the world, as well as the cause of anarchy and atheism; for that which these people consider religion is the worship of the body, and that which they accept as from God is in reality the stupefaction of the spiritual soul. Their triumph is the darkening of the divine light and life, and their victory is in the absence of the Holy Spirit. This is that “darkness” which Christ banished when he came, and this is that “world” which every Manifestation overcomes through the Divine Will.

Now consider the character of this age. It is a sea which is stirred to its depths, and the vessel of every life is tossed by a sudden and violent force. As when, in the rolling of a ship, one object becoming loose falls upon and loosens another object, but the cause of the first object’s movement is not itself but of the ship; so the violent impact of men in this age; those who are shaken ascribe the force to those who move against them, but the initial force, in fact, is not of man. A new life and light has penetrated the body of the world, and nothing that was can remain unchanged. A thousand conflicting winds meet over every wave; there is no escape by retirement, and there is no independence in separation. Each atom of the body of humanity thrills with a new joy or pain, a new hope or a new despair. It is as though a vase had been emptied into the air, and its essence blown to every remotest region. Whatever our interest is, it leads us to a ground of supreme conflict, whether we desire freedom or protection, justice or power, change or absence of change. This is not the result of human thought or will or desire, but the result of a universal force which thought and will and desire have received. So conventions and customs dissolve like ice in the sun; new ideals have put forth leaves and buds like gardens in spring. Among all men, this power is yet not of man; these are the effects we see, the cause is the return of the Holy Spirit whose universal reflection in the life of the world we unknowingly witness.

From the Holy Spirit, a light shining into the mind from above, came those sciences and inventions that have united the material world in this age. From the Holy Spirit, a water poured into the parched and thirsty soul, came those ideals and longings that have broken the rule of the past. Humanity is moving its tents from the desert, seeking the promised land.

Now thoughts and events are but the reflection of the Holy Spirit, its effects and its shadow, and the effects do not give the measure of the cause nor the shadow convey the essence of the light. If we turn from the effects to the cause, from the reflection to the light itself—if we seek for the purpose of this one universal power behind its infinitude of consequences—if we would realize the perfect expression of this power before this power is broken into the division of our myriad minds and hearts—we shall find the purpose and perfect expression of the Holy Spirit in the life and words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

That is to say, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, though appearing in the image of a man, has in reality been the selfless soul and abstracted mind which the Holy Spirit established as its perfect utterance, expression and centre in this age. All others are of the effects of the Holy Spirit, but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is of the source and cause. Through him, as a promise and also as a warning, the Holy Spirit has conveyed its presence and purpose to the world, and in him its predominant spiritual influence, its direct action upon the pure soul has been made utter and complete, its illumination extended to all the horizons. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has revealed the measure of God, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has revealed the measure of man.

Therefore, though in the world of effects we see but the fulfilment of calamity and disaster, in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá we witness the victory of wisdom and love. [XIII:6:138] Whereas men are troubled, or ineffectively seeking something good, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá stood serenely illumined behind the shadow of darkness, and was the point of absolute peace within the heart of the storm. If we would admit the Holy Spirit into our souls, we should turn to the Holy Spirit in its direct expression in the life and words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The world intensifies our attachment to the personal desires and changing thoughts which veil the true inner Self; ‘Abdu’l-Bahá releases that attachment, burns the veils, and sets the spirit free. And this is that which Paul intended when he said “Now we see through a glass darkly, but then shall we see face to face”; for the seeing darkly is the seeing the effects of the Holy Spirit in the world, while the seeing face to face is the seeing of the Holy Spirit in its chosen vehicle and perfect, unconditioned expression. By turning to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá we grow conscious of the true purpose of our existence, and as we grow conscious of this purpose it acquires predominance over our personal thoughts and desires. “Wisdom is from above.” Therefore, whoever is concerned about the establishment of peace, he sees forces in the world for and against peace—a vast confusion of efforts and opinions; but in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá he will find, the very essence of peace, the peace maker, an ever-continued inspiration to nobler action, like a tree whose fruits are renewed as often as they are picked. Whoever is concerned about the nature of being, its origin, its expression and activity, its growth, its fulfilment and its end; he finds in the world “wisdoms” that allure and powers that flatter the self he now is; but in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá he will find the Self of all the selves, whose riches can only be expressed in poverty, and whose ecstasy is proved in pain. And it is the same whether one is concerned about these matters or about industrial stability, justice, women’s rights, education, the protection and care of children or the reconciliation of the religions and creeds: there is only one mirror where these matters can be witnessed in their true, universal aspect and significance, and that mirror is the heart of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Those who can measure the world’s leaders with a true spiritual measure, they will agree.

Part II

Now, while wisdom is essentially a state of being, and only secondarily becomes an expression of principles, and wisdom cannot be comprehended in any one principle alone but only in the meeting of all principles in their source and cause, nevertheless, with respect to the world’s capacity and requirements, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in many tablets and addresses gave importance to certain definite principles which are consequently his characteristic impression upon the minds of the age.

Foremost among ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s principles is that of the independent investigation of truth.

A key to this principle may be found in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s use of the word “imitation” where we would use such words as “superstition” or “prejudice” or “ignorance”. Looking upon the minds, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá perceived them as merely imitating one another and the past, like those prisoners who are chained one to another in rows. For the Christian is born a Christian, and merely reflects the prevailing tradition in which he lives. The German or Frenchman is born to his nationality, and imitates in thought and action the necessities to which nationality has ever in the past given rise. Few people ever stand apart from their mental and moral environment and test its standards by any universal truth. What most of us consider "thought" is merely an adapting of the common thinking to our personal advantage. The savage obeys the law of the jungle, and we obey no less blindly the customs of our own day; and consequently, so far as true self-realization is concerned, we are merely that same savage reborn to a jungle of men rather than a jungle of beasts. The spiritual consequences of this only become apparent when we reflect that while none of us would intentionally commit murder, we have made governments machinery for murder on the largest scale; and while none of us would starve the orphan or oppress the widow, we willingly grow rich upon the starvations that competitive industry commits day by day. For we make our swiftly fleeting powers serve that which is also fleeting, and so at the last we have created nothing which is able to endure. True independent investigation of reality leads to the investigation of our own being, and independence of self as passion and desire is the supreme independence.

Another of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's principles is that of the oneness of mankind. All that 'Abdu'l-Bahá expressed through utterance or action, he expressed from the positive and steadfast realization that mankind, in its origin and its end, is one spiritual Man, whose atoms, so to speak, we are, and that one ray of the divine Self, and not many selves, sustains the spirit within the many souls. Today, as we see and feel the immediate inter-action of events and conditions throughout the world, and how no portion of humanity is independent of any [XIII:7:166] other portion, we begin to realize something of the significance of this Bahá'í teaching. Thus for the first time, one undeviating standard is available for the guidance of religions, governments, industries, education, science and art alike, and that standard is the promotion of the oneness of mankind. Whatever promotes unity is of the universal cause, and will prove fruitful and enduring; but whatever prevents unity is of the limited effects, and will be rejected by the Holy Spirit whose action is predominant over all.

Another principle expressed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá is that the foundation of all religions is one. For by "foundation" 'Abdu'l-Bahá means the manifestation of the Holy Spirit, from which all the religions originally came. The Holy Spirit is at all times one, though like the spring season it comes and goes, for the Holy Spirit is the expression of the will of God, and God is not divided against Himself, but the people of the world are divided. It is this division of the people which causes differences in the effects of the Holy Spirit from age to age, for the Holy Spirit is perfect and complete in itself, but enters the world of humanity only according to the capacity of the time. It is an inexhaustible ocean, while the people are but small vessels that quickly overflow. Thus Moses, Christ, Muḥammad, Buddha seem different beings and founders of different religions; but we see them in the mirror of the world's division and not in the light of the Holy Spirit. In that light they are one being, one essence, one cause, one power and one foundation; and whatever they uttered is the reality, which we have seized and divided (interpreted) for our own gain, as the soldiers seized and divided the garments of Jesus. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said that when representatives of all the world's religions have gathered for a sincere investigation of the foundation of religion, this will become manifest and all the secondary, man-made features of religion will utterly disappear.

'Abdu'l-Bahá himself made no distinction between Jew or Christian, Hindu or Muslim. To all alike his spirit gave of its inspiration, and the acceptance or rejection of his ideal of unity was not of the creed but of the soul.

A fourth principle which 'Abdu'l-Bahá enunciated was that religion must be in accord with science and reason.

Now a person who is sick is limited by that sickness both physically and mentally, and he himself cannot overcome those limitations except by attaining health. In the same way there are limitations which fall upon the understanding from sickness of soul. It is spiritual sickness which permits a man to possess a religion at all contrary to science and reason. He may not realize these limitations, but that is part of the disease. These limitations shut out the ray of the spirit, as a wall shuts out the sun. So long as he remains in this condition, the spirit shows forth only its destructive power. Thus irrational religion does not and cannot become truly predominant in human affairs. Even the fanatic does not follow out his religion in all things, but his self-interest or self-gratification is served in devious ways. Without the Holy Spirit a religion cannot awaken the souls, but the irrational religion gains influence over material affairs through being itself material.

But this principle is binding upon science no less than upon religion. 'Abdu'l-Bahá summons the man of science to spiritual religion as he summons the man of religion to an appreciation of science. If in a laboratory, by means of certain elements, an important experiment could be carried out and thereby great human benefits obtained, what would we think of the person who, though refusing to enter the laboratory, nevertheless denied the possibility of the experiment? Yet modern science for [XIII:7:167] the most part takes this very attitude toward religion. For the founders of all religions have indicated the elements and principles for the development of spirituality, and the people of science deny the essence of spirituality while refusing to enter the laboratory of infinity in their own souls.

As a matter of fact, while irrational religion and materialistic science seem outwardly opposed, inwardly they are equally conditions of being that manifest the absence of the Holy Spirit. Both are plants confined in darkness, and both are ships deprived of sails. Where the Holy Spirit obtains, the very words "science" and "religion" are left behind, for there is but one Reality, though this can be cognized by the several faculties on the several planes.

'Abdu'l-Bahá has also expressed as an organic, universal principle the equality of men and women. Now man and woman are the dual, inter-acting forces produced from the one unity, life, which still controls their duality so that it cannot ever quite become separateness.

Physical separateness only the more closely binds the bodies of imagination and desire. Man in nature realizes himself by contrast with woman, and woman in nature realizes herself by contrast with man. Thus any extreme development in one produces an extreme development in the other, so that an equilibrium of thought and emotion is always maintained. The combative type of man tends to produce the dependent, undeveloped woman, and the dependent, undeveloped woman tends to produce the combative type of man. In the same manner, the materialistic business man tends to produce the woman parasite, and the reverse is also true. For man in nature sees himself by reflection in woman, and woman in nature sees herself by reflection in man. Thus any imperfection in one is conveyed to the other, whence it returns augmented, and so on without end. Only the power of the Holy Spirit can create the one perfect mirror of reality for these imperfect images of being; for the Holy Spirit turns will and desire upward to a body of consciousness where sex does not exist. In this age, as the spiritual reality becomes more and more evident, the negative and disastrous influences of sex—that is, sex as the end of will and the aim of desire—steadily diminishes; and this is the cause of the freedom of women in this age. Were we conscious of the inner significances of being, we should behold in the freedom of women one of the most obvious evidences of the presence of the Holy Spirit in human affairs, and an evidence of inestimable importance. Without the true freedom of woman there can be no end of war and ignorance and disease, for only by the freedom of woman can man likewise become free.

Another principle laid down by 'Abdu'l-Bahá is that of the solution of the economic problem. The solution of the economic problem 'Abdu'l-Bahá has declared to be a distinctive characteristic of religion in its universal aspect; for no human power or alliance of powers hitherto has been able to work a solution.

Now by the fear that lies in poverty, either actual or prospective, the human soul is ever turned downward into nature, where the predominant law is the struggle for existence; and becoming imbued with this law, and captive to it, the soul's struggles only the more heavily burdens its own chains. For the struggle for existence sets off the powers of one soul against the powers of another, and this mutual division of powers is mutual defeat. Thus in this day the sciences and inventions which shadow forth a universal order, and dumbly signify the existence of a reality whose law is co-operation, through perversion have become the greatest menace to the very existence of mankind.

"The disease which afflicts the body politic is lack of love and absence of altruism," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá in New [XIII:7:168] York City ten years ago. "In the hearts of men no real love is found, and the condition is such that unless their susceptibilities are awakened by some power so that unity, love and accord develop within them, there can be no healing, no relief among mankind."

A close study of this aspect of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's teaching indicates certain fundamental elements as conditional to the solution of the economic problem. One of these elements is the universal obligation of useful labour. Consider how idleness is condemned by physiologist and psychologist today, no less vigorously than by the moralist and the student of economics. Wealth does not exempt any human being from the consequences of idleness or even misdirected activity. These consequences are ill health of mind as well as body, and that disordered condition whose ultimate end is impotence or insanity. Moreover, in avoiding useful labour, the privileged classes and their parasites have deprived themselves of the very capacity for labour, while increasing that capacity in those who cannot or will not avoid work. In this condition we may see perhaps one meaning of Christ's saying: "The meek shall inherit the earth."

But 'Abdu'l-Bahá has also stated that useful labour, performed in the spirit of service and with the ideal of perfection, is accounted an act of worship and a form of prayer. Now prayer and worship, in their true signification, are not cries for assistance, nor requests for a gift, nor yet taxes paid to a spiritual overseer, but are expressions of gratitude for the supreme gift of life in the spirit that knows no death. This is the motive that 'Abdu'l-Bahá declares should actuate our daily labour. Moreover, work performed with that motive is creative work, and creativeness is the nature of God, so that it is the worker who shows forth the divine image and likeness on this plane. But consider how many changes must take place in the industrial world before this creative sense can be generally expressed, and before labour is surrounded by those conditions which this conception of labour demands! Nevertheless, even this shall be; for the Holy Spirit is destroying mightily all that intervenes between man and his own reality.

Implicit in this conception of the spiritual value of useful labour, is 'Abdu'l-Bahá's teaching that the present wage system must be extended so as to include participation in the profits of industry. For it is evident that the essential purpose of industry is not to produce goods, but to maintain life—and maintain life on the plane of human dignity and refinement. The act of producing goods must therefore coincide, in purpose and result, with the act of ennobling and freeing the producers themselves. This is impossible under present conditions, but perfectly possible when industry is managed by the social engineer in place of the financial expert.

Another fundamental element is that of the voluntary sharing of wealth.

Reflect how those who possess other forms of wealth—physical, mental, moral and spiritual—have ever obeyed this universal and wonderful law. Thus those who share their physical strength with the weak; those who strive incessantly to increase the commonwealth of beauty and of truth; those who devote their lives to the realization of greater political justice; and, above all, those who give love to whosoever are deprived. All the love, beauty, truth, justice and science we have on earth are the result of a voluntary sharing of wealth—a divine principle whose veils grow darker and darker as we approach the lowest degree of wealth, which is gold. But were we to estimate the sum total of all the taxes paid to any government within the past fifty years, and regard this total as being wealth forcibly rather than voluntarily shared, we can perceive how disastrously extravagant material selfishness is, even on its own plane. For [XIII:7:169] a fraction of that sum total, given in the spirit of unity, would have obviated most of those expenses by which taxes are consumed, while in addition increasing vastly the means of producing more wealth by all and for all. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is he who has voluntarily shared wealth in all its forms and degrees, and this spirit is silently but rapidly leavening the world.

Thus when it is more clearly realized how disastrous separateness is, particularly in the larger fields of politics and industry, we shall behold unparalleled examples of self-sacrifice among the great and the small alike; and this essential condition having been fulfilled, relief and comfort will result. For the more powerful arts and sciences are not yet in manifestation, being withheld in the treasury of the spiritual kingdom, which can never be exhausted. Meanwhile, wealth is being forced from those who will not share it, and the old world is everywhere passing away. Yet far from condemning wealth, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá makes its attainment through useful labour a specific advice; but the object of its possession is the promotion of the unity of mankind. By considering wealth as a talent on the material plane, the principle becomes clear. It is not the inequality of talents or possessions which produces injustice, but the spirit of separateness, in the poor as well as the rich, in the ignorant as well as in the learned. Inequality is the essential foundation of love, for no one can stand alone.

Another principle strongly emphasized by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is the establishment of an international auxiliary language.

As the nervous system is one throughout the body, and co-ordinates all the organs and limbs, so the body of humanity requires one universal language and writing to be learned by all people in addition to the mother tongue, which shall serve to interpret the needs, unite the interests and consolidate the purposes; and multi-language is the paralysis of the body of mankind. Those who have concern for human welfare and progress will surely give this subject the attention it deserves.

But the principle by which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is most widely known, and for which he has been most extensively quoted, is that of universal peace. The assurance that this is the century of universal peace, the age of the elimination of warfare, the day of the most mighty moving of the spiritual waves and the full illumination of the sun of righteousness—this assurance is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s steadfast covenant with those who follow him.

Today, the disaster of warfare is a net thrown over the whole of humanity, like the net thrown over a gladiator about to be slain. None can emerge from this net until all emerge. But the very fact that there is no escape for one save through escape for all, and the overwhelming danger of the present situation, brings the consciousness of the oneness of humanity nearer day by day. Therefore this enveloping calamity is a result of the presence of the universal Holy Spirit—feared as a net of death by those who view it with personal eyes, yet seen to be a garment of divine protection by those who view all things in their spiritual light.

For the effort to avoid universal warfare is binding the minds and hearts of those who have been separate during all of history’s ten thousand years. It is creating the great agencies and institutions of the future humanity; it is destroying all agencies and institutions whose purpose is to keep humanity divided and enslaved. Consider how the world's two most powerful kings have lately been overthrown and their empires rent asunder; and the full toll of inveterate ambition and greed has not yet been taken.

Therefore the indifferent are becoming mindful, and the activities of all humanitarians are finding a common channel and a unified expression. But [XIII:7:170] peace, perfect peace, is first of the heart, through the breaths of the Holy Spirit; consequently those among the humanitarians who are wisest, while they strive to produce concrete results and discuss all possible methods, nevertheless have for their great objective the reconciling of the hearts of men. For only that which is established in the heart can ever be established in the world, and peace will never be made real, lasting or secure until the world has recognized the power of the Holy Spirit which alone can conquer and subdue the rebellious hearts or fuse one changeless ideal upon the restless, ever-divided minds. This is the Most Great Peace; this is the Peace of God.

The arch which these social principles of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, like pillars, are intended to support—the structure which fulfils their purpose and directs their use—is the principle of an international tribunal.

'Abdu'l-Bahá ever visioned the world federation wherein all men and women have part, and invokes this world federation within the progressive people of all races and nations. Its cement is an international tribunal instituted through democratic selection and given binding authority by mutual agreement and pledge. No portion of the race but will be fairly represented, therefore no portion but will be controlled by its decisions. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said that when this tribunal is established, any government which instigated war would be set upon by all nations and, if necessary, abolished. This is the firm basis of peace, and no agreement with reservations can be substituted for it.

It is an inherent part of all 'Abdu'l-Bahá's teaching on the subject of tribunals and political progress that the spiritual conditions for real justice have not yet been fulfilled. He regards the function of legislation as a function of illumined minds, severed from all considerations save that of justice and truth. The act of making laws he declares to be an aspect of meditation. That is, just as the poet receives his visions, or the scientist his principles, through intense meditation, so will the future legislative body arrive at its structure of civic, national or international law. Order is of the essence of the manifested universe, and that order flows through and inspires the minds that turn to it in unity and for the purpose of creating justice. Thus those who are capable of entering this unity and impersonal abstraction are to be selected by the people from their wisest men. The legislator, in fact, is placed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in a high spiritual station, and the evident tendency on the part of our noblest clergy to turn from fruitless theological discussions in order to assist in the solving of great political and economic problems is a reflection of this teaching; for 'Abdu'l-Bahá has also declared that the universal religion of the future will have no professional clergy.

Such, in brief, are some of the principles that characterize the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. They are those beacons he has lighted in the darkness of our world contention and strife, the vital energy he has poured into our apathetic minds and the guidance he has established for our selfish desires. They are the spirit of evolution, the genius of prophecy, the expression of man as a spiritually conscious being in the age of his maturity and strength. That these principles are the fruits of the tree of spiritual tradition is evident also in this further teaching of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that this is the age when the Temple shall be builded, reconciling not merely the religions and creeds, but also religion and science, and science and industry; and that to assist in building the universal Temple is incumbent upon all who are responsive to the divine Will.

These principles are the ark in which whoso enters is secure, and whoso remains outside of it will perish in the [XIII:7:171] rising waters of trouble that overflow the earth. Let no one confuse that which 'Abdu'l-Bahá utters with the speculations of philosophers and the dreams of poets. He speaks of the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit both creates and destroys, and none can resist the power of the Supreme.

For these principles are more than so many channels of useful activity; first and last they are signs and evidences of the return of the Holy Spirit to the world of men. As when a traveller is crossing a barren and desolate land, and he suddenly comes upon a broad highway, lined with luxuriant trees, he will follow that highway to the city of refuge; so those who are travelling the world of righteous endeavour, and are weary and fainting at the oppositions encountered both without and within—when they come upon one of these principles, and behold the power with which it is informed and the majestic grace with which it is offered, they will certainly investigate until they find its source and cause; and the centre to which these principles lead from all the horizons of experience—the city of refuge where these spiritual highways end—is the luminous heart of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that which has ever been called, and is, the City of God.

Some questions about science and religion

Interviews with 'Abdu'l-Bahá at Tiberias and Haifa.

Anna Kunz

The following exquisite picture describes the approach of two very devout Christians, Professor and Mrs Kunz to the Holy Land and their interviews with 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the Easter season in 1921. Professor Kunz is a university scientist. His wife is the daughter of a prominent professor of theology. They were sojourning in Switzerland, their homeland, whence they travelled to Palestine in March of 1921. Editor.

To approach Haifa by boat is most wonderful. It was just a few minutes before midnight of 22 March 1921, when the Karlsbad entered the blessed harbour of Haifa, dropping anchor about a mile off the shore. The full moon stood bright and glorious over Mount Carmel. Along the sea shore, up towards the mountain every house could be seen. There were a few lights only, but the moon illumined the whole country most beautifully. My heart was aching as I stood in silent prayer, but the wonderful spirit of that sacred place and land soon filled my heart and I realized that we had finally reached the Holy Land—holy in the past, holy in this great day of God and holy forever.

Early in the morning my husband and I were met by Dr Luṭṭu'lláh Ḥakím, whom 'Abdu'l-Bahá had sent. 'Abdu'l-Bahá was not at Haifa. After a severe illness he had gone to Tiberias for a rest. In his absence, we were beautifully taken care of by his family and friends. Awaiting 'Abdu'l-Bahá's further instructions as to when we should be permitted to meet him, we enjoyed Haifa and 'Akká.

In the pilgrim house, located near 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house, we were given a room with a view up Mount Carmel. It did not take us long to understand why this rather low mountain range was called the Mountain of God. His spirit indeed lingers there. The whole atmosphere seemed laden with a glorious something, with a great peace, with a joy from on high. This mountain, sacred through the memory of past prophets has received a new baptism of the spirit in this dispensation. Shortly after our arrival we were climbing over the rocky path to the Tomb of the Báb. It was a glorious spring morning. The birds were singing, flowers of all kinds were blooming everywhere. Mount Carmel seemed to speak aloud of all the blessings that God had spread there. It is true, we were greatly favoured to be permitted to come to those places during the year's most beautiful season.

But we deeply felt, though the outward beauty of that country was heavenly, that there was another beauty dominant, a beauty that could never vanish. The beauty of the spirit will always linger there and will be found by the pilgrims of any season. God's spirit surrounds [XIII:6:140] us certainly everywhere, but there it seems to hover in great abundance, as it has pleased God to bless this country above others. This spirit of love and peace, of service and self-forgetfulness, emanating as it were from a great consciousness of God's presence overwhelmed us constantly. This happened again and again as we entered the Tomb of the Báb, while at the Holy Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh, and while with 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family. And him, through whom in this age this splendour is conveyed to God's creature we finally saw at Tiberias. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Servant of God, we were permitted to see.

As on that beautiful spring morning, so also at other times, once at night with the moon as our guide, we went to the Tomb of the Báb. Oh, that all the Bahá'ís could realize the fragrance of that place! Each time we went there it seemed more beautiful. As one enters that sanctuary one feels at once in union with the higher world. As we knelt there in prayer my heart seemed to melt; there was but one great longing. When we prayed there for the last time, it was in the evening before our departure, it was as if my heart would break. I knew that I loved this place more than any other place in the world. Since we have gone away, during all these past months, there would often come over me a great longing for that holy shrine and again and again my thoughts wander there and I kneel down at this shrine and rest. Now that this building is the resting place of 'Abdu'l-Bahá too, it must be more glorious than ever.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's family keeps open house all the time. The women pilgrims are always welcome among these beautiful women and their children. They live a life of great simplicity; their life is a reflection of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life. Their thoughts are with him always; they love him with a deep abiding love; they serve in his footsteps and for his sake serve all mankind. Many a precious lesson was taught to me while in this household. Often I was surprised to see that in spite of their restricted life, these women uphold a truly broad attitude towards life in general; they are full of the universal spirit; they know no narrowness; they are all-inclusive and therefore heavenly.

On Good Friday, before sunrise, we started for 'Akká and Bahjí. We were a beautiful little group, two grandsons of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, some other young men, the Master's youngest daughter, Munavvar Khánum, Mr Kunz and myself. From the station we walked over the green meadows towards Bahjí. Passing Bahjí palace we soon reached the little house, where 'Abdu'l-Bahá often stayed for days and where all the visiting friends rest before entering the Tomb. When we passed through the blooming garden, which was fragrant like the place around the Tomb of the Báb, after removing our shoes, we entered the court. There we all knelt at the door which leads to the holy shrine of Bahá'u'lláh, while Munavvar Khánum with a sweet voice chanted the Visiting Tablet. Then she opened the door and invited us to follow her. The place was filled with the fragrance of Jasmine blossoms, a heavenly light filled the room. Here we felt at once at rest and were permitted to pray for our friends, for the world, whose saviour had come as a thief in the night. Here heaven and earth seemed to meet. He certainly has made his resting place glorious. Before the onrush of his spirit all human thoughts had to die; there was but one prayer possible,—that all the world would soon be enabled to serve at this holy threshold. This was my great longing and this only had importance before so much glory. Tears were welcome, they brought relief to the heart so overfull. Everybody slowly withdrew, leaving Mr Kunz and myself alone at the Holy Shrine, whence for ages to come people of all classes, races and religions will derive new strength and assurance of God's nearness. When we finally [XIII:6:141] had reached the garden again, we found a few Hindu soldiers there. They were talking with the Tomb keeper and we were told that many of them (not Bahá'ís at all) would often come to the gate of this sacred place, kiss the wall and withdraw again, explaining that they felt and knew that they were standing on holy ground.

During the afternoon we saw the Riḍván. We also visited the barracks, where the first Bahá'ís with Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá spent their years of imprisonment. Filled with sacred memories we returned in the evening to Haifa. The next morning we were to leave for Tiberias, where the blessed Master expected us.

'Azízu'lláh Bahádur accompanied us to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. From the train we could see Nazareth. We finally reached the Jordan valley and arrived, after three hours' ride, at the southern end of Lake Tiberias, whence we continued by boat to the old and unique little town of Tiberias. So we finally reached the goal of our journey. We were to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

How I wish that I could be worthier to tell of his glory, as he walked among men in human flesh, unknown to most people, and understood by a few only. On the day of our arrival we got only a few glimpses of the Beloved, but they were sufficient to make us realize that his power and authority were not of this world. It was a bright and luminous Easter morning when the Master called us into his room. Oh, that I could picture him to all those who never saw him, could picture him in those simple surroundings at the shores of that same lake where Christ walked and taught. Though I feared to approach him, after his loving words of welcome this fear vanished. Here we sat before our Master, in a little room, with only the most necessary furnishings, on top of the hotel, with a view of that blessed lake. His look seems to go into one's very heart. Yes, he knows his children and their need. As I think of him now, I always love to think, first, of his great simplicity, his marvellous humility which knows of no self-existence, and last, or better, first, of his boundless love. To us his outward appearance seemed similar to that of the old Hebrew Prophets; his humility, his simplicity and love were like the Christ. This boundless love conquered the hearts at once. 'Abdu'l-Bahá talked to us with a ringing, piercing voice which will forever sound in my ears. His words would come forth with that unique simplicity, then he would pause for a while, often closing his eyes. His spirit, it seemed when I dared to look at him, had left his body; he was looking into infinitude, communing with that world for which we long. Having seen him, we could understand well what he meant when he said to us, "The prophet discerns by sight." We came before him, my husband especially, with many, many questions in our minds, but sitting in his presence we seemed to forget them, or better, there did not exist any unsolved problems. He said, "God has created a remedy for every disease," and while in his presence, we tasted of this remedy.

During the days of our stay at the hotel we saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá often. We followed him as he walked peacefully to a nearby garden. Unknown he passed through the crowd. We saw him come back to the hotel, climbing the many steps to his room with a youthfulness that made my husband say "It looks as if he were carried over these flights of steps by unseen hands." Though he was at Tiberias for a rest he received visitors all day long. During those three days spent near him his love would more and more fill our hearts, so that my heart was sad and depressed when on Tuesday morning I realized that he was to say good-bye to us that day. And as he bade us good-bye our [XIII:6:142] hearts were near to breaking. As our tears of love and gratefulness flowed he suddenly left his room, telling us to remain within.

Before leaving Haifa we saw the Master most unexpectedly again. A few beautiful pictures of how he lived and loved in his own home I shall cherish forever. And as we left his glorious earthly home I felt as others, permitted to come into his presence, have felt. I realized that we could in no way comprehend him, we could only love him, follow him, obey him and thereby draw nearer to his beauty.

His words spoken to us we herewith gladly share with all the friends.

Interviews with 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Tiberias—Easter morning.

The Master welcomed us heartily and said: "I was very glad to hear of your coming. When all the people are negligent you have been chosen by God. You came to the Holy Land, attained to the pleasure of visiting the Holy Tomb and were able to come and visit me here. How are the friends in America?" We told the Master that the friends are well.

We told the Master of a group of Jews who were on the boat from Brindisi to Palestine. He said: "In their heavenly books the prophets have spoken of the Day of the Lord, the Last Day, and what they have spoken is all being realized in this day. The Blessed Beauty sixty years ago in some of his tablets promised the Jews that they would come back to the Holy Land and what he said will be realized. The pavilion of the Lord will be pitched on the mountain and this was fulfilled. The pavilion of the Blessed Beauty was often pitched on Mount Carmel and the plain and hills around 'Akká while he was a prisoner. He was subject to two despotic kings and he was under severe restrictions. When guards were placed at the gate everybody was forbidden to meet him. But his pavilion was pitched on the hills. He would go and spend some days in them, and yet he was a prisoner."

We told the story of Mr Schneider. (Mr Schneider was a refugee from Russia. He reached the northern boundary of Persia penniless, knowing no one and ignorant of his route. Some people met him and took him to their home where he sojourned for several days and then was taken by his host to the next village and to a home where he was welcomed and entertained. From village to village he was conducted, and cared for, until at last in safety he reached the Persian gulf. On inquiring at last who could be these people who had treated him with such marvellous kindness he learned that they were all Bahá'ís.) He ('Abdu'l-Bahá) said such should be the case with all the Bahá'ís. They should be the mercy of God to all the people of the earth without distinction of race and religion. Bahá'u'lláh's light has shone forth upon all. His rain of mercy has fallen on every spot just as the sun shines upon the pure and the sinner. The rain falls upon good soil and the rocks. The attributes of the Bahá'ís should be the same. They should be the light of guidance to all the people.

We said: "Easter has a new significance for us. Resurrection has a new meaning." 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "It is a good, significant coincidence that we meet at this place where Christ told Peter to become a fisher of men." He pointed out the place, about 150 meters away, where this happened. The Sermon on the Mount was preached on Mount Tabor, which, as an accompanying Jew told us, dominates Galilee.

Monday morning at 7:30.

Looking at our children's picture his beautiful face lighted up and after looking at it for a long while he said: "They have bright faces. They will be real Bahá'ís because they will have a Bahá'í education. They will become good Bahá'ís." [XIII:6:143]

Question: "Science denies immortality. How does the prophet know the contrary?"

The Master said: "Science does not know; but the Manifestation makes discoveries with the power of the Spirit. For instance: a philosopher with induction finds out a way. But the prophet discerns with sight. A blind man has to find his way with a stick from point to point; so a philosopher through arguments from premises goes to conclusions, and not by sight. But the Manifestations see with their inner eye (own eye); they do not go from premises to conclusions. The prophets see many things with their inner eye. They do not need to go by discoveries. The scientist with induction is like a blind man who cannot see two steps ahead of him. The prophet sees a long distance."

Question: "Shall I find my mother again?"

The Master said: "Certainly. Separation is only in the world of bodies."

Question: "Will the day come when all mankind will be able to discern by sight?"

He said: "There will always be some. Only a special number will have this attainment. As Christ said, 'Many are called, but few are chosen.' It will always be so. The transformation depends upon divine bounty. The mineral progresses in its own world. But from the mineral to the vegetable it progresses only by divine bounty. Also transformation from the vegetable to the animal is God's plan. Of itself the transformation cannot take place. In the realm of men transformation is possible only through another person."

Question: "When people deny religion how shall we deal with them?"

Answer: "You must be tolerant and patient, because the station of sight is a station of bounty; it is not based on capacity. They must be educated."

Question: "What are the requisites for a successful meeting?"

Answer: "Before the meeting you must pray and supplicate for divine assistance."

Question: "Shall we devote much time to the study of philosophy?"

Answer: "Everything must be done moderately. Excess is not desirable. Do not go to extremes. Even in thinking do not go to excess but be moderate. If there is too much thinking you will be unable to control your thoughts."

I asked the Master to assist me in the physical sciences, in the solution of problems. He said: "You will be able to solve these problems."

Addressing both of us: "You are confirmed. Another power will help you,"—(besides the power of science).

Question: "Why so much evil in the world?"

Answer: "God has created a remedy for every disease. One must apply the remedy. Now these patients run away from the expert physician. They neglect him. Under inexperienced physicians they get worse. The words of the religious leaders have no influence, no effect. These physicians are more diseased than their patients. The spiritual leaders now have no faith, though they claim to have faith in order to secure their positions."

Monday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

We thanked the Master for the prayer revealed for our children. He said: "It is for your sake that I wrote it."

Question: "What is the best method to spread this Cause?"

Answer: "Explain the teachings, the principles of this Cause. Some of them were revealed fifty years ago, some sixty years ago. Fifty years ago there was no thought of universal peace and arbitration. No one spoke of the oneness of religion and science. Now many [XIII:6:144] spread them in their own ways. I spread them through numerous churches and papers in America; then also in Europe.

"The word of God is powerful. It will come to pass."

Question: "Should these principles be spread under the name of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, or without these names?"

Answer: "In the beginning you should mention Bahá'u'lláh. They are his and are spread by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. When all the world was in disorder, when warfare was prevailing in the East and the West, Russia with Turkey, Persia with England and Afghanistan, and Garibaldi was fighting, the East was in intense darkness. There was prejudice of race and religion; national and political prejudice. The East was in intense darkness; the horizon was very dark. And at such a time Bahá'u'lláh arose and spread a set of teachings."

Question: "The students in the schools have to study so many subjects! There are arising more and more sciences. What should be the remedy?"

Answer: "It is too much. One must be moderate in choosing the number of subjects. When there are too many the result is confusion. Moderation is necessary. For instance: if a man has the power to carry a load of three hundred (pounds) he no doubt would fall if we give him one thousand (pounds). He cannot bear it. In the same way, one's brain must not be overburdened. For instance: students should not have more than six hours a day, lessons and preparations included. Otherwise they will not succeed. The brain becomes tired."

Monday afternoon, 28 March 1921.

The Master: "This lake is very blessed. His holiness Christ and the other prophets walked along its shore and were in communion with God all the time and spreading the divine teachings. Now, praise be to God that you reached this land safely and we met one another on the shore of this same lake! You will receive great results from this visit afterwards. You will become the cause of the illumination of the world of humanity. You will release the hearts of the people from the intense darkness of different prejudices, so that each soul may love all the people of the world, without distinction. Just like a shepherd who is affectionate to all his sheep, without preference or distinction, you should be affectionate to all. You should not look at their shortcomings. Consider that they are all created by God who loves them all."

Tuesday morning, 29 March.

The Master: "You have been here three days. They are equal to three years. In the Bible in the days of the Lord one day was equal to one year. I hope that these three days are equal to three years. The results of this visit will be equal to the results of three years. Now you should go back in perfect harmony and joy and with supreme glad tidings. You should gladden the hearts with glad tidings of the Beauty of Abhá. Say to the friends: 'The Kingdom of God has been opened to you. The tree of life is yours. Heavenly graces are bestowed upon you. The effulgence of the Sun of Truth is shed on you. God has chosen you. This crown He has placed upon your head. This eternal life has been given you. Therefore you should be very happy. Turn day and night to the Kingdom of Abhá. Supplicate for boundless favours from that Kingdom.'

"I am praying every night and I supplicate and implore. I beg of God to bestow upon you infinite grace so that all of us may attain to the station of servitude, so that we may do as He wishes us to do. We are all His servants, drawing light from the Sun of Abhá."

XIII:6, September 1922 [XIII:6:145]

The coming of the Promised One

The reconciliation of the expectations of religion and the laws of science.

Albert Vail

The whole religious world today is in anticipation of a world-teacher who will take "the broken arcs" of our human efforts, aspirations, philosophies, social programmes and bring them "to a shining circle". More than seventy years ago Emerson the philosopher-poet felt stirring in his heart the longing for such a teacher and he wrote his declaration that should this great leader appear he, Emerson, would sell all his goods and go halfway around the world to sit at his feet.

Through all the religions today there is shining the glorious anticipation of the coming of a deliverer, a saviour, a messiah. In millions of hearts the good news is ringing that he is right at our doors. "Lift up your gates and be ye lifted up ye everlasting doors and the King of Glory shall come in."

In the following talk taken down by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab during the Great War 'Abdu'l-Bahá shows that even our naturalists today believe in the coming of great teachers. And the logic of the theory of evolution, of perpetual change is that today new teachers are due to come and save our world from its manifest calamities. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's analysis is as follows:

"The adherents of all the religions of the world are expecting the coming of a Promised One and they pray for his advent. Even the atheists anticipate the appearance of a wise and sagacious reformer, a renovator of old habits and superstitions. Their expectations, however, are not like those of the religionists whose beliefs are wrapt in fantastic ideas and impossible and unrealizable rules.

"The atheists believe in nature and its manifestations. They state that for nature there are two courses.

"The first is the common, ordinary course, running throughout all the grades of the social structure and organized, animate and inanimate beings, producing stereotyped organisms and definite, agreed ends, decomposing and recomposing variable forms, with resourcefulness and adaptability.

"The second is the extraordinary and unusual course which produces from time to time human beings who are beyond nature, who are super-mundane, the supermen. After many generations of ordinary type, nature, being bored with its own monotony and corresponding resemblances creates an extraordinary individual (a mutation) to show that its fertility is not at an end and that it is capable of exhibiting the signs of activity uncommon in the field of human experience. Thus a powerful, wise, commanding leader is born who is to readjust through his innate forces the disorganized machinery of the civic, intellectual and ethical life of a nation.

"They further state that change is the unchangeable law of nature. One cannot conceive of nature without motion and variability. These two laws are the inherent qualities of all phenomena and [XIII:6:146] for this reason the events of a previous cycle will not correspond with those of a succeeding one. From its hidden, unseen fountain in every century nature brings forth a new set of forces and fits them into the new exigencies and environments which were brought about, by a new generation with larger demands and greater responsibilities.

"For example: ages ago a philosopher, according to the atheist's opinion—an inspired prophet according to the doctrines and ideas held by the religionists—appeared for the education and instruction of mankind. This prophet established certain principles which laid the foundation of a stable and lofty civilization and insured the security and progress of the people. But after the lapse of many centuries that institution became antiquated; the letter took the place of the spirit, hearts grew cold and unresponsive, dynamic life became static and the basis of the edifice shook and trembled under the weight of superstitions and dogma.

"These events in themselves predicate the appearance of another Teacher, the coming of a second Architect. If the sun shines forth this morning from the east and gives light and heat to all the created beings and then sets in the west is it logical to say that we do not need another sunrise, that the world can live without the rays and heat of that life-giving luminary? Our affirmation or negation will not change in the least the course of the sun. The sun will rise in spite of all our denials and acceptance.

“A skilled mason builds a building and families live in it for a number of years. Does any logician reason soundly in concluding that this building will be permanent? The very word ‘construction’ presupposes ‘destruction’. It is obvious that some time, in the course of years the edifice will be demolished and another mason will arise and build in its place another building, either after the first type, or of a better and more permanent one.

“Consequently, we see that even the agnostics (really) believe in the necessity of the appearance of wise and extraordinary teachers whose mission it is to lead their fellowmen to higher altitudes of intelligence and wisdom. In principle they agree with the religionists. But in mode of expression and phraseology they differ from each other.”

The return of Christ—its real meaning

“In the Divine Holy Books there are unmistakable prophecies giving the glad-tidings of a certain Day in which the Promised One of all the Books would appear, a radiant Dispensation would be established, the banner of the most great peace and reconciliation be hoisted and the oneness of the world of humanity proclaimed. Among the various nations and peoples of the world no enmity or hatred would remain. All hearts would be united one with another. These things are recorded in the Taurat,¹ or Old Testament, in the Gospels, in the Qur’án, in the Zend Avesta, in the Books of Buddha and in the Book of Confucius. In brief, all the Holy Books contain these glad-tidings. In all of them it is announced that after the world is surrounded by darkness radiance will appear. For, just as the night when it becomes excessively dark precedes the dawn of a new day so, likewise, when the darkness of religious apathy and heedlessness overtake the world, when human souls become negligent of God, when materialistic ideas overshadow idealism and spirituality, when nations become submerged in the world of matter and forget God—at such a time as this shall the divine Sun shine forth and the Radiant Morn appear.”

In Christian churches this anticipation is popularly called the belief in Christ’s “second coming”. Ever since the world- [XIII:6:147] war books on the “second coming” have been circulated with surprising popularity. In many churches one of the first questions asked a prospective minister is this: has he the right views about Christ’s return? Many are sure that the appearance of Christ and the attendant thousand years of peace are right at our doors. “Millions now living,” says one popular preacher, “will never die.”

Of course this anticipation has shone in the hearts of the Christians at different periods ever since the ascension of our Lord Christ. To all the early Christians, as one of the celebrated liberal theologians has said, Christ’s first appearance on earth was provisional. His real and glorious coming was to be sometime in the future. In the Book of Acts we read that, as the heart-broken disciples after his ascension stood looking steadfastly into heaven, “Behold, two men stood by them in white apparel who also said, ‘Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye looking into heaven? This Jesus, which was received up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye behold him going into heaven.’” One of the best attested of early New Testament books, the Book of Revelation, says, “Behold, he cometh with clouds; and every eye shall see him, and they that pierced him.” The Book of Revelation and the Gospels both also proclaim that he shall come like a thief in the night. Most of the Book of Revelation is a glorious picture of the coming of the Promised Ones. In the little apocalypse, the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of Matthew, Jesus tells of the darkening of the sun, the falling of the stars, “the end of the world”, or “the consummation of the age”, the coming of the Son of Man on the clouds like lightning shining from the east and seen even in the west.

What is the meaning of it all? One party today takes these prophecies literally. The other party declares such interpretations to be scientifically impossible. How could Christ ride on a cloud? Where would he come from? Modern astronomy teaches us that above us there is only interstellar space. If Christ came on the clouds in physically visible glory so that every eye could see him how could he also come as a thief in the night?

The difficulties in the interpretation of these prophesies have led many liberals to declare that the coming of Christ is just a general and gradual outpouring of the spirit of truth. They quote the Gospel verses, "The Spirit of Truth shall be in you", "The Kingdom of God is within you". Christ returns in each one of us, they say.

But of course the clear text of the Bible and the whole religious history of mankind proclaim the special outpouring of the divine splendour in great prophets or Manifestations. They are the collective centres around which all religions revolve, from which all draw their dynamic power. And the Gospel of John (sixteenth Chapter) clearly says, "The Spirit of Truth shall not speak from himself; but whatsoever things he shall hear these shall he speak." That is, he is a promised person, the "Prince of the World" (John 14:30) who, because he is pure and perfect like Jesus can receive inspiration, transmit it to the world and lead us into all truth. In fact, after His Spirit has taught us He will also be within us. It is no longer I that live but He that liveth in me.

If then we are to reconcile science and religion, if we are to reconcile the passages of the New Testament themselves we must go beneath the letter and find the spiritual significance of these Bible verses. Jesus, as he himself declared, always spoke in parables.

'Abdu'l-Bahá said, in New York City, "Do not satisfy yourselves with words. Seek to understand the meanings of the scriptures hidden in the heart of the words. It is difficult to comprehend the words of even a philosopher; you can [XIII:6:148] then see how difficult it is for one to understand the word of God."

What, then, is the real spiritual significance of these prophesies about Christ's second coming? The explanations of the great Bahá'í teachers, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá are so penetrating, so life-giving that they open a new epoch in the spiritual understanding of the Bible and the sacred books of the world.

Interpretation of the symbols

From the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Bahá'u'lláh.

"The announcement of the angels to the people of Galilee that 'this Christ will return in the same way, and that he will descend from heaven' is a spiritual message, for when Christ appeared he came from heaven, although he was outwardly born of Mary. As he said, 'No man hath ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven.' 'I have come from heaven, and will likewise go to heaven.' By 'heaven' is not meant the infinite phenomenal space but 'heaven' signifies the world of the divine Kingdom which is the Supreme Station and seat of the Sun of Truth. To be brief: the mysteries of the Holy Books are many and require explanation and elucidation. I hope thine insight will be so opened that the divine mysteries may become manifest and clear."

"O thou who believest in the Spirit of Christ, in the Kingdom of God!

"The body is composed, in truth, of corporeal elements and every composition is necessarily subject to decomposition. But the spirit is an essence simple, pure, spiritual, eternal, perpetual and divine. He who seeks Christ from the point of view of his body has in truth debased him and has gone astray from him. But he who seeks Christ from the point of view of his spirit will grow from day to day in joy, in attraction, in zeal, in nearness, in perception and in vision. You have, then, to seek the Spirit of Christ in this marvellous day.

“The heaven to which Christ ascended is not infinite space. His heaven is the kingdom of his Lord, the Munificent. As he said, ‘The Son of Man is in heaven.’ It is evident, then, that his heaven transcends the boundaries that surround existence and that he is exalted for the people who adore him.

“Pray God that you may ascend to this heaven and taste of this food. And know that the people have not understood even to this day the mysteries of the Holy Scriptures. They believe that Christ was deprived of his heaven when he was in this world, that he had fallen from the heights of his elevation and that later he ascended to this elevated pinnacle, that is to say, toward the heaven which does not exist, for there is only space. They expect that he will descend from this heaven seated upon a cloud. They believe that there is in the heavens a cloud upon which he will be seated and by which he will descend: whereas the clouds are vapours which rise from the earth; they do not descend from the heavens.

“The cloud mentioned in the Holy Scriptures is the human body because it is a veil for them, which, like the cloud prevents them from seeing the Sun of Truth shining in the Horizon of Christ.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Question: “Then you do not mean this phenomenal heaven?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “I mean the heaven from which Christ descended and to which he ascended—the heaven of divine Will, the heaven of spirituality.”

“Said Jesus: ‘I go and I come again.’ And in another place he said: ‘I go and another will come who will tell you all that I have not told you and will finish all that I have said.’ These two state- [XIII:6:149] ments are in reality one, were ye to witness the Manifestations of Oneness with the eye of God. ... If the sun of today says ‘I am the sun of yesterday’, it is true; and yet if according to daily sequence it says ‘I am other than the sun of yesterday’, this is also true. Likewise consider the days: If it be said that all the days are the same, it is correct and true; and if it be said that according to name and designation they differ from each other, this also is true as thou seest. For though they are the same, yet in each one there is a name, quality and designation which is different from the other. By the same method and explanation, understand the station of separation, difference and oneness of the Holy Manifestations.

“As to the words, ‘The sun shall be darkened and the moon shall cease to give her light and the stars shall fall from heaven,’—the purport of sun and moon as mentioned in the words of the prophets is not confined to the phenomenal sun and moon which are seen; nay, rather, they have intended for sun and moon manifold meanings. ... One meaning of the ‘sun’ is Suns of Truth which dawn from the dayspring of Pre-existence and transmit bounty to all the created beings. These Suns of Truth arcs the universal manifestations of Divinity. ... When these Suns arise the world is renewed, the rivers of life flow, the seas of beneficence move, the clouds of grace gather and the breezes of bounty blow upon the temples of beings. ... In the primary sense sun, moon and stars signify the prophets, the saints and their companions through the light of whose knowledge the worlds of the visible and invisible are enlightened and illumined.

“It is certain that during every subsequent Manifestation ... the sun and moon of the teachings and law under which the people of that age are enlightened and guided become darkened, that is, their efficiency and influence vanish.”

“By the darkness of the sun and moon and the falling of the stars is intended the aberration of the divines and the abolition of the laws established in a religion.”

“In like manner understand the meaning of (the new heaven and the new earth). By the earth is meant the earth of knowledge and wisdom; and by heaven the heavens of religion.

“The purpose of these allegorical words ... is to test the servants as mentioned so that the soil of excellent and shining hearts may be distinguished from barren and mortal soil. This has always been the divine law. ... Shouldst thou make the mirror of the heart pure and clear from the dust of prejudice thou wilt comprehend all the symbols in the sayings of the perfect word of Divinity in every Manifestation and be informed of the mysteries of knowledge. But unless thou destroyest with the fire of severance the veils of learning which are conventional among the servants thou wilt not attain to the brilliant morn of the ideal knowledge.” (Compiled from The Book of Íqán.)

For the fuller explanation of these Bible symbols one should read first ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Some Answered Questions and then Bahá’u’lláh’s Book of Íqán. There these universal minds outline in detail the new philosophy of religious history, the succession of the divine Manifestations, the real meaning of the prophesies in the holy books.

XIII:6, September 1922 [XIII:6:150]

From the unpublished diary of Ahmad Sohrab

During his sojourn in Palestine with the Centre of the Covenant, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, while the Great War was raging all over the world.

The story of Ismá’íl, the Persian Jew

The carriage was waiting for us at the foot of the mountain. We entered it and started on our way. The road was so muddy and slushy that the wheels sank up to their spokes. In the carriage there was a Persian Jew by the name of Ismá’íl who had been a friend of the Master’s for forty years. He is an orthodox Jew with a strong faith in prophecy, believing firmly that the Messiah will appear in two years. He knows a great deal about the Bahá’í Revelation and has met Bahá’u’lláh. Several times he promised the Master that if the Messiah did not appear at such and such a date he would leave Jewish traditions. But on the grounds that his reckonings were wrong each time he changed the date. Now he swears that this will be the last date and in two years his promised Messiah will appear and will make all the people Jews.

Since our arrival in the Holy Land the Master has seen him many times and helps him always. He is an old man with thin, white beard and he has been in ‘Akká and Haifa for forty-two years. Yesterday he came to Abú-Sínán and this morning the Beloved took him back.

“Now tell me, Ismá’íl,” the Master said, while patting him gently on back and cheeks, “art thou sure that the Messiah will appear in two years? If he does not appear at that time wilt thou continue to believe in the Talmud and the Rabbinical lore? Several times thou hast covenanted with me, and every time thou hast broken the compact. This must be the very last time; otherwise I will punish thee.” Ismá’íl pledged his word that this would be the last time and that he was sure, very sure, that the Promised One would appear in 1916.

Then the Master spoke about the Muslim and Christian calendars, the prophetic dates mentioned in the Book of Daniel, the scattering of the Jews at the time of Titus, and the destruction of Jerusalem. Then he asked me to read aloud, for the benefit of Ismá’íl, the articles published in Servati-Founun, especially the translation of his address in the Jewish Synagogue in San Francisco. As we neared ‘Akká he related some funny stories of his experiences in Tiberias in former years.

“O Ismá’íl,” he said at last, “through the power of God I have, been able to prove the divine station of Christ to thousands of Jews in America. ... What can I do with thee? They are the real Israel. They are free from prejudice. But thou art different.”

When we reached ‘Akká we were glad to find ourselves once more under the sheltering roof of the home of Bahá'u'lláh. When 'Abdu'l-Bahá entered his room he sat quietly on his divan and said: "Alí! We escaped from Abú-Sínán, did we not? Although the [XIII:6:151] weather there was dry and delightful, I did not feel at home. In this room, the room of the Blessed Perfection, I feel happy and composed. Nowhere else do I feel so joyous and happy as in this room. Here, here I realize the peace of the spirit!"

Luncheon was served and Ismá'íl and I found ourselves at the table. The Master said: "Hast thou read *Vahye Koudek*¹ (the little revelation)? It contains many prophesies concerning events in 'Akká. It is a wonderful book. Mírzá Ya'qúb, who was a good Jewish Bahá'í brought it to me. If you can get this book you will enjoy its contents."

Ismá'íl did not eat the food cooked by the Bahá'ís so the Master with his supreme attention to all details had ordered a dish suitable to his taste. "We let everyone enjoy freedom of conscience," he said. "We have no prejudice."

The story of the miser of Balsora

The Master often tells us stories about the misers of different countries. Here is one of them:

Once upon a time there was a merchant in the city of Balsora.² His name was Riḍá. Although he was very wealthy he was the most close-fisted, narrow-hearted man that ever lived in his town. For avarice and penuriousness he had become a proverb among his countrymen. Through his stinginess he made his family suffer hunger and starvation.

In his office he had a clerk to whom he paid a very small salary. This clerk had a large family and though he practised the greatest economy he could not make both ends meet. Often he dreamed of a raise in salary, but in vain. At last an idea flashed into his mind and gave him hope that surely there would be a raise soon. There was but one more week before New Year's day and the poor clerk thought that if he gave a present to his master he would undoubtedly reciprocate and increase his salary. Hence, on that very day he went to the market, bought the head of a sheep, cooked it in his oven and carried it on a tray to the house of his master. The week passed without any sign and finally, on New Year's day he called at the house of the merchant to wish him happiness. He was most hopeful, and anticipated a bright future.

When he entered the room the merchant greeted him effusively. This made him more hopeful still.

"I thank you very heartily," the master said to his clerk, "for the gift you sent to our house. It saved us a great deal of expense, I assure you. We have been feasting on it for the past week. The first day we ate the ears; the second day, the eyes; the third day, the skin of the head; the fourth day, the tongue; the fifth day, the meat; the sixth day we cleaned the bones and on the seventh day we ate the brains."

After travelling for several years and acquiring experience as well as riches he returned to his native city and opened a business of his own. One day as he was walking through the main street his attention was attracted by a most palatial residence. He peeped through the gate and beheld a most beautiful garden. He finally inquired from one of the many servants lounging about whose house this was.

“Art thou a stranger?” they asked.

“Well, how is it that thou dost not know that this is the house of Kareem,¹ the son of Riḍá?”

“Oh,” gasped the former clerk, “what the father hoarded the son is spending!”—and disappeared through the crowd.

Another incident regarding Ismá‘íl, the Jew

This morning ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called us into his room. Ismá‘íl, the Jew, was also present. The Master was in a jovial mood and asked Ismá‘íl whether bread, [XIII:6:152] tea and olives were “Kosher”. He replied, “They are Kosher.”

“Art thou thyself Kosher or Taref?”² ‘Abdu’l-Bahá asked him pleasantly.

“I hope I am Kosher. I wish good to everyone. I am not seeking to harm any soul. If a man curse me or beat me I still like him. I am living according to the religion of my father. If these things constitute the condition of being Kosher, then I am Kosher.”

“Well said,” replied the Master, “I know thou art sincere in the profession of thy religion and that is the reason why I love thee so much.”

Ismá‘íl replied: “I know one thing. Any moment I am ready to sacrifice my life for the Master. For the last forty-two years you have ever been kind to me and on several occasions have saved my life. This has nothing to do with faith. This is love. I declare by Jehovah, if you ask me at this very moment I will die for you gladly, knowing well that I have won the good pleasure of Abraham. Jacob and Moses.”

Then the Master asked Ismá‘íl: “How old was Moses?”

“One hundred and twenty years,” he replied. “But the patriarchs, such as Noah and others lived many hundreds of years.”

The Master said. “The age of those ancient prophets as recorded in the Old Testament is symbolic. It has a spiritual interpretation. Wert thou informed of the science of anatomy thou wouldst realize that this human mechanism and these material organs cannot last more than one hundred and twenty years.”

Ismá‘íl inquired: “Where is the seat of thought?”

The Master replied: “It is generally understood that the seat of thought, consciousness and volition is in the brain. The brain is the organ of the intellect and understanding. The heart also plays a part through the central nervous system. Thus the activities of the brain and the heart by means of afferent³ and efferent nerve fibres are linked together. Figuratively speaking, the brain is like a mirror. When it is turned toward any object, whether in the east or in the west, that object will immediately be reflected on its surface and consciousness is realized. In the world of dreams consciousness is awake and works uninterruptedly.”

“Come, come, friends,” the Master said, as we waited at the threshold. “Let us talk tonight of the old times.” He asked me what news I had. I told him I had heard that Badí‘ Afandí’s school in Abú-Sinán had increased in numbers and that it was no more my room but a Bahá‘í school. He laughed and said: "What dost thou want with a room of stone and clay? I have prepared for thee glorious rooms the walls, the roofs, the floors, and the furniture of which are of pure deeds and immortal virtues. Therein thou shalt abide forever. Badí' Afandí is a capable, efficient teacher and loves the children. He is striving in service and wishes to perfect the work which he undertakes. Perfection of work is man's greatest reward. When a man sees his work perfected and this perfection is the result of incessant labour and application he is the happiest man in the world. Work is the source of human happiness."

About two hours before sunrise I was called from my bed by one of the two Bahá'ís who spent the night here in the house. The Master was up; the samovar was boiling and tea was prepared for our delectation. It was thirst for the "spiritual tea" which awakened me and I dressed hurriedly and made my way through the darkness to the other house. I opened the door of the blessed room and entered unannounced. The Master was sitting in his accustomed place on a divan in the corner next to the window. Only a candle was burning on the oppo- [XIII:6:153] site table which was strewn over with books. There was a pause and a stillness and the dim light added to the mystery and the magic of those sacred moments.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's eyes were closed, his white beard shone; over his countenance was spread the calm of the deep. His spotless white turban towered above his head and as I looked I beheld his silvery locks flowing beautifully over his broad shoulders.

Out of the unutterable stillness the voice of the Beloved of the hearts was heard.

"Happiness is the ambrosia of the spirit and the nectar of the souls. It confers on man the boon of immortality and the gift of spiritual vision. Happiness is the morning star guiding the wandering to the perennial abode of the blessed. Happiness is the crystalline river flowing from the heavenly mountains through the paradise of the mind and causing to grow upon its banks the imperishable ideals of humanity. Happiness is the cherubim of the Almighty which inspires mankind to perform feats of self-sacrifice and deeds of disinterested philanthropy. Happiness is the melodiously singing nightingale which transforms the darkened world of sorrow into the shining realm of celestial beatitude. Happiness is the surging ocean in the depths of which the diver finds the pearls of resignation and the corals of renunciation. Happiness is the elysium¹ wherein grow the asphodels² of good-will and the amaranths³ of forgiveness. Happiness is the heaven of God, the blue fields of which are studded with the bright rolling orbs of satisfaction and the fixed stars of contentment. Happiness is the scintillating crown of humanity the shining gems of which are the teachings of the past prophets and the principles of his holiness Bahá'u'lláh.

"The happiness of man is not dependent upon outward things such as riches, ornaments and clothes. It is, however, dependent upon the susceptibilities of the heart and the attitude of the mind."

XIII:6, September 1922 [XIII:6:153]

Segments of the circle

Marjory Morten

As a moderating influence in those moments when we, as Bahá'ís, approach the danger zone of dogma; as a solace in days of discouragement and at all times when we would make common effort with our fellows, it is well to be aware of the quickening influence on the world at large in the time of the Manifestation.

² Asphodel—any of a genus (Asphodeline) of plants of the lily family, having fleshy roots, narrow leaves, and white or yellow, lily-like flowers; especially the classic flower of death.

³ Amaranth—[old poetical] an imaginary flower that never fades or dies.

On the day of a wedding it is not only the bride and bridegroom, their families and their guests who make merry—the servants in the house, the grocer boy at the kitchen door, the very mouse in the pantry cupboard take share in the marriage feast. If we believe in the oneness of humanity, the interdependence of all creatures, the interaction and reaction of all life forces, we must know that the whole planet is quickened and vitalized in this day.

Although the world may seem to lack mighty protagonists in religious fields a thousand voices are raised by ardent men and women who see clearly that aspect of the truth which impinges on their own fields of endeavour and who faintly glimpse the whole truth. On every side we find indications of the spirit; in the average individual who cries for things spiritual in revulsion of discouragement against the meliorist¹ who would right the [XIII:6:154] world through practical efforts; in the economist who realizes our racial interdependence; in the commercial producer who is aware of the pragmatic result of co-operation; in the orthodox churchman who would abandon the old competitive system in spiritual matters, no longer trying to live a holier life than his neighbour but making the greater effort to be good with others. And in the world of fiction and verse we have many writers who are working for a larger unity: Well's vision of a World State or World Federation; John Galsworthy who, calling art the pacifier pleads for a closer artistic understanding among nations and sees in art an international agent in bringing races together; Thomas Hardy who sees pure literature and religion as one in that they modulate into each other and who, alive to the failure of the churches to rouse the spirit in a materialistic age is seeking to link religion and science or rationality through the medium of poetry.

Such men would teach a world which for centuries has played with aesthetic as a relaxation after labour; would show the coming generation that true art is not a thing to beguile the hard way of life, to soften and make lovely the routine, but rather an expression of the super-consciousness, a channel between mind and spirit. All these efforts are good, even if those who make the effort are not fully aware of the spiritual connotation.

And in science it is possible to read great spiritual truths clearly symbolized in terms of scientific formula. Viscount Haldane in The Reign of Relativity declares that modern men of science realize the entirety of the world—a single whole in which fall matter and mind alike. And the knowledge of the oneness of the world scientifically is shown in an article on the work of Dr F. B. Sumner in the July Current Opinion. “We need to remind ourselves that the organism is not an isolated fact in nature, but is part of a complex system of interacting forces. It is utterly unintelligible, it does not even exist, except in organic relation to the outer world.”

Even in Einstein's disconcerting discovery that light rays experience a curvature in passing through a gravitational field, deviating toward a heavenly body in passing it, we can discover a symbol of the attractional curve we must perform as rays in this day of the Sun of Manifestation!

In this country we find hopeful signs in the trend of our magazines. Such monthlies as Asia and the Geographical Magazine which gather interesting matter from the earth's far corners, and others such as Our World which in covering every phase of world events and activities achieves much more than an assembling of alien facts; makes indeed frank profession of an effort to unite the world.

And there is much food for encouragement in such articles as the very significant editorials of Dr Frank Crane in the July Current Opinion, calling the need of a revival of faith, of spiritual enthusiasm, a “revival whose war cry shall be humanity”. And he is aware of the need of a prophet who will “fire the imagination and conscience of the race with the beauty of human

- a) the world naturally tends to get better and, especially, that this tendency can be furthered by human effort
- b) the betterment of society is possible by improving people's health, living conditions, etc.

brotherhood.”

And if we see on every side a growing knowledge of the need to promote solidarity and more or less conscious effort to build a new structure to house the world family, we find too, scattered chips and fragments of raw material ready for the builders. The very language of the day enriched and vitalized by the words, love, brotherhood, co-operation, unity, is an indication of the material at hand. These words have become part of everyone’s daily vocabulary. Old words, to be sure, outgrowths of terms coined perhaps by the first man of vision, but relegated for so long to the word-pouches of the poet, the mystic, [XIII:6:155] the dreamer; only used in general with an apologetic reservation or linked with their foster-sister words utopia, millennium. And if these expressions are in the mouths of all the people of the time—in some cases of course only parrot repetition—the realities they signify must truly be held in the hearts of many men.

These words represent ideals, and ideals whether they are racial memories of past perfections, or dim concepts of a future state are always possible of achievement—and that possibility is near or remote according to the intensity of our desire to achieve. Now with the release of the great force, the cosmic urge through the appearance of the Manifestation the ideal is straightway translated into a working platform for the work-a-day world; made practical rather than poetic—brought into actuality out of the dream consciousness of the race—these great words love, unity, brotherhood.

Furthermore the name of God and such expressions as we have of God, Divine Guidance, The Power of the Spirit, the Holy Ghost, are no longer confined to religious discussion, and are freed from doctrinaire taint. Not so long since, at any rate in our western world the word God was rarely heard outside of religious groups and orders entrenched in a common understanding, except in theological argument.

Recently I came upon a letter from the editor of a venerable American magazine, the Atlantic Monthly to Ralph Waldo Emerson. In this letter he tells Emerson that the magazine has agreed to publish a series of articles by Thoreau and asks him to urge Thoreau to behave himself and not write about God!

Heretofore your average man in casual conversation used the name of the Deity timidly, with self-consciousness, often following it up with the eager assurance that the First Cause or Primal Will were acceptable synonyms. And how utterly taboo was “Holy Spirit” or “Holy Ghost”, narrowed in the popular mind to the Apostolic bounty.

All these words for so long cloistered and shut from common life have in this day suffered a re-birth, become newly informed with spirit, and their habitual use in the time of this Revelation is a manifestation of the divine breaths brought into objectivity and given actual form on this plane.

Yes, we must become increasingly aware of all these indications of the quickening of planetary consciousness. But this awareness in no degree lessens our responsibility as Bahá’ís, rather does it emphasize our responsibility to sharpen and focalize this consciousness to the most poignant of realizations, to touch the very heart of the race to a recognition of the source of this new life.

The universal language of the spirit

Talk given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his home at Haifa, Palestine, 19 November 1921 at the regular six o’clock evening meeting called “The Persian Meeting”. Mr John D. Bosch of Geyserville, California, was the only occidental present among the sixty friends who met at this time, just nine days before the passing away of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. In fact, this was the last public talk given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the Persian meeting when an occidental attended. Interpreted by Mírzá Muḥammad 'Alí Afnán.

Taken down in Persian by Dr Luṭfu'lláh Ḥakím.

'Abdu'l-Bahá opened the meeting by saying to Mr Bosch:

"Although you are here with these assembled friends and cannot speak with them nor they with you, yet you can speak with one another through the heart. The language of the heart is even more expressive than the language of the tongue and is more truthful and has a wider reach and a more potent effect."

Mr Bosch said: "This is a wonderful spiritual experience—to be here with the friends."

'Abdu'l-Bahá then said: "When lovers meet it may be that they cannot exchange a single word, yet with their hearts they speak to one another. Thus do the clouds speak to the earth and the rain comes down; the breeze whispers to the trees; the sun speaks to the eyes of men. Although this is not actual speech yet this is the way in which the hearts of the friends talk together. It is the harmony between two persons, and this harmony is of the hearts. For instance, you were in America and I was in the Holy Land. Although our lips were still yet with our hearts we were conversing together. The friends here love you very much. They have a real attachment for you although with the tongue they cannot express it."

Mr Bosch said: "I am very glad. I love them too."

'Abdu'l-Bahá then said: "If this love is real and true, if it is from the heart it will characterize itself by self-sacrifice. When the attachment is superficial friends do not sacrifice themselves even to the extent of a hair's breadth.

"His holiness the Christ loved both his disciples and believers to such an extent that he sacrificed his life for them. His holiness the Supreme (the Báb), loved the friends to such an extent that he gave his life for them. The Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) loved the friends so much that for their sakes he accepted a thousand difficulties and afflictions. Four times he was exiled. He was banished from one place to another. [XIII:7:164] His properties were confiscated. He gave all—his family, his relatives, his possessions. He accepted imprisonment, chains and fetters. His holy person was imprisoned in the fortress of 'Akká until the last moment of his life. He was made to suffer more calamities, afflictions and difficulties than could be enumerated. He had not a moment's rest. He had not an hour's comfort. He was continually under the greatest hardships and ordeals. What great persecutions he endured from his enemies! What great afflictions he bore from his own relatives! He accepted all these trials for our sakes so that he might educate us, so that he might make us illumined, so that he might make us heavenly, so that he might change our character, change our lives, so that he might illumine our inmost self. All these troubles he accepted for our sakes. He did indeed sacrifice his life for us. This love is the real love. This is the inner attachment and the genuine friendship. This is the love which sacrifices one's all, one's life. This is the reality of love. He accepted all these troubles.

"All this, cannot be accomplished by merely talking. It cannot be done by saying. 'I love you', or, 'How is your health', or, 'You are my beloved', or, 'You are esteemed'. This is not love. This is an attachment that will break in the testing. This is why one sees persons associating with one another, appearing to be enwrapped with one another. Each seems to sacrifice himself for the other. But when they part they become as strangers. This is human love. It is not spiritual love; it is not divine love; it has no real foundation and in the time of testing it will fall and disappear.

"If you should go to Persia and mingle with the friends there and should be in the house of any one of the friends, and people should come in to take you to kill you, you would then witness how the owner of the house would sacrifice himself for you. He would sacrifice himself for you rather than allow even one hair of your head to be hurt. This is love! It has happened often in Persia that the friends have sacrificed themselves for one another. This has happened many times. This love is the love of God.

“The King of Martyrs and the Beloved of Martyrs were two souls who were greatly honoured among the people. They were very wealthy. They were extremely comfortable. The people pillaged all their property. They put them in chains. They put them in prison. The Sháh of Persia decreed that they should be killed; that they should either deny their faith or be killed. The notables came to them and advised them to renounce their faith. The friends came and advised them; even the government advised them to recant so that they might save their lives. But they would not deny. They continued to cry aloud, ‘Yá Bahá’u’l-Abhá!’ (O, Thou Glory of the Most Glorious!) And so they were martyred.

“This is the love of God! This is the love of the heart! This is divine love!”

From the diary of Ahmad Sohrab

Written in Palestine during the Great War

While we were drinking our tea, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came down and sat at the door of the house speaking with an Arab friend, Ahmad Effendi Jerah.¹ He had been to dine with Šálih Muḥammad, and it was late at night when he returned. Khusraw preceded him carrying a lamp to light the way, as it was very dark. Some of the believers were still waiting for him when he came in. He asked them to wait for a moment, as he was longing to see them, and then went upstairs. In a short time he descended, and we were all waiting, many of us sitting on the floor, as there were not enough chairs.

“When people invite me alone to their houses,” he said, “I ask them to prepare only one dish. Simplicity in food is best. But when they invite others beside me, I do not interfere with their arrangements.”

Then he asked whether anyone had come from Abú-Sinán.

“During the days of the Blessed Perfection,” he continued, “when I got up in the morning, the first thing I did was to inquire about the health of all the believers, one by one; and then I called on those who were sick to see how they were. If their indisposition was slight, I cared for them myself; otherwise I sent for the doctor. Then, this duty performed, I went to the school and examined the pupils. To those who were doing well I gave money or gifts; others I encouraged to push forward. Thus all the students who were graduated from that school received much praise, and were given scholarships in Damascus and Constantinople.”

“In every undertaking, constant vigilance and attention are necessary, for, no matter how perfect an organization, if negligence creeps in, it will little by little lose its efficiency. If a piece of farm land is left to take care of itself, [XIII:7:172] or if the supervision of the farmer is slackened, the farm will be either abandoned or it will turn into a thorny patch.”

“I have carried in my mind for some time an educational system, but so far there have been no means for its realization. If that system were once beaten into workable shape, in two years’ time the children would have studied four languages. At the age of ten they would study sciences; and at the age of twelve they would be graduated. I wanted to establish such a trial school of eighty-one pupils, all six years of age, the children to be brought from Persia and ‘Ishqábád, the teachers to be engaged and transported from America. But a number of unforeseen difficulties have prevented me.”

The Master spoke this morning to Mírzá Badí' about his school for the children. He said: "I know thou art exerting thyself in the instruction of the children. The life of man must be productive of some results, otherwise his non-existence is better than his existence. As I said before, this teaching of the children is a service to the Blessed Perfection. Whosoever serves the world of humanity in this or any other way is serving His holiness Bahá'u'lláh. Your heavenly reward is with him. The education of children is one of the most great services. All these children are mine. If they are educated and illumined, it is as though my own children were so characterized. They will become the servants and the maid-servants of the Cause of God, the gardeners in the vineyard of the Kingdom, and the lights of the assemblage of mankind."

Then he spoke with Shaykh Yúsuf about his ('Abdu'l-Bahá's) own education—of how he was an exile and a prisoner from the time that he was nine years old and consequently never entered even the common school. This is an historical fact, and there are many people still living who bear witness to this fact.

Then he explained in detail the puzzling question of the "Trinity" and demonstrated from both a scientific and religious standpoint that "trinity" not only exists in every religion, but in philosophy as well. In the Mosaic dispensation there was (1) Elohim, the "I AM", (2) the burning bush and (3) Moses; in Christianity, (1) the Father, (2) the Holy Ghost and (3) the Son; in Islám, Alláh, Gabriel and Muḥammad. In philosophy we say, the mover, the motion and the moved; the cause of causes, the cause and the effect; the Illuminator, the illumination and the illuminated; the Creator, the creation, the created; the teacher, the knowledge, the student; the Giver of bounty, the bounty, and the recipient of the bounty. In principle, every religionist believes in this explanation in so far as it applies to the founder of his own faith; but when this same principle is applied to the founder of another religion, he refuses to accept it. Thus, while they are agreed as to reality, they disagree in mere names and historical personalities.

At a quarter past two in the afternoon we left 'Akká in the carriage and started on the never-to-be-forgotten drive along the horseshoe beach toward Haifa. The sea was smooth and the weather was bright and clear—quite transparent.

"Since my return last year," the Master said, "I have not driven along this shore because the train service was so much more comfortable. Now we have returned to our original way of travelling. I judge by the traces of the wheels on the sand that there is already quite a regular schedule established."

On the way we saw many detachments of soldiers going this way or that, and many of them stopped to salute the Master. We proceeded on our drive and finally came upon companies of fishermen who had cast their nets into the sea. Wide-spreading, broad nets they were, [XIII:7:173] and some of the men were drawing in the ropes. But the nets were still far out in the sea. The net of another group could be seen, being brought nearer and nearer to the shore; and still another group had landed their catch and were on the eve of departure. When we reached the second group, the Master asked Isfandíyár to stop the horses so that he might watch the proceedings. The net was at last drawn out upon the beach, and one's heart was touched to see the great mass of palpitating, quivering little fishes. There were actually thousands of them. As I looked I was reminded of the days of Christ and his fishermen disciples. I spoke of the similarity of the scene to the Master. My few simple words suggested the subject, and he delivered a most remarkable talk as the carriage rolled over the hard, white sand. He said:

"His holiness, Christ, because of the vocation of his disciples, gave them the title of 'fishers of men'; but the Blessed Perfection designated the Bahá'ís as the 'vivifiers of the world'.

"Today this world is like a rolling, tumultuous sea. The Bahá'ís are practised sailors and trained fishermen who, with the net of the Love of God and the strength of the Word of God, deliver the poor fish from the whirlpool of destruction and bring them to the haven of safety and salvation. Although the fish of the sea, when once drawn out of the water, die, yet the fish of humanity, when they rise out of the sea of darkness, passion and lust, are immediately transformed into sweet-singing nightingales soaring in the atmosphere of holiness. They break forth into charming melodies and give joy to many hearts. The fish of the sea of nature are blind, deaf and mute; but when they enter the ocean of God they become seeing; hearing and eloquent. The Bahá'ís are displaying great effort and they manifest far-reaching magnanimity. The confirmation of the Blessed Beauty is their net; unity and concord is their bait; attraction and enkindlement is their trap, service and self-sacrifice is their support. They cast their net into the great, turbulent sea and day by day they deliver new fishes. What delightful service is this to the world of humanity! What fruitful exertion is this in the universe of God! What noble striving is this in the path of the Kingdom! What heavenly privilege is this in the promulgation of truth! What divine splendour in the illumination of the souls of mankind! The apostles of his holiness Christ were very religious; very faithful, very spiritual and severed from all else save God. They were inspired by the breath of the Holy Spirit, and laboured with heart and soul for the diffusion of the lights of the Kingdom of the Father. They strove for the progress of their souls, to be characterized with the qualities of loyalty and faithfulness and with whole-hearted sincerity. They fished by day and by night. They took no rest nor did they seek after any comfort. The Bahá'ís must walk in their footsteps, imbue themselves with their endurance and learn their patience and long-suffering. Let them not lose their courage in the face of difficulties. Let them be the fishermen of the sea of spirituality. Let them sail on the ocean of the world of humanity in the swift-moving vessels of assurance and certainty. Let them save the half-famished fish from the sea of doubt and hesitation and instruct them in the teachings and principles of God."

XIII:7, October 1922 [XIII:7:180]

The wisdom of the apostles

From a tablet of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

"In order to spread and teach the cause of God two of the Apostles went to the city of Antioch. No sooner had they arrived than they started to exhort and give counsel to the people. As the inhabitants of the city were totally uninformed of the divine principles they started to censure and arraign them, which finally ended in their persecution and torture and imprisonment. The details of these sad events did not reach the Disciples and thus the way of association and communication was entirely barred.

"But when Peter heard about it he started for that country without delay. Having entered the city he commenced in the beginning to associate and fraternize with the people until, little by little, he became the loving companion and comrade of the nobles and ministers. In a short space of time he became well known for his piety, godliness, virtue, explanations, knowledge, perfections and excellences of the world of humanity. Finally he became acquainted with the king of that country and consorted with him with joy and fragrance. When Peter saw that the king was relying upon him with the utmost confidence, trust and assurance,—one night apropos of some question, he brought in the name of the Apostles. The king told him that some time ago two such ignorant and illiterate souls had entered his city and, having begun to deliver seditious speeches, he had ordered his officers to arrest them and put them under chains and fetters. His holiness Peter expressed a passing wish to meet them. The king commanded his attendants to bring them in to the audience chamber. According to the requirements of the place and time Peter appeared not to recognize them and then asked:

“Who are you? Where do you come from?”

“They answered: ‘We are the servants of his holiness the Spirit of God (Christ), and we come from Jerusalem.’

“Then he asked about his holiness, the Spirit: ‘Who is he?’

“They said: ‘He is the Promised One of the Bible and the Desired One of all the servants.’

“Afterward, in the spirit of the antagonist, he asked them the universal and particular questions and at every step contended with them. Often the very nature of the question gave them a clue as to how to answer.

“In short, one by one, he put the doubts and scruples of the people in the form of questions and they gave convincing answers. Now and then he would accept a number of their explanations, and anon, he would wave aside a set of others bringing forth counter propositions so that the audience might not find out that he also was one of them. In brief, several nights were spent in these interrogations and answers, now in refutation, again in acceptance, then in discussion and anon in controversial contention until all those who were present became fully informed of the fundamental principles of God and all their uncertainties were dispelled. Then, on the last evening he dramatically announced that truly all that (they had) heard conformed with reality; and everyone agreed with him. Then, and not until then everyone realized that this third person was the friend of the first two souls. For this reason it is revealed in the blessed verse: ‘We have glorified them by the appearance of a third person.’

“This story illustrates the meaning of wisdom. Therefore the teacher must speak according to the acceptable standard of the place and the time so that his words may affect the hearts and the people may understand his address. Teaching the Cause of God in this manner will produce fruits. We must not remain stationary and silent. If the thousand-voiced nightingale does not break into musical trills and rapturous melodies it is like a mute sparrow. If the thrush of the rose garden of significances does not sing tuneful lays and sweet airs it is the speechless, wingless jaybird. If the dove of the garden of mysteries does not coo it is the raven of the wretched ash heap. If the peacock of the Paradise of immortality does not display its multi-coloured plumage it is the black raven of the desolate ruin of mortality. Consequently, if ye are of the birds of the gardens of sanctity flutter ye your wings and soar heavenward. If ye are of the nightingales of the Ridván of the Lord of Lords then sing and warble His glorification. If ye are of the lovers of the countenance of the Almighty then raise your voices and demonstrate your sincerity. If ye are of the wooers of the face of the Beloved then cry and weep disconsolately, so that you may throw an earthquake into the pillars of the world, burn the hearts of mankind with the burning fire of God’s conflagration, intoxicate and exhilarate all the lovers and yearning ones with the wine of glory and attain to the ultimate hope of the favoured ones and the highest aspiration of the sincere ones.

Some parables concerning the laws of the spiritual life

Ios was a shepherd boy who tended his flocks in the valleys and on the sloping hills of Persia. He was poor and simple, and knew no life but the care of his sheep, but one love he had and one great longing—it was to behold the face of his King. He had never seen this One of whose greatness and goodness he heard wonderful tales, and he felt that he would live content and die happy if he could but once behold his face.

One day Ios heard that the King with his retinue would pass on the highroad not far from his pasture. Shaken with the intensity of his love he left everything and stationed himself on the road. At last the Royal Procession appeared, haught boys on horseback, soldiers and buglers glittering and gorgeous in the sunshine.

Ios' eyes gazed past all this to the royal equipage slowly approaching, with flushed face and throbbing heart he watched for the face he had waited and longed for all his life.

Seeing that the procession was stopped in its progress the King enquired the cause and was informed that a poor shepherd boy stood in the way and begged to see him. The King commanded that the boy be brought, and Ios trembling with joy came to the side of the carriage, and gazed long and steadfastly on the face he adored. The King amazed at this ardent look said "Who art thou I?" "Ios, the shepherd boy, my King," he replied. "What dost thou seek from me?" "Oh my King," he said, "All my life I have longed for thee. The utmost desire of my heart has been to behold thy face. Now I am happy and content, I can return to my humble life forever blest since I have beheld thee."

The King was greatly touched and looking long and earnestly as the boy passed on his way.

But the memory of Ios haunted him—such love he had not known. All those who surrounded him lived by his favours and bounty, but here was one who sought nothing, asked nothing—who could live and die on the memory of his face.

II

The King's yearning for Ios grew so strong that at last he sent for the shepherd boy and had him brought to the palace. Ios came with eager joy and presented himself trembling and radiant, before the royal presence. Then the King was greatly pleased with Ios and made him the guardian of his treasure and reposed in him a high trust.

But those who had lived by the King's favour were filled with jealousy and tried to find some fault in Ios so that they might destroy him in the eyes of the King. They watched day and night and soon they found a flaw. In the silence of the night when all were sleeping they saw Ios creep stealthily forth, wind his way through the palace and enter a small room far up under the roof. "Ah," they said, "He is robbing the treasury and storing away the treasure in a secret place." Then they hastened with the news to the King. That night he watched with them and saw Ios steal away to his secret hiding place. The King followed, threw open the door and entered the [XIII:7:183] room. It was bare and empty, but on the wall hung the shepherd's coat Ios had worn and his crook with which he tended his flock. "What is the meaning of this, Ios," he exclaimed, "That thou dost creep to this room silently in the dead of night, and thus arouse suspicion when I have so trusted thee?" "Oh, my King," replied Ios, "When first I beheld thee I was a poor ignorant shepherd boy, but thou hast raised me to this lofty state through thy pure bounty and generosity, therefore, I never wish to forget from what I came, but to remain ever humble and grateful to thee. Thus I come each night to reflect on what I was and what Thou has made me through Thy bounty, generosity and favour.

III

One day while the King was riding with his courtiers and favourites he opened a wallet in his saddle, and cast handfuls of precious jewels in the road. His friends stopped, dismounted and gathered the gifts scattered by his loving hand. Ios alone remained at his side with his eyes fastened on the beloved face, never glancing away. Then the courtiers murmured saying, "See Ios, he despises the gifts of the King and will not trouble himself to attain them." The King looked at him and smiling said, "How is this, Ios, dost thou despise my gifts?"

"Never have I desired anything from thee, but to behold thy face, this has been and ever shall be sufficient for this servant."

IV

In Persia they have a great variety of delicious melons and it is the custom in this season to hold feasts and serve this abundant fruit to the guests. When the season came and the melons were ripe the King held a feast and invited many people. Ios was absent engaged on some service, but presently the guests saw that there was one melon left uncut. Then they murmured among themselves saying, "You will see that this melon, which is no doubt very sweet and delicious is reserved for the Beloved of the King," and soon the King sent for Ios, and cutting the melon gave him a piece saying "Thou, too, must partake of my feast. I have kept this melon for Thee." The King also took a piece, but when he tasted it he exclaimed "This melon is as bitter as gall, how couldst thou eat it, Ios?" But the boy replied, "All my life I have received sweet from thy hand, now if thou dost give me bitter shall I refuse it? For bitter is sweet from the hands of my King."

V

That which the King valued in all his domains was the Royal Gardens, which were vast and very beautiful with trees and flowers, lakes and fountains, and where every living thing was safe and protected, for it was forbidden therein to kill. And Ios so lived in the King's heart, was so loved and trusted that he made him the guardian and custodian of this Garden of Life and Beauty, which was the highest honour in his Kingdom. Then Ios faithfully guarded his trust.

One day as Ios was walking in the beautiful Gardens, the King's son, who had been jealous of him crept stealthily up behind him and swiftly shot an arrow from his bow and fled. It pierced the breast of a swan and the red blood flowed down the pure white breast into the water, and the swan swayed and drooped and died.

Ios stood aghast with grief and horror, gazing at the swan then at the bow lying in the path at his feet. As he stooped to pick it up a gardener approached and accused Ios of killing the swan. Then the man hastened to the Royal Presence and told what Ios had done. The King summoned him and said "What hast thou done?" Ios bowed his head in silence. "Speak," the King commanded, "Who has slain the swan?" But Ios would not speak. The King's heart was breaking and he exclaimed, "Thy silence condemns thee. If thou dost not speak and justify thyself I shall banish thee forever from my [XIII:7:184] face." Ios lifted his eyes and looked long on the King's face, then meekly bowed his head and went out from his presence and went alone into exile.

Time passed and the Prince's conscience gave him no rest. He saw how his Father grieved for Ios, and at last he heard that Ios was dying of a broken heart in his lonely but far away. Smitten with remorse he threw himself at his Father's feet and confessed to having killed the swan. The King in great grief sprang up and cried out, "Take me to Ios." And when he came in haste to the but he found him dying. He rushed to him, clasped him in his arms, kissed his brow, his lips, while his tears rained on his face. "Oh, Ios, my servant, my Beloved, thou must not leave me; I love thee, thou hast sacrificed thy life for my son." And Ios, lying in his arms, gazing upon his face exclaimed: "I die in Paradise upon Thy Breast, my King!"

(These stories of Ios were told by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Lua Getzinger and are here transcribed from memory by May Maxwell.)

... [XIII:7:185]

The Chinese are just waiting for the universal light of the Bahá'í Glad Tidings. "China, China, China-ward the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh must march," says 'Abdu'l-Bahá. "Where is that holy, sanctified Bahá'í to become the teacher of China! China has most great capability. The Chinese people are most simple-hearted and truth-seeking. The Bahá'í teacher of the Chinese people must first be imbued with their spirit, know their sacred literature, study their national customs and speak to them from their own standpoint and their own terminologies. He must entertain no thought of his own but ever think of their spiritual welfare. In China one can teach many souls and train and educate such divine personages that each one of them may become the bright candle of the world of humanity. Truly, I say, the Chinese are free from any deceit and hypocrisies and are prompted with ideal motives. Had I been feeling well I would have taken a journey to China myself!"

One day on Mount Carmel 'Abdu'l-Bahá told of his plans to go to China in the days of his imprisonment and exile, of how he longed to travel to all nations in the service of the Kingdom. But for forty years he was a prisoner. He prefaces his story with these words about how Bahá'u'lláh loved to describe the glory of teaching:

"Whenever during his lifetime the Blessed Perfection (Bahá'u'lláh) desired to signalize anyone with his special favour he encouraged him to go forth and teach the Cause of God. When he spoke to one of the pilgrims or wrote to a far-off Bahá'í concerning the promotion of the Cause, inciting the former and the latter to arise and deliver the message of the Kingdom everyone felt instinctively that these souls were elected, the chosen ones and that the glances of mercifulness had encircled them. It is noteworthy to remark that most of the general epistles of Bahá'u'lláh, embracing comprehensive teachings and principles are revealed in the names of the teachers of the Cause. A number of rare, spiritual souls having consecrated themselves to the promulgation of the glad-tidings of the Kingdom were peculiarly favoured by him. Whenever their names were mentioned in his presence his countenance became all wreathed in smiles. This was the most notable proof and clear evidence of the favour and bestowal of the Blessed Perfection. When he happened to discourse on teaching and teachers he waxed most eloquent, his words inspired the hearts, his face became radiant with the anticipated joy of a humanity instructed in the laws of God and the application of the laws of nature, and his unquestioned; divine authority filled the listeners with such fiery enthusiasm for the promotion of the Cause that they were ready to give up their lives to execute his command. He used to say that the teachers were the Isráfils of God who, with the sound of their trumpets blow the spirit of life into the dead bodies of mankind.

"One day, in the course of his talk, he praised so much the lives and services of the teachers of the Cause and expressed such high appreciation of their unselfish lives that, although I was a prisoner, I said to myself: 'O! That I might be confirmed in this!' Then I thought I might go to Káshghar, one of the provinces of China and a place not visited up to that time by any Bahá'í teacher. I was going to travel alone and with no baggage—only a handbag containing a number of tablets and books and papers and pens. I secured even my passport; the old Muftí stood as my guarantor. When the crafty Mutašarrif, Ibráhím Páshá, heard about this he sent his secretary to me with the message: 'I have heard that your Excellency contemplates taking a long journey. I will [XIII:7:186] not be so disrespectful or discourteous as to thwart your plan or in any way hinder your departure but, as I am the Governor of this province, I am responsible to the central government for everything that happens here. Therefore, it will be but my official duty to send a cable concerning your departure as soon as you set your feet on the steamer.' I was familiar with the fortuitous ways of oriental expression. So I saw that this was a polite way of saying: 'We will not let you go!' Hence I deferred my departure to a more opportune time."

"China is the country of the future. I hope the right kind of teacher will be inspired to go to that vast empire to lay the foundation of the Kingdom of God, to promote the principles of divine, civilization, to unfurl the banner of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh and to invite the people to the banquet of the Lord!"

The morn of unity

From the Words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

“O ye friends of God! The morn of guidance is radiant and the hearts of the people of faithfulness are like unto a garden. The divine breeze is blowing, the Spirit of God is manifest, the faded hearts are quickened and rejuvenated. ... Turn your faces toward the rose garden of God for, verily, the fragrances of the Holy Spirit are passing by. Gaze ye toward the Kingdom of Abhá for his Ancient Bestowal is descending. Look ye up toward the Supreme Horizon for the Sun of Hope is dawning. This bestowal is one of the most particular gifts of this great cycle for from its beginning to its end it is the dawning place of the penetration of the lights of the Ancient Beauty. Therefore appreciate ye the value of these times and let not the opportunity slip by from your hands, for the zephyr of the morn of unity is blowing and the rays of the Sun of Reality are shining from all horizons of the universe with universal force. This century is the beginning of all future generations. The standards of guidance shall wave over all countries, yet in this period the power of confirmation is most perfect and well nigh inexhaustible and the lights of unity are irradiating from the hearts of men. To take one step in this day is equal to one hundred thousand steps in the future and to inhale one breath in this age is compared to one hundred thousand breaths in the future, for this is the beginning of the age of grace, the time of the downpour of the rain and the season of the heavenly spring.”

“The germinating and growing trees join the babbling brooks and the sighing pines in the singing of their anthems. May you also resuscitate the dead souls with the wafting of the breeze of divine grace. Praise be to God that the bounty and bestowal of the Blessed Perfection are with us; his confirmation, his spirituality, his advice, his exhortations are with us.

“He has given us an irresistible power which all the nations of the world cannot withstand. May you ever be under the protection of God. May the Almighty Father assist and protect you. I shall never forget you. I shall ever remember you. You will always be in my thoughts. I hope you will not forget me. I trust that the ideal bonds, the spiritual communication may ever become stronger and firmer. These celestial ties are eternal. Whenever I supplicate and entreat toward the Kingdom of Abhá I shall beg for you confirmation and assistance, that the door of all good may be opened before your faces so that each one of you may become a sign of guidance and a flag of peace.

“The portraits which are drawn on the canvas of the world have become very antiquated. Now you must become inspired to paint new life-like portraits in the frame of the universe with the delicate brush of the spirit.”

Bahá'í notes¹ [XIII:7:188]

Just before his ascension 'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote to the new friends in Korea to whom Miss Alexander had told the Glad Tidings of Unity these stirring words:

“Praise be to God! That celestial light guided and led you to the Sun of Reality, bestowed everlasting life and granted heavenly illumination. Ye are like seedlings which have been planted by the hand of Bestowal in His spiritual rose-garden. It is my hope that through the warmth of the Sun of Reality, the pouring down of the showers of mercy and the wafting of the breezes of bestowal ye may progress day by day so that each one may become a blessed tree full of leaves and flowers and may cast your shade over great multitudes.

“The graces of the Kingdom of Abhá are the rays of the Sun of Reality. It illumines the earth and heavens, makes the star a shining moon, turns the speck into a huge mountain, bestows strength upon the weak, gives everlasting healing to the sick, grants heavenly treasures to the poor, confirms the oppressed ones to (win) everlasting glory and turns the people of darkness into the people of light.

“O heavenly friends! The doors of heaven have been opened, the lights of God have shone forth and the heavenly call has been raised. Summon ye all humanity to listen to this heavenly call and invite them to the celestial world so that they may find a new spirit and attain to a new life. In all conditions my heart and spirit are with you.”

Haifa, Palestine, July 1922.

On the afternoon of Thursday 6 July, Fugeta and I went to ‘Akká, or rather to Bahjí. Isfandíyár drove us, and the young man who looks after the electric lights, I think his name is Ḥusayn, went with us because the next day was his day for charging the batteries at Bahjí. We left the Pilgrim House at about five o’clock. That is certainly the ideal time of day to make the drive from Haifa to Bahjí. The trip was beautiful—the sea was so blue, the air so fresh and cool. We talked as we went, sometimes in English, and occasionally Fugeta had a bit of conversation in Persian with the others. Some of that I could understand, and some I could not. At about six-thirty the sun sank, and a mass of great, billowy clouds covered the place where the sun had been. In the east the moon was already quite high, very large and bright.

In ‘Akká we drove through the market, to buy some watermelons, and then out through a break in the city walls. There we could see the different walls very well. First there is a heavy wall, then a very deep moat, forty or fifty feet wide, I should guess; another heavy wall, a second moat; a third wall, and another big ditch. The big ditches or moats are quite dry now, but in ancient times they were filled with water as a protection. As one comes out on to the plain of ‘Akká one can see in the distance the hill from which Napoleon tried to conquer the fortress.

In the twilight the drive from ‘Akká to Bahjí is very lovely, everything is so quiet and peaceful. There are faint sounds of men and animals softened by the distance, a truly pastoral scene. The Roman aqueduct along the road is very interesting. It does not go back to the time of the Romans, but has been built since the time when Bahá’u’lláh first came to ‘Akká. The picturesque old towers are not merely ornamental, as I had supposed, but are for the purpose of lifting the water, and then dropping it with force so that it will go along again for a distance without losing all its momentum. There seems to be a very plentiful supply of water, and the people all along the course of the aqueduct use it, and there is plenty of it for use in ‘Akká. [XIII:8:208]

It must have been seven-thirty or eight o’clock when we reached Bahjí. The friends there were not expecting us, but they gave us a most cordial welcome. We found there the very pleasant keeper of the Tomb, ‘Abdu’l Kázim, his young helper, and an Arab policeman. We people from Haifa made a group of seven people, and a very good time we had. I cannot find words to describe how fine a man ‘Abdu’l Kázim seems to me. He is so pleasant in manner, so sincere, so cheerful, so devoted to his work there. When I thanked him for things that he did for me he insisted that I must not thank him, for he was the servant of Bahá’u’lláh, and therefore my servant. When I told him how lovely the garden about the Tomb was, he said, “Yes, it is the garden of Bahá’u’lláh, and therefore it must be beautiful!” I shall always remember him as one of the loveliest Bahá’ís I have ever met. I think that ‘Abbás Qulí at the Tomb on Mount Carmel is just as splendid and attractive and loveable, but I cannot speak English with him, and so I cannot get so well acquainted with him. ‘Abdu’l Kázim speaks quite a bit of English.

After we had rested a little while, Fugeta and I went into the Tomb. It was dark by that time, and the lights in the Tomb were lighted. The thing which seemed to me most beautiful about the lighting was that the lights were so placed that they shone out from under a fern in the centre of the little inner garden. The light came out soft and green through the fronds of fern. The lights were not all on when we first went in, and I liked it better with the softer light. We stayed there in prayer for perhaps half an hour. There are so many people, so many causes to pray for, as well as for oneself, that time goes very, very quickly! Afterward, Ḥusayn turned on all the lights so that I might see them. They turn into a blaze of light, and made me think of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s comment, when he was in America, that Bahá’u’lláh always loved light; that they might be economical about everything else, but that he always told them to have much light about him. Fugeta also drew my attention to the vase that the American Bahá’ís had sent in memory of the Master’s visit to America. The vase was made by Tiffany, and it is very beautiful. It is of bronze, with insets of jewels and cloisonné¹ work. The latter is of a most exquisite blue, shading off into yellow, as it curves up the slender neck of the vase. It is a very, very lovely thing, as is worthy of such a place.

When we returned to the house supper was not quite ready, and I sat out on the little porch, and talked to Isfandíyár, in a wild mixture of English and Persian. However, I learned several new Persian words, and he learned their English equivalents. I like Isfandíyár very much. He is full of fun, devoted to the Master. He certainly gives himself absolutely in service, now to the family of the Master. He is usually busy from early morning till night, driving the Family or the friends to near and distant places. Fugeta said that taking the two of us to Bahjí, and then to ‘Akká the next morning was quite a vacation for him.

We had a delicious supper, and were very happy at it. We had three lots of food—which we shared together—what Fugeta and I had brought from Haifa, what the policeman had prepared, and what ‘Abdu’l Kázim and his companion had cooked. We had little pats of chopped meat, stewed okra, meat browned in the pan, with tomatoes on top, olives, “mast” (something like Dutch cheese), watermelon, bread, and a “sweet” made of sugar and the ground seeds of some plant. The Arab policeman seemed a very pleasant, friendly fellow. The men say that he is the nicest of the policemen who have been stationed there at the Tomb.

After supper Fugeta and I went for a walk, down through the great pine trees, and beyond. The night was absolutely perfect. The moon was almost full, and shed a soft, clear light down on the fields and orchards. Everything showed clearly, and the view of the Tomb through the trees was beautiful. It was the most calm and quiet of any evening scene I have ever had the joy of seeing. Occasionally some bird would call from a [XIII:8:249] near-by tree. In the distance a shepherd was playing on a pipe, and its notes came to us softly and sweetly. It was so exquisite that it seemed a pity to go in and leave it, for the mere purpose of going to sleep.

I had a nice big room, with three windows, below which there was a wide divan. Before I went off to sleep I sat a little while in the window looking at the soft radiance of the moonlight, and listening to the sweetness of the shepherd's pipes.

I slept so well that I did not waken until five-thirty, which is late as people count rising-hours here! After breakfast Fugeta and I went into the Tomb for a little while. It is very beautiful there in the cool of the morning. Immediately after that Isfandíyár had the carriage ready for us to go to 'Akká. There he drove us directly to the house which I had visited before, in which Bahá'u'lláh had lived for fourteen years—nine of them in one room. It has a beautiful view of the sea and of Haifa in the distance. We met several friends there, and talked to them a few minutes, but did not stay long. Everywhere in 'Akká the friends were the personification of hospitality, asking us to stay to lunch, and if we would not do that, to at least come in long enough to have some tea. From there we walked about the town, first going to see the old Bahá'í Pilgrim House. To reach that one climbs a long flight of steps, and comes out on a wide balcony built about four sides of a large square court-yard. The place is a sort of apartment house! Opening onto the balcony are various "houses", perhaps six or seven on a side. It was one of these that used to be the Pilgrim House. Then many of the other apartments were occupied by Bahá'í families. The Master used to go to the Pilgrim House in the morning, and all the friends from the different houses would come and gather about him there. It is a wonderfully interesting old place. Up till quite recently there have been Bahá'í families there on the court, but now they have all moved away. After we left the balcony we went down onto the wharf, from which we could see the outer wall of the Pilgrim House which has a small balcony on that side overlooking the sea. We then went through the bazaars. They were most interesting, especially one very old one, under a series of high arches. In one shop we met a very old Bahá'í, who had been Bahá'u'lláh's cook, in the time when the friends were in the barracks. I think that he and the Greatest Holy Leaf are almost the only survivors of that group. He was as cordial as all the friends are, and said that he would be very unhappy if we did not come and sit down in the shop a while, and he would make us some tea. I was very glad to see that old man!

From the bazaars we went to the old house within the prison walls, where the Master used to live, the one with the garden in the centre, with the tall date palm, and the long flight of steps leading up to the Master's room. There are houses on three sides of it, and a high wall on the fourth side. The garden in the centre is very well kept, and a Bahá'í friend of 'Akká who had joined us said that the garden had been just like that when the Master was there. And there was the tall date palm that I had seen in the pictures. There are two long flights of steps, in opposite corners of the courtyard. In the corner directly opposite that is another flight of steps, and at the top of that is the door that led directly into the Master's rooms. It is now overgrown with a great bougainvillaea vine which shadows it completely. Apparently that entrance is not now used at all, and the vine is much in need of trimming. We went part way up the stairs, but the door was locked and so we had to content ourselves with looking at the outside of it. The rooms in that corner face the sea. We left the court through a gate in a heavy fortress wall. Outside is another wall, beyond that a narrow opening, then another wall, and then the sea. The friend who was with us pointed out the place under some trees where the Master used to pitch his tent, and receive visitors. It is all just as Mr Chase described it in In Galilee.

It was not far from that house until we came to the barracks. This time we entered it from a new entrance that has been made recently. We crossed over [XIII:8:210] one of the great moats, and after getting permission to enter, were let in through a door that opens into the court-yard, quite near the tower in which Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned. The scene in the court-yard was a great change from what we had seen two years ago. All of it except the end at which we entered was cut off by a barb-wire fence, and beyond that was a garden. The great reservoir in the centre had been whitewashed, and was as white as new snow! Everywhere was cleanliness and order. About the reservoir were planted a circle of eucalyptus trees which were higher than a man. And in the corners were flower gardens in a very flourishing condition. It was a tremendous contrast to what it must have been when the pilgrims and exiles first entered in the sixties. There were a number of soldiers about, resting or looking after the garden. We were not permitted to go inside the wire fence, so we did not see again the rooms at that end of the barracks. The rooms that Bahá'u'lláh and the family occupied are in good condition, clean, and apparently not used by the soldiers. The friend who was with us told us what each one of the rooms was used for, the one the Master had, the one that was used for a kitchen, the one where they used to gather on feast days, etc.

When we entered the carriage we drove directly to the Riḍván. It was good to come in sight of the water-wheel on the end of the island and to see again those narrow, quiet streams of water that cut the Riḍván off from the mainland. In the Riḍván we went directly to the lovely spot under the mulberry trees. How I love that place! I should have liked to stay there for several hours, meditating and dreaming, in that place which is so far out of the world.

At the lower end of the garden we came to the little house in which Bahá'u'lláh had lived while in the garden. We went up a flight of steps to the room Bahá'u'lláh had used, and entered there. It is kept in excellent order, with a number of pieces of furniture Bahá'u'lláh had used. There was the chair he had used, with a wooden chest built about it. Then there was a great table with inlaid-wood top. The top lifted up like the lid of a grand piano and inside were dozens of little pigeon-holes in which he used to keep tablets, manuscripts, etc. In it also were a pile of lovely peacock feathers. The young gardener from Bahjí was with us, and I was utterly astonished when he took out one of them and gave it to me. I love peacock feathers for their beauty of colour, and to have one from the garden of the Riḍván was a most beautiful gift. There were also two or three other pieces of furniture that Bahá'u'lláh had used. After leaving there we went back to the mulberry trees, and I had a few minutes quietly there. It is the most exquisite place!

Riḍváníyyah Khánum told me once about the days there in the garden during the time of Bahá'u'lláh. During the days of the feast of Riḍván the immediate family were there with him all the time. But each day he would invite nine of the friends from 'Akká to spend the day with him. They would come early in the morning, have lunch with him, and not go home till evening. Then on the next day another nine would come and stay. Imagine how the friends must have looked forward to their day in that garden! Riḍváníyyah Khánum said that Bahá'u'lláh was very fond of all beauty, colours, odours, etc. Also that he was very kind to the children. One day he found a number of the little girls playing together, and he asked them what they would like to have. They apparently did not express any wish, but he guessed at what they might like. So he sent a man away and when he came back he brought for each girl a slender gold bracelet, as a gift from Bahá'u'lláh.

Just as we were leaving the Riḍván the gardener brought me a great bunch of flowers which he had picked for me, dahlias, phlox and several kinds of which I did not know the name.

Some questions asked-let us consider them

Dr Frederick W. D'Evelyn

There is a spirit in this age. Men are reacting to its influence. This reaction is shaping questions, moulding comments and formulating surmises. Our best sympathies are awakened.

The Times Literary Supplement (London) recently stated, "There will be changes in the Christian religion;" "What form, no one can say." We advance the claim that Bahá'í elucidation reveals the dawn of a New Cycle comprehensively enough to include all pre-manifested truth and light, thereby establishing a spiritual consummation. Amplify this claim and we find it covers the "change" and the "form" inquired of by the Times Literary Supplement.

This article further advances two questions of most commendable conception. The first, one of faith: "What think ye of Christ?" The student of the Bahá'í teaching would ask to have the question read, "What know ye of Christ." The measure is found in knowing, not in thinking. (We shall return to this later.)

The second question is: "How is the fullness of life to be lived in the narrow way: how is a sincere acceptance of Christianity to be reconciled with a free and generous view of civilization?" This is a great question and when the Times Literary Supplement adds as a context, "Neither of these problems will be solved in a generation or a century" we halt, but are neither fearful nor dismayed for the solution is with us today. Our author says, "we need God" and, if Christians—a "Christ". This later he magnificently interprets "as a spiritual and universal Christ who includes but transcends the Jesus of the Gospels."

We are passing the junction, and are now nearing a common highway. The Times Literary Supplement uses "Names", conventional and orthodox, and, we almost suspect, unwittingly, with their accepted valuation. The Bahá'í is instructed to consider freedom from "Names"—long since sundered from their birthplace and baptism—as blessed. Dogma helps us in no wise with our responses. Having concreted error its subsequent "teachings" are confusion.

In the world of Divinity, identity and quality are one. "Christ" is a station, an attribute, not a surname. The "Word" is inseparable from the identity and quality of Divinity. Word and God are one. No duality, perfect unity. The station of the Christ is the station of the Word. The station of the Word is the station of God. The Christ station and the God station are perfect unity, inseparable. The Christ (station) thus dwells in but transcends the mere personality of each and all the Mighty Human Temples through which God (the Word) has spoken. No section of the world of humanity has any monopoly of Divine rights. "The Essence of My Light is Universal."

This station in its comprehensiveness and oneness permits the "knowing" (the knowledge) of Christ, eliminating the doubting of "mere thinking". The Times Literary Supplement claims Christianity is not and can not be the same thing as civilization, for "just as it has a supernatural creed, so it has a supernatural life." This estimate is surely a mere ecclesiastical reflex, a product of limitation. [XIII:8:212]

Reverentially we would express the conviction that nothing would be more un-Godlike than to impose a "supernatural" life and creed upon man, compel him to sojourn "upon earth", to do His will, recognize His presence and yet deprive man of all possibilities of compliance, thus reducing his existence to a mere phase of probation, unreality and detachment. We admit full sympathy with the viewpoint of the Times Literary Supplement a sympathy which is still more heightened when the writer asks for a "Christianity" which knows that one who gives himself wholly to music or astronomy is as fully a Christian as one who gives himself wholly to the service of the altar or to work amongst the poor. We shall not dissect the claim nor cross-examine its ideal. We prefer rather simply to quote from Bahá'í utterance confident that in so doing we shall afford an evaluation and answer and at the same time confirm our sympathy already expressed.

"The Word (Essence) of God is the spirit of Reality. All things owe their existence to it. Its light when cast upon the mirrors of the wise gives expression to wisdom; reflected from the minds of artists it produces manifestations of new and beautiful arts; when it shines through the minds of students it reveals knowledge and unfolds mysteries.”

Therein is no limitation. “Reality” (Word) is universal; also inexhaustible. Apart from this “Christianity and Civilization” and all the composite conventionality associated therewith become mere terminologies possessing no creative innateness.

The Times Literary Supplement modestly asserts, “his paper is to raise questions rather than answer them.” Joining him in the station of the journey—goal-ward—the service of endeavour heralds comfort and assurance to us; we desire his best activities in things that mean so much. His “questions” translated in the “Spirit of Reality” indicate a turning towards the Light (Centre), with a desire and attraction that will ere long solve for him how the “fullness of life is to be lived” in acceptance of knowledge which hath appeared.

In this category of viewpoints we can find “the spirit of this Age” urging Glenn Frank, Editor of The Century Magazine, “to certain prophecies” which for us are simply reflexes complimentary of the Reality we have already referred to. Mr Frank claims the advent of a spiritual renaissance of Western Civilization, not so much from a plan to set the world right as from a passion to see the world right. We have no desire to comment upon this further than to realize a very honest effort to introduce and establish a viewpoint which, however evident to himself, he is doubtful—and to us it seems justly so—if it will be equally so to his readers. He is timorous lest he may be judged as “predicting a mysticism that would sweep the world.” This he in nowise heralds. He concedes “the confusion of titles” when he says, “it is difficult to avoid this impression”, however, if one uses the word “spiritual” for mankind has ever insisted upon a clean-cut distinction between the spiritual and the secular. From us Mr Frank wins consensus of judgement when he adds “a distinction that is in my reasoning altogether false.”

Later, the way to our traveller seems mist-encumbered. We admit ourselves into his group of “certain minds” who find it difficult to grasp the “notion” that a vast spiritual movement can spring from the secular activities of science, industry and politics. The premises claimed in our earlier statements would simply reverse this order of estimates. We are almost persuaded that Mr Frank himself would assess our claim as a readjustment rather than a contradiction for he later concluded that “spiritual redemption must be brought to the morally impossible condition into which our western civilization has drifted.”

Mr Frank’s estimates as to the probable leadership of the “coming renaissance” are fascinating and arresting. Space prohibits detailed analysis. Further, tendering the explanation we do for the “spirit of this Age” the “leadership” is an already solved relation. The pronounced desire for the welfare of humanity quickens the “issue” taken [XIII:8:213] by Mr Frank and exalts his service into one of valued effort and direction.

It is undoubted that the “Secrets of Greatness” are being sincerely, faithfully and persistently sought for and to all thus seeking it is worth while to remember that our outward self, our inward self, must be consecrated in the service and sacrifice and, finally, it is necessary for the soul to prove the message and reach a station of belief through its own power of judgement.

This is indeed a high and noble birthright.

Capacity and spiritual revelation

How often the eye falls unconsciously upon some word or printed page and a lasting impression is gained which is destined to grow stronger and stronger as the years go by!

Some time ago the writer picked up a magazine which seemed to have been published by some religious organization and was of the type of those usually distributed broadcast with the hope of carrying conviction to some searching soul. One of the pages bore an illustration of a granite sarcophagus. Huge blocks of granite formed the foundation, greater slabs the base and above these there rose the receptacle which contained the remains of the deceased, a case of granite cemented together and bound round with great iron bands, but—this was the story which the printing underneath the illustration related:

“Into a crevice of those granite slabs some slight breeze, or perhaps some bird of flight had dropped a little seed. Sun and rain had cast their magic spell upon this seed and it had sprouted carrying little by little a pressure which had caused the crevice to widen and widen until at the time of the photograph the iron bands were broken, the granite tomb separated and out of its midst there had grown a tree so lovely and symmetrical that it seemed to say by the very beauty of its presence, ‘What hath God wrought?’”

For those who have found the Bahá’í Revelation it is difficult to picture the time when there was any uncertainty as to life after death or to believe that there ever was a time when we were so far from reconciling science with religion that we could have believed in the resurrection of the physical body in the same form which it had borne when it was the temple of the soul! And yet the world has remained in darkness regarding this great subject and humanity is still struggling with it, save those who have been born into a knowledge of what the spiritual resurrection really means through the breaking of the seals by Bahá’u’lláh and the clear and lucid explanations of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. All this puts one in mind of the talk given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá about “Capacity and Readiness”. He said:

“Wherever in the night a lamp is lighted people naturally are attracted to that light and gather around it. When there is a gathering in the evening in any place it is indicative of the fact that a light has there been lighted.

“There are lamps the light of which is limited. There are lamps which illumine the horizons. The lamp of the [XIII:8:214] guidance of God wherever lighted has illumined the horizons. Praise be to God! In this country the lamp of the guidance of God has been lighted and day by day its light is becoming more and more resplendent and this splendour is becoming more and more widespread. Now this is not known but later its traces will become evident.

“Consider how in the days of His Holiness Christ the light of guidance lighted twelve hearts. Twelve hearts were illumined by that light; and how limited it seemed! But how spacious it became, for it illumined the world!

“You are not a great body of people but, because the lamp of guidance has been lighted in your hearts the effects will be wonderful in years to come. It is evident and manifest that the world will be illumined. Therefore you must thank God that, praise be to God! through His favour and grace the lamp of the most great guidance has been ignited in your hearts and He has summoned you to His kingdom. He has caused the call of the Supreme Concurrence to reach your ears. The doors of heaven have been opened unto you. The Sun of Reality has shone upon you. The cloud of Mercy is pouring down and the breezes of Providence have blown toward you.

“Although the bestowal is great and the grace is glorious, yet, capacity and readiness are requisite. Without capacity and readiness the divine bestowals will not become manifest and evident. No matter how much the cloud may rain, the sun may shine, the breezes blow the land of sterility will give forth no verdure. The ground which is pure and free from thorns and thistles receives and produces through the rain of the cloud of Mercy. No matter how much the sun shines it will have no effect upon the black rock. But in a pure and polished mirror its light becomes resplendent. Therefore we must obtain capacity in order that the signs of the mercy of the Lord may become revealed. We must endeavour to make the soil of the hearts free from these useless weeds and sanctified from the thorns of useless thoughts in order that the cloud of Mercy may bestow its power upon it.

“The doors of God are open, but there is need of readiness.

“The ocean of Providence is surging, but we must be able to swim.

“The bestowals of God are descending from the heaven of Grace, but capacity is necessary.

“The fountain of Providence is gushing forth, but we must have thirst.

“Unless there be thirst the salubrious water will not assuage.

“Unless a soul is hungry the delicious foods of God will not appeal.

“Unless the eyes are perceptive the light of the sun will not be witnessed.

“Unless the nostrils are pure the fragrance of the Rose Garden will not be inhaled.

“Unless the heart be longing the favours of the Lord will not become evident.

“Therefore we must endeavour day and night to purify the hearts from dross, to sanctify the souls from every fetter and to become free from the discords of humanity. Then the divine bestowals in their fullness and glory will become evident. If we do not strive and become sanctified from the defects and evil qualities of human nature we will not partake of the bestowals of God.”

Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

“All the created phenomena are subject to the law of change and transmutation. Youth is followed by old age, a tender plant becomes an old, decrepit tree, dynasties are born, wax strong, reach to the zenith of glory and then totter to the ground. Likewise every one of the world-religions has been the cause of progress and advancement in its own time, but now they have become like old, very old trees. They do not yield any more luscious fruits. Some people persist in the unscientific belief that these very old trees will again become young, push forth leaves, blossoms and fruits. This is impossible. This age needs a young, vigorous plant with world-wide growing capacity.”

“We do not oppose the religion of any one. We act in accordance with the Gospel. But we must also act in accordance with the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh. They are: the oneness of the world of humanity, independent investigation of truth, abandonment of prejudice, universal peace, etc. You must act in accordance with these teachings.”

“In the coming of Christ the Divine teachings were given in accordance with the infancy of the human race. The teachings of Bahá’u’lláh have the same basic principles, but are according to the stage of the maturity of the world and the requirements of this illumined age.”—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

The Mount Carmel of the future

A prophesy given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the Shrine of the Báb, Sunday, 4 January 1920

“In this gathering,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “all the friends are assembled together in the utmost freedom, happiness and majesty. Nothing could be better than this. The day will come when this mountain will be resplendent with light,—lights from top to bottom. On one side of it there will be a hotel, a universal hotel. Its door will be open to all the people of the world. Whoever comes will be a guest. On the other side of the mountain there will be a university in which all the higher sciences will be taught. On another part of it there will be a Mashriqu’l-Adhkár. On another part of it there will be a home for the [XIII:8:221] incurables. In still another part there will be a home for the poor. In still another part there will be a home for orphans. All these will be administered with love. I foresee that this harbour (Haifa) will be full of vessels. And from here to the Blessed Shrine (Bahjí) there will be wide avenues, on both sides of which there will be trees and gardens. On the surrounding land at Bahjí similar institutions to those at Mount Carmel will be established. And from all these places the songs of praise and exaltation will be raised to the Supreme Concourse.”

Regarding the Bahá’í Temple to be built on Mount Carmel ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote to Mr Charles Mason Remey of Washington, D.C., in a tablet dated 7 October 1921: “Some time ago I wrote thee a letter the content of which was that, praise be to God, thou hast become confirmed in drawing a plan for the pilgrim house in Haifa. It is my hope that this pilgrim house may be built under your supervision. Also in the future a Mashriqu’l-Adhkár will be established on Mount Carmel. Thou wilt be its architect and founder. I give thee this glad tidings.”

Reminiscences of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

[Original title: The Ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá]

On the twenty-eighth of November, one year ago, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ascended to the City of Light. The press and magazines all over the world have written of his life and world-wide spiritual influence. Mr Frederic Dean gives, in The Independent and the Weekly Review, of 24 December 1921, a personal reminiscence of his meeting with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in New York City in 1912:

“‘Abdu’l-Bahá, whose death was chronicled in the press the other day, was more than a personality—he was an inspiration; an idealist, whose self-devotion breathed new life into dying creeds. His gospel appealed with equal force to Christians, Muslims and Jews; to Buddhists and Hindus, Shintoists and Pársís. His idealism was to many a manifestation of the very source of life, light and love. He came at a time when the soul’s craving for hope and faith was—seemingly—unappeased by any one of the many organized and acknowledged religions.

“I first met the teacher in an uptown church. I had been sent by my paper to report the sermon. The speaker’s likeness to my own father was so startling that, immediately after the service, I entered the anteroom and told him of the remarkable resemblance. Very quietly he answered: ‘I am your father and you are my son. Come and dine with me.’ Another engagement prevented, but I asked if I might take breakfast with him the following morning. ‘Come,’ he said. I went. And after that first meeting followed others. We walked in his garden, and, as we walked, we talked. I told him of his peculiar attraction to me on account of my own outlook on life; that I was a Buddhist—a Buddhist-Christian. ‘So am I,’ replied the teacher. ‘I am also a Confucian-Christian and a Brahmin-Christian; a Jewish and a Muslim-Christian. I am a brother to all who love truth—truth in whatsoever garb they choose to clothe it.’”

Major W. Tudor-Pole of London, England, who with General Allenby entered Haifa in August 1918 prepared a beautiful memorandum of the expressions of love and appreciation which government officials and the press gave to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá after his ascension. “As I write,” says Major Tudor-Pole, in conclusion, “certain memories come back to me with a strange insistence.

“I remember standing beside the Master in the pulpit of the City Temple, London, watching over five thousand people breathlessly absorbed in listening to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s living spiritual words, and in watching his every smile and movement.

“I remember walking with him through the woods at Clifton, 1911, when he spoke of the coming of a spiritual renaissance within the Christian Churches; or, wandering along the banks of the Seine at sunset, 1913, when the Master spoke of the Great War that was to come, and of the Most Great Peace that would ultimately follow it.

“I have sat beside him at Ramleh, Alexandria, Egypt, beneath the palms, and while he spoke of the essential unity of all mankind. There were Christians, Jews, Muslims, Pársís, Hindus and Freethinkers sitting around him on [XIII:9:234] that occasion, one and all united with the same faith and aspiration.

“I remember walking alone with the Master on Mount Carmel’s slopes, sharing his frugal meals in his Haifa house, listening to his melodious chanting within the Garden Tomb, living as one of the family within Bahá’u’lláh’s house at ‘Akká.

“There is no death. The Master lives on in our midst, and the great spiritual work of human redemption goes forward unceasingly.

“Despite the apparent world tribulations of the present hour, the dawn of a new Day approaches, and it is the privilege of every man and woman alive today to work serenely and faithfully for the coming of world peace and true human brotherhood.”

It is very fitting that in commemoration of the Ascension of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá one year ago we quote some of the immortal sentences from the last will and testament of the Master as they were chosen by Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Cause and Lady Bloomfield in their little book, “The Passing of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá”.¹ We quote also the connecting sentences from this wonderful booklet and, at the close, extracts from two of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s last Tablets.

[Extracts from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Will and Testament have been omitted.] [XIII:9:236]

In one of his last Tablets ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote: “Regard not the person of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, for he will eventually take his leave of you all; nay, fix your gaze upon the Word of God. Should it rise and be exalted rejoice, be glad and thankful even though ‘Abdu’l-Bahá be under a drawn sword, be imprisoned or be cast into bonds: for that which is of transcendent importance is the Holy Temple of the Cause of God and not the mortal frame of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The loved ones of God must arise with such steadfastness that should hundreds of souls, even as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá himself, be made a target for the darts of woe, nothing whatsoever shall affect or lessen their firm resolve, their intention, their ardour, their enkindlement, their service to the Cause of God. ... This, O ye beloved of the Lord is my counsel and my exhortation unto you. Well is it with him whom the Lord aideth to do even as bidden in this pure and sanctified Tablet.”

His very last Tablet, graciously revealed for his loved ones in Stuttgart, conveys his reflections upon this transient world, and his counsels to his loved ones that dwell therein:

“O ye beloved of the Lord! In this mortal world, nothing whatsoever endure- [XIII:9:237] eth. The peoples of the earth dwell therein and spend a number of days uselessly, ultimately descending beneath the dust, repairing to the home of eternal silence leaving behind them no achievement, no blessing, no result, no fruit. All the days of their life are thus brought to naught: whereas the children of the Kingdom sow seeds in the fertile soil of Truth that will eventually spring up and bring forth many a harvest and shall forever bestow upon mankind its increase and bountiful grace. They shall obtain eternal life, attain unto the imperishable bounty and shine even as radiant stars in the firmament of the Divine Kingdom. The Glory of Glories rest upon you.”

Two shining lights of Işfahán

The King of the Martyrs and the Beloved of the Martyrs
Jináb-i-Fáḍil Máẓindaránı́

These two celebrated martyrs were pure descendants of Muḥammad in body and soul. They were two fragrant roses, of beautiful colour, from his rose garden and were named after his two grandsons, Ḥasan and Ḥusayn. Their home was in the city of Işfahán, one of the great cities of Persia. They were distinguished from all others in excellence, popularity and wealth and were two shining stars in the heaven of the Cause of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh. During the years 1844 and 1845 when dawned the morning of Reality the horizon of their race was illumined with divine lights and was honoured and favoured with the garment of guidance.

In 1846 His Holiness the Báb, because of the uprising of the learned men, was banished by order of the government from his native town, Shíráz to Işfahán. Then those who were thirsty for the water of knowledge and were seeking after the truths of religion in that city, Işfahán, attained to their wish through meeting His Holiness the Báb and were satisfied.

One night Mírzá Ibráhım, the noble father of Ḥasan and Ḥusayn, invited the Báb to his house. Thus that place became illumined with the light of his presence and on that night showers from the clouds of grace and bounty poured [XIII:9:243] down incessantly and the heavenly banquet descended without interruption. From that time the light of guidance illumined the court of the consciousness of that entire family and they were renowned for their devotion to this Cause and became graceful and fruit-bearing trees in the divine rose garden.

His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh was after this banished from Persia by the order of the government. The blessed party arrived in Baghdád in 1852 and that city was thus for eleven years the dawning point of the light of guidance, the centre of the diffusion of truth and the dwelling place of the followers of pure religion and wisdom. During this time it was the privilege of these two brothers to travel from Işfahán to Baghdád. They attained to the meeting and nearness of the Holy Presence (of Bahá'u'lláh) and quaffed for a time from the sweet-flowing, salubrious river of the divine fountain-head. They became intoxicated with the life-giving wine of the love of God, achieved that which they wished and their utmost hopes were realized. They implored the source of favour and bounty that they might attain to the heights of glory and wealth, and this prayer was answered.

When they returned to Işfahán they had become like two falcons with powerful wings soaring to the apex of material and spiritual success. They were as new creations and a wonderful spirit appeared in these holy temples. The light in their faces announced the glad tidings of the bounties and bestowals of God. Their hearts reflected the divine light. Their countenances were radiant and luminous, their characters were like a rose garden, their words gentle and their utterances were full of the precious gems of knowledge and spiritual susceptibilities. They were rich in the wealth of God and independent of all else save Him. In addition to this they attracted attention because of their material wealth. Their resources were plenteous from the business in which they were engaged and great was their reputation. The range of their business was extensive, they were in continual business relations with other cities and the important affairs of their city were entrusted to them. They associated with the leaders, the learned, the influential and wealthy merchants, with the high officials and were sought out by the needy and dependent. They were a refuge to the poor, a shelter for the orphans and widows, a protection for the failing ones, an ample treasury for the needy, a physician's remedy for every sick one and a help to every hungry traveller. They never refused those who asked of them and were the hope of the hopeless. The door of their generosity was always open to every one. For this reason, during the famine of Işfahán these two brothers gave away their wealth and furnished provision for the starving, caring for and saving them from death.

In those days the antagonism of the people to the Bahá'ís was very great. The scholars of Islám called them infidels and sentenced them to death and the government at that time, willingly or unwillingly executed them. Every day news reached the ears of the people of the various methods used in confiscating the property of the Bahá'ís and in murdering and imprisoning them. In this persecution Işfahán led all the cities, a wealthy and powerful Muslim Mullá there through his influence and authority causing the murder of a great number of Bahá'ís. One by one he attacked these innocent people, with his claws and teeth tearing and biting the harmless sheep and shedding their blood. For this reason he was named Dhi'b, the Wolf, and his son who succeeded him was called The Son of the Wolf. Bahá'u'lláh wrote for the awakening and guidance of this person a long and detailed epistle which is now circulated throughout the world. It is called The Book of the Shaykh and The Epistle of the Son of the Wolf.

The government of Işfahán was at that time in the hands of a cruel and unjust prince who destroyed many lives, confiscated property and seemed to derive special pleasure from the shedding of the blood of the innocent and oppressed. If the injustice and cruelty of this governor were told the narration thereof would fill a large volume. [XIII:9:244]

At such a time as this these two brothers, Ḥasan and Ḥusayn, opened their home to all the Bahá'ís, fully performing their duties, fearing no one, nay, rather, they were the standard bearers of this blessed Cause in that city and the protectors of the oppressed. Whenever an attack was made by the enemies on any of the innocent they used every possible means to save that one. Their house was looked upon as the centre for the Bahá'ís who travelled back and forth and for general meetings. They feared not the hatred of the Mullás nor their public attacks and were so intoxicated with the wine of love and faith that they completely forgot themselves. They seemed not to live on this earth but to be soaring in another, an infinite realm.

When His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh was in Baghdád, these two brothers, longing for martyrdom, sent a petition to him asking that their blood might be shed for the succour of the tree of the Cause of God and that they might ascend to the Kingdom. Indeed, in heart and spirit they had already arrived at their goal and had attained to true martyrdom, which is severance from one's own desire and annihilation in the will of God.

Such was the state of affairs until, in 1878, the great tragedy concerning these two brothers, which is here described, took place.

In the city of Işfahán there lived a wealthy Muslim leader. So numerous were his followers and so great was his influence that even the governor, strong and independent though he was, had to defer to him. Bahá'u'lláh called this person The Raqshá, that is, snake of beautiful spots with moles full of poison. Raqshá owed the two brothers more than twenty thousand dollars and his property was in their control. In this year of 1878 they asked him to settle his account. And then a satanic scheme occurred to him. He determined to do away with them by accusing them of being Bahá'ís. Thus could he escape the paying of his debts and he might, perhaps, even plunder their great possessions. He disclosed, confidentially, this wicked plan to Shaykh Dhi'b, the Wolf, who responded with the utmost hatred and blood-thirstiness and promised his assistance. Together they resolved to carry out their terrible plan and accordingly called upon the governor and, complaining, said:

“These brothers, because of their high positions and many virtues, are gradually drawing the people into the cause of Bahá'u'lláh and are destroying the religion of Islám. Therefore it is your duty to bestir yourself that we may exterminate them.”

The prince at first was delighted, but later he asked to be excused, saying “No one has ever seen them commit any unseemly deed, nay, rather they are adorned with qualities and deeds which are pleasing to God and His creatures. For what crime could they be punished?”

They replied, “There can be no greater crime than to leave the religion of Islám and take shelter under the shadow of a new religion.”

The prince then said, “They are of the descendants of Muḥammad and we will be responsible to God.”

They answered, “We are willing to accept the responsibility as we will be the true murderers.”

Then Raqshá, The Snake, he who was so impatient and so anxious to have them killed, placed his hands upon his own neck thus signifying that the responsibility would fall upon him.

The prince said, “These two brothers are actively engaged in business in many cities and it is certain that if such a tragedy were to happen many merchants would suffer loss, their voices would be raised in protest and the Sháh might perhaps start an investigation.”

They replied, “We assume entire responsibility and will give you a written statement to the effect that we are prepared to answer any question which may be asked by the Sháh or by the merchants.”

They then gave him a statement in their own handwriting and promised him a large portion of the great fortune which they would appropriate. [XIII:9:245]

The prince at last agreed to their plan and decided to act accordingly. He advised them, however, to keep the matter secret for the time being, and not to let anyone know about it.

When the Muslim Christmas, the anniversary of the birthday of the prophet Muḥammad, came round it was customary for the people to call upon the governor and the scholars. This year, a large number, of varying rank, including a group of the governor's supporters, gathered at that time at the meeting-place of Raqshá, The Snake. All their plans were prepared in such fashion that the two brothers upon their arrival would be arrested.

The two younger brothers of the King of the Martyrs went to the meeting. When they were seated and had commenced drinking their tea Raqshá began to rebuke them severely, saying, “You are Bahá'ís, infidels, unclean and are leading the Muslims astray.” Then he gave orders that the teacups be knocked from their hands and the tea spilled. At this the butlers dragged the brothers to the prince, heaping upon them meanwhile the greatest humiliations.

Not knowing where the eldest and most eminent brother, the King of the Martyrs, might be, Raqshá started a search for him. He was at that time at the home of a famous Mullá of the city. This Mullá had the deepest love for him and held in high respect his ideals, his character and his knowledge. The King of the Martyrs on his arrival at the Mullá's home said to him:

“Through the intrigues of Raqshá and just because of his desire for my possessions a terrible tragedy will occur today. He has made full preparations for my martyrdom.”

The Mullá was a near relative of the prince and because of this fact was confident that his home could render protection. Warm-heartedly he said, “I will tell the prince of the intrigues of Raqshá and I will never allow any trouble to occur.”

By this time Raqshá had located the King of the Martyrs and his men, noisily seeking him, had arrived at the Mullá’s home. The Mullá instructed his representative to dismiss the men, whereupon they returned to Raqshá and informed him of the situation. The Mullá’s messenger meanwhile acquainted the prince with what had occurred and insisted that he listen to the advice of the Mullá. Whereupon the prince at once sent his foremost and strongest deputy with more than a hundred heedless ones with strict orders for the arrest of the King of the Martyrs. The deputy gave the Mullá a letter which warned him against protecting the King of the Martyrs and said that dissension among the influential Mullás would lead to terrible results.

When these violent and cruel officers stormed the house the Mullá at last fully realized the state of affairs. Compelled to go to the King of the Martyrs, with the utmost anguish and vehemence he explained the situation, whereupon the King of the Martyrs without grief or agitation but, rather, with supreme joy hastened out of his shelter and to the altar of love. The officers surrounded him as though he were a criminal and dragged him to the governor. While he was being dragged along in that sad and sorrowful state the crowds filled the streets and with their teeth gripped the finger of astonishment and amazement. Some of the people were weeping but the King of the Martyrs was as happy and thankful as though he were about to attend a concert or a delightful musical entertainment.

When the city hall was reached he presented the governor’s agent with his watch and some of his handsome clothing and, apologizing, said, “I am at present unable to give you more than this.”

As he stepped into the presence of the prince he saw his brother. Suddenly the prince with insolent words commenced to chide and insult him because of his religious belief. But the King of the Martyrs with supreme courtesy said, “Your Excellency, if you but knew what I know you would never utter with your tongue such unbecoming statements and falsehoods.” [XIII:9:246]

The prince became very angry at this and with a walking-stick he struck the King of the Martyrs, severely wounding him on head, face and body, insisting the while that he deny and curse the Cause. But the King of the Martyrs held his silence. The Mullá who loved him so much was present and he perceived that his friend’s mouth was very dry. He ordered water to be brought, and with the utmost courtesy and gentleness the King of the Martyrs wet his lips. The prince was exceedingly surprised and said to the Mullá, “Strange it is that even under such circumstances as these he shows a refinement and courtesy which are his essential characteristics.”

In brief, seeing the strength of the edifice of their faith and the firmness of their stand in their religion the prince in a fury ordered that those two brothers be dragged away by their chains and put in prison and that his plundering servants should strip them of their clothes.

Raqshá on his part sent a company of his men to their home. They attacked the women and the little children who were there weeping from fear and distress. They imprisoned them all in one place and for a long time made them to suffer from hunger and thirst. They plundered and confiscated all the money, jewellery and furniture which were in the house. In like manner they went to their store and took everything they could find. The prince also sent a man to the prison to search the pockets of the two brothers and bring him all their checks, notes and receipts. He took all their investments and everything that was deposited in the banks. On that same day he also claimed all their servants, who were many in number.

Now while the two brothers were in prison many telegrams were sent by merchants from different cities to the prince informing him that this disturbance was causing great material losses and was a severe blow to business. The news also came that the Sháh, even, had dispatched a telegram ordering that the brothers be sent to Tīhrán. But greediness for wealth and fear of Shaykh Dhi'b, the Wolf, and Raqshá, The Snake, finally induced him to put the two brothers to death and let the responsibility fall upon The Wolf and The Snake and falsely to declare that the Sháh's telegram was not received until after they had been killed.

The prince all this time persistently urged these two great souls to deny the Cause of God, declaring that to say, even, "We are not Bahá'ís" would be sufficient to save their lives. But each time those two miracles of steadfastness cried out loudly, "Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá!" (O Thou Glory of the Most Glorious!) "Our utmost desire is this, that our lives may be a sacrifice in the path of the love of that Manifestation of Reality and in the spreading of His divine teachings."

At last the prince offered to spare their lives if thirteen thousand dollars were paid to him and he gave permission for the youngest brother, Mírzá Ismá'íl, to go and bring the money. But the Shaykh, The Wolf, and Raqshá, The Snake, who were anxious to have them killed, on the eighth day of their imprisonment called a meeting and brought together a large number of Mullás and judges. All demanded and insisted that the prince should pronounce the death sentence and declared that they would assume every responsibility, in this world and in the world to come. Whereupon the prince said, "Then you are the murderers," and he instructed the executioner to carry out all the wishes of those two oppressors, at which they ordered the executioner to kill the two brothers immediately.

The executioner with drawn sword appeared in the prison at a moment when the King of the Martyrs was talking to and admonishing his younger brother thus:

"O brother, the original intention of these persecutors was to kill me only. Just say, 'My brother is a Bahá'í, not I.' Then your life will be spared. After I am killed take care of the family and bring up the wronged little ones."

The Beloved of the Martyrs replied, "O brother, The Beloved One will give [XIII:9:247] the best of protection to those whom we will leave behind and faithfulness requires that you and I be together in all the worlds of God."

The executioner was one of those who for many years had enjoyed the hospitality and generosity of the two brothers. He begged of them, saying, "Just say a word denying your religion. Then your lives will be saved and I shall not commit so terrible a crime."

The King of the Martyrs answered, "You are under orders and it is your duty to execute them."

So that blood-thirsty oppressor took them to the field of the martyrdom of hope and tightly bandaged their eyes. During a period of about an hour each of them hoped that he might be martyred first and might step out of this world before the other.

The Shaykh, The Wolf, and Raqshá, The Snake, meanwhile were strolling upon an elevation, talking to each other exultantly while waiting, watching with cruel hearts that pitiful scene. They signalled the executioner to finish his work; so, as the two brothers embraced one another, calling on the Greatest Name, "Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá!" and offered thanks to God he cut off their heads and stained their blessed bodies with blood and dust. He then tied their feet with a rope and threw the bodies in a public square that the crowds might see them. After this the bodies were taken to a hollow piece of ground under a great wall which had been wrecked in order to conceal the bodies and place them beyond reach.

But in the middle of the dark night the youngest brother, Mírzá Ismá'íl, with several of the servants rescued the bodies from under the stones and wreckage and carrying them outside the city washed them at the river's brink, wrapped them in winding sheets and then, summoning grave diggers, and unknown to anyone, asked them to dig two graves in the cemetery. But the grave diggers were afraid, lest The Wolf and The Snake might hear of it. So the two bodies were buried there, in that place, and the men returned to their homes in a panic of fear.

Persecutors and disregarders of truth that they were, those people, especially Shaykh Dhi'b, the Wolf, imagined that by the killing of these two great souls the Cause of God would be wiped out and that with the uprooting of these two fruit-bearing trees from the divine rose garden there would remain no trace nor sign of the Eternal Rose Garden. After this tragedy they ordered detectives to watch for and to kill any Bahá'ís who might come into the city and to inform them if any Bahá'í meetings were held. They searched, and in vain, to find the graves of the two martyrs in order that they might destroy the bodies.

The patience and fortitude of these great martyrs while enduring calamities and while losing their possessions and their families in the path of His Holiness the Chosen One and their joyful and willing acceptance of ordeals is the greatest proof of the power, influence, greatness and truth of this Cause. Moreover, the mighty influence of this great Cause upon the spiritual training of mankind became clear and evident manifested as it was in these martyrs through their greatness, their important positions, both material and spiritual, and through their cultivation and their severance. In like manner the wickedness of the leaders of the people, their tyranny and selfishness became apparent to every one. Indeed, this great calamity affected not only the Bahá'ís but many of the fanatical people mourned them and paid tribute to them, chanting poems, of which this is one of the verses: "Heaven, perhaps, had none other arrow than this in its quiver!"

Soon after these happenings relations were broken between Raqshá and the prince. Raqshá fled, and hid himself. After a while, on that place on his neck which he had indicated when he stood before the prince and said, "I am willing to have the responsibility of killing the two brothers fall on my neck", there appeared an abscess, which became so infected and unpleasant that his own [XIII:9:248] family even avoided him and drove him away from the house to a garden out of the city where finally he died.

Shaykh Dhi'b, the Wolf, and The Son of The Wolf suffered humiliation and degradation and became as fruitless and useless trees.

As to the prince, he was driven away by the Sháh and was hated by him. He fell into the depths of abasement and finally, expelled by the Persian government, was forced to live an exile from his country. He returned, once, to Persia, in order to live in his native land according to his own desires on the enormous wealth which he had accumulated. But the people prevented this by throwing him in prison and punishing him very severely. In this connection a story may be related:

During the unjust administration of this prince there lived in Işfahán an oppressed Bahá'í. He was a target for the whip of the Mullás, accused by them of infidelity, and his property was plundered and confiscated. Fearful for his life he concealed himself in places where he could not be found. Once he appealed to the prince, reminding him of the sighs and cries of the oppressed, the broken-hearted and the helpless. He also tried to remind him of his responsibility to God. The prince replied with the greatest arrogance and contempt, saying, "Go to 'Abdu'l-Bahá and accuse me and let him do with me whatever he can." An insult such as this hurt this broken-hearted Bahá'í more than anything else. Later on, when the prince was indicted, despised, imprisoned and expelled and was in utter humiliation that Bahá'í travelled from his distant native town to the prison, met the prince, made himself known to him and reminded him, saying, “Some years ago I spoke to you of my sufferings due to cruelty and oppression and of how all my possessions had been confiscated and I had no place of safety and rest and how I must needs, through fear of my enemies conceal myself every moment. You said to me, ‘Go to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and accuse me.’ Though orally I did not accuse you in his presence yet the justice of God requires punishment and reward. For this reason His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh said, ‘The tent of the order of the world is supported and upheld by two pillars, punishment and reward.’ Therefore, whatever has happened is inevitable and ordained.”

In a word, those powerful enemies under such conditions passed away from this world and their light became extinguished. But their honours, The King of the Martyrs and The Beloved of the Martyrs, have ignited a light which will shine forever. All the days of their life unto the day of martyrdom the nostrils of the spiritual ones were ever perfumed by their fragrance. During their lifetime they were very prominent, just and happy and were loved by all. Because they held their souls in their hands, sacrificed them in the path of the True Friend and took their stand near to the great mercy in the Abhá, Most Glorious Kingdom numerous tablets were revealed from the pen of Bahá’u’lláh concerning their exalted station and the grief of the Supreme Concourse for their ordeals. Such jewels of divine subtleties and infinite favours were revealed that they will remain throughout the everlastingness of the world and the Kingdom. The spiritual titles, The King of the Martyrs and The Beloved of the Martyrs, were granted them, and now, by these merciful names they are well known in the East and the West.

Translated by Dr Ḍiyá’ M. Baghdádí and Emily Vail.

Note: An evidence of the great love of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for these holy martyrs is the fact that he was the essence of kindness to the bereaved families and cared for the son of the King of the Martyrs, Mírzá Jalál, in his own home. Later he gave Mírzá Jalál his daughter, Rúhá Khánum, in marriage.

The victory of faith

Horace Holley

Those who live in the depths of a small, narrow valley, and make no effort to climb the lofty mountains by which they are beset—such people never behold the landscape stretching beyond the hills; they know not what the mountains may conceal.

But he who makes the mighty effort, leaving behind him the narrow valley of human selfishness and ease; he who has the supreme courage and strength to gain the summit, for him the invisible becomes visible; for him the infinite divine horizons are unfolded, and that which was hidden behind the mountains is revealed.

One of those recurrent visions that come again and again, whenever selfishness and greed and fear are truly overcome—that landscape which ever greets with its beauty the soul who reaches the highest hill—is the vision of a united humanity, a single faith, one worship, one law, one God. To this every traveller in the world of spirit has testified, and their testimony ever agrees. We find this vision singing in the words of Isaiah; Augustine, in his great work “The City of God” rediscovered it; its perception haunted the great souls in the Middle Ages; today once more the people of magnanimity like Emerson have testified eloquently that the same spiritual landscape still exists. You may search the records of the vision of every people, East and West, North and South—wherever the soul becomes articulate, its speech is the praise of that which it beholds before it, beyond the hills. [XIII:10:266]

To these witnesses, that vision is reality, and the world’s division, suffering and pain is an unreality they have forever left behind. By and for and in that reality they have lived and died.

But their witness is incredible to the people in the darkness of the valley. In the valley, the description of the landscape beyond the hills seems no more than an empty dream, a denial of the plainest facts confronting one on every hand. Here, reality is the struggle for existence, the survival of those who are “fit”, a constant and painful effort to gather fruit from trees on which the sun too seldom shines. That such a fruitful landscape lies on the other side of death, many in the valley will agree; but that it lies on the other side of sacrifice here and now, this they repudiate, this they vehemently deny. And their repudiation and their denial are sanctified by those to whom they are accustomed to turn for authority in matters that pertain to the life of the soul.

That faith has had no visible victory in any era of recorded time, is all too evident; that the vision of human brotherhood never seemed so dim, so unreal, so legendary as in this troubled age, is no less apparent.

Nevertheless, it is well to recall that some hundreds of years ago Leonardo da Vinci drew plans for the construction of a machine that would fly. In his day, even the thought of aviation was inconceivable. The failure of his efforts appeared to his neighbours like the judgement of an offended Providence against one who had attempted to contravene the divine law.

But now that aviation has become a commonplace occurrence in this age of scientific progress, what are we to say of da Vinci?

In the world of thought, da Vinci achieved aviation—in the world of thought he stood abreast of the people of today. It was in the world of material fact, and in this world only, that da Vinci failed. He failed only because certain material conditions had not yet been fulfilled. He had no suitable motive power, no suitable structural elements such as we now have. But the principle of flight was certainly his—and time itself has worked to vindicate his aspiration.

Therefore we see that there, are two worlds—the world of vision and the world of outward fact. Vision ever precedes fact—vision creates fact. For the world of vision is the world of causes; the world of outward fact is the world of effects. That which exists in the world of vision must eventually come to existence also in the world of fact. The world of fact cannot resist the world of vision, any more than the earth can resist the growth of the seed that are sown. For the earth is composed of the very substance of vegetation—and in like manner, the world of effects is composed of the substance of vision. Where the earth is too scanty for vegetation—where the earth resists the growth of the seed, there the stunted vegetation rots and goes back to the earth; and when this has happened season after season, the earth is fertilized by the very vegetation it seemed to resist. So humanity, denying the spiritual world, resisting the growth and development of the life of spirit, is gradually spiritualized by the influences it destroys, or rather seems to destroy.

Thus if we consider once more the recurrent vision of human brotherhood, righteousness and unified faith: since this reality has ever existed in the world of perception, the world of causes, it must also come to existence in the world of outer fact. For the separation of these two worlds is not the eternal separation of life and death, or good and evil, or light and darkness; rather their separation is that of cause and effect. It is a separation which lies in time, and lying in time, is also joined by time. As the tree is the effect of the seed, but the tree and the seed are separated by time, yet connected in time; so also human brotherhood is the effect of the soul, the fruit of the soul, and the long agony of the soul’s sacrifice is not only the measure of the duration of time but also the measure of time’s meaning.

For there must needs be concurrent conditions for the realization of brotherhood, just as there had to be concurrent conditions for the realization of mechanical flight. Just as the thought of flight remained perfect, unchanging in the world of causes until certain conditions had been established in the material [XIII:10:267] world, so the vision of peace on earth has existed perfect and unchanging, a landscape beyond the hills of sacrifice and endeavour, until little by little those outer conditions might be established of which peace and righteousness are the consummation, the purpose, the motive, the fruit. Never has the man of faith denied the reality of human brotherhood, but in all ages his concern has been to further the inner and outer preparations for its eventual victory.

Let us not be deceived by the apparent predominance of hatred, suspicion and the desire for material conquest in this age.

Nine years ago a child might have travelled from Berlin to Paris in a few hours, without danger, without annoyance. A year later, in 1914, more than a million men attempted to make that journey, and not one man arrived. Why was this? Not one man arrived because they came on conquest, and coming on conquest they raised up forces of opposition that proved mightier than they.

This is a new condition in the world of humanity. Hitherto, no power has existed strong enough to resist empire except the mysterious power of time. Rome was overthrown, overthrown at last, but Rome was overthrown so slowly that people did not perceive the seeds of Rome's downfall were sown by the first legions Rome sent forth to conquer the world. Hence arose, in all past ages, the apparent justification of conquest and the apparent unreality of love: that the effects of ambition and greed were so separated from their causes that the people could not realize that cause and effect are actually one.

But today, cause and effect are no longer mysteriously separated by time, or place, or personality. The material unity of all races and all countries, and their complete interdependence upon one and the same economic organization, has created a condition wherein spiritual motive and material consequence are as inseparable as the heart and the mind of the same man.

There is an old saying about "those who fish in troubled waters" which we can complete by adding the words "must stand on dry land". That is, to profit by others' domination one must stand beyond the consequences of their domination. Today no immunity exists or is possible for any individual or group. For men are no longer associated together as self-sustaining groups, but each community has become an essential wheel or lever in the one world machine—an essential organ or limb in the one body of humanity.

In the light of this new condition let us perceive the sequences in which vision, as cause, becomes reality, as effect.

The origin of love, in evolving humanity, is sympathy, and sympathy is the sharing of the same danger, or suffering, or pain. So long as humanity stood divided from itself, in separate races and religions, so long was sympathy confined in its action to the separate community, and the result of sympathy, love, expressed itself as loyalty to the one nation and the one creed. Therefore love ever resisted and overthrew its own desire, since loyalty to the one nation and the one creed involved opposition to other nations and other creeds. Today, just as injury to one part of a body is injury to all parts, so injury to any portion of humanity has its effects upon all other portions. The very universality of suffering in this age has overthrown the foundations of limited loyalty, and the mutual danger we face through warfare or economic disaster is the pledge of a common sympathy as inevitable as the rising of tomorrow's sun.

If we seek for confirmation of this in one another's spiritual limitations, however, we may seek in vain. For just as an imperfect mirror exaggerates every image, so in our imperfection of thought and love do we tend to confirm each other in our selfishness rather than in our aspiration for the common good. Without some source wherein each may find his own perfection steadfastly set forth, we shall continue as it were in the narrow and endless valley of self, increasing the crisis of modern existence until another and greater war engulf us all.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's spiritual influence alone can overcome the bitterness of suspicion and the habit of hate.

'Abdu'l-Bahá has brought back in its fullness the ancient, the timeless vision of [XIII:10:268] brotherhood, righteousness, peace and love. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has given this vision an expression in word and deed which transcends every limitation of race, of class, of nation and of creed. No community can claim 'Abdu'l-Bahá for their own spiritual leader, and make his inspiration the justification of separateness, as men have done with every spiritual leader of the past. In the divisions of humanity he has arisen as the true centre and point of unity, a mirror reflecting the light of one love and one teaching to every horizon. As each community, seeking relief from its own restrictions and its sufferings, turns to 'Abdu'l-Bahá for guidance, it finds all other communities illumined in the same compassionate love.

When a reporter of the New York Globe visited 'Abdu'l-Bahá at Haifa a few years ago in the course of an investigation of the Zionist movement in Palestine, 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave her this message: "Tell my followers that they have no enemies to fear, no foes to hate. Man's only enemy is himself".

It means nothing how many or how few 'Abdu'l-Bahá's followers may be at this moment here or in other parts of the world. That message was the expression of the reality emerging from the present era of confusion, of trouble, of unrest, of universal change. To receive that message from the lips of 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the time it was uttered is to be forewarned and forearmed; but the message is inescapable, sooner or later, by reason of the actual conditions of the world. 'Abdu'l-Bahá recorded the spiritual evolution that went on behind and within the material evolution of this age. He witnessed for us the victory of faith.

As one considers the strife that is taking place everywhere today, one recalls the ancient story of Atman the king.

One day Atman summoned his four sons to his presence and said:

"My sons, because you expect to share this mighty kingdom after my departure, you are making no effort to develop in yourselves any capacity or any worthiness. As you are my sons I love you, but I also have a duty to my people. Therefore go forth, each of you, into the world, and to him who best proves his worthiness I shall leave the kingdom."

So the four sons went forth, one to the East, one to the West, one to the South, one to the North. And as each had inherited of the father's capacity, so each made a mighty effort to develop worthiness, and each rose to leadership in the country where he lived.

Then having become a leader in his country, each of the four sons remembered his father's promise, and set forth to return to Atman's capital and claim the right of inheritance. So each set forth on the way, bringing with him a mighty following of soldiers and servants that Atman his father might realize how worthy he had become.

Now arriving on the great plain before the gates of the city, each brother beheld the army of the other also arriving, the army of the East with the banner of the dragon, the army of the West with the banner of the eagle, the army of the North with the banner of the bear, and the army of the South with the banner of the palm. But seeing these other banners, each brother thought that hostile armies had gathered to destroy the kingdom of his father Atman, and to defend his father each brother led his army against the other armies on the plain.

By reason of their courage, the four brothers fought at the head of their armies, where the banner was upheld, and in the course of a few hours all the banners were thrown down and the four leaders wounded.

Then the armies, the banners thrown down and the ranks hopelessly intermingled, ceased to fight, and around the four brothers as they lay wounded a circle of mourning soldiers stood in silence.

Then the oldest brother, feeling his heart's blood ebb away, raised his voice in a mighty cry of grief and lamentation:

“O Atman, my father! O my father, Atman the king! Bitter enemies surround thy city, and they shall lay it waste and slay thee in the midst. Gladly have I given life for thee, O my father—alas, that the enemies were too strong and I have died in vain.”

So lamented the eldest brother. And when the other brothers heard him lamenting their father Atman, the king, [XIII:10:269] then they lamented also, and more bitterly even than he, for now they knew that it was no enemy they had fought, but their own brothers they had so blindly attacked and so unwittingly harmed.

Even so the strife in which we are all engaged, even now—strife political, strife economic, strife social, strife religious. This is not an ordinary strife; like the battle of the four brothers, it is the universal combat which precedes mutual recognition and prepares for the Most Great Peace in the hearts of men. For there is no recognition possible between the strangeness of our customs and the intensity of our desires, but recognition is in and through the common fatherhood of God, reconciliation is in and through obedience to the one universal Will.

Let us not be dismayed by this frantic confusion of strife. It is the final and complete expression of divine love, compelling humanity to destroy the foundations of its own injustice and greed. Were there to be no such universally disastrous consequences of age-long injustice, the divine compassion would be entirely absent from the arena of human affairs. This period of universally disastrous consequences is that which they have ever warned humanity, the witnesses of God from age to age. All the spiritual witnesses return in this age of fulfilment. They speak in the voice of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

XIII:10, January 1923 [XIII:10:269]

From the diary of Mirza Ahmad Sohrab

Written in Palestine during the Great War

In the evening, when the believers were sitting in his benign presence, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “All the people are sacrificing their lives for the sake of the worthless (valueless) earth. They are not adorers of God, but worshippers of the ground. Were they giving up their lives in the path of God the results would be everlasting. But now what benefits do they receive? If one soul is martyred for the sake of Truth eternally will he shine from the horizon of glory. Yet, during the last six months probably more than one million living, breathing youths have been left on the battlefields, dead, and soon their names will be forgotten! In a few years who will care to know about them as individuals? The historians of each country will no doubt compile the history of the salient events of this tremendous struggle, for the benefit of the reading public, but the public as a mass is indifferent, heedless and forgetful. Only the noble minds of a few will grasp the general meaning of these world-shaking events.

“Our hope is that the differences will be settled soon and friendly relations based upon sound and permanent foundations will be established.”

An old man passed by. The Master called him and asked after his health. Then he put into the palm of his hand an English pound, and prayed for him thus: “May thy body be at peace, thy mind be at peace, thy thoughts be at peace, thy soul be at peace and thy spirit be at peace.”

When he left, the Master said: “The name of this old man is Rustam Effendi. He has served me in many ways. He has now become very poor. I was looking for an opportunity to help him and this was the proper time.”

While he was talking a carriage stopped in the middle of the street and the stout occupant jumped down and came toward us. He greeted the Master; then, after a few words, he returned to his carriage. [XIII:10:270] The Master said: “This man is As’ad Bey. When we were in ‘Akká years ago he came to me one day and said, ‘Master, I am the most miserable man! I am seeking good fortune but it eludes me at every turn. I long to be prosperous, but ill luck pursues me. If I touch gold it turns into copper. If I hold a green leaf in my hand it becomes sear and yellow. I have lost all my possessions and with them all my faith. Please pray for me that God may help me.’ I gave him some money and, that night, I supplicated at the Holy Threshold of the Blessed Perfection that he might receive assistance. The next day he was offered a government position with a good salary. Then negligence overtook him, and he became so proud that he would not even speak to me. When, later, a Kurdish Mutaşarrif came to ‘Akká he intrigued against us, carried false reports and was even so arrogant as to wish me to offer him a bribe as the price of silence! I did not say anything to him. Later he repented his deeds.”

When we entered the hotel and while we were drinking our coffee the Master spoke about severance from and attachment to the things of this world.

“The realization of these two opposite attitudes in a single individual is very rare. In the Bahá’í Cause it is taught that we must devote the utmost attention to the pursuit of our worldly affairs but at the same time be severed from all else save God. How can the mind and heart be entirely free, and detached from every pursuit, yet occupied with the solution of material problems? This is a most subtle, psychological question. To be in the water and not to get wet; to go through the fire and not to be burned—these are opposite, irreconcilable conditions. Still, in the spiritual world these two antipodes must meet and the two qualities of severance and attachment must be harmoniously combined.”

On our return home there was quite a large meeting of the believers and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “I went out to return the morning call of the German officer. While I was there the Gaemmagam entered the room. According to what they said hundreds of thousands of people have been killed during the past few months. What cruel minds there are! What demoniacal hearts are found! What diabolical thoughts are portrayed! What devilish engines are at work! What black souls are discovered! What satanic schemes are unearthed! What dark imaginations are brooding over infernal plans! All their demoniacal policies work for the destruction of the conqueror and the conquered. The countries of both sides are laid waste. The people of the opposing nations are butchered. The homes of the governments are ruined and civilization on both sides is annihilated.”

It was still raining when we rode away and picked up Mírzá Muḥsin at the other end of the town. There was a heavy sea rolling and the clean sandy beach was constantly being washed by the huge waves. The sight was sublime. Many Arabs, both men and women were walking along, bare-foot, and carrying on their backs heavy loads. There was one especially interesting, an Amazonian-looking woman who carried a bed on her head, a large mat rolled up and tied to her shoulders and a child in her arms. The Master was amused to see this because the woman was entirely unmindful of her load and trudged along perfectly happy and unconcerned.

The Master said: “There are certain forms of work which are beyond human endurance and others which are within it; and these differ greatly according to the early environment and training of each individual. For example, Mírzá Muḥsin here, could not walk bare-footed, as these Arabs do, on such a rainy day as this. He would catch cold and be in bed for a month. But the Arabs go through it day after day and grow healthier and stronger. The struggling, winning, successful man is he who accustoms himself to the accomplishment of those things which are considered to be beyond human endurance. Only a soul thus great can stand the tests of life and come out of the crucible pure and unspotted. (But) if one cannot rise to this height he can [XIII:10:271] at least school himself to perform the tasks which are within the range of his endurance. If a man cannot qualify in one of these two classes he becomes a social burden.”

This morning the Master sat for some hours in the delightful warm sunshine. Many stopped and talked with him. He inspired everyone to be firm and calm in these trying days. His cheerful voice went straight to the hearts and caused sad faces to smile and laugh—even while the warship was slowly passing before us. At noon Shaykh Šálih took dinner with us. He says he will not leave ‘Akká until he can take the Master with him to Abú-Sinán.

In the afternoon we were all summoned into the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Meanwhile the Commissioner of Police was ushered into the room also. In the course of the conversation ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “The citizens of a country are like the various members and organs of the body. So long as the brain and the nervous system are co-ordinate in their functions there will be no jar in the constitution. But when they fall out of harmony great disturbances become manifest. In like manner, when the government represents ideals of progress and justice the people will advance and progress in their activities. Ideal co-operation will bind together the hearts and strike at the root of poverty for preventable poverty is a source of all misery and evil. The rulers must be filled with mercy and solicitude for the condition of the unfortunates.”

Because this is Christmas eve I cannot entertain you better than to relate to you some of the charming stories which fell from the lips of the Master this evening:

“When I was in Mázindarán I was a wee bit of a child and enjoyed all the fun and play belonging to that age. In our town we had a man by the name of Áqá Raḥím who was the overseer of our shepherds. One day he came to our house and asked my mother to let him take me to a country barbecue to be given by the shepherds. After some urging on his part permission was granted, and I was glad of the chance to take part in an outdoor entertainment.

“Áqá Raḥím took me with him and soon we were out in the country. He led me through green valleys and beautiful pastures till we reached the foot of a lofty mountain. Here we had to walk through a narrow defile and then by a zig-zag road and with much difficulty slowly to ascend to the summit. When we arrived at the top I was surprised to find myself on a vast, verdant, tableland which was no other than the pastureland of our cattle. I still feel the exhilarating breeze which greeted my cheeks on that clear day!

“Exclusive of horses and cows there were about four thousand head of sheep and goats belonging to us, while a few thousand more were the property of other owners. But all were grazing peacefully on this broad plateau. It was a most charming, ideal, pastoral scene and, from afar, I could see many shepherds and shepherdesses. We rode on a few minutes longer and then, under a spacious bower I was welcomed by some eighty or more shepherds who were clamouring to salute me. They were all dressed in their best clothes for this was a gala day. To me it was a noble and attractive sight.

“On that morning about fifteen sheep had been killed and prepared in the cool-flowing spring near by; then the shepherds had stuck them on long iron rods to be roasted. Huge, spectacular campfires were burning and while the sheep were roasting the shepherds sang folk songs and danced their charming peasant dances. When noon came they all sat on the green grass and feasted, with extraordinary appetites, upon the well-seasoned, toothsome meat. ...

“When evening drew nigh and the hour of our leave-taking approached all the shepherds gathered around us and in their farewell speeches hinted that they expected me to give them some gifts as is customary with the landlords in these parts. I asked Áqá Raḥím what it was all about and told him that as I was such a little child they should not expect me to make gifts and, moreover, I had brought nothing with me. Áqá Raḥím replied: ‘This will not do. You are the [XIII:10:272] master of all these shepherds and I do not like to think what they will say if you leave this place without giving them something.’

“I was indeed in a dilemma but after thinking a moment the idea came to me to give each shepherd a few sheep from our own flocks. I communicated the idea to the overseer who was rather pleased with it; and it was announced in a solemn tone, and immediately acted upon. When at last we reached home, and my act of generosity was related to the Blessed Perfection, he laughed very much over it and said: ‘We must appoint a guardian to protect Áqá—master—from his own liberality; else, some day, he may give himself away’.”

Spiritual meetings

Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Regarding arrangements for the Bahá’í Sunday meeting for the purpose of worship, this is very suitable that first, prayer should be chanted and supplication made until all gather; then communion should be made. After praying, sacred readings with melodious voices should be read by all together.

Thou hast written concerning the spiritual meeting. The spiritual meeting must be in the utmost state of ecstasy and tumult. The supplications must be perused, the Tablets and Verses be read, eloquent speeches be delivered, divine proofs be explained, the audience be encouraged to enter into the Kingdom of God, news received from different parts be read and in the end they may read all together, a supplication.

The founding of these spiritual meetings is purely for the purpose of teaching; but, as the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár is not yet founded, therefore in the spiritual meetings verses are chanted, supplications and communes offered and discourses delivered. However, when the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár is organized the spiritual meetings will be devoted especially to teaching, and the place of worship will become focalized in the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár.

This Cause is proclaimed through eloquent, sincere addresses. We must unloose the tongue, spread the fragrances of God, diffuse the words of God. We must present to the public the proofs and evidences of this Cause with a tongue of fire so that souls may be exhilarated, minds become full of tumult and acclamation. With words of love and illumination we must set hearts aglow with the fire of the love of God, enkindle minds with the power of the Kingdom. We must explain the teachings orally so that hearts may become like pure fountains, the invisible inspirations may descend, the bounties of the Holy Spirit may be revealed, the rays of the Sun of Reality may shine; the breezes of the Paradise of Abhá may waft and the glad tidings of the Kingdom of Abhá may be announced.

A story from the words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

When the Blessed Perfection (Bahá’u’lláh) was exiled from Baghdád the large number of believers who went with him divided the work of the party among them. For example, Darvish Šidq-‘Alí and Hájí Ibráhím acted as equerries, Ustád Muḥammad ‘Alí looked after the baggage, Mírzá Muḥammad Qulí supervised the pitching of the tents and I was, if we may here use a military term, a commissary officer and had to supply the party, including horses, etc., with food and the daily necessities. Often, by day or by night we covered a distance of from twenty-five to thirty miles. No sooner would we reach a caravanserai than from sheer fatigue everyone would lie down and go to sleep: utter exhaustion having overtaken everybody they would be unable even to move.

But Mírzá Maḥmúd and Áqá Riḍá rested not for a moment. After our arrival they would immediately become engaged in cooking for this party of nearly seventy-two people—and this after their arduous work of guiding all day or all night the horses which carried the palanquin of the Blessed Perfection. When the meal was cooked and made ready all those who had slept would wake, eat and go to sleep again. These two men would then wash all the dishes and pack them up. By this time they would be so tired that they could have slept on even a hard boulder.

During the journey when they became utterly weary they would sleep while walking. Now and again I would see one of them take a bound and leap from one point to another. It would then become apparent that he was asleep and had dreamed that he had reached a wide creek—hence the jump.

In a word, from Baghdád to Sámsún they served with rare faithfulness. Indeed no human being had the fortitude to bear cheerfully all this heavy labour. But, because they were kindled (by the spirit of God) they performed all these services with greatest happiness. I remember how, in the early morning, when [XIII:10:278] we wanted to start for another caravanserai, we often saw these two men fast asleep. We would go and shake them and they would wake with much difficulty. While walking they always chanted communes and supplications.

In those days a famine raged all along the road. When we reached a station Mírzá Ja‘far and I would ride from one village to another, from one Arab or Kurdish tent to another trying to get food, straw, barley, etc., for men and animals. Many a time we were out till midnight.

One day we happened to call on a Turk who was harvesting. Seeing his large pile of straw we thought we had come to the end of our search. I approached the Turk politely, and said, “We are your guests and one of the conditions of (religious) Faith is to honour the newly arrived guests. I have heard that you are a very liberal people, very generous, and that whenever you entertain a guest you kill and cook for him a whole sheep. Now, we desire such and such a thing, and are ready to pay any price that you demand. We hope this is sufficiently reasonable.”

He thought for a moment, and then said, “Open your sack.”

Mírzá Ja‘far opened it and he put into it a few handfuls of straw.

I was amused, and said, “Oh, my friend! What can we do with this straw? We have thirty-six animals and we want feed for every one of them!”

In brief, everywhere we encountered many difficulties, until we arrived in Khárpút. Here, we saw that our animals had become lean, and walked with great difficulty. But we could not get straw and barley for them.

At Khárpút the Acting Governor-General came to call on us—and with him brought ten car-loads of rice, ten sacks of barley, ten sheep, several baskets of rice, several bags of sugar, many pounds of butter, etc. These were sent as gifts by the Governor-General, ‘Izzat Páshá, to the Blessed Perfection.

After our experiences, and knowing how difficult it was to get anything from the farmers along the way—when I looked at these things I knew that they were sent from God, and they were gladly accepted.

At that time Áqá Husayn-i-Áshchí was the assistant cook. He worked day and night and had no time to sleep.

We stayed at Khárpút one week and had a good rest. For two days and nights I did nothing but sleep.

The Governor-General, ‘Izzat Páshá, called on the Blessed Perfection. He was a very good man and showed much love and service.—Recorded by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab.

On Mount Carmel

“The Garden of God”

Miss Genevieve L. Coy, after a wonderful visit in the Holy Land, in Constantinople and among the Bahá’í groups along the way, and notwithstanding the many rigors of the journey arrived the last of September in Ṭíhrán to begin her work of service there. She writes of the marvellous kindness of the friends in the many cities and of the wonderful bond between the Orient and Occident which has been established by the Bahá’í teachings. Describing her visit in Haifa, Miss Coy writes:

Pilgrim House, Haifa; Palestine.

Palestine in the beginning of summer is a very different country from Palestine in late August. Green fields, many flocks of black goats, many herds of black and white cattle, herdsmen in tattered garments, flash past one as the train goes northward. Trees with long green leaves, along some small brook—white melons ripening in the fields—the blue, blue sea breaking in whitest foam on the yellow sand! And then the curve of Mount Carmel, ‘Akká white in a misty distance, and the Tomb of the Báb on the mountainside. It all seems a dream from which I must awaken soon—to be here again in this blessed land! The air is fragrant with many flowers, the breeze is cool and sweet—God’s peace breathes about one.

At the station many people lined the track. Suddenly I saw a hand waved and Mírzá Luṭfu’lláh was at the car-window. It was so good to see him! Outside the train another young Bahá’í, who clerks at the station, joined us for a moment, then went back to his work. We found a carriage—and again I was carried up the steep streets to the beloved Pilgrim House.

To come back to the Pilgrim House is to come back home. Its dear peace and quiet fill one’s heart. I love its high-ceilinged rooms—the faint fragrance that greets one—the cleanliness—the tiled [XIII:10:283] floors, the beautiful rugs. As I sit here writing I can see the top of the Master’s house, above the wall. The two gateways are covered with a riot of bougainvillea, masses of dark-red blossoms, hundreds of them, almost hide the green leaves. If I stand at the window I can look up to the Tomb and the Musáfir Kháníh, halfway up the mountainside.

Mírzá Luṭfu’lláh and I left the Pilgrim House at six o’clock, and climbed up the Mountain of the Lord, to the Tomb. The morning was beautifully fresh and clear. The sun was high in the heavens when we reached the Tomb—but the garden looked delightfully fresh and green and cool.

The caretaker of the Tomb, ‘Abbás Qulí, came and opened the door into the Tomb of the Báb, and then into the room that is the Master’s. We left our shoes at the door, and entered first the Tomb of the Báb. To be again in that place, at that threshold in prayer—what words can tell what it means to one’s heart and spirit? It is so perfectly natural and easy to pray there. One’s prayer knows no weariness. One realizes God so near, that one needs make no effort to find Him. “Love divine, all love excelling” becomes the supreme reality. Prayer for all the friends in America, all the Bahá’ís, prayer with all the devotion of my spirit for the dear ladies of the Master’s household and for Shoghi Effendi, that the divine love may bring them perfect comfort and spiritual joy!

And then we went into that room which I had never before entered—the Master’s shrine. In physical furnishings it is like that of the Báb. The outer room is slightly larger, I think, and the outer door is not directly in line with the inner door. Lovely rugs are on the floor, copies of one or two Tablets are on the walls. I stood at the outer doorway a long time, trying to realize the meaning of the place to which I had come. Then I knelt at the inner threshold a moment—afterwards a little away from it. Mírzá Luṭfu’lláh placed on the threshold the jasmine flowers that he had brought in from the garden. We prayed silently for a long time. The Master’s spirit dwells there in peace and love. What one feels, or how, I do not know. It is the triumph of life. I suppose for those who were here at the Master’s funeral, who saw his body laid in that room, there must be associations of great sadness and loneliness with that spot—but for those who come to Haifa to find his love and his service in the lives of the friends, for those the Tomb of the Master is a place of joy. One knows as never before the victory of life that never ceases, but only changes its form. Words cannot suggest it. It is one of the gifts of God that He sends to those who long for union with the Beloved One.

When we left the Tomb, ‘Abbás Qulí asked us to come to his house for tea. He took us up to the top of the house to the little room that was built especially for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. It has windows north, south, and west and a door to the east; from each there is a wonderful view. To the north, the bay and ‘Akká; to the east, the valley of “Achor”; to the south, the slopes of Mount Carmel, where the girls’ school is to be built; to the west, the Tomb. Here, in this little room the Master used to stay; often at night the friends would hear him walking about on the house-top, chanting. Here he used to receive the notables of the town and country. In the room is the bed the Master used to use, and also the chair, in which he used to sit out in front of the Tomb, when meetings were held there. Above the bed are now hung many pictures of the Master, alone, and with groups of friends. ‘Abbás Qulí talked to us for quite a long time about the Master and the days he had spent there near the Tomb. He told about the building of that upper room. The Master had said that he would like a room there near the Tomb. He asked ‘Abbás Qulí if he could not build him one, and the care-taker of the Tomb said, yes, where would the Master like to have it. The Master suggested that he would like to have it on the top of the house. ‘Abbás Qulí said that the walls of the house were not strong enough to have another story built on top of them. Then the Master said that he would like to have it built in the garden, or above the Tomb. ‘Abbás Qulí said that much excavation would be required for that. Finally the [XIII:10:284] Master said, “Never mind; do not trouble about it.” Not long after that one of the friends had built for the Master a little room on top of the stable, at the Master’s house. Then the Master said to ‘Abbás Qulí, “Could you not build a house like that on the roof?” and he said “Oh, yes.” The Master said, “But I thought that you told me you could not build a room on top of your house!” So ‘Abbás Qulí said, “But a small room like that would have thin walls, and that could easily be built.” The Master smiled and said, “Very good!” and so the room was built.

‘Abbás Qulí has a most radiant smile! As he talked of the Master he smiled all the time! He made me feel the joy of the Master, even when he was speaking Persian, and I did not know what he said. He spoke quite slowly, and I could occasionally understand a word that gave me the trend of his thought. He said that the Master said that he had seen many wonderful views in his travels in Europe and America, but that none of them were as beautiful as the view from his little room on top of ‘Abbás Qulí’s house!

Corinne True

One of the beautiful lessons given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá when we were about to leave his prison home in ‘Akká, Syria, 1907, after six heavenly days spent in that sacred spot—from the outside a Prison, but inside a Paradise:—to leave the home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and go back to the world and its people seemed very, very difficult, once having partaken of its heavenly atmosphere and quaffed from the wine of true brotherhood. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá saw from the tears which simply would flow in rivulets from our eyes that the task was hard for us, so he told us that when we went back to the world “we must look upon every human being we saw as a letter from the Beloved to us.” “No matter,” said the dear Master, “how blotted, blurred, torn or soiled that letter appears to be, nevertheless, you must look upon it with the eye of reality and say to yourself, this is a letter from my Beloved, therefore, because it is from Him, I must love it with that divine love and overlook all its defects—inasmuch as the Beloved wrote it.” It must be our love and devotion to God, the Beloved, that gives us a sin covering eye and welcomes all as the children of the One Heavenly Father.

Message from Shoghi Effendi

This is the morning of the fourth day in the glorious unfolding of the Bahá’í Cause. Our brothers in Baghdád have brought this out most beautifully in the Persian section of this issue. With the Báb, in Persia, there dawned the first morning of the new day of unity. When he was martyred night fell upon the Cause. Then Bahá’u’lláh arose and the sun dawned in full glory. When he departed from this world there fell upon his followers the night of sorrow and separation. Again the sun dawned, in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and a wonderful new day blazed forth. With ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s passing night fell once more upon the sorrowing hearts of his friends. But the radiant morning of the fourth day has now broken in glory. The sun of unity and peace has dawned from Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Cause. After a six months’ absence he returned to the Holy Land and sends all the Bahá’í friends in America the following beautiful message:

“The onward march of the Cause hath not been nor can it ever be stayed. I pray the Almighty that my efforts now refreshed and renewed may with your undiminished support lead it to glorious victory.”—Cablegram sent 16 December 1922.¹

Our trip to Haifa in the summer of 1922

Stanwood Cobb

As many friends have considered it hazardous to undertake a trip to Palestine and the Near East in the summer, it may be of interest to give our experiences. Of course we should have preferred the winter for such a journey, but like many others we were free only in the summer months and we determined to take advantage of our opportunity in spite of climatic disadvantages.

First a word as to route. We found it impossible to get any definite information in this country concerning routes, sailings, and prices, through to Haifa; and even in London information was difficult to get and inaccurate. Therefore we will here share our information, acquired through difficult experience.

There are lines that sail directly from New York to the Near East; but they are Greek lines, with small boats and infrequent sailings, and this route is not to my mind advisable.

The quickest way to reach Haifa (also the most agreeable and as inexpensive as any) is as follows: by boat to England or the Continent; by rail across the Continent to Trieste; by boat to Alexandria; by rail from Alexandria to Haifa. The time consumed is as follows: New York to the Continent, from six to eleven days, according to the boat; across the Continent to Trieste, one to two days; Trieste to Alexandria (by express boats of the Lloyd Tristine which has weekly sailings, or by express boats of the Servizime Italiano which has bi-weekly sailings), three to four days; by rail from Alexandria to Haifa, one and a half days. Minimum time from New York to Haifa, twelve days. Minimum expense, about six hundred dollars round trip. Boat fares are rapidly coming down and next summer the same trip probably would cost less than five hundred dollars.

As to summer climate in the Near East, I will say that we were agreeably surprised to find how comfortable travel was under such conditions. We were not in the least made uncomfortable by the heat nor did we suffer any unhealthful effects from it, except in Haifa itself which has a bad summer climate. One should never move hurriedly in the Near East, nor expose oneself to the sun any more than is absolutely necessary. One should avoid native water and some uncooked foods such as salads. One should conserve one's energy. By following these rules one may travel in safety and comfort in Egypt and Palestine in mid-summer. In [XIII:11:295] fact, our train ride from Egypt to Haifa and return was most cool and comfortable, much more so than many a train in America in the summer season.

A trip to the Near East, apart from the glorious privilege of visiting Haifa, is most fascinating. Life is so different in the Orient, and the Orientals have many truths to teach us. Their simplicity of life, their calm and placid demeanour under almost all circumstances, their nearness to God, are qualities which the Western world must also acquire if it is to maintain its sanity and health.

These qualities are of course to be found in the highest degree in the Oriental Bahá'ís, who radiate peace and joy and love. It is always an inspiration to meet the Oriental friends; and they seem to feel an equal joy in meeting us. This joy that comes from the mingling and sympathetic union of the East and of the West is one of the great blessings that God has reserved for this marvellous century. It has never been attained before. It is like two destined lovers who have grown up in utter ignorance of each other, yet all the time acquiring those complementary qualities which are to make their coming union rich and happy.

On the other hand, the time has come when the unfriendly relation which from time immemorial has existed between the East and the West must cease. Ever since the conquests of Alexander the Great the Western world has sought to dominate the East by force, cruelly exploiting it and waxing fat and luxurious from the industry and labour of the Asiatics. This is the century of justice between all men and all races; and a spirit is rising in the East which will eventually change this Western dominance. We were aware of this spirit in Egypt and Palestine and Syria. Persia is alive with it. From friends who have visited India we get the same story. And events in Asia Minor are but precursors of the embarrassment of Europe if it persists in trying to dominate Asia.

This spirit, which disquiets most Occidentals and which has given rise to much alarmist literature, serves only as an inspiration to Bahá'ís who see in it the signs of the dawning of a new day.

Likewise events in Europe show a condition desperate to the ordinary observation. So great are the hatreds now existing between the different races of Europe that it would seem as if nothing but [XIII:11:296] another great war could be the outcome. One person said to Mrs Cobb, "We hate the whole world!" She asked, "Do you hate Americans?" "Yes!" was his answer, more honest than tactful.

A Rumanian lady, for some years a resident of this country, whom we met in the compartment of the train from Vienna to Paris, then on her way back to America after a rather unsatisfactory visit to her native town, told us most graphically of the hatreds between the neighbouring little countries of the Balkan peninsula. So much do the Hungarians dislike the Rumanians, and vice-versa, that either race when travelling in the other country finds it wise to disguise its nationality. If this be so, how great must be the hatred between Greeks and Bulgarians, and especially, between Greeks and Turks!

The despair in the conquered countries is terrible. A well dressed lady, widow of an Austrian officer, spoke to us bitterly of the desolate life now confronting her. Not only were living conditions almost unendurable, but in the present chaotic economic state of central Europe for which no relief is in sight, what future could she look forward to for her boy of fourteen? For what profession should she train him? The outlook was equally dismal for all the customary professions.

To me this seems the greatest tragedy of all, that no hope for improvement and amelioration lies in the rising generation. For their children, parents see nothing but the darkest outlook.

I would not thus dwell upon the gloom in Europe, were it not to Bahá'í vision a sign of the fulfilment of the prelude to the coming of the Kingdom; and a most clear demonstration that nothing but the power of the love of God can save the world. For as Buddha said, "Verily, not by hatred does hatred cease, but only by love does hatred cease." And 'Abdu'l-Bahá has told us so many times that only the power of the Holy Spirit working in the hearts of men can bring about peace and restore prosperity to the world.

As for our nine days in Haifa, they were days naturally full of spiritual inspiration. I was especially privileged in visiting on several occasions the Holy Family, a favour not hitherto granted to male pilgrims to Haifa. They told us intimate details of the life and passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá;—how he refused every comfort which his family tried to secure for his last days, how upon his death he had hardly one change of clothing. Anything above this amount of clothing he had always given away. Thus his life stands out as a beacon light, pointing to others the way of service.

We made many visits and prayers at the tombs of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and of the Báb. From the beautiful garden surrounding the tombs we looked down the mountain side to the sea, already perceiving in our imagination the glorious parkway which shall one day rise from the Mediterranean to the Holy Tombs. Even now the authorities of Haifa are planning to construct such a boulevard, thus fulfilling the prophecy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

The information conveyed to us by a Jewish girl, a Zionist from Jerusalem whom we met on the train and talked with at some length, gave us an inspiring vision of what Haifa will attain to in the not far distant future, if the Jewish plans for the development of Palestine are carried out. Haifa they intend to make the chief port of the eastern Mediterranean surpassing Beirut and rivalling Alexandria and Constantinople. Haifa is situated much more advantageously for trade with the vast hinterland of Mesopotamia than is Beirut or any other city of Syria or Palestine. It has splendid possibilities as a harbour. The plan is to make a vast sea-wall and construct great docks at which the largest of ships can unload.

Not only will Haifa flourish but all Palestine, under the impetus given by Jewish energy and capital. An irrigation project is already under way which will embrace practically all of Palestine and make it blossom like the rose. Under the protection of Great Britain Jewish capital will more and more flow to Palestine, and within this generation it will undoubtedly become one of the garden spots of the world. Thus is prophecy fulfilled. [XIII:11:297]

I will mention two experiences while at Haifa, experiences of the inner spiritual life which I shall never forget. One of these experiences came from the extraordinary privilege I had, while visiting the Bahjí or tomb of Bahá'u'lláh, of sitting in the armchair in the chamber of Bahá'u'lláh, where 'Abdu'l-Bahá so often sat looking out over the plains of 'Akká to the sea. For just a minute I sat in this chair, and for just that minute I was abstracted from all worldly sensation and lifted to the plane of the Kingdom. Such a heavenly peace flowed about me as I had never experienced before, not even when in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's presence. It was a feeling not only of peace but of exaltation, as being above the distractions and anxieties and dangers of this world. Clearly I was on another plane of being, though physically upon this earth. It was such a wonderful experience that I silently beckoned my wife, who was sitting on the couch, to exchange places with me. While in the armchair, she felt this same uplift and supreme happiness. On the couch we both had, on the other hand, merely the feeling of spiritual peace such as belongs to this earth plane at its best. Truly we had for that supreme moment rested with heavenly souls upon the fields of God. No wonder that martyrs sing as they approach the moment of their release from the cage of life!

The other experience that I referred to was that of beholding for the first time the photograph of Bahá'u'lláh. As I gazed upon his countenance, so massive and so full of majesty and power, I felt that adoration and devotion which led men to become his humble followers while he was a prisoner in a penal colony, and which inspired these ardent followers to spread his gospel throughout the world,—“with a thousand longings sacrificing themselves to the Eternal Beloved.”

It was not a feeling of personal devotion which swept over me. It was rather an awe and worship of the majesty of the law which Bahá'u'lláh personified. As I looked into that Face I perceived the import and power of that Message which he brought for the healing of the nations. I realized that his laws were divine laws, [XIII:11:298] as were those of Moses, only far greater and destined to be the foundation of a divine civilization. Before the awful majesty of such a law, as incarnated in Bahá'u'lláh, one could but prostrate oneself, body and soul; and feel that the greatest privilege this life afforded was to work to help bring this civilization to pass.

Such was the power of Bahá'u'lláh, conveyed even through a photograph. And when his sacred shoes were put into my hands I heard as it were the footsteps of them echoing around the world, the footsteps of One from the mountain-top bearing good news. I had prayed at the tomb of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to have a clearer realization of the station of Bahá'u'lláh. My prayer had been graciously answered.

The day will come when every jot and tittle of this Law will be worshipped by mankind, not only because of its divine origin, but because it will have been the means of bringing to this world the happiest and most perfect civilization it has ever known.

The Knighting of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

The following beautiful description of this event was written by Dr Dīyá' M. Baghdádí who was at that time in Haifa:

“Among the kings and governments of the world who have become convinced that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the well-wisher and the lover of mankind are King George and his government. The King sent a medal to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá with the title, “Sir”, thus making him a member of his household. On the 27 April 1920, the Governor and high officials of Haifa, Palestine presented in a beautiful garden a most wonderful celebration for the knighting of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Bahá’í pilgrims from Persia, America and all parts of the world were present. Muslim, Christian, Jewish leaders, clergymen, notables and local officials from Haifa, ‘Akká and other towns attended. A tent was pitched in the centre of the garden. English troops stood on both sides, from the gate of the garden to the centre where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was seated. The military music added wonderful melody to the rustling leaves of the beautiful trees. The breezes of the spring on that sunny afternoon imparted a remarkable vigour to the physical body just as the presence of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá strengthened the souls. The Governor stood behind ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and, after a short speech, interpreted by Mr Wadí’ Bustání, presented the medal. Then ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, rising from his seat, gave a brief talk and a prayer for the British government.”

An epistle of Bahá’u’lláh

O thou Muḥammad! Rejoice in thy soul because of that which hath descended upon thee— a book, holy and priceless within which is that which severeth thee from the kingdom of heaven and earth and leadeth thee to the threshold of manifest glory.

Say: Glory be unto Thee! O God! My God! Thou seest my weakness, my helplessness, my distress and my poverty. Therefore send Thou to me from the fragrances of Thy holiness that which, though it be no larger than an ant, will, if it breathes upon (those that are) first and last, transform them into kings of Thy luminous beauty and honour them with the light of Thy manifest countenance.

O my God! I am he who hath held firmly to Thy strong support in Thy flawless and wonderful Word and hath grasped the hem of Thy bounty in Thy Name, the Supreme, the Exalted, the Omniscient. Therefore, O my God! as Thou hast honoured me with Thy meeting and hast acquainted me with the Manifestation of Thy Self deprive me not of the river of paradise which Thou hast caused to flow by the right side of Thy exalted Throne and withhold me not, O my God! from attaining to Thy inaccessible grace and Thy ancient favour which descendeth from the clouds of Thy exalted mercy.

Say: O people! In the name of God the True One! The First Point (the Báb) hath appeared in this Word, were ye of those who know. The fire of oneness hath become apparent in this high tree which overshadoweth all living beings.

Say: Verily, the Holy Spirit hath appeared in a new garment.

Say: Verily, the rod (of Moses) in this white and luminous hand is uttering praises.

Say: Verily, the beauty of God hath been sent forth from the veil of light Exalted is God, the King of Kings!

Say: Verily, the veil of mystery hath been torn asunder and the Youth hath appeared from the dawning point of His Name, the Merciful, the Compassionate. This is He who hath not been comprehended by the knowledge of anyone nor by the wisdom of those who have attained. He speaketh now from the vault of heaven summoning all in the heavens and earth; announcing to all the glad tidings of the rose garden of God and calling them to a holy and praiseworthy station.

Say: Whosoever doth not purify his heart from the veils of imitations will never be in the presence of this shining and exalted countenance.

O Muḥammad! Soar thou in this atmosphere with the wings of severance and fear no one. Trust in God, thy Lord, the Bountiful, the Mighty, the Omnipotent. Turn not to anyone, even if harm should befall thee from all living beings. Summon the people to God and to that which hath been revealed in the Book of Bayán and be thou not of those who fear.

Say: O people! Fear God! Obey the laws of God with body and soul and be not of the heedless lest negligence take you away from the point of nearness.

Say: Glory be unto Thee, O God! My God! I ask Thee by Thy Name by which Thou dost wipe out disobedience with forgiveness and changest punishment into mercy and dost usher the guilty into the tent of Thy glorious pardon: permit me not to be alone, for less than an instant, even. Sever not the rope of Thy favour. Debar me not from His meeting in the day wherein the eyes are dazzled, the minds of the wise are perplexed and the feet of the well informed slip. [XIII:11:301]

O my God! Thou art He who hath ever been the King and the Creator of the universe, the Ruler and the Maker of living beings. Thou art He whose mercy surpasseth all things and whose favour is greater than all that is in heaven and earth. Verily, Thou art the Omnipotent, the Mighty, the Supreme, the Beloved, the Wise. Therefore, O my God! I am sheltered by Thy dominion and power and protected by Thy grace and favour. Deprive me not of Thy mercy and favour and keep me not from the rose garden of Thy love and mentioning.

Verily, Thou art the Omnipotent, the Beloved, and to Thy servants Thou art the Clement!

Seven cities in the spiritual journey to God

Compiled from an Address by Jináb-i-Fáḍil

Bahá'u'lláh wrote two books each of which he called The Seven Valleys. They were revealed at the request of an Islamic philosopher, one of the Súfís. This man was attracted to the Cause when Bahá'u'lláh was living at Sámarrá. He asked Bahá'u'lláh many questions and many epistles were revealed in reply to these questions. The Persian Seven Valleys has been translated into English. It is the untranslated Arabic one which I will explain to you.

The title of this book is The Seven Cities. It describes the spiritual journey of those who wish to approach God. It begins in this way:

"O thou traveller in the path of justice! O ye who are gazing toward the beauty of God! Your letter has been received. I carefully read your questions and heard the melodies which emanated from the tabernacle of your heart. The clouds of the will of God are rising that the rain of wisdom may shower upon you and wash away that which you have received from others." That is to say, you will be purified from previous ideas and inclinations and prejudices; your attitude will be changed and you will be led to the oneness of the mind of God and guided to the holy law of God in order that you may drink from this eternal river and your soul may become tranquil, your thirst may be quenched, your heart be made ready and you may become one of those who are lighted by the illumination of God.

I Investigation

If the traveller wishes to accomplish this journey and attain to the mysteries of God and pass through all these stages of God he must first of all enter into the City of Investigation.

When he enters this city of Search or Investigation he must sever himself from everything but God. He must become selfless and lose his will in the will of God, must pass over everything which is in earth and heaven. There must be in his heart no hatred of anyone neither especial attachment to anyone. That is to say, he must love all humanity impartially, not having special love for special people since this love or hatred might prevent him from attaining to reality.

Another thing which is incumbent upon the traveller is that he should purify [XIII:11:302] himself from pride, selfishness and ambition. He must never show any sign of selfishness; he must not be proud of his education, his property or position. When he has characterized himself with these attributes he will then arrive at the City of the Investigation of God. All that he asks God will there make manifest and will show to him His many paths. God will make His illumined path clear to him for He says: "Those who are endeavouring to find us and are searching after Us according to the aforementioned conditions, it will be Our intention to make Ourselves known to them."

The traveller who starts out upon this journey will see many changes along the way. The wonders of God and the mysteries of creation will become manifest to him and he will be informed concerning the path of God and the path of guidance. This is the first city, the City of Search and Investigation, and the requirement for this city is perfect severance—severance from all save God.

II Love

If we become purified from love and hatred then we can enter into the City of Love.

In this place the divine zephyrs of God will waft upon the traveller; his heart will become filled with the love of God to such an extent that he will completely forget his personal self and will know nothing save God. He will entirely forget himself and his own personality. Sometimes he is grieving because of separation and is burning and blazing with the fire of supplication. Sometimes he is joyous and happy. Sometimes he is grieving; sometimes discouraged and restless; sometimes perplexed and agitated. He is anxiously awaiting his especial command from God—waiting with all his heart and soul—that he may sacrifice his soul and body in the path of God. If we greatly persecute him he will take it with utmost joy and happiness. He will live in such a state that he will kiss the hands of his executioners, and is ever ready to sacrifice his life and property in the path of God. If he be thrown headlong into the fire he will be cold; if drowned in the ocean he will be dry. This is the station of the love of God. These are the attributes of the one who has attained to the City of Search and has entered into the City of Love.

Question: "Will not the traveller have a definite object, in the Manifestation of God as the object of his love?"

Answer: Some persons pass rapidly through these seven valleys. He who searches for Truth, who longs to know right from wrong, seeks to find God's Manifestation for he realizes his inability to understand God's Essence. He knows there can be no salvation without the Manifestation of God. He wishes to find the mystery of Manifestation, to grasp the Centre of Lights. Then he becomes a lover of Truth.

III Unity

The third city is the City of Divine Oneness. When man's heart becomes filled with love then he sees oneness; he does not see differences. He sees that all things and all objects are looking toward one centre. He sees unity among mankind. He sees unity among the Manifestations of God. He sees unity and amity among the friends of God and he sees one underlying principle of unity in the teachings of God. He sees nothing but union in union; he does not see differences. He gazes upon everything in existence with respect and homage because he considers all as existing in God, as signs of Divinity. He sees the rays of the Manifestation of God enveloping all the world of existence. He is never haughty toward anyone. He never magnifies himself. At every instant he feels himself living by the power of the Almighty God. He does not wish for himself what he does not wish for others. He does not say to others what he does not wish said to himself. This is the station of oneness. Such persons are sailing in the ark of guidance. The rays of the beauty of God are manifest in their faces and we can inhale the fragrances of God from their words. These are the characteristics of those who have attained to this city. [XIII:11:303]

IV Amazement

After the third valley, the valley of Oneness, there comes the valley of Amazement and Surprise. When man reaches this stage he is filled with wonder at the world of God. He is submerged in the world of God, is unconscious of himself. This is the state of amazement.

There were in 'Akká a large number of people who were amazed because of the beauty of the Beloved (which Bahá'u'lláh revealed to them). They would get up three hours before dawn and would walk around the house of Bahá'u'lláh many times. Then, when the time for the meeting arrived, Bahá'u'lláh would call them in and talk with them. They were like lovers who were lost in the beauty of God the Beloved. They were amazed. There are people now who have attained to this station.

V Selflessness

After this stage there comes the City of Selflessness. In this city man dies in the will of God. That is, his selfish personality dies away. He forgets himself, forgets his body and soul and swims in the ocean of selflessness. He becomes unconscious of himself, of his personal existence. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh states that the mysteries of this city of selflessness are myriad for this is the city of the evanescence of the lover in the Beloved. When we reach the city of selflessness then the beauty of the Beloved becomes manifest to us. Unless we are selfless we cannot see that reality. If self is forgotten then reality will take the place of self.

VI Immortality

After this city or valley comes the City of Immortality, where the traveller forgets his will. He wishes only what God wishes. The attributes of God will clearly appear within him. His life will become a divine life.

VII The unseen

After the station of Immortality comes the station of the Unseen, or of Invisibility. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh says that this invisible city is an unfathomable and limitless ocean. This is the world of the Divine Attributes. The Sun of the Unseen dawns from this Dawning-Place of Invisibility. Bahá'u'lláh says that this is a vast city and very few have entered this city; and no one knows anything about this city of the Unseen save the Manifestations of God and God Himself.

Summary

Everyone enters into the valley of Search and Investigation, because if we do not arise for the investigation of God we will never reach God, will know nothing of His attributes. If we do not arise for the search of Divinity we will know nothing about Divinity; unless we are thirsty we will not appreciate water. The more we desire to know Truth the sooner we will arrive at reality. Those who are thirstiest will most appreciate water.

One can easily tell the denizens of each city. One can easily tell that such a man is in the first city; another man has entered the city of love; another is passing into the city of oneness, and one can easily see that some people are confounded and amazed.

Some even travel through the city of Amazement and enter the city of Selflessness. Those people have annihilated their will in the will of the Glory of God. They are martyrs; they are living, and walking about, but they are really martyrs. This is what is called the City of Selflessness, and this can easily be recognized and discerned. Some have traversed this station and have reached the station of immortality.

Bahá'u'lláh says that the traveller will have a test in each city. If he does not pass that test he must go back to the first stage. It is difficult to overcome these tests which are in our way, yet, in order to progress we must conquer our selfishness and pride. All these cities are very difficult; but the first is the most difficult—to become characterized with the first conditions. The condition for the first city is severance, that is, severance from everything except the love of God.

The origin of race colour

A tablet from 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

To Mr Thomas Maxwell, Chicago, Illinois.—Upon him be greetings and praise.

O thou who art striving for the welfare of the world of humanity! The contents of thy letter were in accordance with the facts. Indeed, the world of humanity is like one kindred and one family. Because of the climatic differences of the zones, through the passing of ages, colours have become different. In the torrid zone, on account of the intensity of the effect of the sun throughout the ages the black race appeared. In the frigid zone, on account of the severity of the cold and the ineffectiveness of the heat of the sun throughout the ages the white race appeared. In the temperate zone, the yellow, brown and red races came into existence. But in reality mankind is one race. Because it is of one race unquestionably there must be unity and harmony and no separation or discord.

God be praised! The animal, notwithstanding that it is a captive of nature and nature completely dominates it, does not attach importance to colour. For instance, thou dost behold that the black, white, yellow, blue and other coloured pigeons are in utmost harmony with one another. They never give importance to colour. Likewise sheep and the beasts are in utmost love and unity. But man is peculiar in that he has made colour the means of strife. Between the white and the black there is the utmost estrangement and discord. When we enter a rose garden we behold how beautiful is the display of variegated flowers. The difference of colour is the adornment of the rose garden. Were it of one colour it would not have such splendour. The adornment of the rose garden is this, that it contains roses of variegated colour.

Thus it becomes evident that difference of colour is the adornment of the world of humanity. Therefore it must not be the cause of discord.

I hope that you with your soul may strive and become a cause of establishing harmony and love between the black and the white.

Upon thee be greetings and praise!

Bahá'í organization¹

Its basis in the revealed Word

Organization in the Bahá'í Movement rests upon the sure foundation of the Word of God.

In this day when many liberal minded people rebel against the restraint to which they sincerely think organization subjects them—it is well to present some of the vital needs for organization which the Bahá'í Teachings make evident.

Bahá'u'lláh touches the heights of Truth when he says:

“We find some men desiring liberty, and priding themselves therein. Such men are in the depths of ignorance.

“Liberty must, in the end, lead to sedition, whose flames none can quench. ... Know ye that the embodiment of liberty and its symbol is the animal. That which beseemeth man is submission unto such restraints as will protect him from his own ignorance, and guard him against the harm of the mischief-maker. Liberty causeth man to overstep the bounds of propriety, and to infringe on the dignity of his station. It debaseth him to the level of extreme depravity and wickedness.

“... True liberty consisteth in man's submission unto My commandments, little as ye know it. Were men to observe that which We have sent down unto them from the Heaven of Revelation, they would, of a certainty, attain unto perfect liberty.”¹

“The Lord hath ordained that in every city a House of Justice be established wherein shall gather counsellors to the number of Bahá, and should it exceed this number it doth not matter. They should consider themselves as entering the Court of the presence of God, the Exalted, the Most High, and as beholding Him Who is the Unseen. It behoveth them to be the trusted ones of the Merciful among men and to regard themselves as the guardians appointed of God for all that dwell on earth. It is incumbent upon them to take counsel together and to have regard for the interests of the servants of God, for His sake, even as they regard their own interests, and to choose that which is meet and seemly.”²

‘Abdu'l-Bahá in Some Answered Questions says:

“When the laws of the Most Holy Book are enforced, contentions and disputes will find a final sentence of absolute justice before a general tribunal of the nations and kingdoms, and the difficulties that appear will be solved. The five continents of the world will form but one, the numerous nations will become one, the surface of the earth will become one land, and mankind will be a single community.”³

Other quotations from the Writings of ‘Abdu'l-Bahá follow:

Absolute equality amongst men: “Equality is a chimera! It is entirely impracticable! Even if equality could be achieved it could not continue—and if its existence were possible, the whole order of the world would be destroyed. The law of order must always obtain in the world of humanity. ...

“Some are full of intelligence, others have an ordinary amount of it, and others again are devoid of intellect. In these three classes of men there is order but not equality. How could it be possible that wisdom and stupidity should be equal? Humanity, like a great army, requires a general, captains, under-officers in their degree, and soldiers, each with their own appointed duties. Degrees are absolutely necessary to ensure an orderly organization.”⁴

to the House [XIII:12:324] of Justice. The wisdom of this is that this world never moves for a long period in one form. The House of justice will make laws applicable to the exigencies and requirements of the time. Its members will not form institutions according to their own judgement and thought. The Most Great House of Justice enacts laws and statutes by the power of inspiration and the confirmation of the Holy Spirit and is under the protection of God.”

“About fifty years ago in the Book of Aqdas, Bahá’u’lláh commanded the people to establish the universal peace, and summoned all the nations to the Divine Banquet of International Arbitration, so that the questions of boundaries, of national honour and property and of vital interests between nations might be decided by an Arbitral Court of Justice; and that no nation dare to refuse to abide by their decisions. If any quarrel arise between two nations, it must be adjudicated by this International Court and be arbitrated and decided upon like the judgement rendered by the judge between two individuals. If at any time any nation dares to break such a treaty, all the other nations must arise to put down this rebellion.”¹

“Again consider organization and decomposition, existence and non-existence. Every being is composed of many different constituents; the existence of everything is the expression of organization. That is to say, when by divine genesis, organization of certain elements occurs, a being is produced. All existent beings are after this fashion. But when a defect appears in that compound, and decomposition sets in, the parts separate and that being disintegrates and becomes non-existent. Thus annihilation of things is an expression of their decomposition and disintegration. The affinity and organization of the elements make possible the existence.”²

“Many an assembly will be organized whose members will be representatives of different nations, tribes and peoples ... This is through the effect of the Word of God. If all the powers of the world should convene they could not organize an Assembly like unto these assemblies.”³

“The Universal Court of Arbitration is the only body that will resolve all the disagreements and contentions that arise between the nations of the world. Extraordinary exertion must be put forward by the civilized governments to organize such an influential international organization, before which all their quarrels may be arbitrated. What better plan can be conceived by man? What harm is there in this?”⁴

“Organize ye Spiritual Assemblies; lay ye the foundation of union and concord in this world; destroy ye the fabric of strife and war from the face of the earth; construct ye the temple of harmony and agreement; enkindle ye the light of the realm of the oneness of humanity; open ye your eyes; gaze and behold ye the other world! The kingdom of peace, salvation, uprightness and reconciliation is founded in the invisible world, and it will by degrees become manifest and apparent through the power of the Word of God!”⁶

“I want you to be organized like a flock of the doves of heaven, whose attitude and conduct toward each other is a symbol of that unity which will take place among human beings, when human beings shall become willing to accept the guidance of the Holy Spirit.”⁷

“... one of the great principles of Bahá’u’lláh’s teachings is the establishment of agreement among the peoples of the world. He founded and taught this principle in the Orient fifty years ago. He proclaimed international unity, summoned the religions of the world to harmony and reconciliation and established fellowship among many races, sects and communities. At that time He wrote Epistles to the kings and rulers of the world, calling upon them to arise and cooperate with Him in spreading these principles, saying that the stability and advancement of humanity could only be realized through the unity of the nations. Through His efforts this principle of universal harmony and agreement was practically demonstrated in Persia and other countries.”¹ [XIII:12:325]

In a Tablet addressed to the delegates to the first Bahá’í Temple Unity Convention in 1909 ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote:

“Now is the commencement of organization; hence every affair concerning the Kingdom of God is of paramount importance. Among the most important affairs is the founding of the Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, although weak minds may not grasp its importance, nay perchance they imagine this to be a temple like other temples. They say to themselves: ‘Every nation has a hundred thousand gigantic temples, what result have they yielded that now this one Mashriqu’l-Adhkár (is said) to cause the manifestation of signs and prove a source of Lights?’ But they are ignorant of the fact that the founding of this Mashriqu’l-Adhkár is to be in the inception of the organization of the Kingdom.”²

The Guardian of the Cause, Shoghi Effendi, reaffirms the need of organization in his luminous epistle to the American friends, 5 March 1922, and quotes the following from the writings of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá:

“It is incumbent upon every one not to take any step without consulting the Spiritual Assembly, and they must assuredly obey with heart and soul its bidding and be submissive unto it, that things may be properly ordered and well arranged. Otherwise every person will act independently and after his own judgement, will follow his own desire, and do harm to the Cause.”³

“In this day, assemblies of consultation are of the greatest importance and a vital necessity. Obedience unto them is essential and obligatory. The members thereof must take counsel together in such wise that no occasion for ill-feeling or discord may arise. This can be attained when every member expresseth with absolute freedom his own opinion and setteth forth his argument. Should any one oppose, he must on no account feel hurt for not until matters are fully discussed can the right way be revealed. The shining spark of truth cometh forth only after the clash of differing opinions. If after discussion, a decision be carried unanimously, well and good; but if, the Lord forbid, differences of opinion should arise, a majority of voices must prevail.”⁴

The foundation of organization in the Divine Cause is powerfully laid in the above extracts from the Holy and Creative Words, and many others that may be cited. Deeply impressive is not only the frequent recurrence of the term organization, but also the greatness and scope of what Divine Wisdom now plans and confirms. Organization becomes a vital element in the new creation. As the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh brings to light everything needed for the elevation and progress of humanity—the power of organization, through the Might that organizes, will reach maturity and perfection.

It is known that some misapprehension exists as to the need of organization in the Cause.

⁴ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Shoghi Effendi, Bahá’í Administration, pp. 21–22.

This has grown out of a widely circulated statement attributed to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, that the Bahá’í Cause could never be organized. The true statement was, as corrected by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, that the Bahá’í Cause can never be rigidly organized; it can never be confined to an organization. The context of the statement tells why, namely: “It is the Spirit of the Age, the essence of all the highest ideals of the century.”

At Haifa, Syria, in 1920, the following question was asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá by some American pilgrims:

“It is misleading, is it not, to say that the Bahá’í Cause cannot be organized?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied: “How is it possible that there should be no organization? Even in a household if there is not organization there will be hopeless confusion. Then what about the world? What is meant is that organization is not rigid! In ancient times it was rigid. In the Torah all the political affairs were rigidly fixed, but in this Cause they were not. In this Cause there is political freedom—i.e., in each time the House of Justice is free to decide in accordance with what is deemed expedient. This is a brief explanation of the matter.”

As the spirit of oneness is in all the Divine Utterances, the perceiving mind can readily discern the harmony of this statement with the many other Words of the Manifestation and the Centre of the Covenant, creating organization.

It must be evident that the mysterious dynamic of the Bahá’í Cause, its holy ideals, its supreme wisdom, its transcend- [XIII:12:326] ent love, its heavenly teachings, are from a world beyond man and his power to organize. The descent of the Holy Spirit is Pure Bounty—absolutely removed from man’s power to direct or control. But that Divine Intelligence, that Luminous Sun now manifested, bestows upon man guidance and order. Organization in the Bahá’í Cause is not man’s feeble and futile efforts, as in centuries past, to organize and control the affairs of God thus multiplying veils of separation and clouding his own insight. It is rather, as is clearly revealed in the divine plan, the intervention of God to direct and control the affairs of man. Man’s attainment to effective organization comes through obedience to the Ancient of Days and devotion to His Beauty.

The appointment, by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, of Shoghi Effendi as Guardian of the Cause, the provision for the Universal House of Justice, and other vital Laws, give to organization a most eloquent and impressive majesty. The high goal of order and service to which Shoghi Effendi now invites sincere souls, adds a new impressiveness to Bahá’í organization.

One of the greatest signs of Bahá’í organization is its fluidity, its universal adaptability to the present age, and to succeeding ages and cycles of the world. It is not exclusive. It inspires co-operation with the true, the beautiful and the good without as well as within its ranks. For there are today, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has said, prepared souls in all religions. One thus finds everywhere forward-looking people who have rent the veils of religious bigotry and racial prejudice. The Divine Command today requires joy and fragrance in consorting with people of all religions. It invites fellowship with the strong, yet strengthens the poor, the weak and the oppressed. It welcomes every sincere soul who seeks advancement, yet becomes the mighty fortress of defence against the seditious and corrupt. Because, as Bahá’u’lláh says:

Thus organization under the Divine Instructions becomes the safeguard to the Divine Edifice. Yet it must never become crystalized with set forms and outworn traditions, the impotence of which today makes merely human organization ineffective for universal service.

Organization, far from being impossible, becomes vital and essential in the growth of the Bahá'í Cause. The division and classification of service, co-ordinated by the divine plan of unity, will ever make for greater efficiency.

Organization appears in everything that God has created. From the tiny atom that moves under molecular attraction to the colossal suns that keep their balance with even and majestic tread,—everything moves according to law and order. Even the body of man is organized. Pain, suffering and dissolution are the penalty it pays for revolt. Shall the Intelligence that organized the universe leave the Kingdom of God in man disorganized?

Through organization the great fundamental Principles revealed by Bahá'u'lláh—Consultation and Kindness—will illumine every Assembly. Through the organization of the people of Light, the pillars that support the order of the world, “reward and retribution” will receive just administration.

Organization facilitates help of the strong to the weak, and of the more efficient to the less efficient. It applies, day by day, the law of co-operation and interdependence. It enables an aggrieved but sincere person to have his wrongs righted through the collective wisdom of an illumined group. If this fails to satisfy, an appeal may be had to the Supreme Court of Guidance. Organization thus removes differences and upholds the oneness of the Cause.

The exhortations to love and unity, which so often recur in the Bahá'í Teachings, point the sincere to both an inward and outward security. Esoterically it means turning to the Centre of Light and Guidance. Exoterically, it is found by supporting with might and main, whatever institution or organization is erected on earth through the Heavenly Power. The Divine civilization ever requires of man co-operative effort. Co-operation in its very nature implies organization. If organization is vital even in small affairs, how much more necessary does it become when human welfare is regulated by the laws of the Kingdom? [XIII:12:327]

Organization, too, will in the divine purpose preserve the Divine Teachings. If those who arise to serve, however sincere, construe the meaning of the Holy Words according to their own limitations they may gather around themselves a following, and in this way a multitude of sects will divide the body of the Cause. According to the Revelation of this day the words of the teacher need only be taken if they agree with what is revealed on the part of God and is recorded in Tablets. The teacher may at any time be questioned as to his authority. Should differences arise, they can readily be corrected through the degrees of organization that the divine plan unfolds. The matter of the physical preservation of the Books and Tablets, their correct translation into tongues other than those in which they are revealed, their spread among the regions of the earth,—are matters too weighty to be entrusted to individual direction. How soon would priceless treasures be scattered, lose their purity through alterations, and be lost to future generations! Here again organization proves its great value.

Organization has grown among the friends in America over a period of years. This has occurred in the natural order of evolution. In the early days of the Cause in America the few Teachings that were then available would be read by a group of believers, and if a stranger appeared the Message would be historically given. As members increased, the efforts to reach people of different environments grew, and meetings in public places, publications, etc., were natural steps. With further progress came the organization of Committees to direct local Assembly work. Also there came, with the plan to erect a Mashriqu'l-Adhkár (Universal House of Worship), the annual Convention. Its volume of business, small at first, increased from year to year. The service of the Convention, as a teaching body, as a temple-builder, as a means of unity, life and harmony among the various Assemblies, has been blessed and glorious! Yet its increasing responsibilities have entailed division of labour; and various committees have been formed to carry forward the work. Within the past year, under the instructions of the Guardian of the Cause, Assemblies throughout America have elected from among themselves Spiritual Assemblies, with full control of local affairs. The National Spiritual Assembly with its Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, Teaching, Publications, Reviewing and Educational Committees, has been entrusted with full service in all Bahá'í affairs pertaining to America.

Bahá'í organization in the Orient, by all authoritative accounts, has reached a higher standard than has yet been possible in the Occident. There, greater numbers and longer experience are seen; while fiery trials and intense persecutions from without have increased the power and penetration of the inward love that unifies. The happiness, peace and prosperity of the friends upon every plane are inseparably linked together. Sweet is the assurance that such a condition, in time, will be found throughout the world. Our Oriental brothers are ever mindful of the Most Great Guidance and the common weal. They successfully conduct, in a highly organized way, not only the affairs of the Cause, but co-operative enterprises of a private nature. Their organizations are so wise and mature as to prove a strong defence against the deceitful and corrupt on the one hand, as well as just administration and loving stimulus to the activities of the friends on the other. The storehouses of the Spiritual Assemblies kept the friends supplied with food during the recent hardship and distress caused by war; so that not one Bahá'í perished for lack of food. This occurred at a time when thousands of people were starving. Such a blessing from organization is its own eulogy.

In Persia the friends have not only a Teaching Committee, but clubs of teachers. These are organized for the purpose of sharing experiences, avoiding duplication of effort, discussing plans for the work and acquiring greater wisdom and clearer guidance in delivering the Message.

It should be clear that organization, in the Bahá'í sense, is ever spiritual. Bahá is the revelation of the Abhá Light in this world for the guidance of the people. To this end God has revealed Himself in His Greatest Manifestation, illumined the earth with His Brightness in the Orb of His Covenant, and today exercises His tender, compassionate Guardianship over [XIII:12:328] all the creatures. Thus in the Bahá'í Cause organization has come into being through the direction and co-operation of the friends in both spiritual and material affairs. After vainly, through thousands of years, striving to attain peace through material organization of spiritual affairs, man now attains supreme happiness through the spiritual organization of material affairs. Certainly no harm can result to any one from this.

The pillar of Bahá'í organization is justice; its glory is service; its bright jewel is humility; its banner is trustworthiness; its light is Guidance; its armour is prayer; its treasury is Divine Love; its exalted purpose is unity. Its members should be free from prejudices against all men. They should be God-like in their firmness, steadfastness and universality. They should obey the Centre of life and power and count themselves nothing in His Path. They should be able to discover their own faults, confess them before God and be able to see the virtues of other people. They should not choose themselves for positions of honour, but be chosen by others. Under the Instructions of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, a greater body should be first appointed, from which a smaller body will be elected. In this simple, quiet way, excitement of elections is avoided and harmony advanced.

The future of Bahá'í organization is bright and glorious. The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, around which many institutions will centre,—such as the school for orphans, the hospital, the hospice, the abode for the aged and infirm and the college of applied sciences, will in its very nature as well as administration, require very efficient organization.

The Universal House of Justice, headed by the revered Guardian of the Cause, the various National Spiritual Assemblies and the Spiritual Assemblies to be found in all Cities, the International Arbitral Court and the federation of the world, each and all bespeak the divine evolution of organization to an efficiency undreamed of, with the noblest and most exalted purpose.

The world spiritually organized in the Light of Bahá'í Principles will be the reflection of the Supreme Concourse.

XIII:12, March 1923 [XIII:12:330]

To the friends in Cleveland

The beloved of the Lord and the handmaids of the Merciful in Cleveland, Ohio, USA.

Care of the members of the Spiritual Assembly.

My beloved friends,

I trust now that I have returned refreshed and strengthened from my needed retirement, I shall very soon hear from you such news as shall encourage and strengthen me in my labours for His Holy Cause.

I look forward with eager anticipation to the welcome news of increased unity among the loved ones of God, of renewed ardour in their ceaseless service to the Cause and of crowning achievements in their field of service throughout that country.

True, in this day the Light of the Covenant is hidden from mortal eyes, yet the unfading Splendour of His Spirit, freed from earthy limitations, shines more brilliantly than ever before and is sure to guide our steps if we but seek His Guidance and walk steadfastly in His Way.

May the radiance of His Inspiration illumine our hearts and the hope of Eternal Reunion be our stay and solace in these days of bereavement and service to His Cause.

Supplicating the Divine Favours on your behalf,

I am your brother in His Service,

One of God's heroes

Jináb (Ibn-i-Abhar) Ayadí, belonged to a noble family in Zanján, Persia. He was appointed by Bahá'u'lláh as one of the "Four Hands of the Cause", in the days of persecution in the middle of the last century, and he "was the recipient of love and honour from all". His life was full of service. Seven times imprisoned by the enemies of the Cause, "he was absolutely fearless", writes one of the friends from Persia, "and when persecution arose, as in the martyrdom of Yazd he individually would carry petitions to the Cabinet Ministers and persons in authority. One vivid recollection is of seeing him speeding across the public square on such an errand. Another recollection is that of seeing him, when totally blind, sitting up in his bed on the foot of which squatting in Oriental fashion was an aged Siyyid who had come from far away seeking Ibn-i-Abhar to teach him the Bahá'í truths. This man was a stranger to Tíhrán; he had heard of the Bahá'í school called Tarbíyat; he searched the city until he found the school and then was directed to the house of Abhar.

"During the last months of Ibn-i-Abhar's life, in spite of his suffering he was busy teaching and counselling the friends. When relating fragments of his experiences he seemed inspired, always referring to his successive imprisonments and heavy chains with smiles and laughter.” He passed into the unseen world in February 1919.

Ibn-i-Abhar dictated the following autobiographical sketch to his nephew, Fakhru’-d-Dín. It was translated by his nephew, Dīyá’u’-d-Dín Munádi, and Amatu’lláh and was transcribed for the Star of the West, in Tīhrán, Persia, September 1922.

The story of Ibn-i-Abhar

A command came for me to leave Abhar and go to Zanján to teach the Azalís. My uncle, ‘Abdu’l-‘Azím, and two other very prominent men, Mírzá ‘Abdu’l-Baghí and Hájí Mullá Raḥmatu’lláh went with me. We rented a house to live in and during the day visited the Mullás, the Governor, and well-known, educated people. Many proofs were given to convince the Azalís. At night, while the others slept I would go to the house of a believer. When the meeting was over a servant would cautiously open the door and I would return home. During four months of strenuous work all but two of the Azalís became well informed and many intelligent and honourable people turned their faces toward the Cause. The fire of the love of God flamed in the hearts of the friends and all received boundless favours from the Kingdom of Abhá.

Upon returning to Abhar we learned that through the flaming of the Word the friends had been attracted to the Cause in an extraordinary degree; however, as a precaution, no one had dared to gather together the attracted ones. This was done and they became very happy.

Shortly after this the enemies began to cry out: “O religion! O faith! The Holy Laws are passing away!” and they persuaded Prince Rukni’-d-Dawlih, brother of Náṣiri’-d-Dín Sháh, who had been my friend, to arrest, imprison and put in chains some of the believers.

It is written in the Qur’án, “Verily the devils incite one another.” Mírzá Abú-Ṭálib, son of Mírzá Abu’l-Kázim, who during the early days of the Cause instigated the first persecution and bloodshed in Zanján now began writing to my cousin, Mirzi Abol-Fatoo,¹ entitled Imám-i-Jum’ih, who was one of my bitterest enemies. [XIII:12:335] These two ridiculed me before the Governor, seeking to ruin me. They stated, in a letter, that Ibn-i-Abhar had been the cause of much disturbance and trouble among the people in Zanján. This letter was spread among the fanatical Mullás.

The Governor was a friend of mine, and he treated the letter of Abol-Fatoo lightly, saying: “It was written through jealousy and a misunderstanding. I have neither seen nor heard anything from Ibn-i-Abhar which is hostile to religion.” This caused an uprising among the people who, suspicious of the Governor, were ready to murder some of the believers.

The Governor now became very much disturbed and ordered that the Tablets be brought from the houses of the believers: if among them there was found anything written by Ibn-i-Abhar the people would be allowed to appeal to the Sháh for his death sentence.

I had written many letters to two confirmed believers, Áqá Siyyid Ismá’íl and Áqá Rasúl. These were found. The Governor, because of his fear, repented his friendship (with Abhar) and secured from the Sháh a sentence of martyrdom. Mírzá Jalíl Khán, chief of the gunners, with ten soldiers was commanded to take me to Zanján.

Suddenly, at evening-time, several soldiers appeared at the door and demanded an interview. My brother, Mírzá Abu’l-‘Aṭúf, said: “It is now late. You had better wait until morning.” Then I came from an inner room and my nephew, Fakhru’-d-Dín, called the officers. About fifty soldiers had surrounded the house. Some students who were there studying with Mírzá Abu’l-‘Aṭúf were put out of the house by the soldiers; whereupon they spread the news through the bazaars and soon the crowds came rushing from all sides to see what was happening. The soldiers in order to scatter the crowd began firing and the noise of gunshots filled the air. As soon as the crowd was scattered Jináb-i-Khán produced from his pocket a letter addressed to Ibn-i-Abhar who was commanded thus:

“Your Excellency! For the purpose of investigating certain matters your presence is necessary in this city. Mírzá Jalíl Khán, with ten soldiers has been commanded to bring you. With Mírzá ‘Abdu’l-‘Azím and Kárbilá’í Mihdí Mílání you must start for Zanján, that the matter may be investigated in your very presence. Kindly see to it that you do not fail to start; otherwise the affair may become serious.”

After reading the letter I handed it to my brother, whereupon Mírzá Jalíl Khán said to him: “You had better go into the house. We have nothing to do with you.” But when two of the soldiers produced a large chain and prepared to put it upon me my brother could not endure it but tried to prevent them. Then the soldiers pushed him out of the room, saying: “You have no right to interfere.”

My brother returned, gave the soldiers fifty túmán¹ and obtained their promise not to chain me that night. I now went into the inner apartment, and they placed a guard at the door, allowing only one servant to pass in and out. In order to show their importance and to intimidate the family they made threats and frequently fired off their guns.

I take God to witness that during that night our house was like a house of mourning. Nothing was heard but sighs and cries and most of the relatives, men and women, were excited, and crying all night for they were given no information as to the condition of the prisoners.

The fourth hour after sunset my cousin, Hájí Mírzá Hidáyat, brother of Imám-i-Jum‘ih took Mírzá Jalíl Khán into a private room and told him that it would be to his earthly and spiritual advantage to torture this servant.

Mírzá Jalíl Khán, understanding my cousin’s hatred and jealousy said to me: “Why are these cousins so opposed to you, seeking to destroy you?”

I answered: “The uncles of His Holiness Muḥammad were against him, and his cousins sought to martyr his descendants. The citizens of Galilee were opposed to Christ. In Moses’ time his relatives arose and drove him out. The family of Abraham caused his expulsion. And was not Joseph cast into the pit? By whom?—his wicked brethren.” Thus, through scriptural citations I finally led Mírzá Jalíl Khán to the Riḍván of the knowledge of the Manifestation and, until midnight, told him and three others about the Great Cause. [XIII:12:336]

In the morning Imám-i-Jum‘ih summoned Mírzá Jalíl Khán and made calumnious accusations against me and against the Revealer of the Cause. He then tried to persuade him to torture (me) Abhar.

“Tell him that you will bind his shoulders, chain him, put his feet in stocks and ride him on a bare-backed mule. Undoubtedly, to escape such ignominy he will pay you a large sum of money. After obtaining the money then act to the very limit of your power in order to secure your heavenly recompense, for these transgressors lead the people astray and the more scornfully they are treated the more the people will fear to follow them. Then, how great will be your station in the sight of the Great Father Muḥammad in the day of resurrection! Proceed at once to Zanján, and make this matter seem very important before the Governor. As soon as he arrives there let the Governor purify the province of Qamṣar from his ignoble presence—(let him be killed.)”

When Mírzá Jalíl Khán compared the words of Ibn-i-Abhar with those of Imám-i-Jum'ih he said: "Áqá, there is an immense difference between your statements and his. Ibn-i-Abhar admonished us until midnight. He gave us the story of the prophets in detail exhorting us to live in peace with all the people of God. He led us to the straight path of love, virtue, holiness and the Oneness of the peerless God. He showed no sadness because of the calamities which had befallen him. Alas for me! that I must bring about the murder of such a prisoner!"

He then arose, saying: "If God wills, the enemy himself will cause good to triumph."

With smiling face he came and reported to me the whole interview, adding, "I thought all Bahá'ís were the enemies of God and of His prophet and I intended to torture and kill you. But since last night, and especially, today, I have changed my mind and am anxious to gain a thorough knowledge of your purpose. I am resolved to do nothing which may cause me to be ashamed in the presence of God and of His prophet."

Ibn-i-Abhar answered: "Verily, the Qur'án says: 'Those who obey God are those who have obeyed His prophet'."

My family wished to send a sum of money to the Governor to obtain my release but he had evidently come under the influence of Imám-i-Jum'ih for he sent a strict order to Imám-i-Jum'ih and Jalíl Khán that he (Jalíl Khán), must set out at once with the prisoner of the government. What a terrible scene followed!

It was the fourth day of Muḥarram, the month of beating.¹ Shops were closed and groups of men had equipped themselves to torment the believers. The soldiers joined in—some having taken bribes; others being followers of Imám-i-Jum'ih; and others joining through fanaticism. The women, hiding in the inner apartment were crying loudly. A rabble of worthless people had gathered about the gate, and friends, also, had secretly drawn near. In the evening Imám-i-Jum'ih with his two brothers, Mírzá Hidáyat and Aga Fatollah,² brought a company of soldiers and instructed them to mount the prisoner in the most ignominious fashion or they would be reported to the Governor and would themselves be humiliated. They gave notice that if anyone rented him (the prisoner) a good horse the animal would be seized and that man and his family would be treated as scorpions. Mírzá Jalál and the ten others did not dare to start with him. A lean pony was brought. Some of the onlookers were scornful; some were laughing; others amazed; and a few were weeping. Many were cursing and reviling, while the sound of crying from the women and children in the inner room rent the heart. The oppressed believers had taken refuge in a corner and dared not utter a word. Imám-i-Jum'ih surrounded by Mullás, theological students, merchants and princes was writing an accusation in an inner room. He ordered this oppressed one to enter, which he did with the chain about his neck and one foot in a stock. Immediately Imám-i-Jum'ih said, with a bitter smile: "Curse you, for an infidel!"

I answered him with a proverb: "First prove the earth and then draw the map of it."

Upon hearing this quotation Imám-i-Jum'ih said, angrily: "Remove this dog from the room. He accounts himself a prophet and reveals verses for us." [XIII:12:337]

Jalíl Khán seized the chain and dragged me from the room while Imám-i-Jum'ih said: "Did you hear what he claimed?"

One answered: "He wanted to make us Bábís." And they all began to curse.

My mother had turned her face toward the point (of prayer) repeating this prayer, which had been revealed for her in a Tablet: "Praise be upon Thee, O Thou, the Beloved, the Knower, and thanks be unto Thee, O Thou, the Aim of the world!”

¹ Muḥarram: forbidden, unlawful; the sacred enclosure of Mecca; the first month in the Islamic calendar.

Her sisters, Táj Naṣṣāḥ¹ and Ḥusnī Ján, and her daughters, Fátimih and Oma² Ḥabíbih, sent a sum of money petitioning that the soldiers would permit me to visit my relatives, and her son Abu'l-Kázim, gave surety with his life.

At first they refused, but when the sum was increased they brought me bound hand and foot with chains into the inner apartment. This sight caused the women to cry so loudly that the men who were in the inner apartment burst into tears. When Imám-i-Jum'ih heard this he said, angrily: “Did you not hear how he despised us and exalted his own station? Let him go at once so that we may be quit of his scorn.”

All this time not a trace of emotion was to be seen in my mother's face. She did not once look toward me nor did she cease to repeat the holy words. The friends led me to her that she might see my face. She said: “O my dear! You know how precious you are to me; but the most glorified One is the Blessed Perfection. I dedicate you to be a sacrifice in his Cause. Go! Be steadfast! Sacrifice yourself in the Cause of God and fear no one. The Qur'án says: ‘Do they think that those who are killed in the path of God are dead? Nay, they are alive in the presence of their Lord and are supping with Him.’” She did not glance my way nor did she embrace me in farewell but continued to thank God and to pray.

The relatives and the others cried out: “O you cruel one! God does not accept your prayers. How hard-hearted you are to consent to the death of such a son!”

My brother then came and took me out of the room, handing me over to the soldiers who put my other foot into the stock and, mounting me on the miserable pony, started off. Everyone was weeping, but Abhar, turning to them all, believers and non-believers said: “I bid farewell to you and ask you to forgive my failings and to beg for pardon for me at the Threshold of Oneness for it is most probable that I will not return from this journey.” One of his (Abhar's) uncles, a bitter enemy, cried out: “Go to hell so that you can not come back, O you, the branded one among your kindred. I trust that you will be hanged!”

About two thousand people of all classes formed our escort. Imám-i-Jum'ih ordered the guards to take the most public route—which ran through the bazaars and passed by his house. Here his relatives stood on the roofs to ridicule, hurl abusive language and throw stones. The prisoner asked the guards to stop the pony so the crowd might satisfy their curiosity. Then he cried aloud: “O ye people! This day upon which I am arrested upon the charge of being a Bábí is the fourth of Muḥarram. You remember that it was upon this same day that in ancient times they beheaded the descendants of Muḥammad and waved their heads on spears before the other captives, crying: ‘You are heathen; you have left the religion of your fathers and have abandoned the laws of God.’ ‘Know, verily, that God will curse the nation that martyred them.’”

During this speech the people wept and wailed and continued so to do until we reached Muṣallá, one mile out of the city. Mírzá Jalíl Khán was so overcome that he dismounted from his horse and ordered two of the guards to break the stocks and release my feet. Then he, himself, spoke to the people:

“O ye inhabitants of Abhar! You may rest assured that the cause of this man is just. He is being oppressed as was my forefather, Imám Ḥusayn. Do not desert this family. Compare the family of Imám-i-Jum'ih with the family of Yazíd. They tried to turn me against this family but, thank God, I was not deceived and have not mistreated his honour.”

We tarried until sunset, the believers gradually becoming more tranquil, saying: “He will have no more trouble along the way except for the heaviness of his chains.” And this was really the case [XIII:12:338] for, two miles out of Zanján, when everyone sat down to rest Mírzá Jalíl Khán, retaining three of the guards who were friendly sent the other seven who continually opposed when religion was discussed, to their homes, telling them not to report to the government office but to change their clothes, and in the morning to come to his house when they would all take the criminal to the office of the government. After the departure of the seven, those who remained began to talk happily about the Cause, chanting meanwhile prayers and Tablets.

The little party soon came to the house of Mírzá Jalíl Khán who then called in some of the believers connected with the court that they might discuss the best method of presenting the matter to the government. They now took off the chains which were about the neck of Abhar.

Two hours later, in the midst of an earnest discussion, there came a loud and peremptory knocking at the door—evidently a messenger from the government; whereupon Mírzá Jalíl Khán and the others hastily concealed themselves. Two deputies and twenty farráshes entered and angrily demanded Mírzá Jalíl Khán and the prisoner, Abhar. It was apparent that the seven guards had turned in evidence.

The government’s messengers with the utmost roughness and disrespect chained the prisoner and dragged him to the government office. Here the head servant was walking about in the hall, so intoxicated that he could scarcely speak. He came up to me and asked, furiously: “Where have you sent Jalíl Khán?”

This oppressed one answered very slowly: “I accompanied him to his own house and after that I have no information about him.”

The head servant called the warden of the prison and said, sarcastically: “Treat him well, because he is the very essence of the Bábís and has converted the servants of the government.”

The warden took my ‘abá (cloak) and emptied my pockets of a small sum of money. Then he put me into a dungeon called in Zanján “Dashborgh”—“stone tower”,¹ a hole dug in the ground and closed over with a stone as large as a millstone which could not be moved at all from below and only with great difficulty from above. The prisoner had only room enough to crouch within. On account of the carelessness of the guards the place was filled with fleas, white ants and lice. One of the prisoners described how sometimes all three would clump together and form a mass the size of a bean. Every day the great stone was taken from the opening for two hours to change the air. Here this unfortunate one was imprisoned for four months and a few days. The place was about ten yards square and there were other believers, also, confined there. When I arrived they began weeping, as though mourning for their own dead children.

I smilingly asked: “Why do you weep? Be happy that you are suffering for the sake of God. You are bound and fettered for the spreading of His Cause. Soon your native citizens, your relatives and your grandchildren will boast because of your very existence and in the sight of men you will reach to the heights of dignity.”

They answered: “We are not weeping for ourselves. We are accustomed to chains and stocks. Our weeping is for your dear and precious life. Until now you have been cherished in ease, and held in the highest respect and honour. How can you exist in such a dark and malodorous hole?”

I answered from the Qur’án: “I am submissive to His command, patient under the calamities of God and there is no one to be worshipped save Him.”

“Consider how every prophet was a target for the enemies of his time, and no one of them failed to drink the poison-cup, draining it as though it were the sweet elixir of Paradise. In the fire of Nimrod Abraham reached to a high station. In like manner Jesus Christ took up his abode in the heaven of Nearness. Muḥammad and his holy descendants tore the veil of superstition from the eyes of their followers and went, straight and swift as an arrow, to their high station.”

These explanations which were in reality utterances from the invisible so affected the guards and farráshes that they ceased to trouble me. Like the others, they forgot me and listened to the teachings. [XIII:12:339]

In order to learn how the farráshes were treating me the warden sent in a new farrásh. This one also in that dark cell became captive to the Mount of God. He stood like a statue, listening eagerly. The warden, wondering why no sound reached him from the dungeon came, stealthily, near, and stood by the opening listening for the cruel treatment of the prisoners. Hearing nothing he rushed in angrily and found that all the prisoners had gathered around this prisoner and were listening to the words of life. He had a heavy club of almond wood in his hand and with it started beating the head jailer striking him and his assistants so severely that the club broke in two. Then, with the remaining piece, he came toward me and began striking me, saying, “O you devil! Can you not keep silent even here? Do you want to lead astray the prison force?”

After many blows he called for a very heavy chain, in addition to the ordinary one already worn. He handed this collar to me ordering me to put it around my neck. This poor oppressed one had been so badly beaten that his senses were benumbed and instead of placing the collar around his neck he tried to draw it over his head, like a cap. The intoxicated warden seeing this burst out laughing, and his anger passed away. He ordered the other prisoners to be confined in a separate cell lest all should become Bahá'ís. I was then chained to the other believers and my feet were put into the same stock. I now began to chant from memory the whole of the following Tablet, called the Tablet of Praise:

“He is the Glory of the Most Glorious!

An early tablet to Persia

Translated by Shoghi Effendi

He is the All-Glorious!

O thou that art aglow with the Fire that burneth in the Sacred Tree!

At this morning hour, when the Light that shineth from the Abhá Kingdom is shedding its splendour upon the regions of the world and the sweet savours of the Lord wafted from the Realms of Holiness are diffusing their fragrance amongst the holy ones on earth, this yearning one is so stirred with the sweet remembrance of the loved ones of God and so aflame with the desire of their meeting that he finds no way to still his longings or to calm his restless soul.

A Voice is calling him from the Realm on High: “O servant of the sacred Threshold of Bahá! Bestir thyself and, with thy pen in thine hand, make mention of that loving friend of thine that seeketh restlessly the Way of his Beloved and who is so enamoured with Thee that a single drop from the Ocean of Thy loving-kindness is to him the Water of Everlasting Life.”

By thy life, so precious to me, I swear that I can contain myself no more and this pen of mine can write no further nor can I guide and restrain any more my writing: Ponder this in thy heart and peruse this letter by the power of thine heart and spirit.

O friend! I know not what to say and write to thee. Behold! The Voice of God so resounds from the Kingdom of Bahá that the ear is well-nigh overpowered with its sound, and the Universe is so shaken by the ringing call of Bahá that it may soon disrupt and burst asunder!

I can write no more.

The problem of unemployment

“It will not be possible in the future,” said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, “for men to amass great fortunes by the labour of others. The rich will willingly divide. They will come to this gradually, naturally, by their own volition. It will never be accomplished by war and bloodshed. The ruling power or government cannot treat the rich unjustly. To force them to divide their wealth would be unjust. In the future, proportionately, about three quarters of the profits will go to the workmen and one quarter to the owner. This condition will prevail in about one century. It will certainly come to pass.”—From Ten Days in the Light of Acca, p. 7.

The coming spiritual renaissance

... Theologians are struggling over new heresies. Division in all great religions is increasing. Christians try to return to Christ, but what is the Christ teaching? Fundamentalists interpret it one way; liberal ministers in a way which is quite different. Some prominent men of science question all our faith. Historical scholars throw ancient documents into doubt. Great demonstrations are held in Moscow denying all religion, just as Bahá'u'lláh prophesied would happen, when he said that after the great war religion would for a time seem to disappear.

In a word, we need a new statement of the teachings of the Divine Christ, applied to new conditions with a new outpouring of spiritual power. “The old teachings,” says 'Abdu'l-Bahá, “are insufficient for today. They cannot cure every disease and are not an ointment for every wound. Those heavenly admonitions of old are greatly loved and profoundly acceptable but the intellectual aspirations of today have advanced and demand fuller explanations of the divine plan. There is great need for universal enlightenment. This need is supplied in Bahá'u'lláh's teachings which are the sum of all teachings. Today he who acquaints himself with the precepts and exhortations of Bahá'u'lláh and reads the Tablets of Kalimát, Tajalliyát, Ṭarázát and Bishárát will know for a certainty that they are the essential food for humanity in this latter day as well as the means of joining this transitory life to the Eternal.

“There are seasons in the revelation from God, as in the natural year, and just as the Christ manifested the Spirit of God in the flesh and helped the earth in his time, now the message of Bahá'u'lláh is the medicine of which the world has much need. Bahá'u'lláh has a larger message on a greater number of subjects than any other, just as this is an age more ready, because of the great spiritual advance made in the great kingdom of knowledge, to understand and benefit by his just commands.”—'Abdu'l-Bahá: From Notes of Mrs Thornburg-Cropper of London.

“As to the significance of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, know that everything which belongs to the universal is divine and all that is divine is certainly for the universal good. Therefore, a divine cause, for universal good, cannot be limited to the Orient nor to the Occident, because the flame of the sun of Truth illumines the East and the West and its heat is felt in the south as well as in the north; there is no difference between the two poles. In the time of the manifestation of Christ the Romans and the Greeks thought that the Cause was especially for the Jews; they thought they had no need for it because they saw that, according to appearances, they possessed a perfect civilization and they thought that they did not need the instructions of Christ. This false supposition caused many people to be deprived of its grace.

“Also know that the principles of Christianity and the commandments of Bahá’u’lláh are identical and that the roads are the same. But every day there is progress. There was a time when this divine institution was in an embryonic condition. Then it became newly born, a child, an intelligent child. Today it has reached maturity: its capacities, its body are the same, but today, it is resplendent, with the greatest beauty and brilliancy.”—From a tablet to a friend in Paris.

The Covenant of peace

From two tablets of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to German friends, quoted in the diary letters of Shoghi Effendi, 7 and 8 October 1919.

“The underlying foundation upon which the Kingdom rests is love and this must be securely established among the friends and must be widely spread so that it may become the cause of the establishment of the oneness of mankind. This love must be so intensified among the friends as to make of them true servants of one another expending their wealth and sacrificing their lives for one another and consecrating their being to the existence of other souls. Then ye shall observe how people will flock and gather under the shade of the pavilion of the oneness of mankind.”

“Praise be to God! Thou hast given up thy material comfort, ... hast travelled to Lubeck and hast instituted an assembly. From the bounties of God I hope that assembly may become a heavenly gathering, may promulgate the oneness of mankind so that the various peoples and different races may all associate with utmost harmony under the shade of the pavilion of the oneness of mankind, the hostile peoples of Europe may be fused into one, the continent of Europe may become one home, this horrible war may lead to utmost union, harmony and love among the different communities of Europe, the monument of estrangement may quake and the standard of affection and unity be unfurled.”

“You must rest assured,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the Secretary of the New York Peace Society, concerning the work of its members, “and let there be no trace of doubt in your souls that God is your assister and helper. The Heavenly confirmations will descend upon you more and more. God will protect you and will give you new strength continually. Your world-motives will conquer the world of men; all obstacles will disappear before your advance; no earthly power can resist the onrushing power of peace. For [XIII:12:344] this power is assisted by the power of God and that which is divinely assisted must prevail. Consider how the Cause of Christ was confirmed. How many resisted it! What mountains of obstacles were raised against it! What hostile forces sought to destroy its foundations! Yet the kings and emperors of the world could not resist its spread and establishment. No power of earth can withstand the on-flow of the spirit of truth. If earthly kings and kingdoms come in its way it will conquer, and they will be overthrown, always: for your cause is truth itself, and truth is omnipotent. If all nations arise to oppose they will be vanquished, and you will be victorious. You are a servant of God, not a servant of this world. A servant of God is he who gives some benefit to the world of man.”

Bahá'í education

Professor Stanwood Cobb, educator, and author of a number of books upon religion, mysticism and the Near East, taught for a number of years in Robert College, Constantinople, and in other institutions. He is now the head of a remarkably progressive school at Chevy Chase, Maryland.

Every great civilization has brought with it a new type of education, expressing the needs and ideals of the age. And as religion is one of the chief factors of civilization, every new religion has caused a profound change in the aims and practices of education. In fact, in the early centuries of any religious dispensation, while faith and zeal are strong, education has been not only influenced but controlled by religion. Such was the case in the early centuries of the Christian era, continuing even to the Renaissance. Such was the case in the inception of Islám, and has remained so to the present day. Even a new movement within an established religion—such as the rise of Protestantism, or of powerful sects such as the Methodists or Quakers—exerts its modifying influence upon all education brought within its sphere.

Therefore it is apparent even to the casual observer that the Bahá'í faith, when it should become established as a world-religion bringing with it a new world-civilization, could not fail to powerfully affect the ideals and processes of education.

Nor need such a partnership between education and religion be feared, especially since the substantiation of scientific truth is one of the principles of the Bahá'í religion. It is true that scholasticism has been a detriment to education; but the cramping spirit of scholasticism is a symptom of decadence rather than of reality in religion. For instance, Islám, now in its age of scholasticism, was at its beginning a powerful ally of the scientific investigation of truth; and its great universities of Cairo and Cordova became the inspiration and model of higher education in Europe. True religion is an expansive, not a restrictive force; it is the essence of creation, not the spirit of limitation. But the organization which grows up in the name of any religion reaches at last a stage of crystallization, then of paralysis. The oppressive influence of the church at such an epoch, though exerted in the name of religion, is not due to real religion, but as 'Abdu'l-Bahá says, to the very opposite of religion.

The founders of the Bahá'í religion, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, have established definite principles to guide the educators of the future. So that if we study carefully these principles, in com- [XIV:1:4] parison also with the general teachings of the Cause, we can form a very clear picture of what education will be like among the Bahá'ís of the future.

In the FIRST place, it will be universal. Bahá'u'lláh has said that it is the duty of every parent to educate his children. If he cannot do this then the state will take charge of the matter. Americans may say, "Such is now the case in this country". But they are mistaken. In this country there are millions of illiterates, a large part of them of old American stock. And as for Europe and Asia, we are aware of the crying need for education in that part of the world. The need is no less great in South America, where the dominant white race is literate, but entirely negligent and antipathetic to the education of the subject races, Indians and Negroes.

When it is conceived that this law of Bahá'u'lláh concerns itself with the whole world, and with every race, nay with every individual, it will be seen how profoundly the complete execution of this law will affect mankind. Illiteracy and ignorance will be entirely obliterated, and all of mankind, by receiving the privilege and aid of education, will for the first time in the history of our planet be thereby placed on a plane of equal opportunity for success in life-endeavours. For the right education is the open door to the expression and utilization of one's native abilities. And while but a privileged portion of the world are placed in this favourable position of advancement, the submerged nine-tenths are even before they are born condemned to be the toiling slaves of the few. This is not justice. And upon the pillars of justice, not of injustice, is the new edifice of civilization to be raised.

SECONDLY, education will be more practical. Bahá'u'lláh said, "Let everyone be taught a trade or profession." Culture is a gift that makes life more beautiful and intelligent, but skill at a trade or profession is the indispensable means of raising man from brutish servitude. Unskilled labour will barely provide the funds for sustenance.

Whom among the readers of this article would wish for his own children the destiny of belonging to the vast ranks of the unskilled? Then why should he wish it for other people's children? There are those who selfishly fear that the consequence of the education and training of the masses will be to deprive the upper classes of their age-long exploitation of unskilled labour at low wages. They fear for their own comforts. But these fears are groundless. As mankind becomes more intelligent and the supply of low-paid unskilled labour diminishes, new ways will be found of doing the same work in a more intelligent manner. As, for example, the modern method of coaling a ship as compared with the Oriental method; or the abolition of stoking in oil-burning steamships; or the project of extracting heat from coal mines by converting the coal into gas and piping it from the mines.

For every diminution in the quantity of unskilled labour there will be, not a loss, but a proportionate gain for humanity. And as for the workingman himself, who would compare the working conditions of crude labour with those of skilled labour; or the living conditions of the two as determined by their wages?

In one field of production, that of agriculture—by far the most important field of effort of the human race—it is apparent what gains are made, not only for the producer but also for the consumer, by applying intelligence and skill to labour. In every other field of effort the gain will be as great. And in the new dispensation the Adamic curse, "Thou shalt live by the sweat of thy brow", will be changed to, "He shall feed all His creatures."

In the Bahá'í scheme of education the cultural will not be neglected; but it will parallel the practical, and not hold precedence over it. [XIV:1:5]

THIRDLY, much that has been deemed important in education will be dropped. Bahá'u'lláh said, "Teach those things that pertain to human welfare, and not those things that begin in words and end in words." This is a glorious but severe criterion. The race must live. It must live comfortably. All men must enjoy comfort.

Education can no longer serve the intellectual predilections of the few. It can no longer present itself as the willing Pegasus for any journey which the curious mind would make into the realms of thought. No! education, like human labour, must serve useful ends. It must teach those things that pertain to human welfare. So may the race progress more quickly to its destined perfection.

As for those things that begin in words and end in words, they must be discarded. Future educators will apply the criterion. We can only hazard here the guess that much of philosophy will go; much of required mathematics; much of dialectic, of grammar, and of the study of dead languages. The study of modern languages will become unnecessary when, as Bahá'u'lláh directed, the world shall choose a universal auxiliary language.

This pruning of the old tree of knowledge, now full of dead branches, will vivify the stock and cause it to produce new and beautiful fruits for the benefit of mankind.

And as for our school children—those of us who have tried the experiment of "teaching those things that pertain to human welfare" know how eagerly pupils of all ages devote themselves to the study of subjects pertaining to the progress of the race. There will be no malingering in our schools when education is made vital and adapts its information to the growing needs and desires of the child.

FOURTHLY, education will be made a joyous process. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has said that schools must be happy places, and that children must not be overburdened with study. Six hours a day, he said, of combined study and recitation is enough. To go beyond that is needlessly to tire the child-mind. And too much study before maturity, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says, blunts the intelligence and does irreparable harm to the developing brain.

Education will be adapted to the individuality of the child, and not try to form each child into a common pattern. In this way children will be happy in their education, and the human race will benefit by the development of all the gifts that are born into it. At present there is much suppression of native genius, both by our social and by our educational systems. The future world will seek out talent wherever found, train it, and give it opportunity.

Bahá’ís, perhaps more than other people, see the hope of the world as lying in the children. Easier by far it is for a child born into the Kingdom to become a perfect citizen of it, than for an adult who has been, so to speak, only naturalized into it. And to perceiving eyes it would seem that marvellous children are being born into the world—more spiritual, more gifted, than the world has hitherto known. Before such children we adults are reverent, respecting higher powers though in those of inferior age.

Therefore the Bahá’í teacher will be humble, sweet, companionable, and above all loving. Not opinionated, austere, bigoted or jealous of mental powers superior to his own. He will be supremely happy with children, for to him teaching will always be a voyage of discovery—the discovery of hidden talents, of dormant powers, of budding gifts, and of germinating flowers of the spirit.

He will be a gardener training his plants, cultivating choice seedlings, gently caring for all; but speechless before the beauty of the blossoms which his care evokes, worshipping that beauty as an apparition of the Divine Splendour behind and through the human veils.

The full power of development latent in the soul we have but little realized. Not only is the human race capable of [XIV:1:6] an enormously greater progress than it has yet reached, but also every child is capable of keener perception, of deeper ratiocination,¹ of greater initiative and creativeness, and of earlier maturity of character.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá once mentioned a plan he had had for founding a model school at Haifa. “I have carried in my mind for some time an educational system, but so far there have been no means for its realization. If that system were once beaten into workable shape, in two years’ time the children would have studied four languages. At the age of ten they would study sciences; and at the age of twelve they would be graduated. I wanted to establish such a trial school of eighty-one pupils, all six years of age, the children to be brought from Persia and Ishqábád, the teachers to be engaged and transported from America. But a number of unforeseen difficulties have prevented me.”

“At the age of ten they would study sciences.” This is a scientific age. The eagerness with which children drink in the truths of science is indicative of what may be accomplished along this line. The present year I began general science with the sixth grade of my school, using a high school text book but accommodating it by means of my own explanations to the knowledge and capacity of these eleven and twelve year old children. It is their favourite subject. They beg to have it oftener.

At the time of the violent earthquakes and tidal waves in Chile, early in November, we made a study of earthquakes. One day we made an excursion to Georgetown University where Father Tondorf,¹ one of the greatest seismological experts in the world, was so kind as to show us his seismographs; and explain to us how, by means of the records these instruments make, he could calculate with remarkable precision the location of earthquakes thousands of miles away. When we got back to the school we discussed again the causes and locations of earthquakes, and the value to mankind of careful observation and recording of these disturbances.

Here was a subject which, in the words of Bahá'u'lláh “pertained to human welfare”; and the eagerness, receptivity, and comprehension of the children were remarkable. In vivid contrast to this spirit of earnest endeavour was the behaviour of the crowd of high school boys who got on the same car with us coming home from our trip to the university. They were tossing their bundles of books to each other, throwing them about as playthings or as bated objects. “Which subject do you like least?” I asked of the boy next to me. “Oh, I hate ‘em all,” he cheerfully remarked. By the titles of their books, “Algebra”, “Latin”, “Rhetoric”, etc., I should say that their curriculum consisted largely of subjects that began in words, and ended in words. What a supreme and lordly indifference to their studies was manifested by these school boys!

This indifference is the educational tragedy of the day. Bahá'í education will not be so characterized. With the right curriculum, inspiring teachers, and the proper concept of their duty to themselves, their parents, and to the world, the Bahá'í children of the future will develop marvellously and will at adolescence surpass in seriousness and maturity of powers the average college freshman of today.

It is a pity that circumstances did not permit 'Abdu'l-Bahá to demonstrate by means of a model school what true Bahá'í education should be. But from his own words and from those of Bahá'u'lláh, Bahá'í educators will construct a more ideal system of child training than that now prevalent.

LASTLY, Bahá'í education will concern itself not only with the moral but with the spiritual development of the child. And this influence will make itself felt even through the university. At present our educational system is quite Godless. Owing to the nature of our [XIV:1:7] government and the presence in our body politic of groups of opposing religions, public education has renounced all authority over the spiritual life of the child.

This is a condition which if allowed to continue would lead to the spiritual bankruptcy of the race. Already we are near that point. Young parents of the present day, themselves trained in an irreligious educational system, have nothing of religion to give their children; and they send the children again to public schools where the teachers are forbidden to teach religion. Once a week, for an hour, the spiritual needs of the child are cared for by the Sunday school teacher. One hundred and sixty-seven hours a week devoted to secular thought, attention, training, activity, and sleep—and one hour a week devoted to the spiritual part of the child! Can earnest people view this ratio with indifference?

Character training is attempted in our schools. But character must be based on a spiritual foundation. 'Abdu'l-Bahá has shown how lacking in the necessary motives for right conduct are those who do not believe in the soul, in God, or in the future life. It is ridiculous to attempt character training apart from the fundamental truths of religion.

What is the solution? In a democracy of mixed and hostile religions, only a new harmonizing and universal religion can heal the breach and make spiritual training a welcome part of public education.

In the Bahá'í world of the future the mind, the soul, and the spirit will be trained together.

And the higher up one goes in education, the more spiritual will one become, and not the more irreligious—as is so often the case today.

In closing I cannot do better than to cite the wonderful words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in regard to the kind of education which our colleges and universities should give. If this ideal, held up by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for the inspiration of future educators, ever becomes realized, there will be little need of prisons and reformatories in a world so educated.

“The Universities and Colleges of the world must hold fast to three cardinal principles. First, whole-hearted service to the cause of education, the unfolding of the mysteries of nature, the extension of the boundaries of pure science, the elimination of the causes of ignorance and social evils, a standard universal system of instruction, and the diffusion of the lights of knowledge and reality.

“Second, service to the cause of the students, inspiring them with the sublimest ideals of ethical refinement, teaching them altruism, inculcating in their lives the beauty of holiness and the excellency of virtues and animating them with the excellences and perfections of the religion of God.

“Third, service to the oneness of the world of humanity; so that each student may consciously realize that he is a brother to all mankind, irrespective of religion or race. The thoughts of universal peace must be instilled in the hearts of all scholars. The mothers in the homes, the teachers in the school, the professors in the colleges, the presidents in the universities must teach these ideals to the young from the cradle to the years of manhood.”¹

Studies in immortality

Part I

The relation of mind, soul, spirit

Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá have in this Latter Day of world progress broken the seals and unstopped the vials of knowledge for us on subjects which have long puzzled an increasing number of eager-minded investigators of spiritual truth, viz: is man of the world of nature or is he a citizen of the Kingdom of Light or does he dwell in both realms? What is the nature of his spirit and its immortality—its life in the unseen Kingdom?

The following compilation from the words of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is concerned with a question which lies on the borderland of psychology and philosophy—the relation of body, soul, mind, spirit. It will be followed by a compilation to be published next month on the new revelation of immortal life.

“As to thy question regarding the soul,” wrote Bahá’u’lláh from his prison in ‘Akká, to Ra’ís, then minister of the Sultán of Turkey, “know that people have written many and varied articles regarding it and have had many different opinions concerning it. (They speak of) a heavenly soul, a mighty soul, a divine soul, a godly soul, a holy soul, a tranquil soul, a contented soul, and to all these, special definitions and explanations are given by each party.

“As to the soul (spirit) which is purposed, verily, it is sent forth by the Word of God and it is that which when kindled by the fire of the love of its Lord will not be quenched by the waters of the rain nor by the seas of the world. It is indeed kindled by that fire which is burning in the human Lote-Tree, uttering, ‘Verily, there is no God but Me’, and he who hears its voice is one of those who are successful.

“Upon leaving the body God will send it forth according to the best form and will cause it to enter into a high heaven. Verily, thy Lord is powerful over all things.

“Know, also, that the life of man is from the Spirit and to turn is indeed from the soul. Reflect upon that which we explained unto thee in order that thou mayest know the Soul of God who came from the dawning place of grace with manifest authority.

“Know, also, that the soul hath two wings. If it flieth in the air of the love and will of God it will be attributed to the Merciful; but if it flieth in the atmosphere of desire it will be attributed to Satan—may God protect us and you against it, O assembly of knowers! And if it is kindled by the fire of the love of God it will be a tranquil and pleasing soul; but if it be kindled by desire it is a passionate soul. Thus have we given unto thee full details that thou mayest be of those who reflect.

“O Supreme Pen, mention to him who hath turned to his Lord, Abhá, that which will make him independent of the world. Say, that spirit, mind, soul, hearing and sight are one, but differ through differing causes. In the case of man, for instance, ye see that by which man understands, moves, speaks, hears and sees: all of these are through the power of his God in him, but they each one are different, according to the difference of their cause. Verily, this is indeed the truth.

“For example, if all these faculties are turned to that which causes hearing, then hearing and its results become manifest, and if they are turned to that which causes sight another activity and another result will appear; if turned to the brain, head, etc., the manifestations of mind and soul will appear. Think of this that thou mayest reach the desired goal and find thyself independent of that which is mentioned on the part [XIV:1:9] of the people and be of those who are assured. Verily, thy Lord is powerful in that which He wisheth.”—From the Súriy-i-Ra'ís Chieftain).

“The soul,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “is a link between body and spirit. It receives bounties and virtues from the spirit and gives them to the body just as the outer senses carry that which they receive from the outer world to the inner senses, in order that (these impressions) may be deposited in the memory and, through his various powers, may be utilized by man.”

“There is a human and a divine spirit, the latter arising through knowledge of and belief in God. The human spirit is superior to the body and struggles with it for control of the soul: when it succeeds the soul becomes heavenly; when the body obtains control the soul becomes degraded.”

“Spirit is the highest and supreme development of the soul. Soul is the material or outer self, the mind. Mind is the action of the soul’s powers. The body is the physical covering or medium in which mind acts and functions. At death everything but spirit is destroyed and becomes extinct.”

“Moral life consists in the government of oneself. Immortality is the government of a human soul by the divine will.”

“As to ____, whom thou hast mentioned, it behoveth him to seek only the divine bounties and those subjects which lead to a real knowledge of the Invisible, through the mediation of the Holy Spirit. Then he will see through his innate perception the reality of the triune powers in man, for, verily, the sign of these triune powers which exist in mankind is spirit, mind and soul. Spirit is the power of life; mind is the power which apprehendeth the reality of things, and soul is the intermediary between the Supreme Concourse and the lower concourse. It (the soul) hath two phases—the higher aspireth to the kingdom of Bahá and the lights of the mind shine forth from that horizon upon its higher sphere. The other side inclineth to the lower concourse of the material world, and its lowest phase is enveloped in the darkness of ignorance. But when light is poured upon this phase and if the soul is capable of receiving it, then ‘truth hath come and falsehood vanisheth, for falsehood is of short duration.’ Otherwise, darkness will surround it from all directions and it will be deprived of association with the Supreme Concourse and will remain in the lowest depths.”—Tablets of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Vol. III, p. 611.

The two powers of man

“Spirit is universal. Man is created spirit in a potential degree. Growth is from a mental into a spiritual station, somewhat like the development from soldier to commander. God, himself, cannot compel the soul to become spiritual; the exercise of a free human will is necessary. We can point the way and furnish the example.—Ten Days in the Light of Acca, pp. 3-4.

“I desire each one of you to become so great that each may guide a country. The friends must now endeavour to attain to such a station as to teach the people of America. Divine qualities are unlimited. For this reason you must not be satisfied with one quality but must try to gain all. Each of you must improve himself that he may attain to nothing short of the best. When one stops (advancing) he descends. A bird when it is flying, soars; but as soon as it stops flying it falls. While man is directed upward he develops. As soon as he stops he descends. Therefore I wish the beloved of God always to ascend and to develop.

“There exist in man two powers. One power uplifts him—this is divine attraction which causes man’s elevation. In all the grades of existence he will develop through this power which belongs to the spirit. The other power causes man to descend; this is the animal nature. The first attracts man to [XIV:1:10] the Kingdom; the second brings him down to the created world. Now we must consider which of these will gain in strength. If the heavenly power wins, man will become heavenly, enlightened, merciful. But if the worldly power wins he will be dark, satanic and like the animal. Therefore he must advance continually. As long as the heavenly power is dominant man will ascend.”—‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Diary of Miss Juliet Thompson.

Degrees of existence

“There are two kinds of life. There is that existence which is palpable to our touch but does not grow or possess sensation—the mineral kingdom. Then there is the higher stage of existence, plant life, which grows but cannot feel. Above this is the animal kingdom which is palpable to touch and has the power of growth and feeling but cannot attain to the station of man which is the highest of all. That which is lower cannot perceive the higher. The mineral cannot understand or feel the plant; plants cannot understand or perceive the animals; and animals cannot comprehend man.

“Now these degrees all belong to one kingdom, are all composed of matter. As it is impossible for these different kingdoms belonging to the same world to understand one another so is it impossible for man to understand the things of the future life. For as the difference between these grades or conditions so is the difference between man and the spiritual kingdom. It is impossible for man to perceive or understand it because he has no power with which to perceive it. As a child in the matrix of its mother cannot understand the world outside so is the human conception on this earth. We can form no conception or idea of the heavenly Kingdom because we have no sense with which to perceive it.

“As it is not yet apparent while the child is in the matrix of its mother what its condition will be—whether or not it will have all the gifts of God, whether or not it will be perfect in all its members, whether it will be blind or deaf or dumb, but afterwards, when it enters the world it becomes clearly apparent if it be defective or not—so is it with the soul in its present state. Its perfections or its defects are not understood until it enters the heavenly Kingdom. Then they are clearly seen and then the soul understands whether or not it is lacking in the gifts of God.

“All the time, too, that the child is in the matrix of its mother it receives all its life and nourishment from (a source) outside of itself. If it were cut off from that life it would die. So it is with the soul here. If it is cut off from its spiritual food it dies.

“As a child in the matrix does not yet know the use of its members—what its eyes are for, its nose, ears or tongue—so also is it with the soul on earth. It cannot understand here the uses and powers of its spiritual gifts. But as soon as it enters the eternal Kingdom these will become apparent.”—‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Prayers, instructions, etc., p. 46.

The new birth

“The sacred books of all nations speak of the possibility of the new birth of man. What does this mean?

“A child in the matrix of its mother is in utter darkness. When it is born into the world it comes into the light. While in the matrix it cannot understand the uses of its faculties; but when it comes into the phenomenal world then the uses of hearing, speech, sight, etc., are understood. So when we leave here and go into the Kingdom of the Unseen we will know the uses of the bounties of God given to us in this world. Here we are prepared, and given faculties which are for use in that world. The new birth is realized in this world when we become characterized with the characteristics of God, when His name and attributes become our name and attributes.”—‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Notes taken at Acca about 1900. [XIV:1:11]

“By the power of the Holy Spirit working through his soul man is able to perceive the divine reality of things. All great works of art and science are witness to this power of the Spirit.

“The same Spirit gives eternal life. Those, alone, who are baptized by the Divine Spirit will be enabled to bring all peoples into the bond of unity. It is by the power of the Spirit that the Eastern world of spiritual thought can intermingle with the Western realm of action, so that the world of matter may become divine.”

“Bodily matters are not important. The physical suffering of Christ passed away, but his spirit was everlasting. These bodily sufferings come and pass away, but the spirit is eternal. The body is not important. The spirit is important. The shell is not so important, but the pearl inside the shell is of great importance. The glass or chimney is not so important, but the light itself is very important. There is no importance in outer words, but the importance is in the significances. This cup is of no importance, but the water herein is important. There is no importance in the house, but there is in the one who lives in it. Likewise, the physical body is not so important, but the spiritual body is of great importance.

“Human-kind have come to the world in innumerable numbers, and passed away; their physical bodies and that which belonged to them passed away with them. Their health and disease both passed away. Their rest and hardship both vanished. Their wealth and poverty ended. Their honour and misery terminated. But the reality of man is immortal. The spirit of man is everlasting. It is the spirit to which importance is to be attached. The difference (between spirit and body) is this, that one will enter the realm of enlightenment whereas the other will fall into the world of darkness.”—From Notes of Mrs I. D. Brittingham, Acca, October

“Be it known that to know the reality or essence of the soul of man is impossible, for in order to know a thing one must comprehend it, and since a thing cannot comprehend itself to know oneself in substance or essence is impossible. ... This much can be stated, that the reality of man is a pure and unknown essence constituting a depository emanating from the light of the Ancient Entity, God. This essence or soul of man because of its innate purity and its connection with the unseen Ancient Entity is old as regards time but new as regards individuality. This connection is similar to that of the rays to the sun—the effect to the primal cause. ...

“Since the pure essence, whose identity is unknown, possesses the virtues of the worlds of matter and of the Kingdom it has two sides: first, the material and physical; second, the mental and spiritual, which are attributes not found as qualities of matter. It is the same reality which is given different names, according to the different conditions wherein it is manifested. Because of its relation to matter and the phenomenal world when it governs the physical functions of the body it is called the human soul; when it manifests itself as the thinker, the comprehender, it is called the mind. And when it soars into the atmosphere of God and travels in the spiritual world it becomes designated as spirit. [XIV:1:12]

“There are two sides to man. One is divine, the other worldly; one is luminous, the other dark; one is angelic, the other diabolic. Man is like the animals in all sensuous conditions for all animal characteristics exist in him. Divine and satanic qualities are both contained in man—knowledge and ignorance, guidance and error, truth and falsehood, generosity and avarice, valour and timidity, inclination toward God and tendency toward Satan, chastity and purity, corruption and wickedness, economy and avidity, good and evil are all contained in man.

“If the angelic side becomes more powerful and the Divine Power and Brightness surround man then the second birth takes place and eternal life is attained at this point.”—From an address by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, published in The International Psychic Gazette, July 1914.

How the message came to Najaf

Jináb-i-Faḍl

An autobiographical story

Travelling in the Orient is fraught with many difficulties and inconveniences which you do not encounter in the West. We have no convenient methods of transportation. Some of the Eastern countries lack railroads. Consequently one must travel on camels, mules and other animals. One of the journeys which I undertook, in order to spread the fragrances of the rose garden of love and amity, was a trip to Najaf and Karbilá, two of the most important religious centres in the Muslim world. The city of Najaf is near Baghdád in Mesopotamia. Though small, yet, as it is the chief community of the Shí’ih,¹ it has extraordinary importance for the Muslim world. It is built in the middle of a sandy desert around which is nothing but wilderness—no trees, no foliage, no green or verdant pastures, nothing but wilderness. Far off on the horizon one will find, coming down the side of a hill, a small stream which has branched off from the Euphrates. Najaf contains the shrine, with its gilded dome, of one of the first Imáms¹ of Islám. It holds also the religious seminary of the Islamic world all of whose students carry on their theological studies in that centre. Therefore the heads and leaders of the Shí'ih school live in that small yet important centre.

In 1909 a very detailed and wonderful Tablet was sent by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Persia. In this Tablet 'Abdu'l-Bahá commands me to go to Arabia and convey the message of this Cause to the Divines of the Muslim world.

Upon receiving the Tablet and command I started on this eventful trip. From Tīhrán to Najaf, in every city that I entered I raised the call of the Kingdom. Meetings were held and the people were summoned to this Cause. On the way I stopped a few days in the [XIV:1:13] city of Káshán where there are many Bahá'ís. They insisted that I stay with them longer, but, as I told them, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had commanded me to go immediately to the city of Najaf: so they were satisfied. I wrote a letter to the Spiritual Assembly in Tīhrán laying the matter before them. The Spiritual Assembly wrote back: "Inasmuch as you have received a direct command from 'Abdu'l-Bahá to go and fulfil this mission, it is best that you start as soon as possible."

Travelling in the Orient is slow and it was a long time before I reached my destination. As a result (of this delay) the news of the purport of my journey to Najaf reached the 'Ulamás² long before my arrival. They had been telegraphed that such a person is on his way to teach to you this important Cause.

The mind of a Westerner cannot comprehend the animosity displayed by the people of the Orient for this brilliant Cause. The leaders of the Islamic religion, from the time of the appearance of the Báb in 1814, have gathered their forces together to eradicate the tree of this Cause. Therefore, before I arrived, they laid their plans so that as soon as I entered the city they might take me, throw me into prison, and do with me as they pleased. They even stationed a number of spies along the way in order that every stage of my journey might be reported to them. About a hundred miles out of Najaf, lo and behold, an unknown person appeared on the scene, expressing the warmest desire to accompany me and assist me on my way; later it was discovered that he was one of the spies.

After meeting many important persons and speaking in many cities and at many meetings I arrived in the city of Najaf. As I intended to remain there for some time in order to associate in friendly fashion with these leaders of religion I went about, for three days, hunting a house and other necessities for living. During these three days I met many of my former students, in the University of the Shí'ih, and they recognized me, and came to see me; and so the number of my friends day by day increased. I spoke with each one of them about the message of the Cause.

The third day, upon leaving my dwelling house I went to the large assembly hall of the thinkers and scholars. No sooner did I enter the hall than I saw how filled with anger were their faces. They looked at me as a wolf would look upon a sheep. A few of them told me that a large number of the 'Ulamás were anxious to meet me at my own home, therefore it would be better for me to meet them there, and that I should return home, for they were on their way. "We were not informed," they said "of the arrival of your honour, else we would have called upon you sooner. It was your duty to have informed us."

When I reached the gate of my house I found these 'Ulamás, whose number continued to increase. I took them into my reception room and began to talk to them of the spiritual principles of the Cause. I was completely ignorant of their plans to persecute me, nay, they had deeper plans—to attack the Cause. It was at the time when the governments of Persia and Turkey after much struggling had obtained their freedom, and had established constitutional forms of government. One of the fundamental tenets of a constitution is religious freedom. The Turkish government had nominally granted this; consequently the ‘Ulamás could not persecute me in the name of religion. The Shí’ih and the Sunní Universities convened meetings and invented certain plans by which they might persecute me, not in the name of religion but in the name of politics. We were entirely misinformed as to their activities.

When I finished my talk with these men one of them rose, saying: “We have come, on behalf of the ‘Ulamás, to investigate, and to find out what you have.” Then they began searching my few possessions.

I said: “I have not many things; but here they are. Come and look at them.” [XIV:1:14]

We had nothing whatever save Bahá’í books and literature. They seized a number of Bahá’í books written by Bahá’u’lláh also, other spiritual literature belonging to this Cause, with many Tablets and letters; with these they left the house and went to their leaders. Thinking that we might perhaps escape they left a number of their men to act as guards about the house.

Half an hour later a large crowd came rushing to the house; with them was a representative of the government of Persia, the Consul. It was an unruly mob and in their faces one could see the signs of hatred and animosity, while from their lips there issued all manner of unseemly words. The Persian representative did not let them go beyond the world of words; as soon as they began to attack me and do me harm he interfered. So they took me and all my baggage and carried me to the house of the Persian representative. The rest of our property was pillaged by these people and from the house of the Persian representative I was taken to prison and fetters were put upon my feet. In that narrow and gloomy cell I began to commune with and pray to the Glory of Glories. I had for companion another Bahá’í. I was not alone. We said, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has ordered us to come here and teach the ‘Ulamás of the Islamic world, but now that we have been thrown into prison and are in all this difficulty how can we accomplish our purpose? We did not take into account the fact that this very imprisonment would bring the name of the Cause to the attention of thousands and thousands of people. This had occurred by morning for, lo, but a few hours had passed before we be held a seething mob attacking the prison. They rushed into our cell, unlocked the fetters from my feet and carried me, almost on their shoulders, to the great hall of the leaders of Islám.

Upon entering this hall I saw that the elite of the Islamic theological world were present. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had mentioned the names of some of them, and they and all the rest were seated around this hall. The Tablets and books which had been seized in the morning were distributed among this large group of theologians and every one of them, it seemed to me, had a few sheets in his hands.

A volley of questions was now fired at me; and a volley of answers was returned. You probably all know that His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh lived for twelve years in Baghdád. The city of Najaf is very near to Baghdád and the people of that province are familiar with the grandeur and majesty of Bahá’u’lláh whose wisdom no one can deny. That fact which seems as anathema to the theologians and clergy of the Muslim world is that Bahá’u’lláh has changed the laws of Islám. First, the Muslim clergy believe in the uncleanness of all religions and nations other than their own. Bahá’u’lláh addresses all humanity, saying: “Ye are all the leaves of one tree and the fruits of one branch.” In my answer to them I made it quite clear that the universality of the religion of God was not something very unusual; they would find the same principle in their own Qur’án—and I began quoting verses from their own bible. The session lasted four hours. When they became weary they sent me back to my cell, placed the irons about my feet, and everything became quiet.

They arranged a still larger meeting for the next day and when they were all ready with their questions they came for me again, to take off the fetters and present me to their august body. For seven days these wondrous meetings continued and every day an inquiring, interested and curious crowd assembled and listened to the proofs concerning the message of the Kingdom. Many of them accepted the Cause. Others derided and repudiated it. During those seven days the only time that my feet were free to move about was when we had these meetings.

Among the Muslims there are many extraordinary tales about the Bahá'ís—one of which is that they are so powerful that when in jail even they [XIV:1:15] grow wings with which whenever they choose they fly out of the jail and enjoy the fresh and bracing outside air. As a matter of fact, the Bahá'ís, often imprisoned, would through their wonderful lives convert their jailer, and he would give them liberty to leave the jail when ever they wished.

This time the jailer did not listen to the call of the Kingdom and every day increased the size of the fetters fearing that I might fly out of the prison. The seventh day I saw through an opening a number of people cutting wood in the court. They were talking about me, but I could not understand all they said. When they came to the jail and took me out I realized that they had decided to put wooden stocks upon my hands and send me out of the town. They had cut out two stocks making a hole for the two hands preparatory to putting my hands into the stocks and carrying me away. The mayor of the city declared a holiday so that everyone could come out and see us in our gala array—and we were made very happy by this for we heard from the lips of the people the words and teachings of Bahá'u'lláh which they had memorized during the last few days while passing the literature from hand to hand.

They exiled us from Najaf to Baghdád, the Turkish guards accompanying us. Between Najaf and Baghdád there is a city called Karbilá. When we arrived there the guards, in order to rest and refresh themselves, put me in prison. In the prison I found a number of important Arabian prisoners, and as their hearts were kind and tender I began to speak with them. Immediately they accepted the Cause. They were so affected by what had occurred during the past few days that upon hearing the story they commenced to weep. In prison I wrote a letter to the Governor of Karbilá, urging him to grant me permission to see him. This Governor was a very liberal minded man and when we had the opportunity to talk with him about the Cause he felt the spirit and was transformed. He told me that although he was powerless to do anything for me in Karbilá—he would endeavour to obtain my freedom in Baghdád. He told me that although the Muslim clergy could not persecute him on account of religion yet they had charged him with certain political schemes, saying that he upheld Sulṭán 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd, the former despotic ruler of Turkey.

It took us four days to cover the distance from Karbilá to Baghdád and during that time I rode upon a donkey with my hands in the stocks. It was summertime and the heat was well-nigh unbearable. The donkey became so tired that often he would walk no longer, then, becoming unruly, he would throw me off. My hands were fettered and I knew not how to manage. The unfriendly muleteer whenever I fell from the donkey would come and kick me, saying: "O, you ignorant man, why do you not get up and ride your donkey. As a matter of fact this happened sixteen or seventeen times—that I fell from the donkey and they had to come and put me again upon its back. The confirmation and assistance of the Centre of the Covenant were so great that whenever we reached a town and rested for a day or night we were strengthened to teach one or two souls. For three days I was in Baghdád. In that jail I was permitted to reach many souls. Later on, the enemies planned to take us from there to Persia where there were many wild tribes, ready to attack and kill us on the instant. The 'Ulamás of Najaf had already written to the chiefs of these tribes that inasmuch as they were unable to kill “this man” under the law upon his arrival at the frontier of Persia they must at once attack and kill him. But they were utterly ignorant of the power of the Covenant. The Consul who was commissioned to take me to the frontier of Persia had the love of this Cause in his heart, and the Turkish governor did not fetter my hands at the time of my departure from the city. No one knew how or why this was forgotten [XIV:1:16] for it is a very important custom practiced upon all prisoners.

When we reached the frontier the guards turned us over to the Persian authorities who, with their men, instead of delivering us into the hands of the wild tribes, treated us with such loving kindness that we were amazed. As we continued our journey many lawless tribes and fanatical individuals lay in wait all along the way, ready to kill us—but they could not because these men were with us. Suddenly we came upon a large body of well armed Kurds. They came up to the carriage driver and asked: “Do you know of two Bahá’ís who were captured in Karbilá and Najaf and are being brought back to Persia?”

The carriage driver, who had now become attached to me and to my companion, answered: “No, I have not heard of them. Why do you want to know about these two men?”

“We want to capture them and, according to the message from the authorities, do away with them,” replied the Kurds.

They had even gone so far as to publish circulars which they spread throughout the city.

Through all these difficulties God protected us, until we reached the city of Ṭihrán. The government authorities in that city in order to quell the uprising decided that the best way to manage the affair would be to keep the two men in custody for some time, until the excitement had vanished.

I remained in Ṭihrán for a month associating with no one; then I started on my journey to the Holy Land to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. When I reached the presence of the Master he related all the details of this journey of mine, so that I marvelled, for it was as though he had been there and witnessed every detail of those things which had happened on this journey. The plans, the strategy, the scheming of those ‘Ulamás and the events which took place ‘Abdu’l-Bahá described. He said: “My purpose in sending you to that Ulamic centre was to spread the Cause and scatter the literature of the teachings and the books of this Movement. The result is now achieved and a great number of men and women are informed of this Movement.”

Later on a number of these ‘Ulamás who had become Bahá’ís came to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and now they are engaged in that very city in spreading the message.

These people thought that they were able to extinguish the lamp of God, but God, through His own invisible and mighty power scattered the rays of the sun of reality to the four corners of the earth.

This is but one of the incidents of my travels.

The wondrous light of the Cause

Selections from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s “soul-stirring Words to his loved ones in Persia, revealed some twenty-five years ago, and during the darkest days of his incarceration in the prison-city of ‘Akká.” Selected and translated by Shoghi Effendi and sent by him to the National Spiritual Assembly of America, March 1923.

[Selections available elsewhere have been omitted.]

O true servant of God!

The cycle in which thou hast been called to life is truly the cycle of the Ancient Beauty, and the age, the age of the Most Great Name. Hallowed and sanctified be the Lord that hath graciously favoured these poor servants of His to gaze upon such wondrous Light! Ours then to render Him thanks, in the daytime and in the night season, for His manifold blessings; to be self-sacrificing in the path of Bahá'u'lláh (may my life be offered up as a sacrifice at His threshold!); to strive for the spread of His Word; to endeavour to manifest His Signs, raise His Edifice, set forth His Proof, recount His Praise, and be lowly and humble, suppliant and submissive before Him; haply His Grace may aid us to prove our gratitude for His bestowals. Wherefore, unloose thy tongue to deliver the Divine Message and diffuse His fragrance.

(Signed) 'Abdu'l-Bahá

O friend!

... A celestial fire hath been kindled in the very heart of mankind, and burns brightly in the Sacred Tree. Ere long its glowing flame shall set ablaze the souls of men and its light illumine the regions of the world.

The signs of God have appeared, the mysteries of the Kingdom are revealed, and the secret of all that hath been recorded in the Holy Writ been made manifest. Wherefore doubt and hesitate? ...

Now that that Ravisher of hearts has spurred on His charger into the arena of Truth, and all that hath been hidden is revealed, why be still and silent, heedless and forgetful? The Divine Candle hath thrown its beams upon the world, whilst the heedless, veiled and afflicted, languish, moth-like, in their darkness of [XIV:1:19] error. Now is the hour to be stirred even as the surging billows of the sea, and seek to attain the heights of the stars ... for time is fleeting, and the Divine Messenger will tarry no longer. Let us make haste, and let our lamps be burning.

O ye the valiant servants and handmaids of the All-Glorious!

Agès, cycles, nay thousands of generations must pass before the Sun of Truth may mount its zenith and shine again in its full splendour. Now that, praise be to God, ye have been called to life and gathered together in this Age, the Age of the Desired One, the ever-praised Beauty, the Day-Star of the Kingdom, the Most Great Luminary of the Realm on High, (may my life be offered up as a sacrifice unto His servants!) how thankful ye must be! How faithfully and fervently should we praise and glorify His Name, inasmuch as He hath graciously aided us to receive this, His most great Blessing! Ten thousand lives be offered for this glory and triumph; ten thousand souls be a sacrifice for such infinite care and this great victory! The holy ones of old, whenever they imagined the wondrous vision of the Age of Bahá'u'lláh they felt as thunder-struck, and yearned for but a fleeting moment of that glorious Hour. Praised be the Lord, we have attained thereunto and been immersed in His Ocean of Glory!

(Signed) 'Abdu'l-Bahá

O thou endued with the Spirit of Life!

The Call of God hath proved the very life of the universe, and the animating spirit of mankind. Behold! how it hath vivified the heart of man, and stirred the conscience of the world! Ere long its signs shall be made manifest, and the fast asleep shall be awakened.

The Glory of God rest upon thee!

Mirrors of the Master

Addresses of Jináb-i-Fáḍil and a special interview

Juliet Thompson

New York City,
6 March 1923.

The power of God's confirmation, in its fullness, is very mysterious. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said once to us in 'Akká: "The magnetism for the Word of God is sincerity of intention, and until you are entirely emptied of yourselves you will never be sincere enough." Jináb-i-Fáḍil is one entirely emptied of himself and filled with the love of God, and therefore whose words have a penetrative power, because the "trace of the Word of God" is in them. When he speaks the word "forgiveness" the attribute of forgiveness grows in your heart; when he speaks the word "faith" you step into the world of faith; his own holiness and wisdom illumine the word "love". By his positive representation of the attributes of the Kingdom, of the greatness of the life of the Kingdom, we see clearly where we have fallen short, where we have been childishly unseeing, where the self has gotten in the way of the larger handling of things. We see how easy it is for love—love and faith—to conquer all—to solve simply every complicated problem.

When I went to him yesterday to ask him for news for the Star of the West—news of Shoghi Effendi and Haifa—he said:

"His Holiness Shoghi Effendi has commanded all over the world that wherever there were nine Bahá'ís there should be a spiritual assembly and that the members of every House of Spirituality should be elected on the condition that they possess all the attributes mentioned by Bahá'u'lláh. These Houses of Spirituality must be in direct communication with one another, must benefit by one another—in other words, must co-operate with and assist one another. They must be like the active power and the active members of the same body. All are joined to the Heart which is in Haifa.

"One of the teachings of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh is the Law of Consultation. The people of Bahá, in order to promulgate the Cause, should help and aid one another in all their affairs.

"His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh in his epistles and books, states that the 'tent of the order of the world is upheld by two pillars—reward and punishment', and the Heaven of the Command of God is illumined by two stars—benevolence and consultation.

"In the epistles and tablets of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá the foundation of consultation is laid down—that all the [XIV:1:28] individual Bahá'ís may be joined and connected together like members of the same body, so that no event could separate them, or cause dissension among them.

"His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in reference to consultation, states: 'The electricity of reality is produced by the friction of two opposite ideas'. When people consult together the friction of reality always is produced. Therefore the Bahá'ís, by the blending of thoughts, consultation and co-operation, should rise for the propagation of the Cause and diffuse its fragrances to the hearts and minds of the people.

"Of the great construction of the Cause planned by His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Shoghi Effendi is laying the foundation. And that construction is the building of consultation, union and co-operation among the Bahá'ís so that the Bahá'ís of the East and West may become like unto members of the same body, uniting their powers. Unitedly should they arise for the promulgation of the Cause, so that the banner of the oneness of mankind may be unfurled from the horizon of the world, that the children of the world may manifestly see this standard,

Jináb-i-Fáḍil said further:

“I am greatly pleased with the immense activities of the Bahá’ís in this city. They are engaged incessantly and untiringly in the promulgation of this great Cause. From every corner of New York City the call of the Kingdom is raised. Day and night those who have dedicated their lives are engaged in unfurling the banner of the Oneness of Mankind.”

Jináb-i-Fáḍil’s first appearance in New York was at St. Mark’s in the Bowery, where friends from Boston and Canada joined the New York friends in welcoming him.

The following night he honoured my house by meeting a group of the teachers here, answering their questions. He spoke of His Holiness Shoghi Effendi in a way that enkindled in every heart a longing to make the pilgrimage to the Sacred Spot, where, as Jináb-i-Fáḍil made it so clear, the Divine Centre of the Covenant, from his Abhá Kingdom, is reflecting himself in the mirror of Shoghi Effendi. Shoghi Effendi, Jináb-i-Fáḍil told us, is the perfect mirror of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. In him we see again our beloved Master. In face, in gesture, even in quality of mind, Shoghi Effendi gives back amazingly the reflection, the likeness, of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Friday evening he addressed Mr Bert Randall’s group at St. Mark’s, where he explained the Hidden Word, “Unreal friends love one another for their personal interests, but the Real Friend loveth and hath loved you for the sake of yourselves”, and where he also gave a talk the substance of which he repeated to me for the Star of the West. Its subject was “The salvation of man from egotism”.

“Self and ego,” he said, “were like a cage, a prison. A man may be outwardly prosperous, but if he does not save himself from egotism, he is degraded and debased; while outside of the prison of self he is free, though (bodily) he might be in the greatest prison. Salvation from self is only possible through the Manifestations of God, through love for Him, faith in Him, service in His path. The lives of the followers and adherents of the Manifestations of God are the greatest proof for the validity of this statement. The disciples of His Holiness Christ and the adherents of His cause forgot themselves in such wise that they sacrificed themselves for the world of humanity. There are no other means for salvation from self except through faith, love and service. Those who become ascetics, weakening their bodies in order to reach the ideal state, will never attain to their object, for weakness of body is conducive merely to weakness of spirit; because a sound soul is only in a sound body. Therefore, we must have strong bodies and strong souls [XIV:1:29] that we may rise for the service of mankind.”

Jináb-i-Fáḍil speaks sublimely on forgiveness, with a power in his simple words so amazing that whatever of the poison of resentment remains in our hearts is somehow immediately washed away. No matter what we suffer from others we must at once forgive, he says, leaving the outcome of everything in the hands of God. We may gently admonish, speaking frankly, but always with love and forgiveness in our hearts. The Bahá’í martyrs softened the hearts of many of their persecutors, by the love they displayed to these enemies, under the very sword, even giving away their possessions to their murderers. One of these martyrs said to the man appointed to kill him: “My clothes and the money in my pockets are yours.” The man could hardly go on with the execution; but the Bahá’í said: “Finish your work. You cannot help it.”

Whenever Jináb-i-Fáḍil speaks he gives us great examples of deeds, of heroic living, either from the lives of the Manifestations of God, or from their sincere followers, detached and lofty spirits who, lifted entirely above the influences of this world, manifest naught save greatness of spirit, the greatness of the unconquerable love of God. On this positive aspect of life he dwells, till all that is less becomes revealed in the true measure of its littleness and unworthiness.

Of Jináb-i-Fáḍil, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has written, “there is considerable difference between him and others.”

Tonight Jináb-i-Fáḍil spoke of the ascension of the holy reality of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the Abhá Kingdom and of his increasing power throughout the world, resulting from his freedom from his body. He told us wonderful stories of the quickening of the work in Russia, of the stirring of a new life in Turkey, Egypt, among all nations. And he ended by saying that we are as many mirrors and the unseen Master is a Sun in the midst of mirrors. He told us the following beautiful tale:

In a meeting in Bákú he had observed a man so humble that he marvelled at such a degree of humility, and wondered how he had attained it. Later he was told the story.

The man had been born a Muslim, and had been a highwayman and a murderer. But one day he asked himself—“If indeed there is a God, how shall I fare for the way I have lived?”

At last he sought out a Mullá and begged to be shown how to win the forgiveness of God. The Mullá said:

“I will tell you. Go, and find a Bahá’í and kill him, and you will be forgiven all your sins.”

This made the man very happy, for, he said, “This is the easiest way for me to win forgiveness.”

So he found a Bahá’í, who was a baker, and one day went into his bakery and began to heap insults on him, to provoke the Bahá’í, in order to have some pretext to kill him. But the more he insulted the Bahá’í the kinder the Bahá’í became. After a while the Bahá’í asked him to be seated and brought him food, then told him of the coming of the Blessed Perfection, and the man was obliged to give up for that time killing the Bahá’í, saying to himself, “I must try again, when he is not so kind.”

However, when he returned the second time the Bahá’í was still kinder, and on the third occasion showed a spirit so divine that his would-be-murderer, already two-thirds a Bahá’í, became entirely converted. On each visit, Jináb-i-Fáḍil said, a third of him became converted.

Wholly converted at last, he said to the Bahá’í, “Now I want to go and kill that Mullá.”

But the Bahá’í answered: “Rather, you must go and guide him, for among Bahá’ís there is no spirit of revenge—there is only peace and love.”

Studies in immortality

Part II

New revelations of the unseen world

There are human sciences and divine sciences. There is human knowledge acquired through a chain of many minds laboriously building up sets of facts, and there is divine knowledge given to humanity at intervals by a great mind which sees with the Inner Sight.

Seventy years on earth, and then countless millions of years in the unseen Kingdom—such is the relation of mortal life to life eternal. One hundred years, even, on earth, is to the life beyond the Gateway as a tick of the clock to an eternal day. For all humanity, therefore, the absorbing question must be: What is the nature of the life in that endless eternity!

Who are the authorities on this subject of life beyond death? The materialists who deny all that cannot be seen and touched? The traditionalists who accept nothing new? The philosophers who adhere to human reason alone as impregnable in all its deductions—deductions which change from century to century, even during the lifetime of the philosopher himself?

The materialistic scientist, the scientific philosopher follows certain immutable laws and works along them for his logical sequences. The searcher for divine truth, equally scientific, asks what is that law of the divine universe by which we may recognize our great, trustworthy authority?

“Blessed are the pure in heart,” said Jesus, “for they shall see God.” And those who can see God can see His immortal Kingdom. But where is the heart which is absolutely pure?

There are many degrees of existence. As the plant cannot understand the animal, as the animal is powerless to comprehend the glory of the human intellect, so man is unable to comprehend spiritual verities until he is spiritually reborn. “Except one be born from above,” said Jesus to Nicodemus, “he cannot see the Kingdom of God.” “Nicodemus had an earthly mind and only understood earthly things. Heavenly things are alone understood by heavenly minds.” “As to the worlds whereunto Christ referred—unto whom be great glory—(the many mansions),” writes ‘Abdu’l-Bahá “they are spiritual, divine, heavenly, single, unlocated; neither the imperfect mind can comprehend them nor the sinning soul can know them. But verily the vision of the people of the Kingdom of Bahá perceives them and the intellects of the people of the Supreme Concourse apprehend them.”

In a word, the masters of divine science are those who have divine character. [XIV:2:36] Knowing themselves, they know their God, because He abides within them. The most pure, perfect and divine of men are the great world prophets. It is through contact with their teachings and their spirits, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has so wonderfully explained in the article on education in this present issue, that human beings are spiritually reborn. In fact, the degrees of existence are: first, the mineral; second, the plant; third, the animal; fourth, the rational soul; fifth, the spiritually reborn, and sixth the Divine Prophets. These Divine Prophets are so pure and perfect that we call them the primal mirrors, the Manifestations of God. When they tell us of the many mansions of the Father’s house they speak of what they have seen and heard. Their utterances are revelations of eternal verities. “I have yet many thing to say unto you,” said Jesus, “but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit when he, the Spirit of Truth is come, he shall guide you into all the Truth.”

Our age of doubt is divinely blessed in having in its midst such masters, who reveal the fuller truth about immortal life. Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá have given the most complete descriptions of life in the unseen worlds of God recorded in spiritual literature.

Some questions answered by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Question: What will become of the soul of man after death?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: The body goes under the earth. Thence it came and thither it goes. Everything that you see returns to its own place. As the human body came from dust, to dust it returns. But the human spirit comes from God and to Him it returns.—Star of the West, VII:9, p. 77.

“Thus, it is apparent that the soul, even as the body, has its own individuality. But if the body undergoes a change, the spirit need not be touched. When you break a glass on which the sun shines, the glass is broken, but the sun still shines! If a cage containing a bird is destroyed, the bird is unharmed! If a lamp is broken, the flame can still burn bright!

“The same thing applies to the spirit of man.”—Paris Talks, pp. 65–66.

The spirits of the sons of the Kingdom, after the disintegration of this body ascend to the world of eternal existence; but should you ask the place, know thou that that world of existence is the world of unity, but the grades are different. For instance, the mineral existence has a grade, but the mineral being has no knowledge of the vegetable kingdom. It (the mineral existence) has no information of a higher realm, nay, rather, according to appearances it may deny the higher grade. Likewise, vegetable life has no knowledge of the animal kingdom. It is entirely heedless and unconscious of that kingdom, because the grade of the animal is higher than that of the vegetable. The vegetable, owing to its limited environment, is veiled from knowledge of the animal kingdom and may deny it, although the animal, the vegetable and the mineral live in the world of existence. Likewise the animal cannot comprehend man's faculties of intelligence which generalize concerning the universal and discover the mysteries of being, so that while living in the East he organizes and founds institutions in the West, and he reveals hidden things. Though he abides in Europe he discovers America; though he dwells upon the earth he unravels the realities of the solar system. The animal is entirely unconscious of, nay, rather, is a denier of this intelligent force which penetrates into the unknown and comprehends the general as well as the particular ideas of this illimitable universe.

Likewise the people of the world lack knowledge of the world of the Kingdom, nay, rather, they deny it. Do we not hear from their lips words such as these: "Where is the Kingdom? Where is the Lord of the Kingdom?" But these souls are like unto the mineral and vegetable who know nothing of the animal and human kingdoms. They neither see nor search. However, the mineral, the vege- [XIV:2:37] table and the animal all live in this world of existence.

The divine trials are in this world, not in the world of the Kingdom.

The human reality in the other world has no physical likeness, nay, rather, it has the likeness of the Kingdom, which consists of the harmonious elements of the realm of the spiritual kingdom.

The centre of the Sun of Truth and of the supreme world is the Divine Kingdom. Those souls who are purified and sanctified, after the disintegration of this elemental tabernacle hasten to the Divine Realm, and that realm is in this universe, but the people of this world have no knowledge of it, just as the mineral and vegetable kingdoms have no knowledge of the animal and human kingdoms.—From a Tablet to Mr and Mrs Ostburg, Boston, Massachusetts.

Question: "Do the dead pass entirely away from the earth, losing all consciousness of and interest in the people and affairs of the world?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "No, the dead retain both interest in and remembrance of those they love."—From Mrs Aline Devine's notes, taken at 'Akká, October 1906.

Question: "What is the connection of the spirit with the body?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "It has the same connection as the sun has with the mirror. Death is the name for the dissolution of this connection."—From Mírzá Maḥmúd's Diary, July 1912.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Concerning the question of death, know that the spirit is abstracted and sanctified from all things; for entrance and departure, ascent and descent, union and separation are the properties of material beings and not of the spirit. Consequently, the human spirit does not enter into the physical body, nay, rather, it has some 'attachment' (to it). This 'attachment' is like that of the mirror and the sun. The sun neither enters into nor does it go out of the surface of the mirror, nor does it absolutely identify itself with it, but it (the sun) has some attachment to the mirror and reflects itself therein. However, when this attachment is broken the mirror is deprived of illumination, beauty and effulgence."—From Tablet to Madame D'Astre of Paris, dated 21 May 1908.

Question: "What is meant by the Mirror for Divine Reflection?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "'Mirror' is the whole body, the brain in particular. Body has many elements in its composition and these are continually changed during one's lifetime. At dissolution each element is received back to its original source. The physical body of man is like that of the animal, the only difference being on the level of consciousness. It follows therefore that only consciousness or mind is left after death. Electricity is known by its attributes and effects. The power of consciousness is also thus recognized. After death the condition is one which cannot be clearly explained in words. It is one of comprehension, understanding which involves all other things—feeling, etc.

"In beings there are degrees; all are not in the same station. Observe the various characters to be seen and compared, say, among ten children who have received identically the same treatment, training and food. Three degrees will be found, which might be classed as, rapid development, less rapid, and almost stagnant."

Question: "Is there any predominant quality which man should develop in order to obtain especial excellence or power after death?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "No, man should develop all his qualities for each quality has its own use and function."

Question: "Is individuality retained by the various individual consciousnesses?"

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "Complete individuality belongs only to the station of the Prophet. Those who follow him are under the 'shadow' of his station. After death man does not develop through conscious effort, but through the power of Divine Bounty or unfoldment. All good works, loving memories, prayers and help from lesser beings assist the soul to push forward after death."—Questions asked at Ramleh, May 1911.

'Abdu'l-Bahá: "You will retain your individuality and will not be swallowed up in one vast spirit. Concerning the condition of the human soul after its ascension from the material world: the essence of the human soul is clarified from material substances and purified from the embodiment of physical things. It is exclusively luminous; it has no body; it is a dazzling pencil of light; it is a celestial orb of brightness."

"Those souls who are not vivified and attracted by the Holy Spirit are accounted among the dead, because their souls are deprived of the Breath of the Holy Spirit; and these, after physical death, are in a certain condition, having feeling and discernment in their environment; but in comparison with the pure souls who have been vivified by the Holy Spirit they are as dead, and deprived of life."—From an early Tablet to Mr F. C. Helbry, Tacoma, Washington.

"Thou hast asked concerning the spirits of men. They are not at all annihilated. They are immortal. But the spirits of heavenly souls will find eternal life, that is, they will attain to the highest and most great stations of perfection. But the spirits of the heedless souls although they are immortal yet they are in a world of imperfection, concealment and ignorance. This is a concise answer. Contemplate, and meditate upon it in order that thou mayest comprehend the reality of the mysteries in detail. For instance, no matter how much the mineral has existence and life yet, in comparison with man, it is entirely non-existent and deprived of life. When man is transformed, translated, from life to death, his comparative station will be that of the mineral existence. In such wise, the mineral life typifies the death of man. This is a brief answer.

“We cannot realize in this world the bounty of God nor can we appreciate His love. But in the next world we can do so.”

The glory of immortal life

From the Words of Bahá'u'lláh.

“But concerning that which you have asked about the spirit and its everlastingness after its ascension: know that it will ascend at the time of its departure until it enters the presence of God in a form which throughout all centuries and times and throughout all circumstances and events of the world will remain unchanged but will be everlasting as the perpetuity of the Kingdom of God, His sovereignty, His power and His might, and from it will appear the traces of God, His qualities, providences and favours.

“The pen cannot move at the mentioning of this station as it is in its supremeness and exaltation. The Hand of Divine Bounty will cause the spirit to enter into a station which cannot be comprehended by expression nor be explained by all the creatures of existence. Blessing be upon the spirit who departed from the body purified from the doubts and superstitions of the nations. Verily it moves in the atmosphere of God's pleasure and enters into the Supreme Paradise. All the angels of the Supreme Paradise attend and surround it; and it will have fellowship with all the prophets of God and His saints and will speak with them and tell them what happened to it in the Cause of God, the Lord of the universe. If anyone could realize what hath been assigned in the Kingdom of God, the Lord of the throne and the dust, he would immediately yearn with a great longing for that immovable, exalted, holy and most glorious station.

“O 'Abdu'l-Vahháb, now listen in the Persian language!

“As you asked about the immortality of the spirit, this Wronged One beareth witness to its eternity; and as to your question about its form—it cannot be described, and is not needful to be expressed; but only some things need to be known and messengers come only to guide the creatures to the straight path of God and in order that people may be trained. Then at the time of their ascen- [XIV:2:39] sion, with perfect holiness and separation and having been cut from the things of this world, they will repair to the Supreme Station. By the Self of God, the rays of those spirits are the cause of the development of the people and the station of the nations! These are the leaves of existence and the greatest cause of the appearance of divinity and the works of the universe. By them the clouds will shower and the plants of earth spring up. Not one thing of all existing things is without cause, reason and beginning. The greatest cause is that the spirits were and are forever above us unequal. And the difference between this (earthly) kingdom and the other is as the difference between the embryonic world and this world. After its ascension the spirit will enter into the presence of God in a form suited for eternity and for the Kingdom.”

Eternal reunion

From Tablets of Abdul-Baha Abbas.

“O thou spiritual friend! This world is a prison for heavenly souls and this earthly world is but a cage, and not a nest, unto divine birds. A prisoner who is awake and conscious will certainly seek for freedom, and a mindful bird will certainly wish for deliverance from the cage.”—Vol. I, p. 109.

“Do not grieve on account of the death of thy son, neither sigh nor lament. That nightingale soared up to the divine rose garden; that drop returned to the most great ocean of truth; that foreigner hastened to his native abode and that one who was ill found salvation and life eternal.—Vol. I, p. 99.

“Be not grieved at the death of thy dear daughter. That divine bird flew away to the rose garden of the Merciful and that plant of humanity hastened to the garden of the Kingdom of Abhá. That drop returned to the Most Great Sea and that ray betook herself to the Most Great Orb. Be happy and thankful, because thou wilt see her face shining in the Divine Kingdom and wilt find her as a lamp amid an assembly in the spiritual heaven.”—Vol. I, p. 179.

“Be not sorrowful on account of the departure of thy good son. He hath indeed departed from this narrow and gloomy world, which is darkened by unlimited sorrow, unto the Kingdom which is spacious, illumined, joyous and beautiful. God delivered him from this dark well and promoted him to the Supreme Height. He gave him wings whereby he soared to the heaven of happiness. Verily this is the great mercy, from Him who is Precious and Forgiving.”—Vol. I, p. 51.

“Mrs ____ hastened from this mortal world to the divine world and soared from this temporal realm to the expanse of the Kingdom. She abandoned the earthly cage and flew toward the bower of the upper world; so that, like unto a nightingale of significances she may in that divine rose garden engage in praising, glorifying and sanctifying the True One with the most marvellous melody. Consequently, do ye not sigh in grief because of her decease and be not dejected on account of her ascension.

“To the people of adoration death is an ark of deliverance and to pure souls flight from this world of dust is the means of attaining to the kingdom of spheres. By ‘spheres’ is not meant this infinite space, nay, rather, is meant the divine world and the invisible realm.”—Vol. II, p. 443.

“O my dear daughter! ... Indeed the separation from thy dear husband is very hard and difficult for thee. But he obtained the privilege of beholding the beauty of the Almighty. We, and you will also soar to that world, and you will find his shining face visible in the heavenly realm and in the world of the Kingdom, and you will find eternal union with him.

“Be thou assured that he has not been lost; he is in existence, that is, in the pure world. And know thou for certain that thou hast not lost him, for thou shalt find him in the end.

“Have therefore patience and endurance and be thou firm and at rest, and seek [XIV:2:40] God’s mercy and benevolence in his behalf. I, too, will pray and beg for him everlasting glory. Be patient, so that thou mayest find great reward and see thy respected husband in the Divine Kingdom in the end, and find peace of soul and rest of heart.”—From a Tablet of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to a friend in Cleveland, Ohio.

“O thou beloved maidservant of God, although the loss of a son is indeed heart-breaking and beyond the limits of human endurance, yet one who knoweth and understandeth is assured that the son hath not been lost but, rather, hath stepped from this world into another, and she will find him in the divine realm. That reunion shall be for eternity, while in this world separation is inevitable and bringeth with it a burning grief.

“Praise be unto God that thou hast faith, art turning thy face toward the everlasting Kingdom and believest in the existence of a heavenly world. Therefore be thou not disconsolate, do not languish, do not sigh, neither wail nor weep; for agitation and mourning deeply affect his soul in the divine realm.

“That beloved child addresseth thee from the hidden world: ‘O thou kind Mother, thank divine Providence that I have been freed from a small and gloomy cage and, like the birds of the meadows, have soared to the divine world—a world which is spacious, illumined, and ever gay and jubilant. Therefore, lament not, O Mother, and be not grieved; I am not of the lost, nor have I been obliterated and destroyed. I have shaken off the mortal form and have raised my banner in this spiritual world. Following this separation is everlasting companionship. Thou shalt find me in the heaven of the Lord, immersed in an ocean of light.’”—Selections from Writings of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, No. 171, p. 201. Tablet translated by Shoghi Effendi, 18 January 1918.

“O thou whose soul is tranquillized by the grace of God and by the Greatest Gift! Verily I inform thee of that by which thy breast will be dilated with joy, thy heart will rejoice and thy soul will be delighted in every time and moment. And it is this, that verily thy honoured Wife, who journeyed unto God and hastened unto the Blessed Spot, her heart ignited with the fire of the love of God and her sight and gaze extended toward the Kingdom of Abhá, was firm in the Testament, and was overtaken by death in the land of Beirut, is now attracted to ‘The Living One who shall never die’.

“Verily, she surrendered her life while she was in a condition wherein she was encompassed with the glad tidings of thy Lord from all directions and her nostrils were perfumed with the fragrances of holiness from the Supreme Concourse. Her soul soared up to the summit of sanctity, under the shelter of the mercy of thy Lord, the Mighty, where the concourse of the chosen ones are assembled around it in the Lofty Paradise, and the angels of mercy are blessing it and are speaking its praise while their faces are smiling because of her ascension to heaven.

“By the life of God, wert thou informed of her prosperity and of the bounty with which she is surrounded and of the favours of thy Lord, which were her greatest desire, thou wouldst smile with joy, thy breast would be dilated and thou wouldst thank God for that which He hath poured upon her; that He hath adorned her with the embroidery of sanctity and purity in His Kingdom, the Abhá; and that He hath crowned her with the diadem of the Greatest Gift in the Supreme Concourse.—From an early Tablet to Mr Percells of Chicago.

Preparation for the immortal degrees

“O servants! If in these visible days and in this present world conditions contrary to your wish appear from the Realm of Decree be ye not depressed for happy and divine days shall come and spiritual worlds of holiness shall be manifest. In all those days and worlds for you a portion is ordained, a sustenance is deter- [XIV:2:41] mined and a food is established. Ye shall certainly attain to all these, should ye exchange the garment of mortality for the garment of immortality and enter the station of the paradise of Abhá which is the everlasting abode of glorious, sacred souls. All things are a proof of your existence, if ye emerge from the gloomy dust of non-existence. Be not grieved at the hardships of these numbered days and be not dejected if your outward bodies are destroyed in the Path of the Beloved One; for every destruction is followed by a construction and a paradise of rest is concealed in every hardship.”—Words of Bahá’u’lláh.

“In the beginning of his life man was in the matrix of the world. There he obtained capacity and preparation for this world. The forces and powers necessary for this world he obtained there. In this world he needed eyes; he received them potentially in the other world. He needed ears; therefore he obtained them in the world of the matrix. Thus was he prepared for this world. When he came to this world he found that all the necessary forces were ready; all his needs for material sustenance were provided.

“Likewise, in this world he must also prepare himself and become ready for the life hereafter. That which he needs in the world of the Kingdom he must obtain here. Just as man prepared himself for existence in this world by acquiring the necessary forces in the world of the matrix so is it necessary that all the forces needful in the Kingdom be acquired in this world.

“After he is transferred from this world to the other world what is man in need of for the life of the Kingdom? In that world there is need of radiance; therefore radiance must be acquired in this world. In that world there is need of spirituality; he must acquire spirituality in this world. In that world faith and assurance, the knowledge of God and the love of God are essential; these he must acquire in this world so that after he ascends from this world to that immortal world he shall find ready for him all that is needful in that life eternal.”—From the Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

“The more difficulties one sees in the world the more perfect one becomes. The more you plough and dig the ground the more fertile it becomes. The more you cut the branches of a tree the higher and stronger it grows. The more you put the gold in the fire the purer it becomes. The more you sharpen the steel by grinding the better it cuts. Therefore, the more sorrows one sees the more perfect one becomes. That is why, in all times, the Prophets of God have had tribulations and difficulties to withstand. The more often the captain of a ship is in the tempest and difficult sailing the greater his knowledge becomes. Therefore I am happy that you have had great tribulations and difficulties. For this I am very happy—that you have had many sorrows. Strange it is that I love you and still I am happy that you have sorrows.”—From a Tablet of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, about 1910.

“Convey my spiritual greetings to the maidservant of God ... and say unto her: “Verily for each one of the Manifestations of the previous cycles there was a certain station in existence, and a particular degree in the creation of man. But the Manifestation of the Greatest Name—may my spirit be a sacrifice for His beloved ones—was an expression of maturity and perfection in the essence of humanity and the world of existence; just as the sun is the centre of light, the source of heat and the point of illumination, comprising all the perfections which were manifested to the world from the shining stars. Endeavour, so that thou mayest obtain an abundant portion and a great share from the Manifest Light.

“Verily I say unto thee, if thou arrivest at that station thou shalt behold all the holy people humble and submissive at that station. Make haste in life before death, spring before autumn, healing before sickness. Thus mayest thou be- [XIV:2:42] come a spiritual physician, healing all manner of diseases by the breaths of the Holy Spirit in this glorious century and manifest age.”—From a Tablet of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, 1902, to Mrs I. D. Brittingham.¹

Two kinds of education

The idealistic youth of today long for education as for the fountain of living water. They make countless sacrifices, work day and night to win an education, travel half-way around the world that they may enter a modern scientific and technical university. China, Japan, India, Turkey, Egypt, Persia, in fact almost every country of the world is sending its brightest youth to the great universities and technical colleges of Europe and America. The true leaders in all countries today are realizing that education is the only solution for our social and international problems.

But what kind of an education shall it be? A brilliant technical education, alone, may be used for the destruction of all civilization. Education is what makes modern warfare so terrible. Present day generals and engineers, chemists and airmen are so finely trained in modern science and its technical application that they can destroy human beings with an efficiency undreamed of in all past ages.

Evidently something is lacking in western education. 'Abdu'l-Bahá strikes the keynote for the future in the following address upon the essential necessity of education. He answers the question which the whole world is asking. This address was given by him in the Unitarian Church at Dublin, New Hampshire, Sunday, 11 August 1912. It was taken down in Persian and given by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Dr Baghdádí who, with two friends, has rendered it into English for this issue of the Star of the West.

That the world of nature is imperfect and needs education is to the wise beyond question. Consider, man uneducated is in utmost barbarism and distress; through education man becomes a man. Left to himself he will be as other animals. Look at the civilized countries. There man is educated acquires ideals, becomes civilized, wise and perfect. But in savage countries, such as Central Africa, man, because he receives no education, remains in the state of barbarism. The difference between America and Central Africa is this that in the United States there is education and in Africa there is no education. The people of Africa have remained in their natural state; but among the inhabitants of this country (America) education has great effect and is firmly established.

Education straightens a crooked branch. Education makes the jungle into a rose garden. Education causes the fruitless tree to become fruitful, changes the thorn patch into a cultivated field, makes devastated countries to flourish. Through education the savage become civilized. Through education the ignorant become wise, the imperfect are made perfect. Education informs man of the world of the Kingdom, makes him aware of God. Education endows man with spiritual susceptibilities, enables him to discover the mysteries of nature, makes him aware of the realities of the Kingdom. In short, it is clear to all that the [XIV:2:43] world of nature is imperfect, and through education will attain perfection.

But for education man would have remained as other animals, nay, lower than animals for some deeds proceed from man which do not occur among the animals. For instance, the animal to satisfy his hunger may devour one animal. But man, devoid of education, and ferocious, kills in a day a hundred thousand people. Consider how those ferocious souls who have come into the world are lower even than wolves, are beneath the carnivorous animals. It is evident that if man is not educated he is lower than an animal.

There are two kinds of education: divine and material. The philosophers who have arisen are material teachers, have given the people material training and have been the cause of the progress of the world of nature. But the holy Manifestations of God are divine educators. The philosophers have educated the world of bodies; the divine, holy Manifestations have trained souls. His Holiness Christ—unto him be glory!—was a spiritual educator, the educator of the Kingdom, the Divine Educator. He educated souls, trained the human reason to see the verities of the spirit. But the philosophers have served material civilization, educating from the material standpoint.

Man, in reality, is in need of both material and divine education. If, however, he does not receive heavenly instruction, if he receives material education only he will be as other animals, for animals discover the bodily verities, the facts of nature, the realities which can be sensed. But God has created in man a power which may perceive mental verities and which may discover the realities of the Kingdom. That power becomes aware of divine bounties, is the cause of eternal life, bestows ideal perfections. That power distinguishes man from the animal because the animal knows but the nether world while man discovers the verities of Heaven.

Man though he progress materially is in need of the breaths of the Holy Spirit, of divine education, of the outpourings of the Kingdom. Not until man receives this bounty can he become perfect. Therefore the holy, divine Manifestations have appeared in every cycle and dispensation so that they may give the human souls this divine education, may banish the imperfections of the human world and make manifest ideal perfections. The world of nature is like a jungle. His Holiness the Christ was the divine gardener. He made this jungle to be a rose garden, these fruitless trees fruitful. These lands which according to the laws of nature should bring forth weeds and tares he filled with roses and tulips. This Divine Farmer sowed the earth with seeds; the worthless grass he threw away. The thorn bushes which according to the law of nature should grow he rooted out, and through divine education the thorny place became a rose garden. Had it remained in its original state it would have been either a jungle or a bramble patch.

The point is this, that man, however much he may progress materially, however much he may acquire of material perfection belongs, still, to the animal world and is in need of the breaths of the Holy Spirit, of divine education. If man partakes of the breaths of the Holy Spirit then the divine reality appears in the human world in utmost perfection and man becomes as the image and likeness of God. He that was earthly becomes heavenly; he that was of the nether world lives now in the divine world; he who was materialistic becomes spiritual; he who was dark is illumined. And this is only possible through the breaths of the Holy Spirit.

The holy, divine Manifestations give a new spirit and a new mind to man, are the cause of great progress; they illumine the world. However, a short while after (their appearance) the darkness and gloom of materialism, of nature, again prevail. The heavenly illumination (the light of the Manifestation) passes [XIV:2:44] away and natural susceptibilities become dominant. It is as though a farmer comes and cultivates land which was full of tares and weeds, and the land brings forth abundant harvest. Then, when left to itself the land once more becomes a thorn patch and a place of weeds.

One time, in Persia, there was a blessed farming land, and through the power of the holy Manifestations that jungle became a rose garden. The darkness of ignorance vanished and heavenly illumination appeared. But soon again the East became entirely dark; no light at all remained; no trace of the divine bounty, nor spiritual education. At such a time as this His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared; at a time when the Eastern nations were in utmost strife and conflict, when the leaders of religions were drinking one another's blood, when sects were battling with each other, intense hatred was rife among the people and no trace of love or heavenly illumination remained. At such a time His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh appeared from the horizon of the East. He taught: the oneness of mankind ..., universal peace ..., that reason and religion must conform ..., that men and women are equal The people of the East were very ignorant. Bahá'u'lláh announced that all people must acquire knowledge, that all children whether in the cities or in the villages must go to school, that it is the duty of all to teach and educate the children. Should the father and mother be unable to educate the children and have not the means therefor, then society must take care of them and educate them so that not one single soul remains in ignorance. Bahá'u'lláh taught that in all schools and colleges sciences, both divine and material, should be taught, in order that the students may discover material realities and the realities of the Kingdom, for material sciences are as the body and divine sciences are as the spirit. The body must live by the spirit. If the spirit does not exist the body then is dead. Though the body be in utmost beauty, yet, if deprived of the outpourings of the spirit it will be fruitless and of benefit to no one, nay, rather, its non-existence were better than its existence. ... His Holiness Christ says in the Gospel, the one who is born of the flesh is flesh and the one who is born of the spirit is spirit. The interpretation of this verse is this, that physical things are like the body but the breaths of the Holy Spirit are the spirit (in the body). The body must live by the spirit, and therefore His Holiness Christ spoke of the second birth.

What is the second birth? It is this: Man while in the matrix world is deprived of bounties. When ushered into this world from that of the matrix he finds himself the possessor of eyes, ears, physical powers, of intelligence. Although God gave all these bounties to man, in the matrix world they were not yet apparent. Only when born into this world did these divine bounties become manifest. Man then found that eyes had been given to him, that he was possessed of ears, and that powers which could discover all created things had been granted him. He saw the sun, and beheld the moon; he glanced at the sea, and witnessed the plains. A rose garden he saw, green and verdant. Of all these things he was unaware in the matrix world; of them he had no knowledge.

In like manner must man be born out of this world of nature that he may enter into the world of the Kingdom. Unless he be born from this world he cannot attain to spiritual susceptibilities nor can he discover the mysteries of the Kingdom nor behold the realm of God. When in the matrix world man could receive no tidings of this world. In that world he was, rather, a denier of this world for had anyone said to him that there was a world other than that of the matrix, a world most vast and spacious, where a sun was shining everywhere, and a moon, where a rose garden grew in utmost beauty—had this been said to him he would have denied such news, saying there is no world save this (the matrix) world. But when he is born he sees that [XIV:2:45] this world is a different world. It is an infinite world, where stars are shining in the heaven and rivers are flowing toward the sea, where rose gardens are adornments and orchards are as embroidery.

Again, the human world is like the animal world. What does it (the animal world) know of the world of the Kingdom? What does it know of God, of spirituality, of divine bounties? When he is born from the world of nature then will man see the world of the Kingdom, then will he behold the lights of the Sun of Reality and will comprehend the manifestations of divine bounty. He will then be submerged in the sea of the lights of mercy and will understand the secrets of second birth.

The holy, divine Manifestations of God have come for this purpose, that man may be informed of the Kingdom of the Lord of Hosts, that he may know divine realities and may attain to the second birth.

Bahá'í Assemblies

Horace Holley

When evening twilight falls upon the world, and shadows cast from the western mountains fill the home, then the servant goes from room to room, lighting the lamps, in order that darkness may not oppress the people of the household.

And, in the same way, when the evening of civilization approaches; when the light of custom and tradition dies; when the mind stumbles, the heart fails and the soul is enshrouded with sudden fear; when the works of shadow and darkness are done—by wars, by strife, by confusion; and the prescience of universal ruin flies like a bat of ill omen over the uplifted heads and staring eyes; then the Divine Servant passes silently from room to room of the household of the world, lighting the lamps of hearts with the flame of spirit, whose illumination, for those who are severed from all save spirit, is as the rising of the True Dawn after the overcoming of that besetting inner twilight which the world miscalls truth, mistermis [applies a misnomer to] reality, misconceives as life.

But when the lamps of the hearts are lighted, then silently, then mysteriously, even as the Divine Servant came, so He departs; and in that departing we know Him by the glory of the illumination whose rays have penetrated the heart; or we know Him not at all.

This is the first solemnity of the hush of that hour when it is realized that 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Divine Servant, having lighted the lamps throughout the household of the East and West, departs unto that Source of Light whence He came.

The shining of the lamps of hearts lighted by the hand of the Divine Servant is the mystery whose outward manifestation stands visible in the life of the world as Bahá'í Assemblies, lamps that shone unseen in the last flickering moments of that false illumination of the material age; lamps that shine the more brightly as material daylight ebbs from the life of men.

For the believers, this is the mystery to be considered, the task to be realized, the worthiness to be attained: that from their unity and by their unity the fulfilment of the coming of the Divine Servant may be established in the foundations of the New Age throughout the world. The unity of the believers one with another is as the rays of light from the lamp. If unity does not exist—unity in [XIV:2:46] the depths of spirit—then the lamp burns only to itself; for the world it would be as though the lamp had not been lighted, and as though the Divine Servant had not come.

For the lamp burns not to itself, but to the world, through the manifold rays which the believers are: each believer a ray, all the believers the visible shining of the lamp. The lamp shines not through one ray, but through the infinity of rays; not upon one object, but upon all objects; not for one horizon, but unto all the horizons. Through the personal unlikeness of the believers, the glory of the lamp is manifested. No believer can be spared, lest the lamp be shorn of its rays.

Therefore, in a Bahá'í Assembly, all the aspects of personal unlikeness exist. The believers are not of one kind, not of one sort, not of one character, not of one training, not of one capacity; which unlikeness is essential to the full shining of the lamp. But the believers are alike in this, that each is a ray of light shining forth from the lamp, whereby the lamp illumines one particular object, one special horizon, revealing itself to that horizon through that one ray which the believer, by reason of his faithfulness, his devotion, his selflessness, has become. The lamp shines through all its rays, and no ray is more important than any other ray shining from the lamp.

Each of the believers has two aspects and two stations. He has the aspect and station of his personality, which is the aspect and station of difference; and he has the aspect and station of the ray, which is the aspect and station of oneness. The oneness of the believers is the lamp lighted by the hand of the Divine Servant; the difference of the believers is the work of the world of nature and of mankind, in whose activity we evolve and by whose influence we are conditioned.

In the life of mankind there have been many lamps, each lamp shining unto one room, one community, one horizon; and the rays of these lamps could not overcome the darkness beyond the one room where the lamp shone. Now there is but one lamp, the Sun of Truth, whose shining is for all the rooms of the household of humanity, all the horizons of experience, all the objects of thought and activity.

Therefore, that the oneness of the Sun of Truth may be manifested, it has become necessary in this New Age that the rays shall have no confinement; that all the distinctions shall be burned away; that reality shall be perceived by one light and known of one spirit. Wherefore, in every Bahá'í Assembly, all the conditions of humanity—all the separateness, all the differences, all the degrees, all the capacities, all the kinds, all the influences built up during the evolution that has gone before—must needs, by the providential law of this New Age, be made one gathering, manifesting the oneness of the Sun of Truth even despite the testimony and evidence of all the differences of personality which emanate from the influence of the world.

This is the mystery of a Bahá'í Assembly: not that its members readily agree, but that they can overcome their differences; not that they are one in personality, in instinctive sympathy, in ambition, in desire, in training, in influence, but that they can penetrate to the foundation of oneness revealed by the glory of the Sun.

Every Bahá'í Assembly is the world in miniature, containing the differences and personal problems of the world, even intensified to the utmost degree. This is our glory, our privilege, our attainment, our distinction; not our weakness, not our shame. No other power save the power of the Sun of Truth could have revealed the oneness in so much difference. It is the spirit of this oneness overcoming our manifold differences, that makes a Bahá'í Assembly a divine foundation, a healing for the world, an inspiration for those who turn from darkness and seek light. Elsewhere differences are organized, but here is unity; elsewhere darkness is worshipped, but here the light shines; elsewhere activity is the [XIV:2:47] pursuit of shadows and reflections, but here activity has one end and aim: that each of the believers may attain to selflessness, and become a ray emanating from the Sun of Truth.

May the friends of the Divine Servant continually assist one another to arise from the station of personality to the station of selflessness which is the station of the ray. May we become infinitely considerate one of another, having cast out pride, ambition, thought and desire, which are veils of the personal self. May we be ever conscious that the unity of each Bahá'í Assembly in itself, and the unity of all the Bahá'í Assemblies one with another, are the preliminary condition to that world unity for which the Divine became [a] Servant in this age. May we be ever conscious that the ray is nothing in itself, but is an emanation from the Sun; that the Sun manifests its power through the ray, and the Sun is all in all.

Then, as the personalities diminish, and the world weakens its secret hold upon the hearts, the Sun will assert its predominant power, having rays unto all the horizons. Then even the consciousness of yielding up self will flee as the ultimate shadow before the Dawn, and the meeting of this selflessness; the community of this faithfulness, will penetrate humanity with a new spirit and a new life.

Now is the work of becoming selfless; but the work of the Sun is at hand.

Letters from Shoghi Effendi

American communities in 31 cities

Dearest Fellow-workers in the Vineyard of God,

Though your number in each of these cities be small and limited, yet by virtue of that Celestial Potency bequeathed to every one of you by our departed Master, you are assured that ere long your small company shall expand and wield such power and influence as no earthly power can ever hope for or attain. Who can doubt that he is ever watching from his Station on High over his scattered fold and is guiding and strengthening his faithful lovers who toil and labour for the fulfilment of his Word and the realization of his Purpose for mankind?

As we observe the sad conditions of the world and the complexity of the problems that are besetting humanity, we may at times lose heart and grow forgetful of the promised dawn of the New Day, so repeatedly and emphatically foretold in the Sacred Writings. But we need only refer to some of the earliest writings of our beloved Master to regain that confidence which the vicissitudes of the world, however distressing, can never shake. Are not these words wherein he assures us of the onward march of the Cause—a march which no one can resist and which is sure to lead humanity to its glorious destiny?

“Now in the world of being, the Hand of Divine Power hath firmly laid the foundations of this all-highest bounty and this wondrous gift. Whatsoever is latent in the innermost of this Holy Cycle shall gradually appear and be made manifest, for now is but the beginning of its growth and the day-spring of the revelation of its signs. Ere the close of this century and of this age it shall be made clear and evident how wondrous was that spring-tide and how heavenly was that gift!”

And as the outlook grows darker and despondency overtakes the hearts, it is incumbent upon us to arise with greater confidence than ever before, endeavouring to clear the mists of hate and prejudice that have dimmed the vision of mankind and, relying upon these assuring words of his, point out to a weary world the Way of True Salvation.

I very eagerly await the news of the progress of the Movement in your cities and shall be grateful and delighted to hear that you have reinforced your numbers, extended your activities, established a centre and founded a Spiritual Assembly that shall direct and co-ordinate your efforts for the promotion of the Cause.

Awaiting your joyful news and beseeching the blessings of the Almighty upon your efforts,

I am your brother and co-worker,

San Francisco, California

The Beloved of the Lord and the handmaids of the Merciful in San Francisco, California, USA.

Beloved Friends,

The various tidings that have directly and indirectly reached the Holy Land regarding the combined efforts which the friends of the Western States have recently exerted for the promotion of the Cause in those regions, and in which the friends in that city have shared in no small degree, have filled our hearts with a joy that no words can express.

It is indeed gratifying to learn how your flourishing city, so rich and splendid in its material gifts, so similar in its atmosphere and peaceful surroundings to the Holy Land, and potentially endowed with such spiritual capacity, is now taking a leading part in lending a fresh impetus to the onward march of the Movement in regions which, though distant and remote, are yet so near and dear to the Master’s heart.

May your patient efforts be crowned with signal success and may the Light of this Divine Revelation so illumine your city as to justify the high hopes which our Beloved had confidently reposed in every one of you.

We all remember you very tenderly during our visits to the Three Holy Shrines and beseech every time with renewed ardour the blessings of the Almighty upon your labours.

Your friend and co-worker,

To the Beloved of the Lord and the handmaids of the Merciful in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, USA.

Care of the Members of the Spiritual Assembly.

My Loving Friends,

Whenever I recall the tender affection with which the beloved Master referred to you in His spoken as well as in His written words I feel that the day may not be distant when the friends of that city will as the standard-bearers of the Cause herald to their fellow-countrymen and to the world at large the glad-tidings of this glorious Revelation.

Assured and strengthened by the memories of the many blessings that have been yours in the past, it is now assuredly the time to arise with one accord for the fulfilment of our sacred obligations, the pre-requisites of the speedy realization of such brilliant success in the Cause.

With hearts united, with minds purified and with a determination never to waver or surrender, let us step into the arena of service and armed with the sword of utterance and teaching combat effectively the ills and sicknesses of this distracted world.

We need not feel depressed or overwhelmed with the magnitude of the task for the mighty combatants whom the hands of the Master have raised in every part of the globe shall come to our aid and the Hosts of the Unseen shall reinforce our numbers till the Spirit of Love and Peace even as foretold in the Holy Writ of Bahá'u'lláh will have filled the world.

I pray constantly on your behalf that your vision may never be dimmed and your courage may never falter in His Path.

I am as ever your co-worker,

The Bahá'í Dispensation

Elizabeth Herrick

The history of the coming of the Kingdom of God on earth is the story of God's love for mankind. Rejection of it is the greatest of all tragedies, and the root cause of the trials of men and nations.

Today they need Divine Guidance more than ever, and know not where to find that which meets all the needs of the world. True, they are beginning to turn again to that which in past days was rejected, and this is good; but if they understand it, they will not repeat the tragedy of rejecting the Divine Message in our own day. The voice is One Voice bringing the eternal message, in each era, and in the utterance of the same spirit, courting that which is divine in man. Knowledge of this is the keynote to the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh. That perception makes unity possible between men and religions and nations. Therefore it is of supreme importance that there should be understanding on this point; because it will put an end to religious, political, racial and industrial warfare. Only lack of understanding makes such tragedy possible, for the beginning and ending of all prophetic aspiration is to promote unity and harmony amongst mankind. This has been God's aim and purpose throughout the ages. It is the Heavenly Father's work, to which Jesus referred when he said: "My father worketh until now, and I work." Yes, and even again, "until now". For is not the spirit of the Father Himself evident in the revelation of Bahá'u'lláh which has called all the sovereigns of the earth and all men and nations, in the name of God, to the divine banquet of universal peace? How could the Father's heart be content with less than universal peace? Peace for the different followers of different religions, since the founders of each have, through the inspiration of the same spirit, been one with Him, each doing the work of preparation essential to the summing up of all aspiration in the glad work of this Latter Day, when all are now called by the same Lord, the Lord of all these hosts, to recognize Him, and leaving all things contrary to Him to "follow that which tends to harmony". For the fundamental teaching of the Founders of all religions, is one. Therefore, no one is called upon to reject his own religion, but to recognize the same Spirit in all, that all may become one in heart and mind in this new day, looking to the same point of guidance.

Without Divine Guidance the rich values which await mankind cannot come for is there not, as St. Paul pointed out, a spiritual, as well as a natural law? And has it not therefore been promised in the name of God, that if mankind will believe in Him and co-operate with It, seeking first His kingdom before all else "The windows of heaven will open and shower upon him blessings beyond all that he can think or speak?"

Therefore Bahá'ís rejoice in the glad tidings which Bahá'u'lláh brings to the world today, and invite all the world to rejoice with them, studying the laws which he declares as necessary to the happiness and protection of all nations, and to the fullness of life, which Jesus promised in "abundance", to all men. The universal divine laws have been stated in Bahá'í writings many times, and will be reiterated throughout the world until they are established in the hearts of mankind beyond all forgetfulness, and their portent evident before all eyes. Therefore, until they are known to all, repetition and remembrance is our "daily bread" in the spiritual world even as the wheaten bread is in the material world. All the world therefore is invited in the [XIV:2:51] name of Bahá'u'lláh to co-operate in establishing the bountiful laws of righteousness which the Holy Spirit has promulgated through him. No one can study them without becoming aware that the divine spirit is at work and all can work with It, to bring about the time when warfare will be at an end and all men and nations will live together in harmony, as brothers in the Father's heavenly Kingdom.

That is what Jesus yearned for; and it has been the travail of the Father's Spirit. "I am the Vine, and My Father is the Husbandman," said Jesus. He finished his appointed work. Today, he whom Jesus promised, has come, telling us those "other things", which he could not tell us then because the world was not ready for them. Now it is so ready that it is longing to hear them. Let us therefore pray and labour to convey the glad tidings understandingly, that there may be no more persecutions through misunderstanding.

Looking back through history, we see there was much work for the Spirit to do after Jesus left the earthly abode. So also is there much work for the disciples of Bahá'u'lláh. And we are grateful for the Centre of his Covenant among the nations, which he has appointed in accordance with divine prophecy. For we are through the living example and precept of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, protected from the errors and misunderstandings to which Christianity was liable in its early days, and which have grown to such a degree that even leaders and teachers of religion are troubled to find so little resemblance in it to the living spirit and example of Jesus. It is above all things necessary therefore, in this important Day of God which is the outcome of previous revelation that we should abide in the Spirit and pray for divine grace to live in accordance with it. That we should live and work and pray harmoniously, in Spirit and in Truth; each individual before all else looking to the guidance of the Spirit—and turning not aside for any other guidance. For the Spirit is the life of us all. Without It, there is no life, no love, no harmony or heavenly joy. It is incumbent on us all, now, to manifest these evidences of reality before the world, as the very early disciples did endeavour to do. We are grateful for all the records of our faith, but learning the lessons of the past it would seem well to remember that it is the Spirit which "maketh alive".

Therefore we gird our loins, rejoicing in the power of the Spirit through which many new sciences and arts and wonderful means of travel and unification have been developed, which, without spiritual power, could never have become manifest. It is our charge, and privilege and responsibility, now they are developed through the divine Will for a special purpose, to do our part in establishing those principles of universal righteousness which, although well known to Bahá'ís, are not yet known to the world, lest this increase of human power should be used for destroying the happiness of mankind instead of promoting it.

So we announce to the world continuously those universal principles which Bahá'u'lláh has declared to be the will of God for this day, that all men and nations may move consciously together under the protection of the Divine Bounty toward the haven of peace and rest which is God's design for them and indeed their own heart's desire. They are:

1. The Oneness of Mankind.
2. Independent Investigation of Truth.
3. The Oneness of the Foundation of all Religions.
4. Religion must be the cause of Unity.
5. Religion must be in accord with Science and Reason.
6. Equality between men and women.
7. Prejudices of all kinds must be forgotten.
8. Universal Peace.
9. Universal Education. [XIV:2:52]
10. Solution of the Economic Problem.
11. An International Auxiliary Language.
12. An International Tribunal.

Bahá'ís want all the world to see the light of the Sun of Truth which illumines the path to the most great peace; so we hold up the light, knowing that the "spirit which God has placed within" all men will enable them to see it. Then they will help us to make known the guidance which is so peculiarly necessary to the salvation of men and nations. Without this larger all-embracing aim individual salvation is insecure.

Unity is the order of this new day. All that does not bear its test will be cast aside, and the reason so many in church and state are now anxious to attain unity is that they well know that the world of humanity will no longer accept anything short of reality. It is tired of trusting the blind leaders of the blind who ever prescribe their own conflicting remedies. But when the True Remedy comes to them they will see its all-inclusiveness, and be satisfied.

Unity can never be achieved on the narrowing basis of the minds of men. For some repudiate one religion, and some another, and others seeing this, repudiate religion altogether. It is God's Messenger who brings us the True Remedy in its completeness today. Without it unity cannot be achieved, for it is necessarily the outcome of the aspirations of past ages and the purport of ages to come.

The true spiritual teacher¹ [XIV:2:61]

"Normal spiritual joy has a healing effect upon the body. I can conceive of no greater joy than teaching the Cause of God. When an individual forgets himself entirely, is sincerely self-sacrificing, loses himself in the sea of the love of the Blessed Perfection, fulfils the conditions of servitude, and has won the good-pleasure of the Lord of Hosts his joy will then be unceasing and his happiness a flowing stream of crystal water. A Bahá'í who serves others is like unto a candle which burns and sheds light upon all those who circle around it. The highest attainable station of the candle is to burn and brighten the dark room, and the loftiest pinnacle of our progress and perfection is to be confirmed in service to the Holy Threshold. This is indeed the most exalted position. But what do I mean by servitude to the Holy Threshold? I mean this, that with radiant faces, detached hearts, cheerful spirits, sanctified souls, illumined minds and unyielding determination we may arise and teach the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. It is well to bear in mind in all our waking hours that he did not educate us for corporeal joy, material comfort nor the physical benefits of this mortal world. He accepted all persecutions and hardships; and chose us for the illumination of the world of humanity, for the moral and religious education of the races, for the spiritual awakening of the people."

"The believers must teach the Cause not only in words but must adorn themselves with the ornaments of deeds in order that all mankind may bear testimony to this, that their aims are universal, their actions disinterested, their purposes inspiring and all-embracing, so that they may witness in their behaviour and manner the holiness, purity, sincerity and loving kindness of the prophets of God ... Tell them to read carefully the Persian and Arabic Hidden Words and to live and behave according to their contents. If a person lives for one day according to those divine exhortations and teachings he will be assisted to move the visible and the invisible world."

"Teach the Cause of God through your deeds and actions. This is God's real benediction and blessing. Live in such a way that when people observe your manners, morals and conduct they may exclaim, 'These are not men and women, but angels of the Lord.' Be ye kind to all mankind. Let mercy be the motive power in your dealings with people. Do not look at their shortcomings. Win the hearts through love and charity; set them aglow with the fire of the love of God. The joy of a soul is indescribable, if the fragrances of spirituality waft from the garden of his being. This divine happiness is not followed by any sorrow nor is this heavenly spring ended by the sultry days of summer."—'Abdu'l-Bahá: recorded by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab during the great war.

"Praise be to God! Your hearts are overflowing with the love of God and you have no great attachment to this world. The thing which is necessary now for you is discourse. It is my hope that you will obtain ... eloquent, expressive and excellent discourse."

"Rest assured in the fact that the breaths of the Holy Spirit will aid you provided no doubts obtain in your heart."—'Abdu'l-Bahá: from Diary of Juliet Thompson.

Fifteenth Annual American Bahá'í Convention

Louise G. Gregory

[Extracts of talks by Jináb-i-Fáḍil-i-Mázindaránī. Interpreted by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab.]

In 'Akká there lived a man who so hated 'Abdu'l-Bahá that he would turn his back when he met him, fearing lest he lose his hatred. One day they met in such a narrow street that the enemy was forced to meet 'Abdu'l-Bahá face to face. 'Abdu'l-Bahá tapped the man upon the shoulder and said, "Wait a few moments, until I speak. However great may be your hatred for me it can never be as strong as is my love for you." The man was startled, awakened, and made to feel the unconquerable power of love. Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá through this power have been able to transform thousands who are messengers of the Kingdom of God in this day.

A woman went to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, received his teachings and blessings, and asked for a special work. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "Spread the law of love. Live in accord with love, reciprocity and co-operation."

She answered, "I want something special. All Bahá'ís are asked to do this."

'Abdu'l-Bahá answered, "Very well. Come tomorrow morning, when you are about to leave, and I will give you the special work."

She was very happy all that day and night, in anticipation.

The next day 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to her, "I am going to give you my son that you may educate him physically, mentally and spiritually."

She was surprised, and was made happy at this. But her surprise gave way to wonder when she reflected that 'Abdu'l-Bahá had no son. What could he mean? [XIV:3:70]

'Abdu'l-Bahá asked, "Do you know this son of mine?"

Then he told her: In her city there had lived a man, her worst enemy. He had died leaving a son, with no one to take care of him: this was now her task. When she heard this she was overwhelmed. She was spiritually reborn. She wept and said, "My Master, I now know what the Bahá'í Cause means."

Children's meeting

... His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá repeatedly spoke of the education of children and how parents should continually put into their minds ideas of peace and righteousness. He was an ardent lover of children and took with him wherever he went a photograph of children. He likened them to young bushes in a garden of roses. If the young trees are cared for they grow straight; if neglected, they become crooked. If a person is allowed to grow up aslant or crooked like a young tree, no human power can make it straight: only the power of the Holy Spirit can change such a person. In the Orient the meetings of the Bahá'í children are a source of inspiration and happiness to the adults. Their gatherings are of intense interest to everyone for they have a charm of love, simplicity and happiness not to be found elsewhere.

'Abdu'l-Bahá tells us that from the very beginning children must be taught lessons of spirituality and morality. He tells us that we must teach the children, in their childhood, only those things which will strengthen their childhood in simplicity of life. The children memorize the wonderful lessons, compilations and recitations with the utmost love and devotion.

There was a family in Persia where the husband, but not the wife, was a Bahá'í. Their little daughter went with her father to the meetings and sat night after night, all attention. Her father asked me if I would like to know the result. I answered yes. He told me that the little girl was repeating, like a phonograph, to her mother, all that I said. Later the father reported to me that his wife had become a Bahá'í, taught by her little daughter.

One day I saw a little girl going to school.

"You, so little, going to school?" I inquired.

"Have you not heard," she answered, "that it is necessary to study science, literature and arts?"

Then she quoted wonderfully the words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. I asked her. "What is a Bahá'í?"

She answered: "A Bahá'í is a collec- [XIV:3:74] tive centre of all the qualities and perfections of the world of humanity."

These remarks caused me to wonder at the power of a movement which made this little girl a dynamo of knowledge. Let us also remember the words of Christ about the children. This is a glorious age, when all these heavenly aims and principles will be fulfilled. How great will be the station of these little children in the Abhá Kingdom, so mighty and universal. Let us teach the children—but let us, first, teach ourselves so that the future ages will be full of light, of new hope and new accomplishment.

How easy it is to mention the principle of oneness, yet how difficult to fulfil its gigantic task! From time immemorial this ideal has been felt that all the children of men should be one. The poets of the past have sung this song and many gems in literature and philosophy contain the dream of oneness. The great poet of Persia, Sa'dí, wrote a very comprehensive poem on this subject. The children of men are indeed one body for originally they were created from the same substance. When one member feels pain and suffering all the other members suffer. Spiritual ideals of oneness have descended to us as a heritage and there is no doubt that the day will come when hate is forgotten and love is enthroned. The great creational law of the Almighty is the greatest proof that humanity is one. Man is created physically, mentally, spiritually according to the same general pattern. In the world of creation God has placed no difference. The same breezes blow upon all. The same rain falls on the just and the unjust. The same good gifts are shared by all the people of the world. There are certain natural differences between the kingdoms of existence, but all these differences only add to the charm and beauty of nature. How charming and delightful to see diversity amongst the beings! Differences in the natural world are only stepping stones of progress and happiness.

On the other hand, some differences are not natural. They are the creatures of superstition. How unfortunate it is that racial prejudices have affected the realm of humanity! Religious prejudices are the children of hatred and fanaticism. Religion in reality is the cause of love. Differences growing out of religion are manmade. They are swords placed in our hands by the demon of hate, so that we may kill our own children. Is there any doubt that the founders of religion came to establish love and unity among the sons of men? Yet the followers of religions today think that these Prophets were generals, issuing orders of discord and destruction. Look at the animal world. Amid domestic animals of the same kind no prejudices are found. But man, who thinks himself the friend and child of God, shows prejudices that put the animal to shame. Bring together a number of cows from different countries and they would not harm each other. They would graze together in the same pasture and raise no objection to each other. But how often does the inhumanity of man in this enlightened century make man unhappy! Such conduct is due to greed, selfishness and ambition.

Once 'Abdu'l-Bahá, to illustrate this point, told the story of a fat mullá who was praying in a mosque in one of the Oriental cities. A man who saw him and who had some money promised a nearby beggar a pound if he would slap the neck of the mullá. The beggar took the pound and gave the mullá a slap on the neck, then offered excuses, claiming mistaken identity. The mullá accepted the excuse and returned to prayer. The man gave the beggar another pound and [XIV:3:77] the beggar gave the mullá another slap, again excusing himself. Another pound resulted in still another slap. The mullá became very angry, declined to accept any more excuses, and demanded of the beggar why he thus pursued him with insults. The beggar replied, "Just as long as you have that fat neck and that man has money, so long will I mete out to you this chastisement!"

Even so, as long as we have greed, hatred, superstitions and imaginations in our hearts we shall have wars and be far removed from the millennium. We are in need of a supernatural power to change the hearts of men. That power was given by Bahá'u'lláh, the founder of the Bahá'í Movement. Since the appearance of this divine Cause in Persia many years ago its influence has spread far and wide banishing hatred and strife from humanity. It creates a spiritual unity in the hearts of men. In order that this unity might spread through the world twenty thousand people gave up their lives joyfully. This divine revelation is so powerful that it has united Orientals and Occidentals to such [an] extent that they are willing to give up their lives for one another. This is the century of light through the spiritual Bounty. The drawing together of races and religions is realized. The flag of universal peace will be raised from the apex of the world. The oneness of the world will reveal mankind as the stars of one heaven, the leaves of one tree and the voices in one melody of Celestial music.

We have had during the last few days many divine meetings and many spiritual gatherings. Day after day and night after night our ears have been attuned to the melodies and the dreams of the coming of this new age—a Temple where all the religions of the world may worship, the oneness of the world of humanity, a universal auxiliary language, a day when universal brotherhood is enthroned in the hearts.

When a person hears these principles he is delighted; but then he will often say, "Utopian! Very beautiful, but impossible! Do you not see the world surrounded by darkness." Sceptics think such a plan wholly impractical.

But there is nothing on the face of the earth which is impossible for man to accomplish. Many are the diseases attacking the body politic; but they will all vanish under the treatment of a skilful physician. See the advancement of use- [XIV:3:80] ful science, and how this has happened in the face of things seemingly impossible! Who a short time ago could have imagined the wonders of electricity or the evolution of the air-ship? Our children and grandchildren will see and enjoy much that we now fail to realize.

Our aims are very high, our hearts are full of hope, our steps are firm, our resolution is unshakeable; and we will work and we will labour and we will make the supreme effort and all our hopes will be fulfilled. Does it matter if we do not see the realization of our dreams? Future generations, our grandchildren will see it.

An old man was once seen planting a tree, the story goes. He was asked why did he thus, as he could not live to enjoy the shade and fruit of these trees. He replied that his ancestors had provided for him and now he must in turn provide for posterity.

Then Jináb-i-Fáḍil showed through a brilliant analysis the underlying unity of all the world religions. They all teach according to the needs and capacities of the students of their day the existence of God, the immortality of the soul, the Golden Rule, the same great principles of ethics, morality and unity. In highly figurative and symbolic form they portray the genesis, the creation of the world. When we study and behold the unity in religions the work of uniting them seems much easier. Jináb-i-Fáḍil then illustrated from his own experience the marvellous power of the Bahá'í Teachings to unite diverse religions. He told of how he had seen Jewish Bahá'ís, Muslim Bahá'ís, Christian Bahá'ís all meeting together in the utmost love and unity. When mankind partakes of universal religion unity will be established in the hearts.

Soul stirring words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Tablet recently translated by Shoghi Effendi

O ye beloved of the Lord! O ye His trusted ones!

Know ye verily that the denizens of the Realm on High, the dwellers in the habitations of Glory, laud and glorify the company of the faithful on earth, who raise their voice with one accord and sing the praise of the Lord and magnify His holy Name. Exalted be the Lord, my God, the All-Glorious! I swear by the Beauty of His Face, by the Light of His Countenance, by the Dayspring of Glory: were earthly gatherings to walk in the ways of the company of the Immortals on High, they would surely mirror forth, in all their beauty, the splendours of the Celestial Concourse, and unfold the mysteries of the Abhá Kingdom. The greater their purity, the greater their reflected splendour.

Wherefore, let us arise, let us bestir ourselves, let us rally round the Standard of the One True God, and gather together under the shadow of the Lord's Sacred Tree, the Tree that hath voiced [XIV:3:88] the Call of God and uttered the Word of Truth. This is indeed, in the eyes of the Lord, your God, the Gracious, a supreme and glorious triumph.

Should the Spirit of true Love permeate the assemblies of men on earth, they, verily, will grow to become a string of heavenly pearls, a guiding constellation that sheddeth its glory and radiance over all mankind.

The Glory of God, the Ever-Living, the Self-Subsisting, rest upon you.

The spirit of the century

Letter of Shoghi Effendi to the friends of Montclair, New Jersey.

In these days, when internal commotions are shaking the very foundations of men's beliefs, and the flames of distress are purging humanity from its ills and maladies, it behoves us, the loved ones of God, to stand steadfastly amid this world-tumult, and with the Divine Teachings exemplified in our lives, restore gradually peace, assurance and tranquillity to the distracted world. For unless the saving Power of the Word of God comes to their aid, peoples and sects, classes and governments, entangled in the mesh of their own undoing, shall fall a prey to one another's greed and passion, and in the end deplorably perish.

But this is not to be, for we are assured that the Divine Will has ordained that from this raging turmoil shall emerge a world purer and better illumined with the Light of the Divine Revelation, and guided by the principles of the Most Great Peace!

Ours, then, is the duty and privilege to labour with heart and soul for the re-birth of mankind, and hasten the advent of the Promised Day.

XIV:4, July 1923 [XIV:4:97]

Tablet of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

The time has arrived for the world of humanity to hoist the standard of the oneness of the human world, so that solidarity and unity may bind together all the nations of the world, so that dogmatic formulas and superstitions may end, so that the essential reality underlying all the religions founded by the Prophets may be revealed.

That reality is one.

It is the love of God, the progress of the world, the oneness of humanity.

That reality is the bond which can unite all the human race.

That reality is the attainment of the benefits of the most great peace, the discarding of warfare.

That reality is progressiveness, the undertaking of the colossal tasks in life, the oneness of public opinion.

Therefore strive, O ye people! and put forth your efforts, that this reality may overcome the lesser forces in life, that this king of reality may alone rule all humanity.

Thus may the world of mankind be reformed. Thus may a new springtime be ushered in and a fresh spirit may resuscitate mankind.

The individuals of humanity, like refreshed plants, will put forth leaves and blossoms and fruit, so that the face of the earth will become the long promised and delectable paradise, so that the great bestowal, the supreme virtues of man will glisten over the face of the earth. Then shall the world of existence have attained maturity.

This is my message.

The proof of God's existence

The divine philosophy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Science has discovered a new universe. Its great stars, most of which are suns, according to new measurements are often found to be millions of miles in diameter, separated from us and from each other by bewildering stretches of light years of a vastness which baffles all attempts at comprehension. Our little earth, with all its teeming life, is but a speck in this splendid immensity. Modern science reveals a universe ordered by laws so invariable that astronomers can prophecy an eclipse generations before it appears on the field of vision. The atom, according to the new physics, is itself a little solar system and reveals in miniature the order of the great cosmos.

To many the very immensity and orderliness, the mechanistic perfection of the physical universe make the thought of God unnecessary. Thus, while science is revealing new universes and through the practical application of the discoveries of physics, chemistry, biology and preventive medicine is bringing in a new, material civilization the most resplendent which the world has seen, it is at the same time undermining for many the foundations of religious faith and the historic sanctions for the good life.

The conflict between science and religion is carried forward, in pulpit, in press, in university hall. What is to be done?

The Bahá'í Teachings present to our modern world the great harmonizing, synthesizing, uniting force, scientific and spiritual, for which we have been waiting. 'Abdu'l-Bahá proves the whole vast universe which science has discovered to be a new revelation of the existence and activity of God, the Ever-Living, the Omnipotent Mind, the Pure Creator.

Both science and religion are from the one Sun of Reality. When truly understood, together they flood the world with light upon light.

In his great Tablet to the distinguished scientific scholar of Switzerland Professor Auguste Henri Forel, 'Abdu'l-Bahá with triumphant scientific, spiritual logic proves the existence of God and the reality of the spirit. ... The Star of the West feels ... through earnest study of this ... great Tablet the student can grow more and more into an understanding of the magnificent philosophy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the scientific proofs of God's existence.

The eternal witness

Compiled by Horace Holley

"This teaching of union has been lost in the world through long lapse of time, O consumer of the foe.

"This same immemorial teaching of union I have declared to thee today; for thou art my beloved, my companion; and this secret doctrine is the most excellent treasure.

“Though I am the Unborn, the Soul that passes not away; though I am the Lord of beings, yet as Lord over my Nature I become manifest, through the magical power of the Soul.

“For whenever there is a withering of the Law, O son of Bharata, and an uprising of lawlessness on all sides, then I manifest Myself.

“For the salvation of the righteous, and the destruction of such as do evil; for the firm establishing of the Law I come to birth in age after age.”—Krishna.

“Why should I preserve this body of flesh, when the body of the excellent law will endure?

“I am not the first Buddha who came upon the earth, nor shall I be the last. In due time another Buddha will arise in the world, a Holy One, a supremely enlightened One, endowed with wisdom in conduct, knowing the universe, an incomparable leader of men, a Master of angels and mortals. He will reveal to you the same truths which I have taught you. He will preach his religion, glorious in its origin, glorious at its climax, glorious at its goal, in the spirit and in the letter. He will proclaim a religious life, wholly perfect and pure, such as I now proclaim. His disciples will number many thousands, while mine number many hundreds.”—Guatama Buddha.

“There is a Creative Principle which is itself uncreated; there is a Principle of Change which is itself unchanging. The Uncreated is able to create life; the Unchanging is able to effect change. That which is produced cannot but continue producing; that which is evolved cannot but continue evolving. Hence there is constant production and constant evolution.

“The Unchanging goes to and fro, and its range is illimitable. We may surmise that it stands Alone, and that its Ways are inexhaustible.”—Lao Tzu.

“When through Me the sky arose from the substance of the ruby, without columns, on the spiritual support of far-encompassed light; when through Me the earth arose, which bore the material life, and there is no maintainer of the worldly creation but it; when by Me the sun and moon and stars are conducted in the firmament of luminous bodies; ... each one of them, when created by Me, was herein more difficult than causing the resurrection, for it is an assistance to Me in the resurrection that they exist, but when they were formed it was not forming the future out of the past.”—Zoroaster. [XIV:4:110]

“The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it; the glory (Bahá) of Carmel and Sharon. They shall see the excellency of the Lord and the glory (Bahá) of our God.”—Isaiah.

“Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil.

“In my Father’s house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

“The words I say unto you I speak not from myself: but the Father abiding in me doeth his works.

“And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may be with you forever, even the Spirit of truth.”

“But of that day or that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father.”—Christ.

“Messengers have already come unto you before me, with plain proofs and with the miracle which ye mention; why, therefore, have ye slain them, if ye speak truth? ... I am the first Adam, Noah, Moses and Jesus.

“Think then not indeed that God fails in His promise to His apostles; verily, God is mighty, the Lord of vengeance; on the day when the earth shall be changed for another earth, and the heavens also; and all shall go forth unto God, the One, the Supreme.

“God is the light of heaven and earth the similitude of His light is a niche in a wall, wherein a lamp is placed, and the lamp enclosed in a case of glass; the glass appears as if it were a glistening star. It is lighted with the oil of a blessed tree, an olive neither of the East, nor of the West; it wanteth little but that the oil thereof would give light, although no fire toucheth it. This is light added unto light. God will direct unto His light whom He pleaseth.”—Muḥammad.

“Exalted and glorified is He above the power of any one to reveal Him except Himself, or the description of any of His creatures. I Myself am but the first servant to believe in Him and in His signs, and to partake of the sweet savours of His words from the first-fruits of the Paradise of His knowledge.”

“The time of former things is past and a new time has become manifest, and all things are made new by the desire of God. But only a new eye can perceive and a new mind can comprehend this station. The Beginning and the End bore allusion to one blessed Word, and that hath come and is made manifest. That Word is the Soul of the divine books and epistles, which hath been and will be forevermore.

“In this Day the new heaven hath appeared and the earth is renewed. Were ye to behold with pure eyes, ye will see the New Jerusalem; and were ye to turn with attentive ears, ye will hear the voice of God.

“Are ye hidden from Myself because of My Name? What maketh ye to doubt? Ye have called for your Lord the self-dependent night and day, and when He hath come from the heaven of pre-existence in the greatest glory, ye have not approached Him, and were of the heedless.

“He who inviteth the people in My Name, he is of Me, and from him will appear that which will be beyond the power of all that is in the earth. Then follow the path of the Lord, and follow not the heedless. Blessed is the sleeping one who will awaken by these powers and will stand up among the dead, directing himself in the path of the Lord; verily, he is of the essence of the creatures before the True One; and verify, he is of those who have attained.”—Bahá'u'lláh.

“Each religion teaches that a media- [XIV:4:111] tor is necessary between man and the Creator—one who receives the full light of the divine splendour and radiates it over the human world, as the earth’s atmosphere receives and diffuses the warmth of the rays of the sun. This mediator between God and humanity has different designations, though he always brings the same spiritual commands. In one era he is called Abraham, in another time Moses, again he is called Buddha, another time Jesus, and yet another time Muḥammad. They have all turned to the divine reality for their strength. Those who followed Moses accepted him as the mediator; those who followed Zoroaster accepted him as their mediator; but all the Jews deny Zoroaster, and the Zoroastrians deny Moses. They fail to see in both the one reality. Had the Zoroastrians comprehended the reality of Zoroaster, they would have understood Moses and Jesus. Alas! the majority of men attach themselves to the name of the mediator and lose sight of the real purport.

“Therefore did Bahá’u’lláh cry, ‘O God, deliver us from the sea of names!’ “Man must turn to the light and not think that the form of the lamp is the essential, for the lamp may be changed; but he who longs for light welcomes it from whatever lamp it shines. If the Jews had really understood Moses, they would have accepted the Christ; but they were occupied with the name, not the truth, and when that name was changed, they denied the reality.

“It is the same with the Christians today. What a pity that they are worshipping a title. They see only the garment. If one recognizes a king by his garments, one would not know him were he to assume a different garb.

“Who is the Christ? When one sees the Christ qualities shining from another lamp, one must recognize that light. We may say that this flower is exquisite; we must not say that it is the only beautiful one. Its perfections are of the divine bounty, a bounty that is universal and unlimited in its manifestations. The marvellous bounties of God are continuous. Should the outpouring of light be suspended, we would be in darkness. But how could it be withheld? If the divine graces are suspended, then divinity itself would be interrupted. Even men ask for continuity.

“We have eyes, and we desire eternal sight. Blindness is an imperfection. We have ears; deafness is a deficiency. As long as we consider these as imperfections in the human world, will they not be even greater defects when we consider the divine world? The bounty of God is without beginning and without end.

“We must adore the Sun of Reality, no matter from what horizon it may appear, rather than worship the horizon; for if we concentrate our attention upon one horizon, the Sun may arise from quite another point, and we consequently be deprived of the Sun’s bestowals. These benefactions are the bounty and guidance of God, the favour of God. This is spiritual progress.”—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

The coming universal society of nations¹

The supreme foundation of the city of the most great peace will, however, be unity of conscience among all people, a deep consciousness that they are all one family, one brotherhood. To strengthen this consciousness, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, suggests that there should be universal education of the children of all nations, under a uniform educational curriculum. This curriculum would include the technical, scientific branches of material education, and it will continually train the children to realize the perils of war and the glory of peace. “You must sow the seeds of peace in the plastic minds of the children,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. “Teach them the victories of peace. Surround them with the lessons of peace. Envelop them with the atmosphere of peace and inspire their hearts with the glorious achievements of peace. Let their food be peace, their vesture peace, their contemplation peace, their highest aspiration peace and the impelling purpose of their lives peace.” The new education in the oneness of mankind will need to utilize every means to establish in the hearts of the children the consciousness of universal brotherhood.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá also presents a solution of the economic problem by which poverty can be practically eliminated and economic strife resolved into co-operation and partnership, without violence, without changing the existing economic structure.

But the supreme power which changes the hearts of men and unites them into one brotherhood is religion. “Only through the power of the Holy Spirit,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “will the cause of universal peace be established in the world. There must needs be a divine, executive power to bring the self-seeking governments to the terms of universal brotherhood and conciliation. Nothing else will do it.”

“Not until the cause of universal peace becomes a personal religious conviction,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, to some friends at Haifa, in June of 1919, “will it prove to be permanent. Diplomacy is impotent; the all-powerful Word of God must establish it and make it a living, potent and lasting factor in the world. Hearts must be purified and no trace of revenge, enmity and rancour must linger in any heart—until peace shall prove to be permanent.”—M.H.P.

A portrait of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá¹

Story by the artist, Mr F. Carl Smith

“It has always remained a mystery to me how it came to pass that it was my special privilege to see and meet for the first time, in my own home, that universally known, that great spiritual soul, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

“I had heard a great deal about Bahá’u’lláh and his son, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, through friends years ago in Paris, and afterwards in Washington, DC. Mr Charles Mason Remey, who had made a pilgrimage to ‘Akká, Syria, on his return had spoken of ‘the Master’s wonderful teachings and especially of the great light which shows in his eyes and upon which one could not gaze without feeling a sensation as of almost dazzling luminosity.’

“It was my good fortune to take the Mediterranean cruise in 1911, which included a visit to the Holy Land. While at Haifa, Syria, I thought of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and wondered just where he might be, for ‘Akká, the City of the Crusaders, lay some nine miles to the north of Haifa along the coast, ‘by the way of the sea’, and could be plainly seen in the distance. As we remained only one day in Haifa it was not possible to take the caravan trip to ‘Akká (the Achor of the Bible), so I spent the day in climbing Mount Carmel and making a sketch of it from the coast.

“Haifa became the home of the Master shortly after that time, and [XIV:4:119] since the war that part of the country is now included in Palestine.

“About a year later ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came to America, and while he was in Washington, D.C., he made his headquarters at the home of Mr and Mrs Parsons, where he was a guest for some weeks. The home of Mr and Mrs Parsons was about two blocks from my studio. I was intensely eager to see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and I asked his interpreter if it were possible to paint a portrait of him, but he replied that there would not be time.

“On the morning of 12 April, shortly after his arrival in Washington, I received word that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and his interpreters would stop at my studio, but only for a few minutes. I immediately prepared a canvas and had everything in readiness in case there might be prospects of a pose. However, just to see him was more than I had hoped or expected!

“All my nervous excitement passed away on seeing the Master, and my first impression was one of peace and good will, for he was like one of the family, so gentle and mild, and he showed such a kindly spirit. His first words were:

“‘It is so good to come into your home!’ He was interested in all he saw, and we immediately went into the studio where I had a chair placed for him in the proper light and asked if he would be seated. Then the Master said:

“‘Now this is as it should be. Here am I a Persian, and you an American. As a rule one nation despises another not of his own nationality; and here we are friends at first sight! That is as it should be—the world one brotherhood, loving one another!’

¹ Presented in an article by Nellie S. French. At that time the portrait was owned by Mrs H. Collins, Pasadena.

"I immediately began to sketch him as he was interested in what I was doing. Then I showed him a sketch of Mount Carmel, and he exclaimed:

"My beloved Mount Carmel! That was the view I had of it for many years in 'Akká!'

"By this time we had all forgotten our hurry and the pose lasted most of the morning. I seemed inspired while at work and I was amazed at the results, for I never had to touch the features again after that pose.

"During the morning 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of his teachings and some of his words were interpreted. He said he believed in equality between men and women and in the oneness of mankind and of religion.

"After that morning I saw a great deal of the Master, for I went frequently to the various churches where he spoke. Also there were many gatherings at Mr and Mrs Parsons' home. I saw him later also, after his return to Washington from his western tour.

"Never shall I forget that experience and I am so happy to have had that wonderful privilege."

A letter from Shoghi Effendi

To the beloved of the Lord and the handmaids of the Merciful, throughout the City of New York, USA. Care of the members of the Spiritual Assembly.

Dear and faithful friends of 'Abdu'l-Bahá!

The welcome letter which the members of your Spiritual Assembly have sent me is indeed a fresh and remarkable testimony of your wise, patient and persistent efforts to promote the Cause of God and deepen its foundations in the heart of that great city.

All throughout the various vicissitudes which the Movement has encountered during this past year of bereavement and uncertainty, the faithful lovers of the Master in New York have, by their wisdom in teaching, the range and character of their activities, their perseverance in their labours and their unity in service, proved themselves worthy of the blessings which our beloved 'Abdu'l-Bahá showered upon them during his repeated visits to their city. It is my earnest hope and prayer that now at this decisive hour of the Cause of God the friends may with clear vision and redoubled energy endeavour to deepen still further the essential truths of the Cause in their own lives, and then extend the sphere of their activity, endeavouring at all times to infuse the regenerating Spirit of Bahá'u'lláh into the divers communities, creeds and classes that are represented in that most cosmopolitan city of the American continent.

From the leaflets, the circular letter and the pamphlet enclosed in the letter of your Spiritual Assembly, I can see clearly how well you have undertaken the task of acquainting the intellectual and religious circles of your city with the Divine Teachings, how admirably you have co-ordinated your efforts for service and how beautifully you have immortalized the memory of the Beloved's sojourn in your midst.

As I have already intimated in my first letter to the National Spiritual Assembly, I shall be most pleased to receive from every Bahá'í centre throughout America regular and comprehensive reports on the position of the Cause and the activity of the friends. These I shall gladly transmit to the friends throughout the East, who in their present hour of restlessness and turmoil will, I am sure, be cheered to hear of the steady and peaceful growth of the Cause in your land. I have already shared the news you have conveyed to me with the resident friends in the Holy Land, and shall soon, by the aid of the Spiritual Assembly of Haifa, send them to the believers throughout the East.

Our departed Master, whose Call first awakened that city, who later visited it and with his own hands watered its soil, and who to his last hour bestowed his tenderest care upon it, is now, as ever before, watching from his Station on High the progress of the work which he has entrusted to you, his beloved children, ready to bless, guide and strengthen you in your efforts to achieve success for his Cause. [XIV:4:123]

Awaiting your joyful news, and wishing you from all my heart the highest success in all your endeavours,

I am your devoted brother,
(Signed) Shoghi.

Universal peace

Louis G. Gregory

Thoughts of universal peace are not new in the world. Outstanding thinkers and philosophers of the past have mentioned it with hope. Seers have visualized it. Bards have sung. Even statesmen of high rank have at times looked beyond the field of nationalism into the broader field of internationalism, with human welfare in mind. But it has remained for the Prophets of God, with the voice of authority, to promise this happy day of the realization of universal peace.

As the world advances and people become more thoughtful, dissatisfaction with war as the solvent¹ of human problems grows apace. The arbitrament² of arms places right and wrong upon the same level.³ It stirs up the worst passions of human nature. It banishes judgement. It imbrutes⁴ the finer instincts of man. It is the sum of all calamities. War cripples commerce, impedes agriculture, lays waste cities, makes desolate homes, perverts science, suspends education, consumes wealth, vandalizes art, dethrones reason, degrades manhood, violates womanhood, deifies violence, abases morals, dispirits religion, blasphemes God. In wartime people worship the god of hate, however sacred the name by which they invoke him. To this idol they supplicate for confusion upon foes! To this creature of passion they return thanks when foes are destroyed! What has the God of love and mercy to do with all this? The god of hate is without ruth.⁵ Overnight he transforms men into fiends. People who under normal conditions are so gentle and kind that they avoid harming an ant, when war is on not only breathe out cruelty and slaughter against their fellow beings, but do not hesitate to desecrate the very sanctuary of God. Not the least of war's ills is the arrogance of the victor and the hatred of the vanquished. These spiritual distempers may endure for ages.

It must be conceded, however, that some good may come through warfare. But alas! How little is this when compared with the great good of settling the issues between nations upon the durable basis of justice, peace and arbitration! The good that is by comparison a modicum seems mainly to arise in spite of rather than because of, the terrific slaughter of humanity. Peace is life. War is death. Peace is heaven. War is hell. Pride, ignorance, jealousy, suspicion, fear and their ilk unite their hideous faces in the orgy of bloodshed. How long shall these guileful imps deceive the intelligence of mankind?

In the past, numberless cases can be cited of the futility of war to right wrongs or to improve conditions. The thirty years' war in Germany between [XIV:5:132] Catholics and Lutherans was so terrible that during this long period of suffering the population of that country was reduced from thirty million to five million souls. As fully five-sixths of the population was destroyed during this carnage, it is interesting to note the result. At the end of this bitter struggle both sides adhered to their respective faiths. The Catholics continued to be Catholics and the Protestants remained Protestants. The war changed no one's religion. But how frightful was the cost of this bitter hatred which remained to vex long after t[he] destruction [of] so many people

The war of a hundred years between England and France was equally fruitless of results. The English king was ambitious to rule France. Under English law his succession to the throne was justified. According to French law his right was barred. For a time he succeeded in imposing both himself and his dynasty upon France, only to invite the continual force of opposition. The end of a century of fighting saw the king of England confined to his own land and the king of France established upon his throne. For through the heroism of a woman, Joan of Arc, although French law debarred a woman from reigning in France, the French dynasty was restored and the foreign invaders expelled. Void was the effort for those who started it.

The wars between the West and East, known as the Crusades, covered more than two centuries. Their object, on the part of the Christians, was the delivery of Jerusalem from the hands of the Muslim, who were regarded as heathen and infidels. Seven efforts were made to conquer and hold Palestine, netting a total failure. But the terrible acts of the invaders reflected the savagery of the dark ages, to which they belonged. Had these ignorant people, who called themselves Christians, paused to investigate the Muslim faith, they would have discovered that the people of Islám had not only the greatest love and reverence for Christ, but in the practice of the religion which their Prophet, Muḥammad taught them they had attained a civilization far superior to the people of Europe, whose religion had then lapsed into idolatry and their civilization into barbarism. But the recent hatreds of the Cross and Crescent for each other are the heritage of those bitter memories.

The world has stood aghast at the terrific losses of the world war.¹ Huge natural resources were destroyed. A vast area was reduced to ruins and shambles. Countless families were reduced to homelessness, beggary and starvation, about $358,000,000,000 in wealth and treasure was consumed, and approximately 30,000,000 lives were prematurely cut off. After four years Europe is still on the verge of collapse and the whole world still feels the effects of war. One of the delusive claims made for the war was that it would destroy militarism. With more men now under arms in Europe than at the outbreak of the great war nine years ago, with the powers scrapping only a few of their armaments, with the preparation of poisonous gases and great fleets of destructive aeroplanes, this aim is far from being realized. But perhaps we have now dwelt long enough with shadows to prove that force and violence accomplish no lasting results. Can the realm of humanity survive another war?

Let us turn to the armies of peace. Day by day these shining ranks increase in numbers and power. Theirs is the assurance that in the end, victory will adorn their banners. Among the great forces mobilized in this cause is that of popular education. The training of the masses to think for themselves and the diffusion of knowledge will become more and more a deterrent to warfare. If the few people who bring on a war were the only ones to do the fighting, all wars would be of short duration. It is necessary for the people to discern the motives of those who would stir up their passions and exploit their prejudices for personal and selfish ends. The limelight of knowledge will expose these sordid interests, [XIV:5:133] which would impoverish the many to enrich the few. The killing of a human being is at any time a most serious offence, among civilized people. But the killing of millions, perhaps to avenge the deaths of a few, seems not only a great calamity but amazing folly. The righteousness of peace, the criminality of war, will more and more challenge the intelligence of the world. Especially is this appeal to the rising generation; the children in schools, the students in the universities. Dispassionate thinking and common sense are needed to prevent a return of the horrors of the past.

Another sign of universal peace is the growing freedom and influence of women. It is to the eternal glory of that sex that rarely in human history have they lent their powers to the killing of their fellow beings. Their benign influence, through fine intuitions and tender hearts, is cast on the side of life and construction, peace and healing. Happily there is now a growing tendency on the part of the governments of the world to give to women representation in their councils. These helpers are producing from their ranks many brilliant advocates of peace. Their logic is so incisive, their eloquence so appealing, their vision so large, that men listen to them with attention and admiration. From among many of these peace advocates two are mentioned, representing, respectively, the East and the West.

About the middle of the last century Qurratu'l-'Ayn arose in Persia. Through the Báb and her training as his disciple, she perceived that a new day of ideal brotherhood and peace had dawned for all humanity. Her powers included personal charm, great natural gifts cultivated by study and a heart purified by divine love. These she dedicated to the evangel of Truth. She stood for the freedom of women and for the harmony of the world. Her inspired eloquence attracted many to the standard of peace. She travelled from city to city, suffering with serene composure every difficulty from the persecution of benighted and ignorant foes. After years of exalted service, her life was victoriously sacrificed for the truth she espoused. Men of many nations today are thrilled as they read of her wonderful life and character. Today her traces are visible in every reform looking toward the elevation of women, international peace and the harmony of life. She is easily one of the foremost characters of all time.

Another shining example of the brilliant advocate of peace is Justice Florence Allen, of the Supreme Court of Ohio. One passing through Ohio will find the women and the wise men all behind her with their support and very proud of her. No doubt she is destined for even greater honours than those to which merit has already called her. Not only is she a great jurist, but she shows the powers of an international statesman of the highest rank. Nor is the womanly sweetness lacking withal. Her arguments for international peace are so noted for sound logic, array of facts, choice diction, power of analysis, nobility of purpose and moral enthusiasm as to be rarely equalled in the arena of discussion. After this remarkable young woman has spoken, the impression of her hearers is that naught remains to be said. It is inconceivable that an advocate of war can answer her arguments. These are signs that the ranks of women, increasing in potency, are marching toward peace. When they once highly resolve, who can impede their progress?

A third division of the army of peace is the working people of the nations. The farmers in the rural districts and the industrial workers in cities have discovered a common interest. This bond of unity is being extended so as to include the labourers and farmers of all countries. These co-operative societies are a powerful influence for peace among the nations of the earth. It is astonishing how these co-operative societies have grown both at home and abroad. Through co-operation they are building their own [XIV:5:134] mills, factories, banks, etc., hoping, as one of their leaders recently said, "To build a new world in which service and not greed is the mainspring of human action and in which gain without labour shall no longer exist." As the losses of warfare are borne chiefly by the workers and those who suffer upon gory fields are likewise drawn from these classes, they naturally begin to think soberly of peace. Perhaps their thoughts will inspire even those who in the past have exploited them, to be less eager for the gain which means spiritual loss. It is certain that their influence will be felt.

But how can universal peace, in a rational, effective and stable way, be realized? How can the nations keep peace? How can the continents be peaceful? How can the races enter a durable bond of peace? For there must be laws as well as sentiments to maintain peace.

This is truly the greatest thought of today. It appeals to all noble natures. And now comes the publicist and humanitarian, Edward W. Bok, offering a prize of $100,000 for the best essay, unfolding the most practical basis for this nation to enter into a union of durable peace with the other nations of the earth. This is indeed one of the hopeful signs of the times.

The wise men of the world, its statesmen and philanthropists, may well at this time study the luminous text of Bahá'u'lláh and the brilliant Tablets of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, for therein they will find all their questions answered and the heavenly manna of peace offered, now as of old, "without money and without price".

First of all, there must be an improvement in the character and attainments of men selected for high positions. Ignorance of leaders has ever been a bar—sinister to human advancement. In public life among all the nations, there is the greatest demand for leaders who are just, noble, self-sacrificing, free from prejudices, learned in the sciences and arts, informed about both national and international affairs and having minds that expand with universal intelligence. Such pure servants will not only work for peace, but will adopt the means provided in the Sacred Writings for the realization thereof. The great international Tribunal which is to be the permanent foundation of peace must be a fortress of justice. It must be more than a loose agreement among some of the nations, so that it may not when a crisis comes, as the Hague Tribunal, ingloriously fail. It must include the representatives of all nations and be supported by all peoples. The nations, unitedly and of one accord, must resign to it so much of their powers as will give to it executory authority, enabling it to enforce its decrees. The majestic might of all the rulers must uphold it. Bahá'u'lláh calls the kings to unity. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in his wonderful volume, The Secret of Divine Civilization, reveals the following plan:

“True civilization will unfurl its banner in the mid-most heart of the world whenever a certain number of its distinguished and high-minded sovereigns—the shining exemplars of devotion and determination—shall, for the good and happiness of all mankind, arise, with firm resolve and clear vision, to establish the Cause of Universal Peace. They must make the Cause of Peace the object of general consultation, and seek by every means in their power to establish a Union of the nations of the world. They must conclude a binding treaty and establish a covenant, the provisions of which shall be sound, inviolable and definite. They must proclaim it to all the world and obtain for it the sanction of all the human race. This supreme and noble undertaking—the real source of the peace and well-being of all the world—should be regarded as sacred by all that dwell on earth. All the forces of humanity must be mobilized to ensure the stability and permanence of this Most Great Covenant. In this all-embracing Pact the limits and frontiers of each and every nation should be clearly fixed, the principles underlying the relations of governments towards one another definitely laid down, and all [XIV:5:135] international agreements and obligations ascertained. In like manner, the size of the armaments of every government should be strictly limited, for if the preparations for war and the military forces of any nation should be allowed to increase, they will arouse the suspicion of others. The fundamental principle underlying this solemn Pact should be so fixed that if any government later violate any one of its provisions, all the governments on earth should arise to reduce it to utter submission, nay the human race as a whole should resolve, with every power at its disposal, to destroy that government. Should this greatest of all remedies be applied to the sick body of the world, it will assuredly recover from its ills and will remain eternally safe and secure.

“Observe that if such a happy situation be forthcoming, no government would need continually to pile up the weapons of war, nor feel itself obliged to produce ever new military weapons with which to conquer the human race. A small force for the purposes of internal security, the correction of criminal and disorderly elements and the prevention of local disturbances, would be required—no more.”¹

It is for the lovers of peace to consider its inner as well as outer aspects. The universal treaty, the arbitral House of Justice and the federation of the world, however well organized, can never endure without the confirmation of the spiritual power. Without this mystic power, man will speedily return to the depths of ignorance, vibrating upon the animal plane. The animal plane is ever dark and selfish and heedless of the commonweal. But the Holy Spirit rectifies human nature. It changes the satanic works of men into angelic deeds. It converts self-seeking into self-sacrifice. It transforms narrowness into universality. It creates the oneness of humanity. It expands national love into world patriotism.

Those who follow in the footsteps of the lowly Nazarene, of whom there are still, happily, a few in the world, readily think and act human brotherhood, whether the point of contact be the native or the alien, the mighty or the weak, the learned or the ignorant. The creative Breathings of Christ, in the early centuries of the Christian era, established unity among various races and nations, through the power of his Word. His prayer for the descent of the Father's Kingdom is now happily realized. The followers of Bahá'u'lláh throughout the world today are potentially the world's federation. Through the power of the creative Word, as revealed by him, they have abandoned racial, religious and national bias. Their ideals are pure, their sympathies are broad, their hearts are universal. Trained by the lives and precepts of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the universal educators, they in turn strive to guide the people of the world. Because their hearts are at peace and their spirits rejoice, they are the cause of peace and joy to others. On every continent, amongst all races, in every religion, these people are found. They seek to serve. They believe in one God and one humanity. Under the banner of Divine Love they point all mankind to the great, abiding and perfect peace.

The call to the oneness of mankind

From an address by Jináb-i-Ávárih in London

In 1911–1913 His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá, who was the exponent of the teachings of his father, Bahá'u'lláh, travelled extensively in Europe and America. In churches and audience halls, in America, especially, he gave long, important addresses. These addresses were translated into many languages and were spread broadcast. Those who saw him at that time can remember how impressive was his personality; and it may be that that sweet voice which spoke of the oneness of the world of humanity can be heard by the ears of the friends even today.

Because His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá worked in reality for the service of the world of humanity, therefore his teachings had a marked effect in each part of the world, and he left in the hearts of his loved ones, those who were affected by his teachings, a peculiar love and affection.

'Abdu'l-Bahá worked very hard for the oneness of the world of humanity. For forty years he was imprisoned in the barracks and fortress of 'Akká, Palestine, where the climate was the worst that could be imagined. After that, he travelled across the sea, to America and Europe. For three years he travelled. He gave to the world the principles of Bahá'u'lláh.

Now it is as though 'Abdu'l-Bahá speaks to us, saying, "In 1911, in 1912 and 1913 I invited you all to universal peace and to the oneness of the world of humanity. In America, repeatedly I said, ere long the world war will appear, nay rather, my words and writings as published in papers and books exist today, in which I said, Europe has become an arsenal. This war will break forth from one spark. The well wishers of the world must work for universal peace; they must establish a court of universal international arbitration. They must lay aside superstitions and limitations, so that no religious, racial superstitions, or political or patriotic prejudices exist. The great ones of the earth should look upon mankind with a single eye, so that the world may become at peace, and may rest at ease."

The spirit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, is calling from the worlds of the Kingdom, "O ye people of the world! has there not been enough of these wars and strifes, this restlessness and enmity? Surely there has been enough. How long must the innocent ones be killed in battle? How long must mothers lament their children? And how long must fathers cry and lament? Is not this bloodthirsty earth yet satisfied with the blood of the youth of the world? Must this bloodshed, and these sanguinary conditions still go on? Will the world continue at war?"

"God has created the world for all people. O children of humanity! be kind to one another. Do not see any strangeness in one another. Consider this word which His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh spoke sixty years ago: 'O people of the world! Ye are all the leaves of one tree, the fruit of one branch, the drops of one sea.'"

Perhaps, still, that melodious voice of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is sounding in the ears of those that search for the truth and who say the time for superstition has passed away, the time of illumination has come, the whole of mankind must be servants of humanity (servants of one another).

‘Abdu’l-Bahá used to say that the members of all nations and religions were from God, that all religions have come for the training of mankind, all have come for the unity of hearts and for the showing forth of affection, one [XIV:5:137] toward another, and, because the truth of all religions is one, all the prophet praised God, all the religions worshipped one God, the prophets are from one Reality.

We must hold to reality, and set aside the superstitions which have crept in.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá used to say we should not have prejudice, saying, “I am a Christian, I am a Jew, etc., I am of the West and this one is of the East, or, I am an American and that one an European. Nay rather, we should say that we are all children of Adam and sisters and brothers of each other.” How much ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wished that there might be unity between the coloured and white races, between the East and the West. He repeatedly said, do the white doves and the black doves fight each other? Do the Western sheep and the Eastern sheep contend with each other? No, God forbid, they are rather in utmost love and friendship with one another, because they are of the gentle creatures. Fighting, quarrelling and strangeness are found among the ferocious creatures. How can man, who is the best of created beings, become involved in such a state!

Is it not good economics that the money spent in wars and destruction be expended instead in promoting and developing human welfare and in improving the conditions of life? Is it not good economics that we should gather together our strength and might to bring forth those treasures which are hid in the earth, and then use them for the betterment of humanity?

But the teachings of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá are many. The whole of Persia was too small to contain such a precious jewel as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. When a pearl is in a shell gradually it grows and grows until the shell cannot contain the pearl. Then the shell breaks and throws out the pearl because the shell has not the capacity to hold it. In the same way; Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá were the two precious pearls of whom Persia formed the shell, but that shell was small and could not keep these precious pearls; therefore it broke and threw them forth.

Although the exile to Baghdád, to Constantinople, to Adrianople and to ‘Akká was an act of great oppression, yet there was great good in it, for the teachings of those souls were more widely spread in the world. This is why, repeatedly, both Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said they were happy and glad because of their imprisonment and exile.

We said that Persia was too small to hold these precious jewels, yet we must remember the high attainments of that land, for the learned ones of the world know that that land has brought forth great men, philosophers, poets and leaders, nay more, in ancient times Persia had seers like Mahábád and Zoroaster. And in this century, although the civilization and progress of that country have declined, she can now be proud of these jewels, the Báb, Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Persia can say, “O people of the world! God still is with me; truth has not turned its face away from me!

“It is my horizon, shining brilliantly, which gives forth light to all the world.”

The husband of my sister’s daughter had been martyred, one of eighty-four persons who were martyred together, in Yazd, in 1903. The young man was twenty-five years old. His mother had only this one boy. She gathered up and brought all her money to the executioners and begged them to take it and not to kill her boy. They took the money from her, then shot the boy before her eyes.

About a month afterward a Tablet was revealed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, without anyone’s having written to tell him of what had happened. The Tablet came through me to the wife of the young man:

“O thou persecuted hand-maiden of God!

“Although rich women may be brought up in utmost ease and comfort and luxury, yet at last that comfort and ease will be buried in the dust, in the narrow grave, in a dark place. [XIV:5:138]

“The ease of the day will pass away, and the happiness of the evening be spent. But in reality and in truth the hand-maidens who have entered the Divine Path, though they receive persecution, trouble and martyrdom, and see their loved ones persecuted, and drowned in their blood, their end will be everlasting glory and their home eternal.

“Then be thou not sad that thou hast sacrificed thy husband in the path of the beloved of the Lord, that illumined youth whom thou didst see immersed in blood, and in the dust. That was not death, it was life. It was not annihilation, it was existence itself. It was not calamity, it was divine grace. Then praise thou God that thou hast reached such a station and that thou hast come to such a position. Ere long the world and whatsoever is therein will pass away; but the traces of the martyrs in the path of God will remain forever. This world will become a paradise, this world will be seen as heavenly, and the station of these souls will become apparent and known.

The wonderful life of Qurratu'l-'Ayn

Jináb-i-Fáḍil

“The appearance of such a woman as Qurratu'l-'Ayn is in any country and any age a rare phenomenon, but in such a country as Persia, it is a prodigy—nay, almost a miracle. Alike in virtue of her marvellous beauty, her rare intellectual gifts, her fervid eloquence, her fearless devotion and her glorious martyrdom, she stands forth incomparable and immortal amidst her countrywomen. Had the Bábí religion no other claim to greatness, this were sufficient—that it Produced a heroine like Qurratu'l-'Ayn.”—Prof. E. G. Browne, of Cambridge University, England.

One of the great principles of the Bahá'í Cause is the progress of woman and equality between men and women. When we speak of equality between men and women many people think that this idea is not new. But it was new at the beginning of this Cause and came from it. It was so new and so important that it was one of the greatest signs of the progress of this age. No one had ever conceived of this idea of equality; nothing definite concerning it was written in any religious book of any age, and some people have even thought that the opposite was taught.

Many women of the early period of the Cause in the Eastern countries rose like flames of fire, like the stars of God. Even in the Occident accounts were written of one of them, Qurratu'l-'Ayn. Her history is very long and interesting. Her sublime faith, her lofty thought, her ardent work and service were truly a great miracle. She was indeed a woman whose equal is seldom found in the history of mankind. Her name, Qurratu'l-'Ayn, means “Consolation of the Eyes”. This title was hers because in knowledge, in sagacity, in radiance of soul and spirit, she was unique among the women of her country. She was a great and illumined soul who shone at the beginning of the Bahá'í movement, eighty years ago.

Qurratu'l-'Ayn's father and uncle were members of the clergy of Persia, and were conspicuous for their dogmatic beliefs. Her great uncle, especially, was a bitter enemy of the Cause. She and her sister were trained, in their home, by their father and uncles, according to the education of that time, scientific, literary and religious. But Qurratu'l-'Ayn hungered for greater knowledge; she was never satisfied with the education which her father and uncles could give her and she finally left her native city to study [XIV:5:139] in a theological institution which was a centre of religious education.

Women at that time were not supposed to leave their homes to further their education, nor were they supposed to go to other cities in search of the knowledge of God. But Qurratu'l-'Ayn was graduated from the seminary, and received a diploma. This was contrary to the custom—to give a woman a diploma in theology—and up to that time men only had received them. But Qurratu'l-'Ayn's attainments were so extraordinary that they were obliged to give her a diploma.

She then returned home, and married the son of her uncle. Difficulties now arose, for she was very brilliant, very illumined, and her husband was a reactionary leader. She was much esteemed, and at whatever gathering she appeared she spoke upon profound religious subjects. She was a gifted poet and wrote in both Persian and Arabic poetry of a very high order. She had two sons and one daughter.

The Bahá'í Movement had not as yet arisen, but the minds and the hearts of the people were awakening and becoming ready for this Cause. Qurratu'l-'Ayn was still so eager for spiritual knowledge that she left her home and family to study a second time at the religious centre. She spent much time in meditation and supplication, and received inspiration from God. From her deep study she understood that God was about to manifest Himself again, and she was very anxious to meet and speak with the Manifestation. Continually she talked of this, teaching the people and telling them that He would arise. There were several other great and illumined souls who, also, knew that the Light of God was about to appear. They tried to find the Manifestation, seeking diligently from city to city for the Light of God. Qurratu'l-'Ayn was, herself, not permitted to travel, but she asked them to notify her when they found the Divine One. After some time spent in travelling at last, in the year 1844, they found His Holiness the Báb. They recognized his station and understood that he was the morning star in the early dawn of this great Day. Filled with this knowledge they wrote to Qurratu'l-'Ayn.

One night Qurratu'l-'Ayn had a vision. A beautiful being, with illumined face, and wearing a green turban, stood between earth and heaven, praying in new words, with a new meaning, a prayer she had never heard before. When she awoke she remembered the prayer he had chanted and wrote it down. She was waiting for news of this heavenly being when those other great souls met the Báb and wrote to her of him. They sent her several lines from the early writings of the Báb; these lines were exactly the same as those which she had heard in her dream. She became aflame with interest, and sought eagerly for further news of His Holiness the Báb.

One of those early disciples of the Báb was sent by him to the city where Qurratu'l-'Ayn lived and studied in order to work with her. The Báb soon wrote an epistle to the head of the faculty at the theological centre, revealing to him the Glad Tidings. This epistle was given to this disciple and to Qurratu'l-'Ayn. In it the Báb said: "If you have spiritual insight you will know that this is the Word of God. If you can distinguish the Word of God from human thought, you will know that this is the truth. If, with the knowledge you possess, you are not sure, after studying together you must pray and God will send a sign to make clear the truth."

They went to the head of the theological institution and gave him the message; and the news of the Cause spread in that city. Some of the people believed. But many of the mullás did not, and arose in opposition.

One day Qurratu'l-'Ayn while talking of the Cause at the home of a woman believer, knew intuitively, all at once, that difficulties had arisen, and she said, "I must go home." Soon after she had [XIV:5:140] left enemies surrounded the house and took the believer prisoner, thinking her to be Qurratu'l-'Ayn. They inflicted injuries upon her, but she was happy to bear them. As they carried her through the city, surrounded by enemies, a man, who knew her, told the captors that she was not Qurratu'l-'Ayn whereupon they set her free. After this Qurratu'l-'Ayn went to these enemies and said, "I am Qurratu'l-'Ayn What do you wish?" They took her and banished her with her friends to Baghdád.

In Baghdád she was placed, under Government guard, in the house of a leading muftí.¹ The Governor of the city declared, "I cannot understand this matter for I do not know enough about this religion. We will call a meeting of the mullás and question her."

When this was done, Qurratu'l-'Ayn, being a woman, could not come into the presence of the mullás, but must remain behind a curtain. From that place she gave the message with great power. Many people were present and they asked many questions, to all of which she gave answers which were in accordance with religious and scientific knowledge. Those who listened were completely satisfied and many believed her, realizing that she had profound spiritual insight. A Jew, who was present, became a believer because of her explanations. He recognized in her words the knowledge of God. The muftí of the city also became greatly attracted to the teachings.

The Governor of Baghdád finally exiled her with the friends who came with her. But wherever they went they gave the message and awakened the people. They would enter a city, go to a large house, and invite everyone to come and listen to them. Then, in a few days, the enemies would band together and wreck the house in order to break up the meetings. The Governor would then command Qurratu'l-'Ayn to leave the city. On one occasion, when they had been driven quite a distance from the city—there were no trains—the driver left Qurratu'l-'Ayn and her companions in the desert, taking the horses with him that there might be no means of escape. Qurratu'l-'Ayn wrote an eloquent letter which one of the men of the party carried back to the city. The heart of the Governor was touched when he read this letter and he sent a horse and donkeys to carry them on. Thus Qurratu'l-'Ayn overcame all manner of difficulties.

When she returned to her native city she was opposed by all her relatives, and was made practically a prisoner in her own home. Every day and night these relatives met to question her, but they could not confound her, she was so much better informed than they. Her uncle said, "If you told us you were a Manifestation we would believe it because you have such great knowledge; but when you tell us that a young man without education is the Manifestation we cannot believe it." She told them that earthly knowledge is but a drop from the unlimited ocean of the revelation of God.

While these events were taking place the Báb was a prisoner on the top of a high mountain, in the extreme end of western Persia. He was surrounded by Persian guards and cut off from all communication with his followers. Although his jailers were very vigilant and tried in every way to prevent his disciples from seeing him, yet the friends of the Báb came to the castle where he was imprisoned from every direction, travelling from the north, south, east and west, and by many ingenious ways met him, received his blessing and returned home.

There were many apostles of the Báb who were highly trained in deep spiritual knowledge. They were busy heralding in every way the new day and the coming of the new truth.

While Qurratu'l-'Ayn was a prisoner in her own home, a disciple of the Báb appeared in the city of Qazvín, and started a class for the study of these spiritual teachings, giving the New Mes- [XIV:5:141] sage. Through the patience and fortitude of Qurratu'l-'Ayn in teaching the Cause, and the spreading of the Message by this follower of the Báb, many people became believers, and the fire of opposition was kindled among the Muslim clergy. The great uncle of

Qurratu'l-'Ayn, seized this moment to rise in the mosque and speak against the Báb, thus still further augmenting the opposition. These vehement speeches so inflamed the animosity against the believers that they were scoffed at and derided everywhere.

On one occasion a fanatical mob took one of the teachers and a few others to the gate of the house of this great uncle of Qurratu'l-'Ayn bastinadoed them, and there left them. Another believer was beaten almost to death, and then carried to the house of the Governor. When his brother went to ask for the release of the tortured one the Governor answered by placing a foot of each in the stocks, and beating them mercilessly.

One may imagine how Qurratu'l-'Ayn in her home, felt when she heard of these deeds. Although her relatives tried in every way to prevent her from leaving the house yet she managed to meet the friends, in a home where the pilgrims gathered who had visited the Báb. They met together with greatest unity and joy, encouraged each other, and gained wisdom and strength.

Two great difficulties now arose for Qurratu'l-'Ayn, one within the Cause, one without. Through her intuitive wisdom she realized that the day had come when the old dispensation should end and though she had had no direct instruction from the Báb, she herself began to inaugurate changes and to spread them abroad. It was in the earliest days of the Cause and the time had not yet come for the Báb to announce these innovations, for the hearts of the people were not ready.

One of the pillars of superstition was the veiling of Muslim women and their non-association with men. Qurratu'l-'Ayn with supreme courage, laid aside her veil, and came out heroically to mingle with men. There were many of the friends who were strong and sincere, but, having heard or read nothing on this matter (of the veil) from the Báb, they were shocked and astonished and they blamed Qurratu'l-'Ayn, calling her a heretic. Then it occurred to them to ask the Báb what he thought about the matter. They forthwith sent him, by a special messenger, long epistles against Qurratu'l-'Ayn. On the way the messenger met a prominent believer and told him of this difficulty in the movement. The great man said, "I believe that Qurratu'l-'Ayn is right, although I have no authority for saying so."

When the Báb received these documents he wrote a wonderful epistle, praising the extraordinary qualities of Qurratu'l-'Ayn and calling her "The Pure One". When this glorious epistle arrived all the doubts of the friends disappeared and an understanding of the greatness of Qurratu'l-'Ayn grew in the minds of those who had judged her.

The other difficulty was this: the great uncle of Qurratu'l-'Ayn, he who was so opposed to the Cause, had the habit of reviling in public meetings, the Báb and the forerunner of the Báb, Shaykh Ahmad. At one of these meetings a disciple of Shaykh Ahmad, who loved him very much, was in the audience and he became very much excited when Shaykh Ahmad was attacked. So one morning, when the uncle was praying in the mosque, this disciple killed him. Although the murderer was not a follower of the Cause, but of Shaykh Ahmad, yet, because this Shaykh had foretold the coming of the Báb, the whole city arose, blaming the friends of the Báb. The mob attacked and pillaged the homes of the believers, imprisoning them and putting chains around their necks; and it was decided that Qurratu'l-'Ayn must be placed in still closer confinement.

The father of Qurratu'l-'Ayn at first held the mob at bay before his house, and tried to save her. But he was soon [XIV:5:142] overcome and they rushed in, took her with two other women, and carried her before the Governor of the town. The Governor questioned them minutely about the murder and Qurratu'l-'Ayn with the greatest eloquence explained that the Bábís had had nothing to do with it. The Governor, however, was not appeased, and he had hot irons brought to brand the women who were with Qurratu'l-'Ayn to compel them to tell a different story. Qurratu'l-'Ayn turned her face toward heaven and began to pray. The court was filled with curious spectators, all watching eagerly this terrible deed.

Just as the burning iron touched the hand of one of the women there arose a commotion at the back of the court, the people crying out that the murderer had been found. He had heard what was being done to the women, and his conscience caused him to confess. So he asked to be taken to the Governor. This confession was such an unheard-of occurrence that the people were incredulous, but he said, "If you do not believe me, I will dig up the dagger that you may see it." He showed them where to find the dagger, and they were convinced.

The persecutions of Qurratu'l-'Ayn continued, and a number of the friends were taken, with the murderer who had confessed, to Ṭīhrán, the capital of Persia. They were all kept prisoners for several months, and then the command came to execute several of them. The relatives and family of Qurratu'l-'Ayn so hated her that they tried in every way to injure her and her followers. The Governor at last set her free, but ordered her to stay in her own home and not to go out. This she did for a long time, always closely guarded. Fearful lest her food be poisoned some of the friends, in the guise of servants, took special dishes to her. She lived, thus, in close confinement, until released by Bahá'u'lláh.

Bahá'u'lláh, in Ṭīhrán, sent a letter to Qazvín to Qurratu'l-'Ayn by special messengers who brought a horse and left it outside the city wall. The messengers entered the city at sunset and were taken secretly to Qurratu'l-'Ayn in the middle of the night. She escaped from her house and the city with them, mounted the horse which was waiting for her and, travelling day and night, reached Ṭīhrán. With greatest joy she stood in the presence of Bahá'u'lláh.

Of the two men who accompanied her in her flight from Qazvín one was a believer and the other was not. Bahá'u'lláh entrusted to this second escort a large sum of money; this he was to carry in his saddle bag. The money was in gold and silver and the man reasoned with himself that it would be safer to put the silver pieces on top; then if robbers attacked him they would take the silver and leave the gold. When they reached their journey's end Qurratu'l-'Ayn expressed great appreciation of his services and, without looking at the money, took nine handfuls from the bag and gave them to the man. She picked up the silver pieces as they were on top, and he was disappointed. Surmising this Qurratu'l-'Ayn said to him, "You will prosper greatly in the future. This money is but for the expenses of the journey. God will bless you."

In the absence of this man the enemies of the Cause stirred up the people against the believers and, knowing this man to be friendly to them they searched for him. However, upon his return, the search was discontinued, in almost miraculous fashion. The man then realized the truth of what Qurratu'l-'Ayn had told him. Later he became very rich.

During these days there were many meetings of great spiritual importance, the friends sitting at the feet of Bahá'u'lláh and learning new truths. One day, at one of these meetings a very learned man was present. He discoursed upon philosophy, giving proofs and evidences regarding the Cause. Qurratu'l-'Ayn listened for a while, then arose, and cried out, "This is the day of deeds. If thou art a man show forth deeds!" [XIV:5:143]

Again, there was a great meeting, where many of the friends were gathered, (The Conference at Badasht). Up to that time women had taken no part in such a meeting; the veil was still worn, and prejudice was strong. In the middle of the meeting Qurratu'l-'Ayn entered, suddenly, without her veil. The believers were utterly astonished, and much excited, and the meeting was thrown into confusion. Then Bahá'u'lláh, who was present, told one of the friends to chant the chapter from the Qur'án about the Resurrection: "The old conditions have passed away and the new conditions have been set up. The old ideas have vanished and the new principles have appeared."

After this Conference Qurratu'l-'Ayn started upon a long journey, teaching from city to city.

She was continually followed by spies who sought a pretext to accuse her. Finally she was arrested, carried back to Ṭīhrán, and imprisoned in the top of a house, in a room which could only be reached by climbing a ladder. Here she was kept for nearly four years. It so happened that this house was the home of the Mayor of Ṭīhrán. His family became interested in Qurratu'l-'Ayn and often invited her to, come down stairs and take part in their entertainments.

One of these occasions was the wedding of the son of the Mayor, and Qurratu'l-'Ayn was invited to be a guest. Now a wedding day is a time of merry making and not a religious festival; so there was music and dancing. But when Qurratu'l-'Ayn appeared, with majestic carriage and spiritual face, the assembled company looked upon her with awe and asked her to speak to them. She talked eloquently upon the Cause and its teachings of justice.

Shortly before her life was ended Qurratu'l-'Ayn was ordered to appear before the Sháh of Persia, an awe-inspiring despot. He had heard many tales of her, of her wonderful personality and magnetic powers which could win the hearts of her enemies even. So he wished to see her.

When she arrived at the audience room the Sháh was there surrounded with all the pomp of his high position. In she walked, carrying herself straight as an arrow, and began to speak to the Sháh of the great spiritual principles of the Cause. He became so interested because of her beauty, eloquence and depth of knowledge that his mother feared lest he be converted; so she called the guards to remove Qurratu'l-'Ayn.

In the year 1852 orders were given by the Sháh that all the believers be killed, and the life of Qurratu'l-'Ayn was demanded. On the day appointed, the first man assigned the task of martyring her refused to perpetrate the deed. A second man was then sent. He was intoxicated and strangled her with a handkerchief; then he threw her body into a well and covered it with stones.

So she gave up her life, and her spirit ascended to the Kingdom. Though her body returned to the dust, yet her light is ever shining; she is living always. Her name and her services are eternal.

A large volume might be written of the life of this peerless woman. In the history of the world there are few like her. Educated and beautiful, a gifted poet, she was still willing to sacrifice all, even her life, for the sake of truth, that through the spreading of truth the world of humanity might become enlightened.

When Qurratu'l-'Ayn was in prison the jailers refused to give her paper and ink. But so eager was she to write to her sister that she used a straw from the broom for a pen and the juice of green vegetables as ink. She wrote thrilling poems, sublime ideas, eloquent verses on the bits of paper which were wrapped around her food and sent them to her friends. These poems are today chanted throughout the East. Her verses are full of the fire of divine love.

The spirit of the century

In a Tablet to Mr Arthur S. Agnew, of Chicago (1907), 'Abdu'l-Bahá outlines in a few luminous sentences the way in which the coming spiritual civilization will become the real preventive of crime:

“As to the difference between the natural civilization which is, in the present day, in force, and the divine civilization which shall be, ... material civilization prevents and safeguards people from committing evil deeds through the force of the laws of retaliation and correction.

Thus you see how prohibitory laws and rules of correction are constantly being framed, yet no law effective 'for the prevention of crime is to be found, and in all the cities of Europe and America spacious prison buildings have been founded and established for correcting and punishing criminals.

"But the divine civilization will so train mankind that no soul will commit crimes, except a few individuals, which exception is of no importance whatsoever. Consequently, there is much difference between preventing people from evil actions and crimes through correction and retaliation, or through violent punishment, and so training them, enlightening them and spiritualizing them that they will shun crime and evil deeds without any fear of punishment, prevention or retaliation. Nay, they will consider crime itself as the greatest punishment and mightiest retribution, will be attracted to the virtues of the human world and devotedly spend their lives in that which is conducive to the enlightenment of mankind and to spreading qualities acceptable at the threshold of the Almighty.

"Consequently, consider what a difference and distinction is there between material civilization and divine civilization. Natural civilization prevents men from doing harm and wrong through force and punishment and thus withholds them from committing crimes. But divine civilization so trains men that human individuals avoid sin without having any fear of punishment, and the very sin itself becomes unto them as the severest punishment. And they will engage with utmost zeal and fervor in acquiring human virtues, gaining that by which mankind will be uplifted and that which will enlighten the human world."

The problem of law enforcement

Thirteen hundred years ago, in the Arabian Desert among a group of savage people so degraded that they buried alive their daughters, there arose a prophet of God, named Muḥammad. One of the laws which he transmitted from the heaven of the Divine Will was that of abstinence from alcoholic liquors.

For over a thousand years the millions of his true followers have refrained from the drinking of wine. One of our American university presidents, in a tour around the world some years ago, remarked upon the striking absence of drunkenness in all the Muslim cities which he visited.

Thirteen hundred years later the voters of the United States passed a prohibition law and, to make it adamant and everlasting, incorporated it in the Constitution itself. Yet all the authorities of this, one of the strongest nations of the world, are unable really to enforce this law.

The only authority that can truly establish a law is the conscience of a people. The outer authorities cannot watch all the multitudes every moment. The secret, hidden infractions of a law they can never prevent. But if the conscience of a people recognizes an ordinance as the will of God, they will obey it. For God is Almighty, Ever-Present. He sees the inmost heart. By His divine justice He [XIV:5:147] punishes and rewards not only deeds but thoughts and motives. Once the love and the fear of God arise in the hearts of a people and they behold a law as the will of their Eternal Beloved, they will obey it. Even the flames at the stake cannot prevent that obedience.

This is the record of all human history, that the Great Prophets transmit this love for God and His commandments: They are the mouth-pieces of God, the Manifestations of God. "For the law of God is a collective centre which unites various peoples, native lands, tongues and opinions. All find shelter in its protection and become attracted by it. For example, Moses and the Mosaic law were the unifying centre for the scattered sheep of Israel. He united these wandering flocks, brought them under control of divine law, educated and unified them, caused them to agree and uplifted them to a superlative degree of development. At a time when they were debased, they became glorified; ignorant, they were made knowing; in the bonds of captivity, they were given freedom; in short, they were unified. Day by day they advanced until they attained the highest degree of progress witnessed in that age. We prove, therefore, that the Manifestation of God and the law of God accomplish unity.

“Consider the time of Christ. Peoples, races and governments were many; religions, sects and denominations were various; but when Christ appeared, the Messianic reality proved to be the collective centre which unified them beneath the same tabernacle of agreement. ... Therefore, it is shown that the divine Manifestations, the holy Mouthpieces of God, are the Collective Centres of God.”¹—‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

Today this voice of Divine Authority, for multitudes of Christians and Jews, is silent. New conditions of society, new sciences, a new industrial order have obscured the shining commandments of Moses and the Christ. Many Muslims, Hindus, Buddhists, Chinese, are finding the same difficulty in obeying and following their sacred scriptures.

The time has now arrived when from every corner of the world comes the cry for a new outpouring of the Spirit of Truth, to lead us into all truth. We need a new spiritual and scientific explanation of sacred scriptures and symbols, a new voice that speaks with authority, a new application of the divine law to present world conditions. Science is new, world-communication is new, crime has a new power, war has become a new and world-enveloping terror. Therefore we must have a new revelation of the Eternal Truth, powerful enough to solve these problems of the potentially marvellous age in which we are living. We need a teaching which will gather together the broken rays of new sciences, new world movements and longings into the pure white light from which they came.

In the writings and life of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá we find in world illuminating splendour the new manifestation of the Ancient Glory of God. These great teachers explain in scientific terms the bibles of old, their prophecies, their miracles and their commandments. They make the sacred scriptures of all religions one continuous revelation, and reveal the real process of creation, over its millions of years. They manifest again that Holy Spirit which produces a new creation. They transmit God’s voice so clearly that a multitude from all religions and races are laying down their prejudices, their fears, their points of separation that the law of universal love and the oneness of mankind may be established among the nations. Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá have become the centre of the new world of brotherhood and peace.

Mount Carmel, the Vineyard of God

“The air here at Mount Carmel,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “is fragrant and the earth is sweet.” “Syria is a most wonderful country. It is a world in miniature. The trees of the hot climates, date palm, orange, mandarins, etc., are found in Syria. Tiberias is known for its hot weather, but Mount Lebanon is a cool summer resort.”

“In reality the air of Mount Carmel is most energizing. I have breathed the air of many country places and have seen much natural scenery, but the air of this mountain is most wholesome, vitalizing, and its scenery is very entrancing. Purity of air, sublimity of panorama and beauty of landscape are united on Mount Carmel presenting to the eye a noble and inspiring spectacle of nature; its panorama of sea and land is very unique, its sun is all-glorious, its moon all-beautiful and its stars are all-sparkling.”

“Many Jewish prophets either lived here or passed a portion of their lives or sojourned for a while or spent the last days of their existence on this mountain.” “This is the Holy Land, the land which gave birth to the prophets—Abraham Isaac, Joseph, David, Solo- [XIV:5:149] mon, Moses, Isaiah, Zechariah and, last of all, Christ. Elijah lived on Mount Carmel. You must love this land very much because all these holy happenings have taken place here. His Holiness Christ came to this holy mountain many times. The atmosphere is permeated with wonderful spirituality.”—From the unpublished Diary of Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, 1914.

The future of the Cause

The Governor of Acre called upon the Master this morning. Having heard of the success of the Cause in America, he wondered how it was possible to unite Muslims, Christians, Jews and Zoroastrians. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said:

“Things will come to pass in a wonderful way after my departure. God has brought about this, that He should be on earth and, at the same time, not be (on earth), in order that the beloved ones may not relax their work.

“There will be a little time of quiet, after my departure. Then there will be a great (spiritual) blaze. Especially will this happen if the divine friends remain firm and steadfast in the Covenant, if they are not troubled or disturbed.

“The Blessed Beauty has crowned his believers, and especially those who were in the Great Prison, with an everlasting diadem of sovereignty. In the days of Jesus, the Son of Mary, those who were under the shelter of Jesus could not realize under what shelter they were abiding. But after His Holiness Jesus ascended they served Him faithfully—may my life be a sacrifice to them! In the days of His Holiness Jesus they did not accomplish anything.

“And now no one can realize what a crown is laid upon the heads of the believers, especially those who were associated with the Blessed Beauty in the Great Prison. They underwent great troubles; for days they did not rest. Therefore we must in appreciation of this grace and virtue arise and serve the Cause of God. A similar crown should be placed upon our heads. We were poor, he made us rich. We were looked down upon, we became respected. We were ignorant, we became learned. We were blind, we found sight. We were deaf, we now can hear. There has been no bounty which he has not shown to us. As a sign of gratitude for these gifts and blessings we must be firm and steadfast in the Cause of God.

“All this place will be filled with schools, hospitals, asylums, orphanages and pilgrim houses. The kings of the earth will go forth from the Supreme Shrine at Haifa to the Blessed Shrine at ‘Akká. In the future Haifa and ‘Akká will be united. There will be villas, suburbs and gardens. Here will be the eternal pilgrimage for the world.”—From the Diary of Mírzá Badí‘ Bushrú‘í, Shrine of Bahá'u'lláh, Bahjí, ‘Akká, 16 April 1916.

In the name of God!

O Most Mighty Branch!

On Wednesday two written leaflets have been received from thee and every letter thereof testified unto the Unity of the Divine Essence and the Sanctity of God, the True One, above all resemblance and likeness. Blessed be thy pen, thine ink and the scroll that beareth thy remembrance. [XIV:5:151]

I pray God that by thee He may graciously enable His servants to sound the inmost depths of the Ocean of Divine Unity, that through thy remembrance He may aid them to drink deep from the stream of Everlasting Life, that through thine utterance He may cause them to quaff the mystic wine of the knowledge of God, that He may assist thee to triumph by the Hosts of understanding and wisdom in such wise that by thee He may gloriously conquer the citadels of worlds and of hearts! There is none other God but He, the Gracious, the Beloved!

O thou that art the apple of mine eye! My Glory rest upon thee. Mine ocean of loving-kindness, the Day-Star of my Grace, the heavens of my mercy be with thee. We pray unto God that He may illumine all mankind with the light of thy knowledge and wisdom; that He may ordain for thee that which may gladden thy heart and solace thine eyes Mighty and Powerful is He over all things!

Glory, mercy and praise rest upon thee, and upon whomsoever circleth around Thee!

Australia and New Zealand

“My dearest co-workers in that distant land:

“How great was my joy to learn that in that far-away continent, remote from the turmoil and restlessness of a weary world, the Voice of God has been raised and proclaimed and, has attracted such a promising number of ardent and faithful lovers of Bahá'u'lláh.

“I offer you my heartfelt love and sympathy and the assurance of my unfailing assistance in the great work of service to mankind which is now so gloriously unfolding itself to your eyes.

“I have shared fully your news with those loving pilgrims and resident friends in the Holy Land whom I meet regularly in what was in the past the audience-chamber of the Master and who thirst after the tidings of the progress of the Cause in every land. They, and myself with them, will pray most fervently for every one of you that the seeds of faith and loving fellowship that you are casting in the soil of hearts may germinate and swell the ever increasing numbers of the valiant hosts of Bahá and enable them to attain glorious victory.

“I shall await with eager expectation the welcome news of the extension of your activities, the widening of your correspondence with the various spiritual centres throughout the world, the plans you contemplate for the spreading of the Movement and the means you will utilize for their speedy execution. On my part I shall never neglect to send you such news as will urge you to press forward your great work for the Cause and hearten you in your labours of love and devotion at His Sacred Threshold.

Dearest Friends:

I welcome gladly and heartily this first opportunity of expressing to you in writing what I have always felt in the depths of my heart of my confident hopes for your whole-hearted assistance in the great task that is before me.

I know too well of the spirit of ardent devotion and steadfast love that animates you in your labours for the Cause, and it is primarily upon this that I confidently rely in facing the great responsibilities of the future.

The world is sadly stricken and in a state of continuous turmoil and signs of weariness and despondency are apparent everywhere. But we, fired with the hope of the Abhá Kingdom and ever mindful of the unfailing promises of the dawn of a new and better day, must weather every storm and endeavour to impart to every earnest seeker that firm faith and inner peace which the world cannot give.

It is our vital and most urgent duty to assure at whatever cost the safety and the unity of the Cause of God, and with harmony and concord firmly established amongst us, to arise with confidence and courage for the enlightenment of the world and the salvation of mankind.

With my best wishes and earnest prayers for your success in these noble endeavours,

I am your brother and co-worker,

... [XIV:5:156]

My dearly beloved brethren and sisters in 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

Your sweet messages of love and greeting transmitted through the kindness of our beloved Bahá'í sister, Mrs Collins, have deeply touched my heart and have strengthened my hope and confidence in the great service which the Bahá'í youth will render in future to the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh.

I have read your individual letters with the deepest interest and enclose for you all in this short answer of mine flowers planted in the close vicinity of the Holy Shrine and placed upon the Sacred Thresholds of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. And as I placed them on those hallowed spots I remembered you most tenderly, and prayed on your behalf, beseeching the Almighty to guide and protect you in your earnest endeavours to learn and to teach the Cause of God.

I very strongly urge you to devote your time to a very serious and profound study of the history of the Cause and of the various Writings of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The study of the Cause and its Teachings and the daily endeavour to exemplify its Spirit in our dealings with our fellow men are the most essential obligations of all Bahá'ís, whether young or old, who aspire to see this Divine Message spread throughout the world.

As to a name for your Club, "Bahá'í Fellowship" seems to be the best reminder of the spirit that must animate continually its members in their work of service to mankind. I cherish the hope that you will all show forth in all your activities the spirit of true Bahá'í fellowship, and grow to become efficient workers in His Divine Vineyard.

Wishing you success from all my heart,

I am your devoted brother,

Dear brethren and sisters in 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

In these days of world unrest, of political upheavals, of social disruption and spiritual ferment, the one Power that can bind effectively together the scattered and conflicting elements of human society and breathe into them the vivifying and eternal Spirit of Life is indeed the power of the Call of Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá!

We, of this noble Faith, the chosen ones of God, who carry with us this wholesome Medicine for the ills and sicknesses of this world, must now bestir ourselves to further activity and relentless efforts in the great and urgent mission entrusted to us by Bahá'u'lláh, that we may minister freely and effectively to the needs of mankind.

Our primary duty is to create by our words and deeds, our conduct and example, the atmosphere in which the seeds of the words of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, cast so profusely during well-nigh eighty years, may germinate and give forth those fruits that alone can assure peace and prosperity to this distracted world.

Clear in our vision, broad in our outlook, tireless in our energies and steadfast in our hopes, let us promote one and all this great work of Reconciliation of which the world stands in such great need at present.

May the Light of His Divine Guidance illumine our path and lead us to our glorious destiny.

Your brother,

The search for truth

Louis G. Gregory

The search for truth has caused the forward march of mankind in all ages of the world. The will to know is one of the most powerful mainsprings of action and the greatest incentive to progress. Freedom and happiness, both for the individual and collective man, depend upon the knowledge of truth. Greater joy there cannot be than that of discovery. But this attainment is impossible for man unless he becomes an independent seeker. He should, for this noble purpose, put aside empty forms and servile imitations. And while reverence for ancestors is praiseworthy, the independent investigator must weigh his conclusions in the balance of sound logic. However long established the view-points of others, he must strive to know for himself. While this station is possible for all men, its attainment requires courage. For no discoverer of truth can hope to escape the sneers and jeers of prejudice and ignorance. But although the path is difficult, it is yet glorious. Through the degrees of martyrdom the soul of man is freed from its earthly cage and makes extraordinary advancement. The bold and untrammelled search for truth is the light of genius in all times. The power of truth removes the stagnant pools and dead seas of outworn usages. It refreshes the soul of man with living streams that flow from the Bosom of God.

Job said: "I know that my Redeemer liveth!" Such an exalted height of knowledge is not impossible for any man. For the very purpose of man's existence is to know his Creator. The powers by which he may know God are hidden within his own being. Attraction to the beauty of truth reveals man's inward powers. The genial flame of truth sets in motion new vibrations, unfolds the true virtues of religion and the laws of science, apprehends the mysteries of God and His endless creations. Great and wonderful are the reaches of mind. Deep and subtle are the mysteries of the heart. When the inner sight is clear through powers that are heart-dwelling, the mind is brightened and man is thereby elevated to his true station of glory and splendour above the world of matter. If he does not discover these latent powers the purpose of life is lost. If he does not use these forces, by what sign can he prove himself man? The hand, the eye, and other powers of the physical temple have their manifest functions and improve their skill by service. Should not those greater powers, which attest the emanations of Divinity in man, adorn his career and crown his destiny? The aspiration of man soars Heavenward as he strives to awaken these powers. Spiritual unity is the reality of man and the presence of Divine Bounty.

The beginning of truth-seeking, which [XIV:6:162] may lead through Divine Favour to the Greatest Light, is very simple. First of all, let us have faith; and as a sign of faith let us humbly ask the Giver of Bounty for light and knowledge. If one thereupon subjects whatever is presented him to a reasonable inquiry, he may be astonished at his own growth. If the mind is free from bias or hate, the horizon will widen and faith will become confidence. Even as when, as hungry children, we go to our parents for food, fully confident that they will answer our needs, even more firm should be our assurance that the Light of God will not mislead us.

The Bahá'í teachings, which focalize reality, reveal the unity of truth, however diversified its aspects. The oneness of God reveals the oneness of truth. The singleness of truth reflects the singleness of God. All things in creation are related through their common emanation from Divinity. Because reality is indivisible, it can never be plural. The Divine Light which is the essence of truth, is the universal Glory of God, now manifest. "It is the Bahá of Abhá which covers the earth as the waters cover the deep." When this fact becomes generally known, how conducive will it be to the unity of religions, the end of strife and the establishment of eternal peace! When hearts are aflame with the sacred fire of truth, thoughts will coincide in the reflection of One Reality and constructive service will heal the world. And since this wondrous light and knowledge are impossible save through the Manifestation of God, the ascent of man depends only upon his detachment from all else and his attraction in greater and greater degree to that manifest Splendour. Marvellous poise! Infinite joy! Universal Harmony!

How sad and depressing is the bedlam caused by the opposite! Not long ago, before a noted gathering, a theologian was heard to state very dogmatically the basis of his own faith and that which in his opinion made it superior to all others. But it so happened that the dogma he selected as the holy of holies and sine qua non of salvation was no other than a blind superstition, sans scientific, rational, spiritual or even common sense basis. He was even mistaken in the assumption that his own faith was the only one that relied upon the said superstition. For inquiry makes it appear that the ancient Egyptians, thousands of years before Christ, as well as millions of non-Christian religionists in the world today, have adhered to the same unprovable belief. Thus in one breath this good man showed himself an alien to science as also to the comparative study of religions. The statement of this dogma is omitted here although it is one which many people unthinkingly and blindly support. The purpose is educational rather than controversial, to stimulate investigation and discovery rather than to shock those who lie dormant. A religious leader may, in his own way, lord it over the masses for a long time. But if he has no universal vision of truth where is his capacity to serve mankind in their progress toward unity and freedom? The attitude of bigotry, narrowness and pride time out of mind has divided the realm of humanity into a multitude of warring sects, belying the spirit of true religion and execrating those whom they should love. Hopeless is the task of establishing unity on the basis of dogma and superstition. Yet the veils are being removed; for all the opposition of mice and men cannot prevent the sun from rising!

Truth is the light of God in the world; and God is love. Truth is the descent of Heaven to man; and Heaven is man's home. Truth is the manna upon which God feeds His children; and all souls are hungry. Truth is the outpouring of God's Holy Spirit in the morning of the resurrection; and this is the morning of that great Day of God! All the Holy Manifestations of God, throughout cycles and ages, have trained humanity in truth. Their pure and perfect lives were [XIV:6:163] standards of truth. Their sacrificial examples applied the truth. These perfect mirrors of divinity reflected the truth. For this noble purpose Jesus Christ and the other Divine Messengers of the past, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá in this day, came to earth in human temples, suffered affliction, pain and martyrdom. Assuredly their purpose was not to exalt themselves. Else why should such intelligent beings descend from a realm of pure delight to dwell in the world of dust? Or whence their indifference to the praise of men? Their true purpose was to free humanity from the thralldom of nature; to remove the barriers caused by blind imitations, spiritless forms, savage dogmas and ignorant prejudices. Kindly they wrought, lovingly they taught, that hatred and warfare might be displaced and truth enthroned. Their oneness of love is outpoured upon all. Their far reaching Guardianship protects all. Can man afford to be heedless to this call? The reign of ignorance and the sovereignty of calamity have ever been for man convertible terms. The still small voice, stronger than the clash of armaments, counsels peace. Will the children of men hear the Voice of God?

The devotee of truth avoids contention. The follower of light seeks its blessing for others. Disciples of truth are signs of guidance. One vivified by the spirit of truth may become the means of imparting life to his companions, for he has turned with reverence to the Sun of Truth, the Creative Word, which brightens and cheers all the worlds. Whoever perceives this wondrous Light will not be misled by a torch or candle, or the will-o'-the-wisp of formalism. Yet one who is divinely favoured will not only seek light and guidance for his kind, but be merciful even to the animals. Insight reveals the relationship of the part to the whole. Guidance brings humility.

Once upon a time, the story runs, six blind men of Hindustan went to see an elephant. As all were blind, their impressions were dependent upon the sense of touch. One, touching the elephant's head, said he was like a ball; another, touching his leg, thought him like a tree; another touched his trunk and declared him like a snake; another his tail, likened him to a rope; another his ear, spoke of him as a fan; another his side, insisted that the elephant was like a wall. They then quarrelled over their various opinions, each adhering to his own with the greatest rancour and obstinacy. They abused and denounced each other and even fought. Each partly right, but all generally wrong, the educational effect of listening to each other's points of view was entirely lost. So it ever is with bigotry and pride.

Happy is he, in this day of hostile creeds and clashing dogmas, who can see the elephant in full proportion. It symbolizes in this day the Sun of reality and truth. Yet how difficult is this, because men are so much attached to the idols of their own fancy! The divine hand ever beckons us to the pathway of light. There seems a touch of humour, as well as pathos in the divine injunction to the truth-seeker:

“Leave them to amuse themselves with their vain discourse!”

Man should ever mount higher and higher in seeking reality. He should never let the mind and heart be limited by the imaginations of men. The vision that is universal is a true emanation from the Divinity of the Word. The same God gives good gifts to all his children. The same vital truth is declared in all religions. The hidden mystery of truth, Divine Love, is the cause of all life. The inner law is changeless; the outer law is varied by the Giver of Bounty from cycle to cycle to relieve human needs. Because men are so forgetful, the Merciful Providence in this cycle of truth and knowledge decrees the renewal of the spirit. What favour can be greater than this? It is the appearance of this Lordly Splendour which rend the veils of superstition and error and reveals the light of assurance and knowledge.

The great and luminous Apostle Paul [XIV:6:164] foresaw the greatness of this day when he wrote:

“When that which is perfect has come, that which is in part shall be done away.” Though men adhere, for limited reasons, to that which is limited, such attachments must ultimately give way; for the darkness is powerless to defeat the light. As mists disappear before the rising sun, so must error and limitations depart as the Sun of Truth mounts higher and higher, approaching its full power and glory. The light and heat of this genial Sun will bring to full growth the minds and hearts of men. There is no night but ignorance! There is no light but truth!

This blessed assurance is given by Bahá'u'lláh:

“Every soul who sincerely accepts the Word of God hath verily passed through the path and succeeded in approaching the paradise of God’s pleasure, and hath assembled with those who are near to God, the chosen ones.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá thus reveals to us the beauty of truth and the ultimate goal of man’s attainment:

“What is truth? Truth is the word of God, which gives life to humanity. It restores sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf; it makes eloquent those who are dumb, and living beings out of dead beings; it illumines the world of heart and soul; it reduces into nothingness the iniquities of the neglectful and erring ones. Beauty, perfection, brilliancy and spirituality in this existence come from or through the word of God. For all it is the supreme goal, the greatest desire, the cause of life, light, instruction. The road to attain to this Truth is the love of God. When the light of the love of God is burning in the mirror of the heart, that flame shows the way and guides to the Kingdom of the Word of God.

“As to what causes the growth of the love of God, know that it is to turn one’s self toward God.”

Prayer—the ladder to heaven

From the Words of Bahá'u'lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, with an introduction by Jináb-i-Fáḍil.

The Holy Spirit is the power which is in the Manifestations of God. When man is freed from his natural conditions he draws near to the Holy Spirit. In the early dawn at Haifa, in the Holy Shrines on Mount Carmel, one finds souls intoxicated with the love of God, at this time of prayer and meditation. Through meditation the spirit is delivered from the cage of the human nature; real communication is established and divine gifts are granted. The attitude becomes holy, and we long to serve.

It has been asked: “Should the heart be emptied, to let God speak?” The Bahá’ís have many beautiful prayers and supplications in which the spirit of Bahá'u'lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá dwell and when we are using these supplications and thinking of their meaning our spirit expands.

Christ lived for a long time in the caves of the mountain and it is said that Satan came to test His Holiness Christ, but had no effect upon him. What was Satan and what was the test? Satan was materialistic thought. Satan tried to test the Christ because he was leaving behind human thoughts and was turning to the spiritual Kingdom. Christ had a human body, but his body had no effect upon his spirit. It is written, “The spirit, indeed, is willing, but the flesh is weak.”

Before his declaration, Bahá'u'lláh lived alone in a cave for two years, in a high mountain in a very dangerous country called Kurdistán. When the simple shepherds of that region heard him praying in the early morning they felt such a spiritual power that they gathered around the cave to listen.

My meaning is this, that when prayer [XIV:6:165] or supplication is rising from the heart and is uttered by the tongue, especially if the words are divine words, it attracts divine qualities, like a magnet.

God is Universal Consciousness, unlimited, infinite, unknowable, incomprehensible to our finite minds. The Infinite cannot be included in the finite, but is reflected from every atom in the universe. Each kingdom reflects God according to its degree of receptivity, whether mineral, vegetable, animal or human; but the heart of man is the greatest reflector of all. If you split an atom in the heart of it you will find a sun. "Dost thou think thy body a small thing, while within thee is enfolded the universe?" said Bahá'u'lláh.

Science has proved that God is not a man in the sky, for there is no place which can be located as Heaven. An ant with long horns tipped with olfactory nerves would think that God was a very large ant, with long horns just as man thinks God is a great, perfect man. We have so pictured God as a large man with eyes and ears, who could speak and, perhaps, eat. As there is no physical Heaven, therefore there is no place for such a God to live in. Science has released us from this superstition.

But the universe is full of the spirit, the attributes of God, and the heart is a mighty magnet. True prayer is thinking of, reaching out to God, lifting up our hearts, freeing them from self and material things; and after we have freed the heart it acts as a magnet to attract these qualities, these attributes. It becomes attuned to these vibrations, as a wireless receiver becomes attuned to certain wave lengths in the air. The prayers of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá help to put the heart in tune. From two talks recently given by Jináb-i-Fáḍil.

"In all the worlds of existence there is nothing more important than prayer. Prayer confers spirituality upon the heart."¹ "Spirituality is the greatest of God's gifts and life everlasting. It means turning to God." "Turn your faces away from the contemplation of your own finite selves and fix your eyes upon the Everlasting Radiance; then will your souls receive in full measure the Divine Power of the Spirit and the Blessings of the Infinite Bounty."²

"Stay ye entirely clear of this dark world's concerns, and become ye known by the attributes of those essences that make their home in the Kingdom. Then shall ye see how intense is the glory of the heavenly Day-Star, and how blinding bright are the tokens of bounty coming out of the invisible realm."³

Morning thoughts

"Everyone upon awaking in the morning awakes with a thought. The commercial man awakes with the thought of commerce; the inventor awakes with the thought of his inventions; the banker with the thought of money. But you, when you awake, must at once think of God and begin the day with an earnest desire to attain to the will of God and His good pleasure."

"Man must be freed from every material tie and must seek the path of the Kingdom. He must not look backward, he must look forward; not downward, but heavenward."

"The meditative faculty is akin to the mirror; if you put it before earthly objects it will reflect them. Therefore if the spirit of man is contemplating earthly subjects he will be informed of these.

"But if you turn the mirror of your spirits heavenwards, the heavenly constellations and the rays of the Sun of Reality will be reflected in your hearts, and the virtues of the Kingdom will

“We should not be occupied with our failings and weaknesses, but concern ourselves with the will of God so that it may flow through us, thereby healing these human infirmities.”

“Neglect not praying and communing in the gloomy midnights and at morn and eve, and offer glory unto thy Lord the [XIV:6:166] Supreme.”

“Know that nothing will benefit thee in this life save supplication and invocation unto God, service in His vineyard, and, with a heart full of love, be in constant servitude unto Him.”²

“Draw nigh unto God and persevere in communion with thy Lord so that the fire of God’s love may glow more luminously in the heart, its heat may grow stronger and give warmth to that region and its sound reach the Supreme Concourse.”³

Abu’l-Faḍl, the Bahá’í saint and philosopher, one of the most brilliant scholars of his age, prayed, we are told, seven times every day. Great souls keep strong by reading and prayer. When he went into exile, Bahá’u’lláh gave him the following prayer to be repeated whenever he was in need: “O my God! I beg of Thee by the King of Names and Maker of heaven and earth, by the rustling of the leaves of the Tree of Life, and by the Utterances through which the realities of things are drawn unto us, to grant me”

The joy of prayer

“There is nothing sweeter in the world of existence than prayer.”

“Prayer and supplication are two wings whereby man soars toward the heavenly mansion of the True One. However, verbal repetition of prayer does not suffice. One must live in a continual attitude of prayer. When man is spiritually free his mind becomes the altar and his heart the sanctuary of prayer. Then the meaning of the verse, ‘We will lift up from before his eyes the veil’ will become fulfilled in him.”

“It is most difficult to stand unshaken during the days of trials. When we were living in Baghdád conditions at one time were such that the friends of God were always in danger of losing their lives. Not a night passed during which they were sure that they would be alive in the morning and not a morning did they arise with any certainty that they would see another night. Yet they lived in the highest state of faithfulness, firmness, spirituality and attraction. Áqá Riḍá and seven others lived in one small room. They rested, ate and slept in this one room. Every night they had spiritual meetings, chanting prayers and poems till long past midnight. Often their food consisted of a few dates. These Bahá’ís were peddlers in the bazaars. Some of them sold nothing all day. When in the evening they returned home they all pooled the few piastres which they had made and with that small sum bought their dinner. Some days they made only twenty pares. With this they bought dates and of them made their meal. However, they were the richest men on the face of the earth. They lived in a state of holiness, sanctity, attraction and devotion.

“There was a man, Pidar-Ján.⁴ I cannot praise him enough. He was the embodiment of spirituality. He used to carry under his arm while walking in the bazaars a dozen pairs of stockings, hoping to sell them. But, forgetting his surroundings, he would slowly chant the communes (prayers). Then someone would come up softly, behind him, and take the stockings from under his arm. If a customer wanted a pair of stockings Pidar-Ján would look under his arm—but there would be nothing there. So he thought he would carry the stockings on the palms of his hands. Again he would become absorbed, reading the supplications, and again the stockings would be stolen without his knowledge.”—Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá recorded by Mirza Ahmad Sohrab.

How prayer becomes real

In all centuries those who have learned the spiritual laws prepare for prayer by reading or repeating sentences through which a saint or prophet has reflected the effulgence of the Holy Spirit. The great Manifestations of God reveal prayers which are ablaze with divine love, which melt the heart, and usher one into the [XIV:6:167] court of the Eternal Presence. The heavenly books are like a city, writes Bahá’u’lláh. “What shall we mention of the signs, tokens, appearances and splendours ordained in that city by the command of the King of Names and Attributes. It quenches thirst without water and increases the heat of the love of God without fire. ... It bestows wealth without gold and grants immortality without death. ... This city is renewed and adorned every thousand years, more or less. Therefore, O my friend, we must make an effort to attain to that city.”

The more one reads with “longing, fervour, with love, rapture, attraction and devotion” the sooner does “the Ideal Herald” “dawn like the true morn from the Divine City with spiritual glad tidings and awaken the heart, soul and spirit from the sleep of negligence with the trumpet of knowledge.” “Those who earnestly endeavour in the path of God after severance from all else will become so attracted to that city that they will not abandon it for an instant.”

The prayer that is answered

“There are many subjects which are difficult for man to solve, but during prayer and supplication they are revealed.” “Muḥammad said, ‘Prayer is a ladder by which everyone can ascend to heaven’; if one’s heart is cut from the world his prayers are the means of the ascension.”

“If our ruling desire binds us to God we shall receive what is God-like. ‘I link myself to God and not to dust.’ If one prays to be whole (perfect), on God’s part the answer is eternally complete. We must fulfil the conditions to expect God to fulfil His promises. To pray is to lift the soul into union with the Eternal Goodness. Wholeness is the natural result of abiding in God.”

Prayer and service

In the supreme adjustment one turns the glory received from prayer into the channel of daily business and service to the Kingdom. “Go,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to a student coming to America, “with the intention and aim of teaching the Cause of God and spreading the fragrances of God. Then thy study and worldly affairs will both prosper.”

“O God! O God! Cause me to drink from the cup of Thy bestowal. Illumine my face with the light of guidance. Make me firm in faithfulness and steadfastness in Thine Ancient Covenant. Suffer me to become one of Thy sincere servants. Open before my face the doors of prosperity. Prepare for me the means of livelihood. Give me my bread through channels over which I have no control, Thy heavenly treasures. Grant me the power to turn my face toward Thy merciful Countenance, to be faithful to Thy Cause.

“O Thou Clement and Compassionate One! Verily, Thou art gracious to those who are firm and steadfast in Thy strong and impregnable Covenant. Praise be to God, the Lord of the worlds!”

“The Essence of Oneness is sanctified above the servitude of the world of mankind and independent of the devotion of all else. One should, therefore, engage in serving His servants, which act is identical with serving Him. Then will the essential unity, harmony and oneness become manifest and unveil their beauty.”

When work becomes worship

In the coming spiritual renaissance, the glorious Day of God which is now dawning, work, study and scientific research when performed in a spirit of unselfish service will be accounted as worship. Such is the new Bahá'í teaching. It all depends upon the motive, the pure intention. “We should do little things as well as great things for the love of God,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. “Service in the love of mankind is unity with God. He who serves has already entered the Kingdom and is seated at the right hand of his Lord.” “Bahá'u'lláh has even said that occupation and labour are devotion. All humanity must obtain a [XIV:6:168] livelihood by sweat of the brow and bodily exertion, at the same time seeking to lift the burden of others, striving to be the source of comfort to souls and facilitating the means of living. This in itself is devotion to God. Bahá'u'lláh has thereby encouraged action and stimulated service. But the energies of the heart must not be attached to these things; the soul must not be completely occupied with them. Though the mind is busy, the heart must be attracted toward the Kingdom of God in order that the virtues of humanity may be attained from every direction and source.”¹

“A profession, a trade, farming, these are worshipping God. A farmer who cultivates his land with the utmost application is like a worshipper who with deepest reverence and humility prays to God in a temple. When the labourer works honestly and sincerely it is as though he were praying.” “Every soul who occupies himself in an art or trade,” wrote Bahá'u'lláh, “this will be accounted an act of worship before God.”

Prayer in the peace of solitude or worship in the spiritual meeting will prepare for the prayer without ceasing in home or shop, school or office.

“Mayest thou ever be in a prayerful attitude,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to a friend who was seeking the radiant pathway of the spiritual life. “In all the worlds of existence there is nothing more important than prayer.”

Divine contentment

This tablet to Mr and Mrs Rabb of San Francisco was found by Shoghi Effendi among the papers of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, after ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s ascension. It was unsigned, also no date was attached.

He is God!

O ye faithful ones of the Holy Threshold!

Your letter, which was expressive of your supplications to the Holy Threshold was received. Thanks be to God, that you have remained firm in spite of all the trying temptations.

This material world of ours is a world of contrasts. It has in itself abundance and destitution, joy and sorrow, youth and old age. It is all the time changing and one has to undergo these different stages. Hence it behoves every faithful person to be patient and to be grateful for that which he receives.

It is fitting for those in the Kingdom to be satisfied with their fate and look only toward the increase of the heavenly spark in their hearts for this, alone, will give them rest and consolation. And you, too, should endeavour to increase that spiritual flame, known as the love of God, for through its increase you will enter into a new world of love and contentment.

I beseech the Lord to help you to overcome these hard conditions and to bestow upon you abundance of gifts from His bounties.

I think of you always and pray for you. Be comforted, and trust in the mercy of the Merciful One, for it is said, "He who is not contented with what he receives, let him seek a God other than Me."

Therefore we have to be contented and devote our time to the worship and the praise of our God.

Upon you be my greetings.

A note on morality

Horace Holley

Like a boat laid up alongside a rapid stream, our impulse continually feels the tug of a current flowing past, a current in whose urgent flow it seems natural for impulse to be cast, a current in which impulse continually does cast itself. Refreshed and renewed by journeys down this current, journeys long or short, impulse lies again just outside its urge, like a boat drawn to the bank. But the stream never ceases to flow by, its invitation never relaxes its instinctive appeal.

In the current of custom, popular manners, social convention and use, our personal impulses find their most lasting and most urgent expression. Traced to their source, few impulses are personal at all. Few leap cleanly from the man himself, his own expression; most impulses are drawn forth from the man by outside forces—they express the environment immediately about him; for the man, they are impressions so urgent as to require response. Society is the continual, strong current tugging at the boat of our lives. In impulse released we feel a personal vitality and purpose, an enlargement of personal consciousness; but the release of impulse down the social current brings only a reflected self into being. With the dissolve of the determining conditions, the vitality and purpose also dissolve. They disappear like images from a mirror when the room is emptied of its things. The realization of this comes seldom enough, for almost invariably new images immediately replace the old. The ordinary person's habitual self, his reflected self, seems real enough year on year and life on life. For seldom is the room actually emptied of its things before the mirror of mind. When, in sickness or catastrophe, the mirror finds nothing before it to reflect, its own emptiness becomes dreadfully acute. For this extraordinary thing does happen to ordinary people to feel one's self ebb slowly but completely away. The social current does stop unexpectedly from flowing past the boat of our impulse; and when this happens, the boat lies deep enough in mud, unable to follow. This extraordinary sense of losing the sense of ordinary things actually occurs more than once in every one's experience. It happens to us all, but it is an experience we do not communicate to others. The failure of personal impulse to move on the current of reality seems to each one a unique, individual failure. It is a universal experience, but it is never considered universally. We regard it as an experience special and particular to ourselves. It is not a pleasant experience.

But the result is that we continue to take the power supplied to impulse from the attractions environmental to impulse, as a power resident in impulse itself. We invariably hasten our thoughts over this painful lapse of self, and dwell rather upon the occasions when impulse seemed most successfully to seize its own in the outer world. The fact remains, however, that personal impulse is rather passively effective, like a boat, than actively effective, like a stream. The stream takes the boat so completely within its own movement that the movement seems from the boat itself. The boat's own lack of motivity only emerges as a perceptible fact when the stream turns away out of reach.

At such times, if we face the experience squarely enough, impulse actually weakens and fails like a boat out of water. The social needs dry up first, but the personal needs fade out soon after them. Eating and drinking, apparently personal beyond the range of social influence, become faint and tepid [XIV:6:170] functions as soon as imitation is completely removed. Life settles down into a state of passive torpor—we continue to be, but our being is not our self—our “natural self”—at all. The lover who expects to find his mistress at the rendezvous, and awaits her in vain, feels all his vitality ebb away. The mother who loses a child undergoes this experience. The miser is a mere nothing without his wealth. These extreme cases are extreme simply because in each one the social environment has concentrated into a single influence. To remove that influence, in these cases, is to remove the entire experienceable world.

But if we face that experience earnestly enough another fact grows apparent. As the tide of social influence runs out, leaving personal impulse high and dry, another tide seems to flow in. The boat of personal impulse seems to rise upon the current of another stream. This other stream seems to flow within the man himself. It seems to flow less urgently, and before the boat has ridden fairly upon it the unusual condition of things usually changes. The accustomed world swings back, bringing the sense of relief as from a crisis more difficult even than the sense of failure as of a boat in mud.

For some, however, the world swings back too late. It flows in with the old currents of influence after the new current has become a fact. The boat has gone [on] a new journey, through landscapes more desirable, on a stronger tide. The “self” that ebbed away has been recovered, a new “self” the man would not willingly yield.

This hidden inner current, so unreal to the world, is the reality of religion. It is the reality which ordinarily, in comparison with the ease of impulse down the currents of convention, seems an upstream effort, tedious and vain. Of what use to struggle against a current so strong that one's greatest effort only holds one ever in the same spot? It is evident enough, at any rate, that the two currents flow in opposite directions. The downstream of the world is the upstream of the soul. But the spiritual current has its own downstream. It has its own forceful currents which, under the right conditions, carry the boat of impulse not less easily along. It has the same power of communicating its own force to the boat so imperceptibly that the boat's movement seems from the boat itself and not from the stream. But “duty”, as opposed to desire; the lonely effort of attainment as opposed to the genial grace of imitation, do not become aware of this fact. One only becomes aware of it when, somehow, the stream of spiritual experience takes complete possession of the soul. Then it is convention which seems upstream. Then the sense of struggle, the sense of futility, attaches itself to the world; and to join the common activity, urged to it merely by imitation, becomes repugnant and impossible. The soul's own life, of attainment, becomes natural, inevitable, successive acts of self-expression whereby personal impulse is gratified as never before.

The clear, definite statement seem hypothesis more than experience merely because, in almost every one of us, the boat of impulse lies much farther out in the stream of convention than in the stream of faith. The direction of the forces exerting upon impulse for imitation seem to determine the “upstream” and the “downstream” of experience because they press against a greater area of our being. For those few in all generations whose lives have lain more in faith than in convention, religion has been downstream and the world upstream.

Nothing is so important to realize in this matter of morality. It is the truth at the heart of experience; it is the basis of reality in life; and misconceptions in this region work havoc for the whole of experience at all times. The universal belief that the religious life is a life upstream has dwarfed religion to insignificance in our social development. [XIV:6:171] We have employed as the working hypothesis of religion throughout our civilization the impression that personal impulse is gratified and justified through convention, but negated and made futile through religion. This impression derives from the experience of minds still adrift on the conventional stream—their sense of struggle, as against a mighty, unresting tide, is actually a struggle not against the spiritual requirement but against the social habit. They have never swung fairly out on the other current.

If we establish our moral truth upon the experience of those who have attained, we vivify it as by the transfusion of living blood to a desperate body. For the struggle against the stream of convention—when one struggles full in the stream itself—is really a futile effort. But this is precisely what religion amounts to in most lives: an occasional struggle against a stream dimly perceived to be leading one's life to emptiness and desolation. The first step toward spiritual reality consists in leaving the stream of imitation itself. It is least effective when taken against the stream; most effective when taken away from the stream. For outside the currents of social imitation other currents, even more rapid, await. As one swings the boat of impulse into the current of faith, a greater power than impulse or will perfects the act. The difficulties of religion are not difficulties inherent to spiritual development—they are inherent in leaving the stream of social convention. Spiritual development brings its own downstream, whence the joy of self-gratification amply returns.

The psychologist usually builds consciousness upon two factors, habit and imitation. But these two factors are really one. Habit is the imitation of oneself. The dominant factor, then, is imitation. Imitation like momentum, tends to carry experience along a straight line. So borne, experience confirms itself at every point. The inability to realize that the strongest habit is but imitation of self many times repeated, proves that we drift unconsciously into a being limited on all sides save the direction of its own definite movement. As momentum gathers weight, the influence exerted to swing experience from the straight line grows continually more ineffective. Thus most of us fail to perceive that the essential nature of experience is dual rather than single. As a matter of fact, consciousness has a double pull, a pull now in one direction, and a pull later on in the opposite direction. Habit merges these two definite forces into one, thus destroying the particular contribution each brings. Habit does not only destroy the value of the spiritual impulse in life—it even destroys the value of the worldly or social impulse.

Were each impulse to be given its own terms of influence, life would not be an experience laid out straight along, like a narrow artificial road; it would be a continual ascent, as one ascends a winding staircase in a tower. To follow out each impulse cleanly and courageously in its turn, is to spend the force of each so that the other force can exert itself effectively. The religious "habit" is quite as impoverishing to experience as the social "habit". In those whose lives respond to needs more vital than habits, the impulse of activity carries them on until that impulse is spent, when the impulse to meditation naturally arises. The normal life—the life that is normal to the inner standard and not merely to the standard of the majority of people—ascends from activity to meditation, but then ascends likewise from meditation to activity. It goes from one phase to the other ever around and upward, from stage to stage of the tower. The phase of meditation enriches the activity just experienced—gathers it up and gives it meaning and value—but also prepares new forces for activity to draw upon. Likewise, the active phase enriches the meditation just experienced—enriches it by bringing its purposes and [XIV:6:172] its meanings into effect. It is as though meditation created the vision of a picture, and activity laid the vision upon canvas. The two phases are absolutely reciprocal. On the other hand, it is as though such activity emptied the mind and heart of their pressing fullness, preparing the way for another and greater vision. To be normal, then, a life would continually ascend the tower, pausing a little at each landing to look from the window—looking out now on one side, now on the other—but ever urged upward, and from the higher landing obtaining a wider and clearer outlook. This is the normal experience, the experience which our own lives attempt to create for us—a rich, eager experience, ever renewed and ever deepened, fed on the bread of physical toil and gladdened by the wine of mystery in revelation. For the tower has many stages. Meditation and faith return again and again, subtler and larger, clearer eyed. And activity returns again, ever more refined, ever more truly expressing the creative urgency of the soul. No man can exhaust the wonders of the tower of experience. It rises high above the city of commonplace. It rises to the heavens. It is not a tower built up stone by stone from the earth; it is a tower let down from the throne of God.

One further remarks of morality, therefore, that the essence of experience is movement and change, while the one obviously immoral thing is standing still. The extreme of immorality is to stand still at any stage of the tower—whether the stage be that of activity, or meditation. It is quite as terrible to spend a lifetime at being “religious” as at unrestingly laying up gold. It is more immoral, for the example is more disastrous to others. The most depressing spectacle in the world is not the worldly who will not ascend above their material wealth—it is the supposedly spiritual folk who will not ascend beyond their stagnant “unworldliness”.

In a true civilization, labour and religion are the two pillars of existence. They are the two pillars that stand so close they become one. Your really religious man merges labour and meditation inseparably one in the other. They are the indrawn and the outdrawn breaths that keep the blood pure. Both would be taken for granted, and the relation of each to the other would be taken for granted. Pure blood compels the reciprocal indrawing and outdrawing of breath. Where labour is not a form of worship, and where religion is not the inspiration and control of labour, the blood of life is impure. Life is not life, but sickness.

Yet health is the normal condition of life, while sickness is the abnormal. In every life the instinct to pass from activity to meditation, from meditation to activity, exists and exerts itself. It exerts itself forever throughout life, but becomes the knocking of a child’s hand against a barred door. Habit denies this vital instinct its full expression. As habit increases—habit which is nothing more than self-imitation—the instinct urges in vain. The instinct continues year after year, though the knocking sounds fainter and fainter. We build the wall thicker and higher with time, until finally the sound no longer reaches through.

Were we conscious of movement upward in the tower on the part of the lives around us, we ourselves would instinctively ascend. Our all-powerful sense of imitation would respond to truth as completely as it now responds to ignorance. No element in mind or heart would have to change to make us worthy of the true civilization. All the elements necessary to enjoy that civilization, to maintain and develop that civilization, are present in men. The difference between war and peace, between poverty and free self-expression, does not imply an impossible or even improbable making over of human nature. It implies rather the response of human [XIV:6:173] nature to its own hidden truth. Were there a soul who had mounted the tower to its very top, who had gone through every intervening experience, making each phase his own, then from the top signalled to us standing dejected below—signalled as with a mighty trumpet blown from the forgotten depths of our own souls, should we not gaze upward? Should we not see before us the easy ascent of the Way? Should we not hear the trumpet, hear it—and believe?

The true civilization—its existence, its nearness, its inevitableness—sounds like a clear trumpet in the life and words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

The glory of deeds

Jináb-i-Fáḍil

The following narration tells of the glorious martyrdom of three Bahá'í heroes, one a child of twelve, another a youth of seventeen, the third a celebrated poet.

When we view martyrdom from the physical point of view we see only "the destruction of life". But when we behold it from the spiritual point of view it becomes the most perfect manifestation of love and faith the heart can conceive for here the lover of God, the lover of mankind gives his all that the Kingdom of peace may appear in the world. "Deeds speak louder than words." They make words real. "True words," said Bahá'u'lláh, "are verified by action. One without the other will not satisfy the thirsty or open the doors of perception before the blind."

Martyrdom makes the spirit of utter dedication to the service of God so real that it ignites in other hearts a like flame of divine devotion. The martyrdom of Christ on the cross conquered and changed the hearts of untold millions. True martyrdom is the greatest spiritual educator in the world of existence.

An American business man tells of how he was travelling in Persia. He saw a Bahá'í brought forth to execution. He was tied with his chest to a cannon's mouth. A great crowd assembled. The Bahá'í turned to his executioner: "Grant me one request before I enter the heavenly world," he said. "What is it?" asked the executioner. "Turn me around that the crowd may see how happy I am to die in the pathway of God," replied the man.

The executioner turned him around and blew his body from the cannon's mouth.

"I saw that," said the American business man, "with my own eyes. When I want a religion I am going to be a Bahá'í for there is a religion that has power in it."—Editor.

There were thousands of martyrs to this Cause many of whom shine with a brilliance like the sun, dispelling the darkness of night. Among those of great renown was Badí', the messenger who carried the epistle of Bahá'u'lláh to the Sháh of Persia. During the reign of this Sháh thousands of believers were martyred. This was because enemies of the Cause impressed upon his mind the idea that this great Cause purposed to overthrow the government of Persia and to establish another form of government; therefore the Sháh feared lest the believers were plotting against him. As soon as he heard that a person was connected, even remotely with the Cause an order was sent to do away with him.

In 1852 he issued an edict that every believer within his domain should be put to the sword, sparing no one. Accordingly, in every city of Persia many believers were thrown into prison and martyred, the greatest of these persecutions taking place in Tīhrán. [XIV:6:174]

Now, a few years after his incarceration in the fortress city of 'Akká, Bahá'u'lláh revealed a long and detailed epistle for this Sháh of Persia. Those who have studied it realize that this epistle is a heavenly book containing scientific and spiritual teachings. Bahá'u'lláh purposed to send this Tablet by a messenger who would give it into the Sháh's own hands for it was a well-known fact that the courtiers around him did their utmost to keep the words of Bahá'u'lláh from his ears, saying that these words had such a power that, should the Sháh listen to them, his heart would be changed. Therefore Bahá'u'lláh planned to send this Tablet by a messenger who would carry it to the Sháh himself.

When Bahá'u'lláh revealed the Tablet he wrote upon it certain conditions. First, before the bearer accepted the commission he must realize that in accomplishing it he would be killed with severest torture and that he must show utmost steadfastness and assurance. Secondly when on his way to Persia, and in Persia, he must associate with no believers for after the king had apprehended him his deputies would undoubtedly try to find out the names of the believers with whom he was associated in order to seize and kill them also. This was the wisdom of the command of Bahá'u'lláh. He must from the very beginning of his journey meet no believers so that he could declare truthfully that he knew no one of them. The third condition was that he should deliver the epistle with his own hand into the hands of the Sháh.

Now Badí' was a youth of seventeen, and at that time was in 'Akká and in the presence of Bahá'u'lláh. Before his arrival in 'Akká, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh told his followers there that the messenger who was to carry this Tablet to the Sháh would ere long arrive.

One day, when some friends were gathered together His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh took the Tablet and holding it in his hand, said: "Who is the one who will carry this to the Sháh of Persia?"

Badí', like a flame of fire, sprang from his seat and bowing down before Bahá'u'lláh said: "I will carry this Tablet." Bahá'u'lláh asked the question a second time; and the youth repeated his supplication.

Bahá'u'lláh called the third time, and the third time Badí' petitioned that he might carry the Tablet.

So Bahá'u'lláh gave him the wonderful Tablet, and took it, and started on his great mission.

Badí' went to Mount Carmel from the presence of Bahá'u'lláh, where he engaged in supplication and prayer as though in preparation to meet God. There were with him two other believers.

He dressed in a long white garment and would stand in an attitude of humility, facing 'Akká. He seemed like a thirsty man searching for cool and refreshing water. Bahá'u'lláh sent from his presence in the care of one of the believers two small packages to be delivered to Badí', who arose, accepted them in his hands, kissed them reverently and thanked God with great exaltation. The two friends felt that these packages must contain some special command for the service of the Cause, and they asked if it would be possible for Badí' to let them read their contents. But he replied: "I have no time," and immediately set out on his journey to Persia.

He did not tarry at all nor rest upon the way but with patience and utmost perseverance followed the instructions of Bahá'u'lláh. One of the old believers, now living, met the young man on the journey and wondered concerning his great abstraction. This man said that every now and then Badí' would steal away. "Once I followed him," he said, "to find out what he was doing. Then I saw that he prostrated himself upon the ground, facing 'Akká, and prayed with utmost reverence. After I heard the story of his martyrdom I realized that he was offering prayers of thanksgiving."

When Badí' arrived at the gate of Tíhrán, the capital of Persia, the Sháh [XIV:6:175] was out of the city on a hunting trip. So Badí' mounted a hill on this plain outside the city and stood there in his white garment with the Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh in his hand. For three days and three nights he stood motionless upon the hill. The Sháh, scanning the country with his field glasses, looked at him many times and at last, filled with curiosity, sent some of his men to bring the youth to him that he might learn of his errand. The messengers inquired of Badí' what he wanted and Badí' replied that he had a very important letter for the Sháh of Persia and he wished to be allowed to deliver it with his own hand. They tried their utmost to get the Tablet from him but Badí' would not give it up. So they returned to the Sháh who ordered that Badí' be brought to him. Thus Badí' at last attained his utmost desire—and delivered the Tablet into the very hands of the Sháh.

The Sháh realized at once that it was from Bahá'u'lláh. He became very much enraged and, with his attendants, insisted that Badí' reveal the names of the believers with whom he was associated. The courtiers began to beat and injure him, and Badí' gave thanks to God, exclaiming: "At last I have attained to the station of martyrdom which Bahá'u'lláh prophesied upon this Tablet."

He ordered the officers to take the young man away. So they took him, and branded him with hot irons. Badí', to the utter amazement of those who tortured him cried out, in wonderful joy: "You have branded but one side. Would you not like to brand the other also that I may have this fire of suffering all through my body!" They were so astonished that they reported the matter to the Sháh, saying: "Here is no human being. No matter how much we brand him he does not tell the name of any believer but shows still greater happiness." The Sháh replied: "Take his photograph and bring it to me." So while they burned Badí' with hot irons they took his photograph. This photograph exists today, among us.

Then the Sháh commanded that he be put to death immediately and that no one be shown his photograph lest that one become a believer. Thus the prophecy of Bahá'u'lláh, written upon the Tablet, was fulfilled.

Later on the Sháh read the epistle of Bahá'u'lláh, and a wonderful change took place in him. He understood then that the great purpose of this Cause is to establish universal peace, universal brotherhood and universal reconciliation, that this Cause has appeared in order that all mankind may be united in spiritual oneness and brotherhood. Therefore he never again, personally, interfered with the believers nor himself persecuted them.

His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh in this great Tablet addresses the Sháh thus: "Will you invite the mullás and learned men to meet together and allow me to come also? I will present myself and the mullás may ask of me any sign which would make them realize the station of this Cause. If these signs are manifested from me, well and good; if not, then you may do with me what you wish."

The Sháh sent the Tablet to the mullás of Tíhrán, asking what they would do.

They made no answer to the Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh, which proved to the Sháh that these enemies were unjust and prejudiced.

Badí' was but one of the many martyrs in this Cause who showed their love for it with fortitude and steadfastness.

Another martyrdom unique to this Revelation is that of Varqá, the poet, and his twelve year old son.

Varqá asked of Bahá'u'lláh the meaning of a verse in the Book of Aqdas which refers to the appointment of 'Abdu'l-Bahá as the Centre of the Covenant: "When the ocean of My presence hath ebbed and the Book of My Revelation is ended, turn your faces toward Him Whom God hath purposed, Who hath branched from this Ancient Root."¹ Bahá'u'lláh replied that the meaning of this verse is 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Therefore from that time Varqá with all his heart loved the Master. [XIV:6:176]

Varqá constantly supplicated Bahá'u'lláh that he might attain to the station of martyrdom, and finally his petition was granted. As this promise, however, was not fulfilled during the lifetime of Bahá'u'lláh, after Bahá'u'lláh's departure from this world Varqá made his request to 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Varqá was a well-known teacher, an illumined speaker and a peerless poet. His poems speak of the love of God and are of such high spiritual quality that they lift the reader to wonderful heights. In several of them he prophesies his own martyrdom.

His son, Rúḥu'lláh, was a youthful genius, a speaker and a teacher of great power and persuasiveness. At the age of twelve years he wrote beautiful poems. He was a brilliant child. Because he was so young and so full of joy and enthusiasm when he went to see Bahá'u'lláh he (Bahá'u'lláh) would sometimes joke with him and ask him questions. Now and then he would call him "the teacher". One day Bahá'u'lláh said to him: "You have a great gift for teaching. Now suppose that Promised One of the Muslims should appear, the One who, according to tradition is like an eagle, and will guide the people to the Kingdom. If this One appears what will you do?"

"Through the confirmation of Bahá'u'lláh," replied the boy, "I will teach him and make him a believer."

Varqá with his young son started on a campaign of teaching, in Persia. They arrived at a city whose Governor was a very cruel and merciless man. The people quickly brought to this Governor reports that Varqá was a brilliant teacher and that he carried with him much wealth. This wealth consisted of fifty volumes of the writings of Bahá'u'lláh and was indeed very precious. In addition to the spiritual value of these books they had, truly, material value, for they were written on the best of paper and were embellished and bound.

The Governor sent his officer and had Varqá and his son taken prisoners. When they examined his possessions the Governor saw that Varqá had no wealth, only a few volumes. Varqá, who longed to give him the message of the Kingdom, now began to teach him, and begged the Governor to invite the 'Ulamás and the scholars of the city that he might speak with them. He would, he said, prove to them the validity of this Cause from the text of all the heavenly scriptures and writings. The Governor granted his request and the learned men assembled. Then Varqá and his twelve year old son spoke to them. The boy was so eloquent and persuasive that the Governor and many of the people became greatly attracted. The Sháh now sent a telegram that these two believers be sent immediately to the capital.

In Tíhrán they were held captive, in a large mansion. Here some of the believers visited them secretly. At that time Varqá wrote a letter to the believers of Tíhrán in which he said that, in keeping with the promise of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá it would seem as though the time was drawing near when he should attain to the station of martyrdom, yet, judging from the kindness and respect with which the Sháh and the Prime Minister treated him and the fact that they had put him in such a mansion, he could see no evidence of the approach of martyrdom. Evidently this delay was due to his inability to attain to that high station.

After a while the chief courtier, a very cruel man, carried a report to the Sháh which resulted in an order to put Varqá and his son in prison. From this prison Varqá wrote a letter to the Sháh requesting him to invite all the learned men to a meeting and to permit him, also, to attend this gathering. The Sháh sent this chief courtier, who had given evidence against him, to Varqá to inquire how he wished the meeting arranged. When the courtier entered the prison room and heard from Varqá's own lips his request for this meeting he became very angry, and said: "Do you think to spread the [XIV:6:177] teachings of Bahá'u'lláh throughout the world?"

While these things were happening to Varqá the fiftieth anniversary of the reign of the Sháh occurred. The Sháh wished to make a great celebration of this event; so he planned feasts and parades and demonstrations. In order to do honour to his anniversary the Sháh, himself, paid a visit to one of the holy Shrines outside the capital. There a revolutionist, just arrived in Persia, hid himself. From this hiding place he shot and killed the Sháh.

Upon hearing the news of the Sháh's death the chief courtier went to the prison of Varqá and his son and began to upbraid them. Then he drew his sword and cut Varqá to pieces before the eyes of his young son.

To the boy he said: "You have now seen how your father has been killed. Recant your beliefs and I will give you the highest position in the kingdom." The boy replied: "I have no other hope save martyrdom. My father has trained me all these years that I may reach to this great station." Then the boy, also, was murdered.

The tree of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh was watered with the blood of these divine souls. Under this tree all the children of men will find rest and peace.

The heavenly artists

When 'Abdu'l-Bahá was in London, in 1913, among his many callers was an actress who spoke to him of the theatre and her work. "We also have a theatre," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The actress immediately became all interest and enthusiasm. "Yes, where is it?" she said. "I should love to see it. Can I play in it?"

"Our theatre," 'Abdu'l-Bahá answered, smiling, "is built in a country where there is eternal springtime. The streets of that city are as clean as the surface of a mirror. The lights of that playhouse are the rays of the Sun of Reality, the actors of our drama are the Holy Manifestations of God, the audience is composed of pure and sanctified souls. They play their parts with the most delicate art. They deliver their words with power and potency. The stage of our theatre is the arena upon which is played the sublimest tragedy, the most terrible drama, the most thrilling and heart-moving events of life.

"Come and join our company. You have acted all your life upon the material stage. Now come and act on this celestial stage. Your fellow actors will assist you, will coach you in your part and, step by step, you will become a star shining in the galaxy of those heavenly inspired dramatists."

A musician visited 'Abdu'l-Bahá in London and asked for spiritual confirmation in the study of music.

"There are two kinds of music," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá "divine and earthly music. Divine music exhilarates the spirit, while earthly music has an effect upon the body. Divine music belongs to the Kingdom of God, earthly music is of the mundane world. I hope you will be confirmed to study both kinds of music so that you may be able to sing the anthems of heaven and the songs of this world."

To a portrait painter of New York City, who was in 'Akká, Palestine, with a party of visitors, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, picturing in glowing words the work of the heavenly artist: "As to your art, it is one of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh that art is identical with an act of worship, and you must go on with your art and improve in it; and through this very Cause you will be able to make great progress in your art, for you will be helped from above. Say, 'I have two arts, one physical, the other spiritual. The physical one is that I draw the images of men; my spiritual art is that I draw the images of the angels, and I hope that at last I shall [XIV:6:178] be able to draw pictures of the perfections of God. My physical art will at last end, but my spiritual art is everlasting. My physical art can be done by many, but my spiritual art is not the work of everyone.'

"Can you paint upon the page of the world the ideal pictures of the Celestial Concourse? The pictures which are in the ideal world are eternal. I wish you to become such an artist. Man can paint those ideal pictures upon the tablet of existence with the brush of deeds.

"The holy, divine Manifestations are all heavenly artists. Upon the canvas of creation, with the brush of their deeds and lives they paint immortal pictures which cannot be found in any art museum of Europe or America. But you find the masterpieces of these spiritual artists in the hearts.”

XIV:6, September 1923 [XIV:6:180]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Shoghi Effendi

From a recent talk by Jináb-i-Fáḍil

When I was in Haifa I felt that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was planning to take a very long journey. We did not, however, grasp its significance. We thought that it was to be a physical journey. We did not realize that it was to be to the Kingdom of Abhá.

One day, in the Pilgrim House, it was said that the physical appearance of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá showed signs of weariness. Some of us thought that this was due to the small amount of food which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ate. He always divided the food among the guests, a symbol of the way in which he distributed spiritual sustenance. He took almost nothing, himself, but a glass of milk or the yolk of an egg.

A group of friends were selected and their spokesman, a very old and spiritual Bahá’í went to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Overcome with emotion at the question which he was about to present, he could not speak a word. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá took him by the hand, and encouraged him. The old man said: “The believers feel that there are two reasons for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s weariness. First, he does not eat enough. Secondly, he works too hard.” Then ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, very humbly, told him that he was mistaken. “Do you think,” he said, “that this material food has any effect upon my body? This food has no effect. Only good news from the believers, the glad tidings which comes from all parts of the world of the advancement of the Cause, of the unity of the believers, this, only, improves my health. As to the second point—I am going to take a long journey and at that time my spirit will rest.”

Later, we understood what the Master had meant. These talks showed that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had finished his work, was preparing for the great journey to the Kingdom.

Another day ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that the Bahá’ís look to the light, many others look to the glass in which the light is shining. The Bahá’ís apprehend the inner reality of man and the light of God which is living in the Being of the Manifestations of God; others look to the outward appearance or the garment of names. The religionists who denied the Manifestations in the past clung to the garment, the glass, Bahá’ís turn to the reality of the light.

At the time when the Báb was being driven by his enemies from place to place there lived in a certain city a believer who had never seen him. He had heard that the Báb wore a green turban, as did all the descendants of Muḥammad. This believer went to see the Báb, and he looked for the green turban. It so happened that just before his arrival the Báb had taken off his green turban, putting on instead, a Persian cap. So the man did not recognize him. The Báb joked, saying: “I have heard that you have become a believer in the new movement. What has caused this change?”

The man answered: “The proof of Muḥammad was his eloquent Arabic book. I have heard that this young man brought through revelation several eloquent Arabic and Persian epistles which have the spirit of the word of Muḥammad.”

The Báb said: “Whoever thus reveals, you believe?”

He then began writing verses, like a crystal river. The man, overwhelmed, cried out that such an one must be a Manifestation. “But why does not he wear a green turban?”

So ‘Abdu’l-Bahá showed us that we should judge not by the garment, but by the heart beneath.

When but a youth Bahá’u’lláh, dressed at that time, as a government official and not in the turban and flowing robes of the scholar, entered the classroom of a celebrated theologian. Many students were there. The teacher, who was deeply versed in religious philosophy, suggested, for discussion, some very difficult topics. Immediately the class entered into controversy, many voices being raised; and the teacher was not satisfied with the discussion.

Bahá'u'lláh then asked permission to speak. He soon solved the difficult problems. All had heard that he had never attended a school; yet no sooner did he begin to speak than they realized that he was an ocean of thought whose waves washed the shores of every mind in that audience. The teacher said: Behold! you have all studied! But here is one who has never studied, who gives luminous answers.”

When Shoghi Effendi returned to Haifa many did not realize that, though dressed differently, though young, yet he was the perfect mirror reflecting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. I was so fortunate as to be in Haifa when Shoghi Effendi arrived. It was as though he brought an ocean of hope, activity and longing to serve and to sacrifice. No sooner did he arrive than he began to write to all parts of the Bahá’í world. One who met him saw in him the same will, the same love, the same tenderness, the same overpowering desire to serve that he saw in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

In some of his last talks in Haifa, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “After my departure there will be a short time of quiet in the Bahá’í Cause. Then the flame of love and activity will leap forth and there will follow a great period of work, and proclamation of the Cause, of going out to all the highways and byways of the world.” This is coming to pass. First, a great shock, a feeling of loss. Now, since the return of Shoghi Effendi, and his correspondence with all parts of the world, there is a great resuscitation. The advices and exhortations in the last Will and Testament of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá that none must rest, but must teach—these are being realized in the visible world.

This is the first year of the mission of Shoghi Effendi. To show him our great attraction in the Cause we must manifest great activity. It behoveth us that in this year we engage in extraordinary service and walk steadfastly toward the city of universal peace and the oneness of hearts and minds.

The life of the Báb

Jináb-i-Fáḍil¹

Bordering on the Persian Gulf, in southern Persia, there is a very beautiful province, called Fárs. This province is quite large and, centuries before Christ, was the seat of Persia’s kings and rulers; it was also the home of the ancient Pársís. It is celebrated in Persian literature as a veritable throne of learning. Here, nearly seven hundred years ago, the great poets Háfíz and Sa’dí lived and died, and here they wrote their verses. Their tombs or shrines are visited every year by many people.

In Shíráz, the capital of Farce, there lived a family, of the merchant class, who for many generations had been noted for their piety, morality and generosity. Into this family there was born, in Shíráz, 20 October 1819, a child, the Báb. The Báb’s father, a merchant, died when the boy was quite young, and the eldest of his three uncles who was also a merchant, took care of him and brought him up. The Báb’s education was entirely elementary; and soon he went into business, becoming his uncle’s partner.

As a child he gave signs of remarkable precocity and, while still very young, wrote beautiful essays in Persian and Arabic. Those who read them were astonished at his knowledge for they were aware how meagre had been his education. The Arabic scholars were especially interested in his writings in that language and thought it very extraordinary that one without learning could write such perfect Arabic.

After he went into business his family noticed what seemed to them certain unusual traits in the young man; he would depart at midday, retire to a secluded spot and meditate, chant and read prayers, spending hours in deep spiritual communion. Observing this the Báb's family endeavoured to awaken in him a greater interest in acquiring wealth and fame, but they soon found that these things did not interest him.

In the Báb physical beauty was joined to that of the spirit. His hair was black and his dark brown eyes shone like stars. His features were symmetrical and his face most luminous. His carriage was majestic, yet simple and humble. The purity of his character was such that even his enemies could find no fault with him. It would be hard to imagine a life more spotless, more devoted to love for humanity. He reflected the light of the spirit and radiated to those around him such wonderful spiritual life that his superiority was generally recognized, and he was shown utmost honour and respect. When he entered a room he was given the seat of honour and others, involuntarily, waited for him to speak first. He was full of happiness, contentment and resignation; so it seemed as if the Spirit of God were shining from that young body. [XIV:6:194]

A few years before his declaration, in 1844, he left his uncle's office and journeyed to Karbilá, Mesopotamia, the centre of the Shí'ih Muslim world. The tomb of Ḥusayn, the martyred grandson of Muḥammad is in Karbilá, and every year thousands of people made a pilgrimage to this shrine, where long prayers were read. When the Báb repeated his own prayers before the assemblage the people turned from the usual prayers and gave all their attention to him. The Muslims had, in Arabic and Persian, many prayers which seemed to them beautiful beyond description. Therefore they were prepared to recognize the sublime beauty and the inspiration of the Báb's prayers. He remained in Karbilá several months and many people were drawn to him because of his inspired utterance and the holiness of his life.

At the age of twenty-three the Báb married a young girl, a relative of his family. A little son was born to them who lived but a few months. And shortly after, the Báb was apprehended and thrown into prison.

The religious outlook of the Muslim world had become very dark; the people had lost their spiritual vision and held to dogma as spiritual truth. About this time God inspired the hearts of a number of men to look deeper into their religion and study its true meaning. This school of men in their teachings made frequent mention of a Star of Guidance which was about to dawn. In 1843 they set out on a journey to the distant parts of Persia to try and discover this Master of the New Age. Before starting they gathered together in a mosque and for forty days fasted that they might be prepared for the momentous journey. They had been taught that there were nineteen proofs by which they might recognize the Great Master, the coming One, one of which was his spiritual power which, even if he spoke not a word, would draw the people to him. This power they were to find in the person of a handsome youth. They made a compact that he who discovered the Truth should at once communicate it to the others. Then they started off, in different directions.

Mullá Ḥusayn, a very celebrated and learned man was one of this group. He remembered having met at Karbilá a singularly spiritual youth, who came from Shíráz, and he decided to journey to Shíráz and try to find him. Arriving in that city he made inquiries which led him to the young man's home. To his great joy the door was opened by the Báb, himself, who welcomed him as a guest and bade him enter. Then the Báb told him how, when about to leave home early that morning for his office, there had come to him the foreknowledge that great and glorious news was about to be made known. He knew that the coming of this guest was a part of the good news. So, here in the rose garden of the Báb's home, was laid the foundation of the Great Cause.

The Báb inquired of Mullá Ḥusayn by what sign would he recognize the Great Star. And Mullá Ḥusayn gave the nineteen proofs.

Suddenly the Báb said: “Do you see these signs in me?”

Mullá Ḥusayn was made almost breathless by the question. However, after a moment’s consideration he said: “Yes, I see all the signs but one in you. That one sign is this: the Great One should have extraordinary knowledge. This important sign of wisdom and knowledge I do not see in you.” He said this, thinking that great knowledge must be acquired in colleges and universities.

The Báb talked of other matters, tea was served, and the hours passed.

Later, while conversing upon very spiritual subjects, the Báb again said: “Do you see these signs in me?”

Mullá Ḥusayn did not make immediate reply but led the conversation into channels which it seemed to him must make apparent this knowledge. [XIV:6:195]

The Báb then left the room, and Mullá Ḥusayn, seeing some books upon the table, took one up and began reading. He was astonished to find that both the ideas and phraseology were entirely new and unfolded the divine mysteries. He read page after page and when the Báb returned inquired the name of the author of the book.

The Báb replied: “A young man.”

Mullá Ḥusayn exclaimed: “Read some of these words yourself! Who has written them?”

The Báb said: “You see. You see.”

Then he placed the book beside him, and began to speak eloquently, in a higher language. The words flowed from him like a river. Mullá Ḥusayn listened spellbound, for these were the erudite phrases of the book. He became so intoxicated with divine joy that he was like a man beside himself; so the Báb again spoke in his ordinary manner, and gave him tea. Mullá Ḥusayn threw himself at the feet of the Báb and cried: “I must go and proclaim the truth!” But the Báb said: “No, this is not the time.”

When Mullá Ḥusayn, the first disciple, was completely converted he longed to bring his associates to the Báb but the Báb told him that, for the present, he must just tell them that the Star of Hope had arisen, but not of his whereabouts.

Mullá Ḥusayn returned to his friends who found him so transformed that they besought him to tell them if he had found the Truth. So, one by one, he took them to the Báb, and the first class, numbering seventeen, was formed. Qurratu’l-‘Ayn also became one of these disciples. With the Báb himself they were called the Nineteen Letters of the Living.

The Báb called himself “Báb” because he was the “gate” of the New Age. The first disciple was given the name “Bábu’l-Báb”, for through him the people came to know the truth. Another spiritual person among the eighteen “Letters” who recognized the Báb from afar and instantly believed in him, was Quddús. When the eighteen Letters of the Living were complete the Báb became the Point of Knowledge around which they gathered; eighteen apostles and one Point, making the first circle, the first unity.

The Báb gave his disciples certain wonderful epistles bidding them travel throughout Persia and, especially, to Karbilá that they might teach the religious leaders of the Muslim world. These early apostles were fearless and full of enthusiasm. Whenever they entered a city they at once gathered the people about them and proclaimed aloud the good tidings of the New Day and the coming of a new spiritual dispensation. As their students were of the Muslim world they referred to the Qur’án and its prophecies concerning this day and the coming of the Point of Knowledge, explaining that they were fulfilled in the Báb.

In the Qur'án it is said that no one could give to the world a book to compare with the Qur'án. And from the time of Muḥammad until the year 1260 of the Hegira this was true. Then the Báb, through divine power, wrote with the same brilliant and profound knowledge. In order to prove this power to the people he called to them in his epistles, saying that he would answer abstruse questions without recourse to any book. So he was asked many difficult questions. And he wrote the answers with the rapidity of lightning, each page a masterpiece in thought, in style and beauty of penmanship. Again and again it was proved that his writings were not of the intellect, but were pure inspiration.

The Báb now went to the holy city, Mecca, the centre of Islám, to which thousands of people journey every year. The journey was made by sea, and one day a terrible storm arose. It seemed as though the ship would sink any moment and the passengers were in a state of great excitement, when some of them noticed the Báb, sitting quietly, apart [XIV:6:197] from the others, in deep meditation. He seemed so undisturbed by the impending peril that they exclaimed: "Do you not realize that we shall all be drowned?" But, with perfect serenity, he continued his meditations, and soon the storm passed and the sea became calm.

Among the passengers on this ship was a man of spiritual insight. He recognized the quality of the courage and serenity in the Báb and later became one of the Letters of the Living.

While the Báb was at Mecca the three disciples who first accepted him started out from Shíráz and began fearlessly proclaiming the message. Mullá Şádiq, an eminent and very popular Muslim, head of a mosque and with a following of hundreds of people, was one of their converts. It was the custom to proclaim, four times a day, from the turret of the mosque: "God is great and Muḥammad is His Prophet!" Mullá Şádiq told the Mu'adh^hin [Muezzin] to call out also that a great Gate of Knowledge had appeared. He, himself, mounted his pulpit and read from the writings of the Báb profound interpretations of the Qur'án. This sufficed to arouse in opposition some of the people of the community; others recognized the mercy and justice of this message to establish the Kingdom of God. The mullás of the city became so disturbed at these happenings that they appealed to the Governor, as fanatical as they, who gathered the people together in a large hall and demanded the presence of Mullá Şádiq.

When Mullá Şádiq entered the audience hall his presence bespoke such majesty that the people were impelled to rise and show him deference. The Governor inquired concerning the new teachings. Mullá Şádiq replied: "You are asleep! You must rouse yourselves and listen to this call for the One whom you are awaiting has appeared, to fulfil the prophecies. This is his Book and he, himself, is at Mecca!"

But this great message was rejected, and the three disciples of the Báb were taken into custody. Their beards were burned, holes were pierced in their noses, they were bastinadoed, and made to ride through the city seated backwards on donkeys. They accepted this treatment with such resignation that the people began to open their eyes. They were banished from that city, and went to other places to teach the Cause.

By this time word had come from Búshihr on the Persian Gulf, that the Báb was returning from his pilgrimage to Mecca. The Governor then sent guards to bring him back to Shíráz. When he arrived in the city the state authorities and the clergy met in a great conclave and flung at him numberless questions. These he answered with such wisdom that his friends were all confirmed in the teachings and his enemies could find no fault with him. Nevertheless it was decided that he must abide in the home of his relatives, that no one could visit him, and that his teachings must not be spread among the people.

But the idols of imagination were now broken. The people were ready to investigate, and many eminent men, seeking information, made their way to the Báb.

Then a terrible epidemic appeared in Shíráz, hundreds of people were stricken, and fear and consternation fell upon all. The Governor, when his son fell ill, felt that this had come upon them because of their persecution of the Báb. So he went to the Báb and fervently besought him to help his son. When the son was healed the Governor was so overjoyed that he permitted the Báb to leave the city that he might bring happiness to others.

Quietly the Báb left Shíráz and travelled to the city of Işfahán, in the centre of Persia. The rumour of his coming having reached those regions the people ran out to meet him, and the Governor, Manúchihir Khán, a deeply religious man, welcomed him, and became a believer. The radiant, spiritual happiness of the Báb, the glowing beauty of the [XIV:6:198] love of God which he manifested, drew hundreds of people to him. The doors were thrown open, that all might enter, might meet the Báb; listen to his words and be quickened. Among those who visited him during these first days of his stay in Işfahán were many important personages, whose presence inspired the people with confidence. Then some of the clergy, seeing the Báb's large following, feared for their own popularity. The Governor told them that, since this was a theological matter, a meeting would be called, and all their questions could be put to the Báb. Reports were taken of this meeting. These reports exist now, and the questions asked were most childish. The Báb in replying threw such wonderful new light upon these questions that they were utterly unable to comprehend his words.

The Governor was much disturbed. Although he favoured the Báb, yet he could not risk his position. So he said, to the mullás: "I will exile him for your sake." He ordered a cavalcade to accompany the Báb on his departure, and instructed the guards to bring him back. So the cavalcade left the city through one gate, and brought the Báb back through another. He stayed with the Governor for forty days, and many people visited him and received the message. He wrote many volumes upon his teachings during this period of his stay in Işfahán. The Governor became so enkindled that he wished to take radical steps to spread the Cause. But the Báb said: "This is a day of faith and persuasion. Force cannot accomplish your purpose. We must teach the people through self-sacrifice and non-resistance." He also told the Governor that his (the Governor's) days were numbered, and that ere long he would enter the Kingdom of God. On the fortieth day of the Báb's concealment in the palace of the Governor the Governor passed away.

The new Governor was neither just nor good. Finding the Báb in the palace he told the populace. They raised a great hue and cry and demanded that he be banished from Işfahán. Therefore, by special permission of the Sháh, the Báb was sent to Ṭihrán.

While these events were taking place the eighteen Letters of the Living were travelling north, south, east and west proclaiming the teachings with such spiritual fervour that their number had increased to a host of believers. It was like a great conflagration. When the Báb's teaching had spread throughout Persia the Sháh wished to know of its message. On his staff there was a mullá in whom he had great confidence. This mullá he sent to Shíráz to visit the Báb that he might ascertain the nature of his teachings and report to the Sháh. This mullá became one of the Báb's greatest apostles and finally gave his life for the Cause.

The Báb wished to meet the Sháh, personally, also the Grand Vazír [Vizier] and the Cabinet. He hoped that they might be persuaded to give heed to the revelation; then the people of Persia might also become enlightened and enter into a new, spiritual life. Therefore, when he arrived, in his journey to Ṭihrán, at a village nine miles distant from the capital, he sent a letter to the Sháh. But the Grand Vizier prevented the Sháh from meeting the Báb. He influenced the Sháh to write him that it was impossible to grant an interview, giving as excuse that the frontier was being attacked by an enemy. The Sháh then had the Báb taken to northern Persia, there to await a change in conditions, saying he would send for him later. On this journey from Tīhrán the Báb's bodyguard, rough, uncouth tribesmen, became so transformed through his spiritual power that before the journey's end they were ardent followers, ready to do anything whatsoever that he desired.

In banishing the Báb, at this time, from place to place, the guards made it a custom to stop outside the towns and villages that no one might know of his [XIV:6:199] presence. But despite this precaution the news of his approach would spread and when they drew near the towns the people would meet him and, often, bribe the guards for permission to talk with him and receive his spiritual instructions. Thus this plan of banishment which, it was believed, would exterminate the teachings, proved a failure, for all those who came in touch with the Báb were irresistibly drawn to him. Even the Governor of this province was attracted, and allowed the people free access to his presence.

Then the enemies of the movement again became active and influenced the Sháh to command that the Báb be sent to a very remote castle, near the extreme northern boundary of Persia. The Governor, here, was an exceedingly harsh man, and he kept the Báb's presence absolutely secret. His followers travelled and searched, in every direction, but no one could discover where he was hidden.

In this castle the Báb's imprisonment was extremely severe. He was allowed no light, and completely isolated from the outside world. However, he now had the time to write many divine teachings, which gradually spread throughout Persia. During these days a fire was lighted in the hearts of his followers, which flamed forth and enkindled others and many awoke from the deep sleep of centuries and started out to travel and teach. Then the enemies became more active than ever and determined utterly to extinguish the Cause. The followers of the Báb were obliged at times to band together and defend themselves, bodily, behind trenches, in order to resist the violent attacks made upon them, in different parts of the country. A new Sháh, seventeen years of age, now reigned and the country passed through a period of confusion. More than ever were efforts made to extinguish the flame of the movement, because of a prevailing idea that, in this way, peace could be established in the land.

The siege of Mázindarán, which occurred about this time, has no parallel in religious history. About four hundred of the followers of the Báb were gathered together in a jungle. Here they were surrounded by several thousand guards, armed with guns and cannon, and reinforced by a populace numbering many, many thousands. In the centre of the jungle there was an ancient shrine and here the believers entrenched themselves, and a siege began which lasted for nine months. During the last three months of the siege the little party were almost starving. They ate their horses, and then boiled the leather of the harness, and ate grass and herbs to sustain life. Yet they spent the time in prayer and spiritual communion, and the forces of the government were utterly unable to overcome them.

Then the general decided upon other tactics. He sent to the besieged the Book of the Qur'án upon which he had written a covenant or agreement to the effect that if they would come out, and go their way, their lives would be spared. Believing in the sincerity of this document they filed out into the open. They were asked to lay down their arms, and when this was done a feast was spread before them. While partaking of this feast the soldiers charged upon them and massacred them all, to a man.

Two other events, of a like nature, occurred in southern and central Persia.

The movement seemed threatened with complete destruction. Although the followers of the Báb made heroic defence, the government authorities slaughtered them right and left. Yet, strange to say, their numbers steadily increased, and the longing for truth flamed brighter and brighter.

At last, in desperation, the Sháh and his prime minister determined to do away with the Báb himself. Word was sent to the Governor of Tabríz to bring him out from his prison. An important meeting was then held at which many dignitaries were present. The Báb was [XIV:6:200] questioned, declared a heretic, and sentenced to death. An order was issued that he be bastinadoed. But, at the risk of their lives, the servants of the court refused to carry out these instructions. They were filled with respect and admiration for the noble prisoner. This so angered the enemies that one of them rose in his wrath and himself perpetrated the deed.

The proclamation went forth that the Báb was condemned to death, and great excitement prevailed in the city. On July ninth, 1850, he was brought out, with bare head and feet, and compelled to walk through the streets to his execution while thousands followed him.

One of the most devoted disciples of the Báb, who had been with him in prison, requested that he be martyred with his master. So these two were fastened with ropes to the wall of the citadel, in the open square, and a regiment of Armenian soldiers were commanded to fire upon them. They all fired, at the same moment. When the smoke cleared away the body of the disciple was discovered riddled with bullets. But the Báb was nowhere to be seen. At first it was thought that a miracle had been wrought. But, upon investigation, the Báb was found in a room in the citadel. The bullets had merely severed the ropes binding him to the wall, and he had fallen to the ground, unharmed. He was brought back and the regiment commanded to fire again. But they refused to do so, saying, among themselves, that the Báb must be a great saint. Another regiment, of Muslim soldiers, was brought, and this time their bullets pierced his body, leaving his face quite free of disfigurement. Thus the soul of the Báb ascended to heaven.

His body was carried and dropped outside the city, before the eyes of the populace, as a sign of disgrace. A small number of guards were set to watch the place. While most of them were asleep some of the disciples of the Báb came and bribed the two who remained awake, and obtained possession of the body. They carried it to a silk factory and it was carefully wrapped in silks, and taken secretly to Tìhrán, where it remained for many years. After the departure of Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá had the body brought to Mount Carmel where it was placed in a tomb and now all pilgrims who journey to this region visit this shrine.

Two years after the martyrdom of the Báb great trouble came upon his followers through a few fanatical disciples who in their ignorance made an attempt upon the life of the Sháh which resulted in a violent persecution of the whole movement. The Sháh, very despotic and powerful, was at his summer palace. These misguided disciples secreted themselves in the garden, and, as he came forth from the palace they rushed forward, with pistols. The Sháh was slightly wounded and several of the conspirators were killed. Believing this to mean that the movement was opposed to the government the Sháh gave orders that all the believers in Persia be searched out. In Tìhrán many were found; among these were about forty eminent men who were placed in an underground prison where they were heavily chained and given little food. Each day one or two of this number were taken out, by order of the Sháh, and executed, after being subjected to every kind of torture. The Sháh divided the believers among groups representing the various professions and trades, to be killed by each group according to their particular method. The spiritual fortitude of these martyrs was so wonderful that some of their enemies even were converted. While undergoing utmost torture they chanted the glorious verses of the Báb, and one of them danced during his execution. Permission was given by the court to kill all believers and confiscate their possessions. It was believed that anyone who killed a follower of the Báb would ascend to heaven.

A regiment of soldiers was sent to destroy the home of Bahá'u'lláh, and [XIV:6:201] men, women and children, nineteen in all, were captured. They were stoned and thrown into prison. This, it was thought, would completely eradicate the movement.

Although the six years of the Báb ministry were spent, largely, in prison and in exile, and he was constantly surrounded by guards and enemies, he was at all times peaceful and happy, always radiating heavenly joy. He was so surrounded by enemies that his friends and followers had the greatest difficulty in obtaining a meeting with him, and yet, thousands and thousands of the people of Persia, of high and of low degree, partook of his teachings, became their embodiment, and spread them to all parts of the country.

During this long persecution the Báb found time not only to dictate many teachings but, with his own pen, to write volumes of exquisite calligraphy. In Persia, to this day, beautiful penmanship is regarded as an art. Those who are fortunate enough to possess some of the delicate writings of the Báb consider them a most valuable heritage. Many of the Báb's writings were, unfortunately, destroyed. Often, when his followers were being persecuted and driven from their homes they buried in the ground, before fleeing, his writings which they prized so highly. Returning at some later time they would find that moisture had almost effaced them.

The teachings of the Báb

The teaching of the Báb to which his persecutors objected most was that man should be delivered from superstition and dogma. Living in Persia, it was necessary to consider the Muslim world; therefore a large part of his teaching referred to questions asked him regarding the Qur'án. He called to the people of Islám to consider the inner and important meaning therein. He taught that he himself was but the "gate" or door to the "City of Revelation", that divine City which would be revealed. He taught that a Great Personage, then living, but hidden behind the veils, would come to them and teach them a divine revelation and would usher in the new era of universal brotherhood. He often addresses this invisible Being in his writings, saying: "O, my Master! O, my Lord! I have accepted every persecution in order to prepare the people for Thy coming so that when Thou shouldst unveil Thyself they might be ready to meet Thee!"

A great question of the Muslim religious world was that of the "return", the belief being that when the new Gate of Knowledge appeared many holy souls would return and be present with him in flesh and blood. This question was given utmost importance, and it is for this reason that the Báb said the qualities and attributes of these holy souls had appeared, through his apostles.

Another question which the Islamic world addressed to the Báb was that of the "Resurrection", which was understood, literally, as it is by the Christians who have the same teaching. The Báb explained that the resurrection is the coming of the Manifestation of God, when religion is renewed. He said that his own coming was the Lesser Resurrection; but the Great Manifestation, of whom he so frequently spoke, would usher in the Great Resurrection. God sitting upon the throne, he explained, meant that the body of the Manifestation would be the throne of the Holy Spirit. Paradise, meant the recognition of the Lord in the Manifestation and living in accordance with His teachings. Hell was selfishness, fanaticism and doubt. He said that resurrection, therefore, did not mean the resurrection of flesh and blood from the tomb, but a spiritual resurrection, an awakening of inner potentialities and spiritual faculties, brought about by the recognition of the Manifestation of God.

The Báb divided the revelation of the Manifestations of God into five parts. The first part deals with those writings [XIV:6:202] which explain the mystery of divinity. The second part includes the prayers, communes, supplications revealed by the prophets and addressed to God. These, when recited, draw man unto the spirit of divine harmony and a higher state of spirituality. The third part is concerned with the interpretations of the heavenly books, explaining the symbolism and hidden meanings from which man has been veiled for past centuries. The prophets and Manifestations from time immemorial have spoken in metaphor and symbol and their meaning it has not always been easy for people to understand. But the Great Teachers themselves have been able to throw a flood of light upon the esoteric teachings of the former Great Teachers; they alone can fully grasp and explain the significance of the sacred words. The fourth applies to the metaphysical, scientific and theological questions asked by the scholars and thinkers of the age. The fifth part is the essence of the Teachings.

The writings of the Báb may be similarly divided. First, his explanations of divinity, so subtle, so transcendental, so divine in quality that a mind and soul especially equipped are required, to understand them. Second, the prayers which are filled with ecstasy and rapture. Third, answers to questions regarding interpretations of the Islamic writings, as the teachings of the Báb have largely to do with the Muslim world. Fourth, treatises on scientific and philosophical questions. Fifth, the verses of the Báb stating that when the Great Manifestation appears He will cancel or repeal as many of these teachings as are not fitted to the exigencies of the time.

The Báb declared that he had brought in but the Lesser Resurrection because his message was circumscribed, limited to the Islamic people and to one part of the world. But there would arise a new consciousness, a universal resurrection, and this new spiritual consciousness would sweep over the entire world.

The need of the Bahá'í Movement in Europe

Territet, Switzerland, August 1923

As one travels through the different countries of Europe one is deeply impressed with the tragic and desperate situation with which the whole civilization of that continent is threatened. The hardships under which so many races are suffering, and the dangers of much worse events in the coming years, are due not to physical or necessary causes, but purely to a state of mind. It is the double quality of fear and hate which is spreading the gigantic shadow of oncoming ruin over all of continental Europe.

This state of mind, which would seem the easiest thing in the world to change, is in reality the hardest. It is easier for humanity to tunnel mountains, bridge oceans and conquer the air than to change this psychology of disunion into a psychology of union and fraternity. The sad truth must be told, that the war has failed as yet to turn the hearts and thoughts of the great races of Europe into ways of peace. One nation only, Austria, has learned a lesson and has renounced war thoroughly from heart and soul.

In Europe I am reminded of the advice of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, not to give our interest too much to earthly politics, but to the politics of the Kingdom of God. One sees here clearly the futility of earthly politics. The most statesmanly brain, the most astute intelligence, brooding over European politics ad infinitum, could find no earthly way out of the dilemma. There are no sides one can take. There is no one nation that by a sincere effort toward justice is leading the way to peace and stability in Europe. All are wrong. All are sharing in a guilt which if continued can only be paid for with more blood.

So one wearies of reading the newspapers of the different countries, of discussing with different nationals the present situation, with any hope of arriving at a human solution or of being able to take sides with right against wrong. All is wrong here, in the play of politics; and the right is only to be found in the application of Bahá'u'lláh's laws to the crying needs of a war-intoxicated and bewildered humanity.

Here and there, of course; are individuals who have the heart toward peace; here and there are organizations which are working splendidly for harmony rather than disharmony between nations. But the general tide and current of thought in continental Europe is no longer toward internationalism, but toward a nationalism, supported by war.

Hence to those sincere and eager souls who in such a situation despair bitterly of the future, the Bahá'í Message comes welcomed and receptively. They have no argument against it, because desiring peace and prosperity for their country and for the whole world, they can see no way of attaining their desires unless by such spiritual means as the Cause offers.

How clear and evident now is the word of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that no human effort or organization can bring about the ideal conditions for humanity! Those movements here toward fraternity, toward international brotherhood and peace, which sprang up with sincere intention and flourished with a vivid hope in the years immediately subsequent to the war, are now languishing. They have no power or life. The miasmatic overgrowths of hate and fear are overshadowing them, choking them out. It is very plain to any intelligent person that these now feeble calls to peace cannot become effective. Not but what such organizations are good and praiseworthy. All such present secular efforts toward brotherhood, though on the plane of action ineffective, are preparing people to take part later on in establishing the Kingdom [XIV:7:204] of God. Bahá'ís should give their sympathy and help to all such movements—but their heart and central energy to the holy Cause of God.

It is strange how this terrible and heart-moving spectacle of a war-mad Europe strengthens one's faith in the Bahá'í Movement. The reason as well as the heart becomes convinced that only this Cause can prevail against such hatreds and animosities. The Cause begins to stand out like the cloud that led by day and the pillar of fire that led by night the people of God through the wilderness. In America we cannot as yet see the grand station of the Cause, because the life of the people is going on prosperously and happily without it. Pray God it may not need such disasters in America to open our eyes to the need and the reality of the Cause of God.

More consoling and uplifting can be my next letter, in which I shall tell of the holy sweet souls we have met, brothers and sisters in the Cause shedding their little rays of light in darkened countries; and of sincere, earnest souls to whom we gave the Message. These are things to make one glad. This is the politics of the Kingdom.

Can religion and science agree?

Louis G. Gregory

Can religion and science agree? An affirmative answer to this question, generally understood and accepted, will bring peace to numberless people and set at rest a matter that has caused centuries of controversy. Our hope is not the repose of inaction, but the realization of that peace which blends into harmony all forces in human development. The question itself is in view of the fact that for long ages past and for the most part at present, there has been and is conflict between the devotees of science on the one hand and of religion on the other. This strife is not found in reality. It has brought only evil results and can never be justified. For both religion and science are light; but strife grows out of darkness.

Religion clearly apprehended, sanctions every truth discovered and conveyed to us by scientific research. In an age which unfolds so many wonders of science, great light and cheer come through the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that, "Religion must be reasonable; in so far as it contradicts the known and proved facts of science it ceases to be religion and becomes superstition."

It is wonderful to have the mind brightened by scientific knowledge. It is marvellous to have the heart purified by the fire of divine love. Both gifts are sacred and essential to human well-being. But until their unity is widely realized, discord will rend the best elements of the world.

Harmony between religion and science does not imply that pure religion must agree with every scientific theory. There are many such theories which are not sustained by adequate proofs, but rest only upon the imagination of men. Such theories, like the dogmas of religion, often change. The ancient Greeks, although not without fame for learning, once believed that the sun was a ball of fire drawn by horses which daily crossed the sky. Tradition had it that old Sol once lost control of his team and as a result went too near a man's field, burning his wheat. Later the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, with its cycles and epicycles, held sway over the scientific world. Contemporary scientists are practically unanimous in their acceptance of the belief that the entire human race is evolved from common animal ancestry. But these and other theories are all confined in the realm of [XIV:7:205] conjecture and speculation. Scientists cannot justly revile those who refuse to accept what is not proved. On the other hand, religion should not oppose the well-established truths of science, such as the law of motion, the law of cause and effect, the rotundity of the earth, the conservation of energy, the indestructibility of matter, the law of gravitation, the conic sections which form the orbits of heavenly bodies, the great antiquity of this world and of the universe, etc., etc.

It is evident that man, with all his acquired power and knowledge, creates nothing. His inventions are not creations, but discoveries of the secrets of nature. These secrets or laws are classified and arranged and to that branch of knowledge the term science is applied. The creation of religion is also beyond the power of man. That variety of religion which man evolves from his own minor or lower consciousness is but a sorry imitation. It abounds in useless forms, ceremonies and creeds. It leads to a labyrinth of doubt and gloom. It bewilders the judgement but fails to comfort the heart. But when religion and science are both genuine, they have their common origin in the divine Logos, or Creative Word, which, according to the Bahá'í teachings, is the first emanation from the unknown and unknowable Essence of Divinity. It is this supreme Power, bestowing light and knowledge, and periodically revealed to mankind through the perfect man, such as Moses, Jesus and Bahá'u'lláh, which calls into being sciences, arts, virtues and religion. Every grade and element of existence, according to its capacity, reflects the light of the divine Manifestation. The Spirit of the Word gives life to man and the universe. Great, indeed, is the mystery of the Word; Beyond the Word the aspiration of man cannot soar. The hope, the illumination, the heaven of man are in the Word. The Word itself implies its mysterious and Mighty Speaker.

The successive civilizations of the world have all grown out of the various revelations of religion which have come to mankind through the transcendent Might and Favour of God. Pure religion ever gives its sanction to true science, for in spirit they are one. The Bahá'í Revelation accentuates spiritual graces and also brings the greatest stimulus and encouragement to scientific studies. Spiritual faith is not weakened, but confirmed by reason. Every power in man should pay homage to his Creator. When the body, mind and heart all consciously reflect the divine Light and accept its Guidance man becomes happily free from other dependence. When religion, however, becomes corrupted by the ambitions of men it is no longer the paradise of truth, but becomes the wilderness of error. For the superstitions and imitations which pretend to be religion always make war upon science. And a superficial understanding of science may make one arrogant toward religion. But the great scientists of the ages always discover in their laboratories those signs and wonders which make them humble. They bow with reverence before these signs, knowing full well that such phenomena did not create themselves. Great scientists of the past, such as Pythagoras, Hippocrates, Plato, Aristotle and Pliny, were confirmed in their belief in God through the discoveries of science and philosophy. The greatest lights of science and philosophy in modern times are reverent in their attitude toward true religion. Professor Huxley speaks of "true science and true religion as twin sisters", and declares that "the separation of one from the other is likely to prove the death of both." Herbert Spencer, while admitting for the scientist a pride before the traditions and authorities of men, yet bears witness to humility "before the impenetrable veil which hides the Absolute."

He further declares:

"Only the sincere man of science, ... one who through lower truth seeks the highest, can truly know how utterly beyond not only human knowl- [XIV:7:206] edge, but human conception, is the Universal Power of which Nature, and Life, and Thought are manifestations."

Within a few years a report was circulated by the press that the American wizard, Thomas A. Edison, was a sceptic, a story which was promptly and vigorously denied by Mr Edison. Yet it may be understood how all these eminent men would be classified as agnostics and sceptics by those who mistake ceremonies for the reality of faith. These men of genius have too large, clear and penetrating a vision to be misled by the idols of human thoughts. But when they discover reality, in either religion or science, they are made happy. No doubt they would all react favourably to the sentiment expressed by the Victorian poet Tennyson, whose conception of peace and progress in both religion and science so clearly reflected the Light of Bahá'u'lláh:

"There lives more faith in honest doubt, Believe me, than in half the creeds."

The Holy Scriptures of all religions reveal the Word of God. The universe at large and all that is therein unfold the works of God through his Word. All that God gives is light; man brings darkness by veils that cover his own heart and mind. Evil is only the misuse of good. How many of the world's greatest scientists are today classified as enemies of religion because they cannot honestly subscribe to those tenets of error which mask as religion and which sometimes are commercialized and are sold for a consideration! And how many religionists, even sometimes the honest in heart, are so veiled by ignorance as to revile science, a blessing to the world from their own Creator! The creation of God is ever bright and harmonious with the melodies of love and unity; but those who fail to use their own highest possibilities of study will never soar beyond the abyss of darkness and rancour.

It has come to pass, even in this day of popular education, that several prominent clergymen have denied the rotundity of the earth, no doubt led by the misreading of their own Bible. One declared that although the philosophers teach that the earth is round, yet the Holy Bible speaks of the four corners of the earth and it is obvious that anything that has four corners cannot be round. So he passed that back to the philosophers, who, he believed, were quite vanquished in argument.

A theologian was once explaining to a rural conclave the creation of man.

"God," he declared, "created man out of wet clay, and then set him up against the palings to dry."

"Well in that case," asked inquisitive Deacon Brown, "who set up those palings?"

"Now Brother Brown," replied the parson, "if you are going to ask such questions as that you will destroy the whole system of theology!"

Despite the veneration which many people have for their own notions, it becomes more and more apparent that theology may be upset without harm to either religion or science.

The clear cause of the conflict between religion and science is the failure of each spiritual generation, or dispensation, to understand its own Holy Book. Truth, divinely revealed, wears two dresses. One is the simple statement, "Precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little, there a little." This all men can grasp, though unfortunately few apply. The second dress is the symbols and parables found in all the sacred writings. These, the hard shells say, must be interpreted and believed literally, or else man is an apostate and infidel whose soul is lost. Even though such literal interpretation sets at naught science and reason, betrays spiritual blindness, and is at variance with all the laws of God's universe, this school of dogma will expel and persecute those who dissent from their own narrow and limited views. The failure of orthodoxy to understand its symbols led to the crucifixion of Jesus, and the same enmity, born of ignorance consumes the souls [XIV:7:207] of men whenever a Divine Messenger appears in the world.

"O Jerusalem! Jerusalem! Thou that killest the Prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee!" This was the pathetic lamentation of long ago.

Today Bahá'u'lláh says:

"I beckon thee to life; but thou preferrest death!"

It is both sad and strange that darkness is preferred to light. But the eternal hope is now that great Light which harmonizes religion and science, and the Promise is that all creation will eventually see its splendour. It is the Light of God which makes religion reasonable and clearly reveals its harmony with science. The Supreme Authority establishes this for all time. Now we know that those sacred writings, revealed by the Prophets of God, which on their face appear to contradict science were never meant by their inspired authors to be taken literally. Their meanings are veiled by symbol. Therefore, each statement, if not understood, should be weighed in the balance of science, reason, and spiritual insight. If it agrees with the truths of science, it should be accepted without question. If it contradicts the proved facts of science, which are also of God, it is symbolic and not to be taken literally. Prayer, a reverent attitude toward the Word, a study of the Bahá'í Revelation, will unfold its inner significance, which is truly a divine favour. It is not the divine purpose that sincere seekers should be veiled in this day, but rather that all should discover the Great Light of Reality. The true Educators, who are the Holy Manifestations, would awaken in man's consciousness the unity of truth. Man's light, joy, and reverence will increase with this great blessing.

A child reads the fables of Aesop and thinks that the animals actually conversed. But a mature person, perusing the same fables, enjoys their entertaining humour, but with clear discernment sees the purpose in the moral. In much the same way, the Messengers of God in the past, sometimes in the present, have conveyed great spiritual laws in the form of symbol. As these luminous Points so often appeared in the mystic East, they have used those figures of speech and vehicles of expression which were understood by their disciples, revealing light and knowledge according to the advancement of their followers. There, speech abounds in symbols. Even a little light upon those symbols which appear in the Holy Books will bring clearer understanding to those who read. In the light of the Bahá'í teachings it is made clear that water is a symbol of knowledge; fire, Divine Love; tree, a Holy Manifestation; birds, human thoughts; animals, nations and peoples; dragons, religious orders or dynasties; clouds, changes of ordinances, alterations opposed of men; hell, deprivation or ignorance; heaven, knowledge, the Divine Will, exaltation, etc.; Sun, a Holy Manifestation; Moon, successor, or first believer; stars, the clergy, or religious doctors, etc. These are very few of [the] many symbols that appear with meanings that sometimes vary. As we read them, they bring new insight in reading the first eleven chapters of Genesis, which are all in symbol, as well as many other parts of the Bible and of other revelations. Wonderful significances are found in such stories as the Garden of Eden, Cain and Abel, the plagues of Egypt, Satan, Jonah and the whale, the dead and their graves, the resurrection, the temptation in the wilderness, the rivers of Paradise, etc. Parables unfold the stages of man's progress, from the material to the spiritual, and his condition of utter helplessness and misery when deprived of Divine Favour. But these significances are veiled from those who insist upon literal interpretation and are at war with science.

The origin of science and the inspiration to man's acquirement are in the Word. Whatever of reality man discovers today is his reaction to that marvellous Spirit which Bahá'u'lláh [XIV:7:208] brings to the world. One familiar with the theory of the electron, now popular among the scientists, may well be thrilled in reading in the Seven Valleys of Bahá'u'lláh this wonderful statement:

"Whatever mote thou splittest thou wilt find therein a sun!"

After gazing into the starry heavens, and then upon a piece of radium, it is no less thrilling to read the following passage from the Súriy-i-Haykal:

"Should we desire to show forth from an atom, suns without beginning and without end, We are indeed able and We can make them all appear in a moment by My Command. Should We wish to produce from a drop of water the seas of the heaven and earth and from a letter the science of what was and is, We are indeed able—verily it is an easy matter."

How marvellous, how overwhelming, is divine knowledge! Man is awe-struck by the Power of the Word! Should he not be a witness to the ceaseless flow of creation which ever meets his astonished vision? He is ever a child if he reads the Book of Life without striving to perceive its meaning. The soul is enriched by both material and divine sciences. 'Abdu'l-Bahá ever beckons us to knowledge! May no false pride or vainglory rob us of the divine gift! May reverence that is meet increase our capacity to know! For whatever the progress of man, the True One remains, exalted in His greatness and Glory,

"A sea upon which no one can sail!"

Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá because of their Revelation and interpretation of heavenly laws, making religion both rational and spiritual, have attracted to their standard some of the world's most powerful minds. Leo Tolstoy, the hope of Russia, drew his light and inspiration from Bahá'u'lláh. Arminius Vambéry, the profound Orientalist, hailed with delight his meeting with 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Prof. Cheyne of Oxford University and Prof. Browne of Cambridge have added their tributes to the chorus from many countries and climes. Among the learned in America who have praised the Bahá'í Cause may be included statesmen, ambassadors, jurists, scientists, educators, theologians, welfare workers and philanthropists. Should not the weight of such authorities move the thoughtful to investigate?

The certainty that religion and science agree, as clarified in the Bahá'í teachings, brings a refining, cleansing, healing chord among the disciples of truth. Religion and science united, makes religion scientific and science spiritual. Since religion and science are now wed, the fruits of that marriage will bless, brighten and civilize man. The oneness of religion and science reveals the Divine Unity and the unity of men. It unfolds to our ken the mysteries of creation and the secrets of both worlds. It establishes the connection and correspondence of all phenomena and suffuses the universe with light. The progressive in spirit, those who seek the symmetry of education and want ideal advancement, may well turn to the example of Shoghi Effendi. That brilliant youth, to whom a world looks for guidance, acquired the sciences with diligent application. His grasp of religion is as luminous as the sun.

We are rejoiced to receive word that the name of Miss Agnes Alexander, our Bahá'í pioneer in Japan, is in the list of those who were saved in the great Tokyo earthquake. May all the beloved friends be protected and safe.

Within and behind the laws of nature, by the watching of whose operations the scientists may explain this cataclysmic disaster, is the Omnipotent and Loving Creator, Who transforms apparent calamity into light and mercy. May this great disaster bring a closer accord between Japan and the United States as they send their good-will to each other over the "Ocean of Peace".

XIV:7, October 1923 [XIV:7:209]

Communication and divine inspiration

The physical world reflects the spiritual, the flowers of earth, the flowers of heaven, the laws of matter, the laws of the spirit. As Plato and Swedenborg and other divine philosophers have so often said, by the law of correspondence we see in things below a reflection of those on high.

Engineers are today investigating with the greatest eagerness the physical laws of the transmission of the electrical waves which produce the miracle of the radio: what interferes with their perfect transmission, what obstacles prevent their conveying a message in its original purity, how can they perfect the receiving instruments, how protect the hearers to whom they are sending beautiful music, for instance, from the jarring notes of the uninitiated transmitters and their poor instruments which vibrate discordantly over the ether.

The radio of the earth is an exquisite symbol of the radio of the spirit. Brilliant scientific minds of our day are investigating with equal earnestness the laws of spiritual communication. Prominent writers and men of science, are devoting their time to perfecting researches in the spiritual radio and making it known to a world which is hungering for spiritual knowledge.

In this investigation, however, we meet with difficulties. We find that there arise in people's minds countless ideas which they believe to be real communications but in reality are merely the ripples of the sea of imagination. They rise to the surface as do the mistaken ideas which appear in the minds of thinkers, in all ages. Like the old scientific conception of the flatness of the earth they are pure imagination. A large part of the so-called communications of our day are simply the motions of the sea of illusion.

But the fact of real spiritual communication is none the less as indubitable as the shining of the sun. It is perhaps the central motive power in all human history, this communication of spiritual thought and life from person to person. It is the essence of all successful teaching. What was that strange something which Moses communicated to the children of Israel? When he stood on the hill and but raised his arms the Jews felt their minds and hearts charged with an invincible energy. Jesus communicated to his disciples something much greater than physical words. He transmitted the love, the purity, the divine flame of devotion to the Kingdom which was burning in the crystal of his divine spirit. 'Abdu'l-Bahá tells of how Mount Carmel seems almost to speak with one, as though a wave of unseen life swept from the mountain into our spirits. How much more does the living presence of the great prophet radiate life into our being! A visitor was one time sitting by the wall inside the garden of the Pilgrim House at Haifa. All at once he felt a great current of spiritual life touch and envelope him. He rose in wonder, and beheld 'Abdu'l-Bahá passing on the other side of the wall. Even the walk of the great spiritual Master, Bahá'u'lláh said, sends spiritual energy through the world. It is this broadcasting of the waves of their spirit which makes their written words so life-imparting. In the following quotations 'Abdu'l-Bahá describes this great spiritual law:

"This material world has an outer appearance. It has also a hidden aspect. These created things are linked one with the other into one system which leads to the unseen, and ends at last in spiritual realities. I hope that these spiritual links will every day become stronger and this mind-communication which is termed inspiration, will continue. When this is realized there is no cause for disturbance over bodily separation. This station is beyond the circle of words and above all description.”—‘Abdu’l-Bahá: From Diary of Mírzá Maḥmúd, 28 April 1912.

“Often people speak together without [XIV:7:210] the mediary of the tongue. There are two methods of intercourse—one through the outward tongue, the other through the ideal, the inner tongue. When the spirit is detached, when the heart is in a subjective state, then the ideal tongue can speak. But as long as the spirit is preoccupied and the heart is objective in its activities it is impossible to attain to that station. Consider: is there not an ideal union between the lover and the beloved? Often with the glance of an eye, or a handshake a whole world of thought is conveyed, without the uttering of a word. It is possible to attain to such a state, if we are set aglow with the fire of the love of God, if we are attached to Him, if we are as a burning torch, if we rise above material phenomena and objects.’—‘Abdu’l-Bahá: Diary of Mirza Ahmad Sohrab, 20 December 1912.

“When man’s soul is rarefied and cleansed spiritual links are set up and from these bonds heartfelt sensations are produced. The human heart resembles a mirror. When this is purified hearts are attuned and reflect one another and thus spiritual emotions spring up. This is like unto the world of dreams, when man is detached from tangible matter and experiences spiritual activities. What amazing laws operate and what remarkable discoveries are made and it may even be that detailed communications are registered.”—From Tablet to a Chicago friend.

“Know verily, that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has spiritual speech, heavenly conversations and revelations of the heart. Verily I address, through the Bounty of Bahá, in spirit and vision, (those) who address me, and this is known to those from whose eyes God has lifted the gloomy cover.”—From Tablet to Mrs Nash, Los Angeles.

“Verily, the spirit knows the spirit, the spirit addresses the spirit, and the spirit associates with the spirit.”—From Tablet to Mrs Frankland, Tropico, California.

“Verily, I speak unto thee through the tongue of my spirit, from the spiritual direction, and explain for thee the mysteries of the Kingdom and the meanings of the sacred, heavenly books. ...

“Verily, I love thee with my heart, my spirit and my mind and associate with thee in spirit (and converse with thee) with my inmost tongue. I love for thee to arise to that for which I have arisen, in servitude to the Sublime and Holy Threshold, turning unto God, hoping for martyrdom, so that thou mayest attain to the gift, the lights of which glisten in the eternal horizon.”—From Tablet to Mr J. F. Brittingham, New York City.

Communication from the heavenly world

Nor does this communication cease when the spirit of the Great Master ascends into the unseen world. Nay, rather, then communication is easier, because he has laid aside the barriers of the body. It is difficult to find, in its influence on European history, a more momentous event than the conversion of Paul, the cause of which was a spiritual communication received in the form of a vision as he journeyed to Damascus. In his heart was hatred, a determination to uproot, to exterminate if possible the whole community of the early Christians when suddenly he saw, with inner vision, the spirit of the Christ shining upon him, like the sun, and a voice bade him become an apostle of the new religion. That spiritual communication transformed his life and through him changed the whole course of human history. Similar communications, in later years guided Paul at crucial moments. The Bible is full of accounts of how angels flash to the children of men heavenly guidance. These angels are either the purified souls of those who have ascended into the Kingdom, or they are the rays of the Holy Spirit, in either case a shining symbol of communication from on high. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá says: "Evil spirits are deprived of eternal life. How then can they exercise any influence? But as eternal life is ordained for holy spirits therefore their influence exists in all the divine worlds." And Bahá'u'lláh [XIV:7:211] tells us that the rays of these holy souls determine the stations of the nations. They are broadcasting spiritual waves to all corners of the earth and many an artist and thinker who believes himself the creator of great and original ideas has but caught on the receiving instrument of his mind and heart the waves from the world of the Kingdom.

'Abdu'l-Bahá wrote to Miss Sarah Farmer: "O thou prepared lamp! Be thou enkindled with the fire of the love of God as much as thou canst and illumine those countries so that thou mayest find eternal life and shine upon all ages and cycles."

How to be sure that communications are real

How can we know when the message which comes to us is true and when it is merely imagination and illusion? First we must so perfect and purify our instrument, our mind and soul that they may register none but the communications from on high. Sometimes these come in waking moments. Often they shine upon us in our dreams when the outer mind is quiet and the body is at rest. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá says: "It is well known that a very profound relation exists between the spirit of man and the reality in the world of existence, for it often happens that what we see in a dream comes to pass in waking hours. This shows that between the spirit of man and the outer phenomenal world there is spiritual communion. Furthermore the spirit of man has the power of discovering things. When this power is recognized these problems become easy. But the most interesting fact of all is this, that even the materialists, while they deny spiritual power are engaged in making discoveries and are thus immersed in spiritual power and claim to know coming events."—'Abdu'l-Bahá: From Mírzá Maḥmúd's Diary, 10 June 1912.

"There are three kinds of visions or dreams. First, those that arise from over-excited nerves, or disordered stomach, and are of no use whatever. Second, when God sends a revelation to a soul that is not entirely pure from the world to such an one He sends visions in symbols and signs, and these experiences need an interpreter. The third kind is when a soul who is severed from the world receives a revelation from God. In this station everything is clear and pure and needs no explanation."—'Abdu'l-Bahá: From notes of Miss Pearson, taken at Akká, 26 February 1899.

The true communication is often quite contrary to our personal will. Paul's vision on the road to Damascus meant that he must renounce his will completely, to build the Kingdom of the Christ. We know all real spiritual communications by their fruits. True messages from the heavenly world make our lives more pure, more loving, more dedicated to the service of the Kingdom. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá says of these spiritual letters: "My correspondence with thee is uninterrupted, for in my Spirit I supplicate and entreat toward the Kingdom of Abhá in thy behalf. The essence of correspondence is this, that it may be imprinted upon the tablet of the heart. (This correspondence) is sent to thee without intermission by the faithful messenger of the Spirit. Consequently look thou and study thyself. Whenever thou beholdest that the soul has glad tidings, the heart is rejoiced, the eye and the insight are illumined, the ears opened, the tongue fluent in uttering the truth of His Highness the Merciful One, and the spirit is soaring heavenward with joy know of a certainty that the tablet hath reached thee.”—From a Tablet to Miss Ambrose, Washington, D.C.

But the supreme test of the truth of our visions, ideas and communications is to compare them with the divine messages of the great prophets. With them communication with the worlds of God becomes so perfect, so infallibly certain that we call it inspiration or revelation. They are the pure hearts which see God, which reflect the Sun of Reality in Its completeness. At best our messages are but broken rays, coloured by the glass of [XIV:7:212] our imperfect lives. Only the absolutely selfless and pure can receive messages which are invariably certain and true.

Therefore, through all history God has sent a shining succession of these pure mirrors to reflect and communicate the very truth of God in language fitted to their time and age. The great prophets merge their human will in absolute obedience to the will of God. Therefore in them the voice of God can speak crystal clear.

The visions of Isaiah, Ezekiel, the revelations which came to Amos, Hosea, Jeremiah, St. John on Patmos are recorded in the Bible. From cover to cover the Bible tells one story of divine communication which we know as inspiration.

In our day it has burst upon the world with undimmed brilliance through the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and now in Shoghi Effendi. Jináb-i-Fáḍil speaks of how the great prophet manifests such amazing knowledge, “foresees events thousands of years before they come to pass. They are like sensitive photographic plates on which are reproduced the images of the Kingdom. His Holiness the Báb was the herald of Bahá'u'lláh. He said, ‘Today I am the centre of knowledge. Whosoever desires to ask me any question, no matter on what subject, I will write or speak about it immediately, without reflection.’ He said not only that he would answer, but he said that he would answer without reflection. His inspiration was just like the water springing out of the fountain, uninterruptedly. ‘Whatever I write,’ he said, ‘with my hand, it is not my hand that writes; it is the power of God that moves the hand.’ He wrote with greatest rapidity, on scientific and philosophical subjects. It often happened that the ‘Ulamás of Persia gathered in a great meeting and presented to him abstruse questions. Instantly, the Báb would take his pen and write in answer, explanations that were most clear and perfect.”

Bahá'u'lláh says in his Tablet to the Sháh of Persia: “O King! I was but a man like others, asleep upon My couch, when lo, the breezes of the All-Glorious were wafted over Me, and taught Me the knowledge of all that hath been. This thing is not from Me, but from One Who is Almighty and All-Knowing. And He bade Me lift up My voice between earth and heaven, and for this there befell Me what hath caused the tears of every man of understanding to flow. The learning current amongst men I studied not; their schools I entered not. Ask of the city wherein I dwelt, that thou mayest be well assured that I am not of them who speak falsely. This is but a leaf which the winds of the will of thy Lord, the Almighty, the All-Praised, have stirred. Can it be still when the tempestuous winds are blowing?”¹

The same inspiration flowed through the pen and the voice of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Jináb-i-Fáḍil tells of how “one of the philosophers of Persia came to 'Akká, Palestine. He asked certain proofs of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, I am ready to answer any question that you ask. I will dictate to you provided that you are able to follow my thought, without stopping. The man replied, very well, that is easy. Then he asked a scientific question. The explanation flowed from the tongue of 'Abdu'l-Bahá like a waving sea. When the philosopher had written one page he begged to be excused. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that he would dictate more slowly. So the man wrote the second page. But he found it impossible to follow the dictation. He was so filled with wonder and astonishment that he immediately became an ardent follower of the Cause and began to teach others.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá in his last Will and Testament shows us that after his ascension Shoghi Effendi, the glorious youth, is the dayspring of divine guidance. He is under “the unerring guidance of God”.

Thus we have, in the midst of the world [XIV:7:213] a standard of divine revelation. By this heavenly standard can we compare our ideas, speculations, dreams and visions. The Great Prophet speaks the pure teachings, the pure truth of God. He thus becomes a divine centre of certainty and of unity, for by uniting upon his teaching, which is the teaching of God, the many peoples and nations may become one.

Furthermore, he communicates not only ideas, but the dynamic power to put them into action. He transmits to those who read his words much more than the words, much more than ideas—the divine energy which purifies the spirit, consecrates the life, sets the heart aflame with the fire of love. He communicates his divine energy to all those who with pure and responsive hearts read his words or repeat his prayers. His words are the water of life which makes all things new, God’s bestowal for establishing on earth and in the minds of men, unity and peace. Out of the water of his divine knowledge, flowing through the New Jerusalem of his teachings, rises the tree of life, the beloved community of his disciples in all lands and religions, whose leaves (deeds and spirit) are for the healing and uniting of the nations. “Blessed are they that have a right to come to the tree of life and enter by the Gates into the City.”

XIV:8, November 1923 [XIV:8:227]

The new Covenant

The symbol of the Covenant runs like a shining cord of unity through the religions of the world. The Old Testament means the Old Covenant. The New Testament is the New Covenant. And all through the Bible is to be found the promise of a still newer Covenant to be made in the Latter Day, the fullness of time, when God shall write His law in the hearts of His children, and they shall know Him from the least unto the greatest; and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd, a thousand years of peace. “The holy ones of old whenever they imagined the wondrous vision” of this day of days were “as thunderstruck and yearned for but a fleeting moment of that glorious hour.”

The Covenant is a divine agreement between God and His children. He has a wonderful plan for man’s life upon earth, for his destiny as a transformer of the world. “O MY SERVANT! Thou art even as a finely tempered sword concealed in the darkness of its sheath and its value hidden from the artificer’s knowledge. Wherefore come forth from the sheath of self and desire that thy worth may be made resplendent and manifest unto all the world.”¹ “O MY FRIEND! Thou art the day-star of the heavens of My holiness, let not the defilement of the world eclipse thy splendour. Rend asunder the veil of heedlessness, that from behind the clouds thou mayest emerge resplendent and array all things with the apparel of life.”² But to attain to this station ordained for him from the creation of the world, man must obey God’s laws, which are the articles of God’s Covenant, revealed by Him through His chosen messengers. The covenant with Abraham gave the glad tidings that through his seed should all the nations of the world be blessed. The covenant with Moses, uttered from the Sinai of Light, opened the door to the Promised Land. Its first articles were the Ten Commandments.

The sovereignty of David, the splendour of Solomon, the flowering of Israel into a strong nation reveal the power which comes through obedience to the Covenant. The degradation of the Babylonian captivity, the ruin of Jerusalem were the result of disobedience. When the early Christians followed the covenant given by Christ in the Sermon on the Mount they became the light of the world. They united the divergent races and religions of the old Roman Empire into a brotherhood so wonderful that three hundred years after Jesus' crucifixion a man travelling from Persia to England would be greeted by the Christians, all along the way, as though he were a member of their own family. [XIV:8:228]

Centres of unity

The collective centre which unites "various peoples, tongues, nativities and opinions" is the Manifestation of God, the Great Mouthpiece of God. Said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in the Church of the Ascension, in New York City: "The Collective Centre has always appeared in the Orient. Abraham, Moses, Jesus Christ, Muḥammad were Collective Centres of Their day and time, and all arose in the East. Today Bahá'u'lláh is the Collective Centre of unity for all mankind, and the splendour of His light has likewise dawned from the East."¹ These collective centres have established the only real and powerful interracial, international unity that has ever been known upon this earth. They are God's greatest bounty to mankind.

Elements in the Covenant

The covenant of God in each prophetic dispensation consists of two parts: the teachings and the Divine Teacher; the revelation and the Prophet who reveals it. "Is it possible that one may believe in a book without believing in the teacher of that book? Is it possible to accept the sun and to reject its rays? He who rejects the rays is, no doubt, a rejecter of the sun, too. Further, many say, 'we have no need of prophets. We can have direct connection with God.' They do not know that divine prophets are the rays of the Sun of Reality and a means of educating the realities of men. Therefore he who rejects the bounty of the Sun of Reality and thinks himself not in need of it is like unto him who says that he is not in need of God and rejects both God and reality in face of the fact that all creation is receiving incessant bounty from God and is dependent upon Him as the body is dependent upon the soul."—'Abdu'l-Bahá: from the Diary of Mírzá Maḥmúd, November 1912.

Again, the teachings are like the rays of the sun: the revealer of the covenant is the sun itself. And the sun is more than all its rays, for it is the divine centre that radiates the rays to all corners of the universe. So is it with the Great Prophets, the Manifestations of the Sun of Truth. They are the pure centres through whom God speaks, and pours His Holy Spirit like a river of light. They are both the heavenly teachings and the power of God. As 'Abdu'l-Bahá said of Jesus: "Jesus was a Manifestation of God. Everything of him pertained to God. To know him was to know God. To have him was to have God. To obey him was to obey God. He was the source of all divine virtues. He was a vision of all divine qualities. In this vision the light of the Sun of Reality was reflected to the world. Through this mirror the Energy of God was transmitted to the world. The whole disc of the Sun of Reality was reflected in him."

Because this "Primal Mirror" thus transmits the rays of the Sun of Truth and brings them directly to bear upon the lives and thoughts of men his appearance upon earth is like the glory of a divine springtime. He focuses upon the world the radiance of a new truth, the warm rays of a new love, the showers of God's mercy, the all-renewing breezes of the Holy Spirit. From out his teachings there flowers the summer season of a new civilization.

After the most glorious summer, however, there always follow the autumn and the winter. This has been true of the teachings of even the greatest Manifestations. Their covenant is, after a while, forgotten, its light hidden beneath the clouds of dogma and superstition. When this occurs the Sun has always dawned again, from a new horizon, to fulfil the promise given by the previous Manifestation, that God would send a Successor, a new Mani- [XIV:8:229] festation, who would bring in a new “springtime of His Holiness The Eternal One”.

The succession of these Manifestations of God is the central law of the religious development of the world. It is the supreme teaching of the Covenant. Therefore, “when the old world is sterile and the ages are effete” we must search for the new collective centre of God’s new Covenant, and listen to his words, for when we have found him we have found God’s new will for the new time. This is the law of the spiritual history of the race, that every Great Prophet has taken a covenant with his followers that they should follow and obey his successor, the one whom God has willed to come after him. This covenant tells men that they must be watchful for the next Manifestation, for he may come like a thief in the night. Moses took a covenant with his followers that they should find and obey the fuller covenant to be revealed in the Christ. Christ took a covenant that all should watch for the Son of Man, The Paraclete, The Spirit of Truth. Buddhists have for twenty-five hundred years waited for the fuller covenant to be revealed by Maitreya; Zoroastrians for the three great figures to appear in Persia who would bring the forces of light to everlasting victory. Muslims await the coming of Qá’im, the Mihdí, the Messiah. The Hebrews remember the words of Malachi: “Behold I send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me; and the Lord, whom ye seek, will suddenly come to his temple; and the messenger of the Covenant, whom ye desire, behold, he cometh, saith the Lord of Hosts.”

The new Covenant in Bahá’u’lláh

The Bahá’í Teachings present to a despairing world the glad tidings that these promises of old have been fulfilled in a new and universal way, wonderful beyond all our imaginings.

The true prophets, said Jesus, referring to the glorious ones who should come after him, ye shall know by their fruits. The following are some of the fruits of the life and the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá which prove their divine mission:

The reconciliation of science and religion so as to satisfy the minds and the hearts of men.

The statement of the Eternal Truth in the language of today so as to solve the problems of present-day society: “He diagnoses the illness and prescribes the remedy. Every day has its own secret.” “The teachings of Bahá’u’lláh,” wrote ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, shortly before his ascension, “are the light of this age and the spirit of this century. Expound each of them at every gathering.

The first is investigation of truth,
The second, the oneness of mankind,
The third, universal peace,
The fourth, conformity between science and divine revelation,
The fifth, abandonment of racial, religious, worldly and political prejudices, prejudices which destroy the foundation of mankind.
The sixth is righteousness and justice,
The seventh, the betterment of morals and heavenly education,
The eighth, the equality of the two sexes,
The ninth, the diffusion of knowledge and education,
The tenth, economic questions, and so on and so forth.”¹

Teachings stated in so universal a form as to appeal to all races, religions and types of minds, from the least unto the greatest.

Teachings reinforced by the divine Holy Spirit which creates men anew: The teachings of

Bahá'u'lláh transform, like a divine elixir, the baser metals of human nature into the shining gold of love, sacrifice, illumination. They open the eyes of the spiritually blind, unstop the ears of the deaf and make the simple, the humble, even the children eloquent apostles. "Through them flows the river of Divine Knowledge and bursts the fire of the consummate wisdom of the Eternal."

Creative words that burn away from human hearts the prejudices, hatreds, superstitions that divide religions and [XIV:8:230] races: Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá have already united a great multitude, drawn from all kindreds, all peoples and religions into the most universal spiritual brotherhood which the world has ever known. "Consider the power of the Covenant," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá to a group of visitors in 'Akká in 1909. "Before the coming of Bahá'u'lláh it was absolutely impossible for a Zoroastrian to be united with a Jew, a Siyyid (descendant of Muḥammad), and a Mullá; and for these to be united with a Christian was impossible. But the power of (his) covenant has so gathered them together that they seem like one spirit. Although the bodies are many, the spirit is one."

The lives and deeds of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá are so perfect as to be themselves the teaching that they proclaim. The Word was made flesh and all who had eyes to see beheld its glory. Professor T. K. Cheney of Oxford University, higher critic and Bible scholar, tells of his doubts and perplexities; and then of how there came to his study one day, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, who made all things new. Whereupon he studied the life of Bahá'u'lláh with all the rigor of the higher and historical critic, and could find no sin in him. He was, indeed, wrote Professor Cheney, what his followers loved to call him, the Blessed Perfection.

Bahá'u'lláh established the tree of his Cause in the midst of the most terrible storms of persecution and opposition from a host of enemies. Forty years he was an exile and a prisoner. But he withstood all his enemies like a mountain, until his light shone forth triumphant and illumined the world.

"And some of his signs are the unfoldment of prophecies and glad tidings, the appearance of proofs and references—the expectations of the pure and devout—and they are of those who attain.

"And some of his signs are his steadfastness before the great nations and powerful governments, even before a host of enemies, who shed blood and strive to wreck the divine edifice in every time and place. Verily, therein is a thought for those who reflect upon the signs of God.

"And some of his signs are the wonders of his explanations, the eloquence of his utterances, the rapidity of revealing his words, verses, addresses, communes, interpretations of the symbols and illustrations of the parables. By thy life, the Cause is evident and clear to those who see with the eyes of justice!"—From a Tablet of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

'Abdu'l-Bahá in the following words, spoken to some visitors at Haifa in the winter of 1920, sums up a few of the proofs of the mission of Bahá'u'lláh:

"Among the proofs are the teachings of the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh), teachings such as have not been given since the beginning of the world. These teachings are for all mankind and in them is to be found the highest degree of counsel—advise in the utmost eloquence and beauty of expression, morals in the highest degree of perfection, politics in the highest degree of perfection, laws of the utmost firmness, public management most perfectly regulated. Whatever the world of humanity needs is found here. All the religions of the world see the utmost perfection of man in these teachings. ... The teachings and exhortations which His Holiness Christ gave the Christians can be found in Bahá'u'lláh's teachings. Politics are in the Qur'án: the Muslims can find political science of the most perfect order in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Such fundamental things as are useful, such as equality and freedom—these can be found in the laws of Bahá'u'lláh. ... The teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are all-inclusive. Other teachings are like branches; but the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh are like the trunk of a tree which sends out all the branches.

“These are from a person who never entered a school, who had never known a teacher, who had never associated with [XIV:8:231] people of learning and who had from his early life been in utmost tribulation. Such teachings are most illuminating. Such teachings are divine. What greater proofs than these!

“The Cause of the Blessed Beauty in every possible way is clearly proved. The proof is not of one kind only, but of all kinds. One is at a loss to know which proof to begin with. For example, in Europe, in the great assemblies, talks were given. I spoke to eminent people. I remember that one day I met a Member of Parliament. He asked me: ‘What is the proof of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh? I want it in a concise and useful form.’ I said: ‘The concise and sufficient proof is that Bahá'u'lláh in such a prison as ‘Akká, and when under chains, raised his banner. In Tīhrán he was in prison and under chains. In ‘Akká he was in prison. Under these circumstances he raised his banner.’ When I mentioned this proof he became very silent. I said: ‘There is nothing recorded comparable to this. What power is this, that from the beginning of the world until today such a thing has not happened!’”

When, through an independent investigation of truth, we find the divine physician, the captain who can guide us safely through the storms into the promised kingdom of peace, then we entrust our lives to his guidance—his guidance and his teachings.

What is the Bahá'í Covenant?

The Bahá'í covenant is an agreement which God takes with those who recognize His latest Manifestation that they will live according to the teachings which He reveals through His Chosen Ones. As ‘Abdu'l-Bahá says: “According to the irrefutable text He has taken from us a firm covenant that we may live and act according to the divine exhortations, commands and lordly teachings.” “If a person lives for one day according to those divine exhortations and teachings (that is, as revealed in The Hidden Words) he will be assisted to move the visible and invisible world.” These teachings, “descended from the Realm of Glory, uttered by the Tongue of Power and Might and revealed to the Messengers of old”, shine from the pages of Bahá'u'lláh and ‘Abdu'l-Bahá like a world-illuminating sun, dispelling the darkness of nature and ushering in the day of the oneness of mankind, the oneness of religions, universal peace. But the centre of them all, the most great characteristic of this new revelation from God, is the Centre of the Covenant. In every cycle the Centre of the Covenant is, first, the Great Prophet who reveals the covenant to his age. The divine, universal Manifestations of God live their teachings so perfectly that they are not only its centre, they are the Covenant. Their pure teachings and pure deeds flow like a fountain ever new, from the Ocean of the Ever-Living.

But when the Great Prophet ascends from this world how is the unity which he establishes upon earth to be maintained? As long as the followers of Moses, of Muḥammad and the Christ had a centre of unity they were the spiritual transformers of the world. But when self-seeking leaders began to interpret their revelations, each one creating “a party round about himself”, sects and divisions arose and the army of light lost its power. Without unity of command the soldiers of God can never scatter the forces of darkness. Therefore the Centre of the Covenant is the essence of the Covenant.

“The Bahá'ís,” says ‘Abdu'l-Bahá, “are ordered to establish the oneness of mankind. If they cannot unite around one point how will they be able to bring about the unity of mankind?” Bahá'u'lláh, in order that God's glorious purpose, of uniting in the Latter Day the divergent peoples and religions into one fold might be fulfilled, bade his disciples, in his last will and testament and in many epistles, to turn after his pass- [XIV:8:232] ing to the one whom God had purposed, the one branched from the Pre-Existent Stock—‘Abdu’l-Bahá. “The purpose of the Blessed Beauty in entering into this Covenant and Testament was to gather all existent beings around one point so that the thoughtless souls, who in every cycle and generation have been the cause of dissension, may not undermine the Cause.”¹

“There were dissensions after the departure of Christ because there had been no centre appointed.”² “In former cycles no distinct covenant was made in writing by the Supreme Pen and no distinct personage was appointed to be the standard differentiating falsehood from truth.”³

“Inasmuch as great differences and divergences of denominational belief had arisen throughout the past, every man with a new idea attributing it to God, Bahá’u’lláh desired that there should not be any ground or reason for disagreement among the Bahá’ís. Therefore, with His own pen He wrote the Book of His Covenant, addressing His relations and all people of the world, saying, ‘Verily, I have appointed One Who is the Centre of My Covenant. All must obey Him; all must turn to Him; He is the Expounder of My Book, and He is informed of My purpose. All must turn to Him. Whatsoever He says is correct, for, verily, He knoweth the texts of My Book. Other than He, no one doth know My Book.’ The purpose of this statement is that there should never be discord and divergence among the Bahá’ís but that they should always be unified and agreed.”⁴

For thirty years ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the Centre of the Covenant, through the inspiration of God, united members of all religions and peoples into a spiritual oneness which encircles the world. He lived so gloriously the teachings of the Covenant that he was, himself, the Covenant of God’s oneness.

In order that the disciples of Bahá might maintain their perfect unity and through that unity become the spiritual transformers of the world, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá also wrote a last Will and Testament, naming in clear, indubitable words the collective centre whom God had chosen after his ascension. He entered into a covenant with all his followers that they should follow and obey this Centre. This Centre of Bahá’í unity named by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, this dayspring of guidance, this chosen one of God, this Guardian of the Cause is the glorious and inspired youth, Shoghi Effendi. When the Universal Spiritual Assembly shall be elected, from all the Bahá’ís of the world, Shoghi Effendi will be its life-long head. They will apply the divine teachings to the new problems, the new world conditions.

Thus can the lovers of the light in the Day of God attain unity of action through unity of guidance; thus will they avoid the sectarian divisions of past ages, by turning to the one centre which God has appointed. To love and follow that Centre is to attain perfect freedom, for freedom is not found in following all the new ideas that chance to arise in the individual’s mind, ideas that often separate and divide, cause war and dissension. True freedom is attained by every individual’s obeying in perfect joy the will, the law of God as revealed in His Chosen Ones. “Say: True liberty consisteth in man’s submission unto My commandments, little as ye know it. Were men to observe that which We have sent down unto them from the Heaven of Revelation, they would, of a certainty, attain unto perfect liberty. ... Say: The liberty that profiteth you is to be found nowhere except in complete servitude unto God, the Eternal Truth. Whoso hath tasted of its sweetness will refuse to barter it for all the dominion of earth and heaven.”⁵

Arabian civilization

Jináb-i-Fáḍil

The Arabian peninsula is a vast desert inhabited from time immemorial by Bedouin tribes, and Arabs, who, with their camels and horses roamed over the great stretches of that land and on it pitched their tents. Until the coming of Muḥammad, six centuries after Christ, these people developed no distinct civilization. The Bedouin tribes of Arabia were, however, before the time of Muḥammad possessed of certain excellent qualities, such as generosity, faithfulness, loyalty and hospitality. Because of the dry, hot climate of the desert their mode of life was extremely simple, and they wore but little clothing. They were a physically powerful race, many of them able to outrun even their own horses. Like these famous steeds they were fiery and quick-tempered. Yet they possessed qualities upon which a sturdy nation could be built.

The Arabs are Semitic in origin, descended from Shem. As the many tribes were separated from each other their language resolved itself into a number of dialects. Each tribe lived independently, under the leadership of a chief—a shaykh or amír. But as a nation they were always influenced, or governed by the Romans, the Greeks or the Persians.

Previous to Muḥammad their religion was Sabeanism, which is star worshipping. Each tribe had a star, signifying a deity, and Arabia abounded in small temples dedicated to the gods of the stars. Of these many temples the most important was at Mecca, “Head of Towns”, where all the religious groupings and crude ideals of the Arabs were assembled, and then disseminated. This chief Arabian city of Mecca contained hundreds of idols, one of which was very ancient, and thousands of pilgrims from all parts of Arabia came to Mecca to worship in wild, barbaric fashion, their rites including the sacrifice of their own children.

The chief and daily occupation of these people was tribal warfare and internal feuds. To make war was regarded as evidence of courage; and each tribe had its particular method of carrying on warfare with other tribes. Century after century they fought. This kept them weak as a nation; therefore any foreign power could gain control over them because of their disorganized state. They had, also, many blameworthy practices, such as polygamy and drinking. They considered the birth of a daughter such a disgrace that they often buried a girl baby alive rather than let her grow up to mortify the family. The advent of a son they hailed with delight for here was one who could perpetuate the traditions of the family.

This, in brief, is a picture of the life of the Arabs at about CE six hundred—nomadic, quarrelsome bands of people, courageous and generous, yet possessed of many unadmirable qualities. In one section, only, a district called Yemen, was there really any civilization. Here, many eminent kings and rulers had reigned, developing a certain kind of culture. One of these rulers was the Queen of Sheba, referred to in the Old Testament.

The only literature developed by the Arabs was poetry. They loved and honoured a poet and regarded him as inspired. Once a year, at Mecca, a great festival was held, when the tribes from all parts of Arabia gathered, to exchange their merchandise. Here the poets came also, and read their compositions to the people. A group of judges selected the best poem which was then hung upon the wall of the sacred temple there to stay until the following year, when it would either be removed to give [XIV:8:236] place to a better poem, or permitted to remain for many years, because it had no rival.

When Christ arose, even his divine light did not penetrate to these ancient temples of idolatry. A few of the Arabians accepted him, believing in a strange version of the trinity, and worshipping the Heavenly Father, Christ and the Mother of Christ. There were also among the tribes several descendants of Jacob who professed a belief in the Old Testament, but this belief in God, which came either through Christian theology or Mosaic creeds, was not strong enough to illumine this ancient idol-worshipping nation.

Previous to Muḥammad the Arabs had no written language, but with his advent a new chapter opened in their history, an era of philosophy, science and ethics, for he ushered in a world-wide civilization.

Muḥammad belonged to the family of Quraysh (Koreish), whose members were the custodians of the key of the temple of Mecca, the greatest honour which the Arabians possessed. His ancestors were able men; his uncle, Abú Ṭálib, was counted one of the wisest and most honoured poets of the land. Muḥammad's parents died when he was a small child. He was brought up by an uncle, according to the simple life of his country, and received no education whatever. As a young man, occupied with his uncle's business, he showed a character so sincere and straightforward that the people respected and loved him. He was called Muḥammad the Faithful, Muḥammad the Truthful. Then, at the age of forty, he started upon his great career as a religious teacher, and invited the people to the Oneness of God.

We have a clear, historical account of how Muḥammad came to the realization of his relation to God, and his mission. Forty days he spent, in a cave near Mecca, meditating, fasting and praying. At the end of that time he came forth, with words of inspiration on his lips and a deep conviction that he had a message to deliver to his people. He confided this to his wife, a very remarkable woman, spiritual, and with executive ability which enabled her to carry on large business enterprises. She believed in him and encouraged him in his conviction that he had received a great message and must deliver it.

The story was told, in the symbolic language of that time that, while in the cave near Mecca, Muḥammad had a vision in which he saw a beautiful being descend from heaven, who commanded him to recite certain words, God's first revelation to him. This heavenly being was called Gabriel, or, the Holy Spirit, and his messages to Muḥammad founded the religion of Islám.

Muḥammad's inspired writings begin thus: "Read, in the name of your Lord, who is He that creates! He created man from the embryo. Read! Your Lord is the most generous; it is He who guides the pen. He taught the human mind all it did not know." They end with the words: "Today I have completed your religion and made it Islám (peace)." The revelations of Muḥammad, adapted to the needs of the time, descended from on high during a period of twenty-three years. They were written upon anything he could find, often the bones of sheep, and were finally collected into the Qur'án, which was the first religious text-book of the Islamic world, and the first book written in the Arabic language.

The Qur'án planted in the minds of the Arabian people the seeds of the belief in One Invisible, Eternal God, which flowered into a spiritual and moral civilization. It established among them the principle of divine reward and punishment and gave the moral teachings of justice, love, faithfulness, purity, etc. Barbaric practices were abolished and a new, spiritual consciousness was developed. This in a short time became the mighty tree of a spiritual and scientific civilization which spread its branches [XIV:8:237] from the East to the West. And the Qur'án was the prototype for thousands of ethical, mystical and spiritual books.

Of unity Muḥammad said: "O People of the Sacred Book! Come in and unite in one common centre. Believe in the One God and worship no one beside Him." He also said: "The believers of any religion, whether they be Sabaeen, Jew, Christian or Zoroastrian, if they believe in God and are doing good they should have no fear or unhappiness." Of forgiveness he said: "The believers are they who forgive in the face of calumny. If the ignorant curse them they will reply, 'Peace be unto you'."

The Arabs were submerged in a sea of idolatry, having as many gods as they could find of stars and planets in the heavens, therefore a very complicated polytheism prevailed. Muḥammad's great service to his people was his declaration of the Oneness of God, the Singleness of the Deity, Who is the Creator of even the highest beings, and far beyond the limited minds of men. The divine power in this teaching destroyed the belief in many deities—the chief cause of dispute among the Arabs. Realizing the greatness of this new truth, they naturally desired to spread it among their fellowmen. The keepers of the various temples, who represented the privileged class and the vested interests of Arabia could not permit the old ideas to be overthrown unchallenged; therefore there was much opposition to Muḥammad and his followers. Yet, Muḥammad's whole life had been so blameless and pure that the people respected and loved him and believed him to be truthful. Therefore, when he claimed to have received a revelation from God they believed him to be sincere, especially since his teachings were so clearly fitted to the needs of the times. The eloquence and poetry of his inspired words were so compelling that all the poets of Arabia took them for their model.

The Qur'án is a book of epigrams, the teachings of Muḥammad given in a poetic and epigrammatic style suited to the minds and thought of the Arabian people. Muḥammad told his disciples to travel among the Arabian tribes, teaching the singleness of God, and to work unceasingly, until all the idols were broken down, and the worship of the One God was established. During the twenty-three years that he himself taught Arabia was rent with great wars, instigated by the chiefs of the different tribes in their effort to annihilate the religion of Islám. Finally, through divine power, all the enemies of the faith were defeated, and, before Muḥammad's death the Oneness of God was well established.

In the Qur'án Muḥammad gave the history of the lives of Isaac, Jacob, Moses, the Jewish prophets, and Christ, explaining their spiritual power and their teachings. Previous to this the Arabian people had not believed in any of them, but Muḥammad, through his teachings, brought them to believe in all of the prophets of Israel and in Christ, thus rendering a great service to Arabia. Referring to the prophets of Israel, and others, Muḥammad said that God had sent for every people a guardian, who spoke their tongue. A chapter of the Qur'án is devoted to a history of Mary, the mother of Jesus. He called Christ the Word of God, and the Spirit of God. Therefore, the Muslim world today, because of the teaching of Muḥammad, believes in the prophetic station of these great spiritual teachers. The teaching of the principle of the Oneness of God united the Arabian tribes, put an end to their feuds and brought them to agree upon ideals for common progress.

Muḥammad was not only a religious teacher, he was a statesman and a king. His book contains many rules for moral and spiritual training, and also many regulations for the conduct of the practical affairs of the Islamic world. He abolished the custom of burying daughters alive and also many other vices. The [XIV:8:238] life of Arabia was transformed and the Arabs became a new people, noble and high-minded, guided by a new force and ruled by a new motive. After twenty-three years of incessant labour Muḥammad passed from this world, leaving behind him eighty thousand staunch, zealous followers and an Arabian nation, united under the banner of Islám.

Before the end of the first century after Muḥammad his religion had been carried by his apostles to Asia and to parts of Africa and Europe. Just as the Old Testament became the foundation for the Jewish civilization, so the Qur'án became the foundation for the civilization of Islám. The second century after Muḥammad was marked by great works on philosophy and science. Brilliant minds appeared, not only among the Arabs, but throughout the Islamic world. With the spread of the religion of Islám into many lands the Arabic tongue spread also and came to be regarded as a sacred language. What had been practically a dead language now became one of the most scholarly and, in the first century after Muḥammad, many text-books, dictionaries, etc., were written in Arabic.

Muḥammad taught his disciples to study the sciences. One of his epigrams is: “Study science, even if you must travel to China.” China was, in those days, a very long way off. Again he said: “A man must study, from the cradle to the grave.” This teaching filled the Arabian scholars with a longing for knowledge and in the middle of the second century a great Academy of Science was founded in the city of Baghdád, which was then the seat of the Arabian government. The Caliphs of Baghdád were patrons of science and letters and they brought from all parts of the world Jewish, Christian and Persian scholars, who formed a school of translators. From among the philosophers of Greece nineteen were chosen, whose works were translated into Arabic, and the writings of learned Hindus and Persians were also translated and taught in the Arabic universities.

In a short while Baghdád, Baṣrah, Bukhárá, Alexandria, Cairo, Morocco and Spain became celebrated centres of learning. Brilliant authors, in all departments of science appeared, and hundreds of schools and libraries arose. Observatories for astronomical research were founded, and students travelled to every part of the world in search of particular text-books, and all kinds of knowledge. The Islamic rulers sent out especially trained scholars that they might travel and bring back information, and in some libraries there were more than a hundred thousand books. Universities were established in Baghdád and Andalusia, and to their doors came many students from all over the world, especially for the study of medicine and chemistry.

From the sixth to the ninth centuries, when the Islamic world was actively studying science, expanding and spreading, Europe was submerged in the darkness of ignorance. A period of complete stagnation prevailed, all over Europe, until that country awoke from the sleep of the Dark Ages and put forth an effort to acquire knowledge. Having no scientific text-books of their own many Europeans went to the Islamic schools in Andalusia, studied Arabic for many years, and then translated into Latin such works as those of Avicenna, Rází, Ṭúsí, Averroes, Albucasis, al-Ghazzálí, Avempace, Jábir and others.¹ By this means several educational institutions were established in Europe. Andalusia and Cordova, seats of Arabic learning, became so famous that a great religious leader, who later became Pope, enrolled himself, in the year 999, as a student. Afterwards he spread through southern Europe the knowledge gained in Islamic universities. Many professors from universities in England and France became students of universities in Arabia, and Arabic words became a part of European languages.

One of the Popes of Rome, Clement XI, arranged for a party to travel to the East in order to secure scientific data.

A tablet of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

O thou servant of the Sacred Threshold!

The stability of every throne and the security of the seat of every sovereign are dependent upon the grace of God and are based upon the power of Divine assistance. All the Chiefs and Rulers of the West, Emperors and Kings, that they may establish firmly their rule and dominion over their peoples, proclaim and hold fast unto this saying of Peter, the Apostle: “In truth, all authority is of God”, that is to say every sovereignty is established and exercised in accordance with the Divine Purpose. By this means, they assure the sanctity of their throne and proclaim the sacredness of their sovereignty.

And now, consider and reflect! How often are rulers and governments praised and extolled in the Holy Writ of Bahá'u'lláh and how frequently allegiance and loyalty to Kings and Monarchs are enjoined upon every one! Ponder in your hearts and realize what the result will be in future!

Gracious God! They that are in authority are as yet unaware of this most great bounty bestowed upon them and know not what a rich blessing the Lord hath vouchsafed unto the rulers and governors of the world.

At this hour, in the uttermost parts of the earth, even in the continent of America, peoples are praying on behalf of the Chief and Ruler of Persia and praise and glorify his name. Ere long, ye shall see how the government of Bahá'u'lláh's native land will have become the most advanced country in all the regions of the world.

This indeed is supreme bounty and a warning unto every beholder!

Through pride will man be reduced to the lowest rank

Stanwood Cobb

A peculiar inspiration comes to one from perusing the word of God in a foreign language. That first vivid impression, veiled by long familiarity with the text as it exists in English, has been restored to me in all its freshness upon reading the Hidden Words in German.

One verse has especially impressed me, both from its meaning and from some of the experiences of my travels. "Wegen der sterblichen Herrschaft weniger Tage habt ihr Meine unsterbliche Herrschaft verworfen, euch selbst in rote und gelbe Gewänder gekleidet und damit geprahlt. Ich erkläre bei Meiner Schönheit, dass Ich euch alle unter das gleichgefärbte Zelt des Staubes bringen und die Farben von allen entfernen werde, nur nicht von denen, welche Meine Farbe, rein von allen andern, erwählten." "For a fleeting sovereignty of a few days have you abandoned My imperishable dominion and arrayed yourselves in mortal hues and pride yourselves therein. I declare by My beauty, that I will bring you all under the uncoloured canopy of dust and take away the colour from all, except from those who have chosen My colour, pure from all others."

Bahá'u'lláh has said that it is better to read one Hidden Word than hundreds of pages of any other literature. Therefore, let us meditate somewhat on the significance of this mighty utterance. Let us consider some of the examples of fallen glory.

In passing through Holland on our way to Germany, our train went close by Doorn, where William II languishes in exile. Our thoughts were much upon him. When we reached Berlin we found his former palace turned into a museum. I shall never forget the impression received upon traversing these corridors and rooms and gorgeous halls, so recently consecrated to the glory of the Hohenzollern House. There had been a time when every gateway and approach was sternly guarded; when at the bugle calls announcing the forth-riding of His Majesty, the sidewalk crowds and traffic of the street had drawn aside in breathless, almost religious silence to make way for the through-passing of this mortal glory. And now the common crowd invaded the erstwhile halls of imperial grandeur. Yes, penetrated even to that holy of holies, the golden throne room, access to which had been esteemed so high!

I was reminded of the so-similar fate of the tyrant ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd’s palace at Yildiz,¹ in the immediate period subsequent to his forced abdication in the Revolution of 1908. Here, too, the common crowds had penetrated, eager and curious, to see the interior of that sac- [XIV:9:260] rosanct, guarded as few palaces have ever been. As I went through it at that time I was struck by the carelessness of the guards, and the flippancy of the amused crowd thronging these secret and treasured rooms—a natural reaction against their former terror of the Sultán.

It was during the last days of ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s life was so seriously threatened. Then in a few days we saw the captive of injustice set free to make his glorious and victorious journey through Europe and America; while the former Sultán, whose rule had been for thirty years the most absolute in the world, was to languish out his life in a sad and miserable captivity.

In the museum at Leipzig we were held spellbound by Lehnbach’s portrait of Bismarck. Those wonderful eyes of the great diplomat and statesman glowed from the canvas with a cold blue flame. They were eyes before which no man could stand in opposition; eyes revealing the great mind, the invincible will, the gigantic magnetism of the man who moulded Europe to his desire. Yet that mind and will and magnetism had to yield before the determination of the imperial young master to rule alone. And not only did Bismarck’s life end in dismissal and exile from the court whose glory he had created, but we see now the utter failure and collapse of all the structure he built up by “blood and iron”. Only there remains the good that he conceived and executed—the unity of the great German people formerly divided into kingdoms and duchies and free cities at constant fratricidal war. So God uses man to forward that which is good; and that which man does of evil is quickly frustrated.

In the same gallery was a wonderful picture of that other great conqueror and superman, Napoleon. How he stormed over Europe, terrifying whole populations, making and unmaking kings, and moulding states to suit his will; yet he lived to see his conquests come to naught, a helpless prisoner on a lonely isle. In the Corcoran Gallery at Washington is a statue of him as in his dying days, looking out over life with still his great will and invincible spirit, learning perhaps certain lessons of the spirit.

In his Memories of the War Time 1806–1813, Friedrich von Mueller, Chancellor of Weimar, which we visited while passing through Germany, tells us of his interview with Napoleon, in which he sought pardon and safety for his master, Carl August, Duke of Weimar. Napoleon was very angry with the duke for having fought against him on the side of Prussia; angry, also, because the duke did not now immediately abandon allegiance to his over-lord, the King of Prussia. To secure this audience the duke’s chancellor had followed Napoleon humbly and beseechingly from Weimar to Erfurt, from Erfurt to Raumburg, from Raumburg to Wittenberg, from Wittenberg to Potsdam. At last Napoleon granted the long-sought-for interview: It is a dramatic scene, as described by Mueller. (I translate from the German.)

“Finally came the longed-for moment. I was called into the imperial cabinet, in the midst of which, in rather a defiant attitude, stood Napoleon in his green Chasseur-uniform, his hat under his arm. ... The Emperor broke out into the bitterest reproaches over the conduct of the Duke, my Master. ... ‘You see,’ he said, ‘what I did with the Duke of Braunschweig. I will drive these wolves in the employ of Italy back to those they came from. Like this hat,’ here he threw it angrily to the ground, ‘will I overthrow and humiliate them. And I have a great desire to do so with your prince.’

“By Heaven, if one has not at least a hundred thousand men and a goodly count of cannon, one had better not undertake war with me. These Prussians had as much and more, but what help was that to them? I have scattered them like spray in the wind, I have crushed them down, and they will not lift their heads again.” [XIV:9:261]

What a picture of despotic power! The great conqueror asserting his might and prowess; the faithful servant pleading for the throne of his master, who had done no ill but to fulfil his duty to the King of Prussia. After much storming, Napoleon softened and promised to keep the duke upon his throne. “But,” and here he spoke again in fiery mood, “let your duke well understand, that he owes his land and his political existence only and solely to the high respect, the deep friendship which I have for his wife, the duchess and for her worthy sister.”

Of no man is there recorded such an impression of over-mastering power as of this world conqueror. Women hung their heads and blushed as he walked past them. His bravest, roughest generals became tame and awe-inspired in his presence. For a time he held Europe in the hollow of his hand, and there seemed no deliverance.

But Goethe’s mother, writing to Weimar in this period of storm and stress from Mainz, which had fallen into the possession of Napoleon, says, “Yet God still lives, and everything can turn out better than many now believe. A single moment can change everything.”

And so it turned out. Napoleon’s power went to ruin more quickly even than it had been built up.

One more example of fallen glory comes to mind—the greatest example in history of a terrifying, conquering empire smashed suddenly to pieces! When Sennacherib, the great Assyrian king, was on his way to conquer Egypt, he stopped at a walled city of an insignificant little kingdom and called upon it to surrender. It was a city and a kingdom hardly worthy of his conquest, and worthy of his attention only because it lay in his line of march and communications, and its existence as a stronghold had become to the Assyrians a danger.

It was the general opinion that the city should be immediately surrendered. The councillors so advised, the people so clamoured, and the king was so minded. For woe to that city which resisted Assyria and then was conquered. Death, destruction, tortures unspeakable for the leading defenders—this was the policy of frightfulness that had made the word “Assyrians” a name to terrify even babes with, and had lowered the courage and resistance of those whom Assyria would conquer.

One man alone stood out against the decision to surrender. It was Isaiah, the man of God. To the thundering, earth-shaking armies of Sennacherib he had nothing to oppose but the invisible power and protection of Jehovah. He alone had no fear. By his fiery and inspired words he aroused new courage in the people, the councillors, the king. He promised them safety. He assured them of the invisible protection.

And in one night a plague coming from the marshes of Egypt so smote the Assyrian army, killing a hundred and eighty-five thousand, that “Sennacherib, king of Assyria, departed”, to use the simple and quaintly expressive language of the Bible, “and went and returned, and dwelt at Nineveh.”

The Assyrian empire vanished as magically as it had arisen. Within less than a hundred years after Sennacherib so threatened the destruction of Jerusalem, Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, fell before the combined armies of the Chaldeans and Medes and Persians. The terrible scourge of the East was at last laid low. “Its fall was forever. When two centuries later Xenophon and his ten thousand Greeks marched past the place, the Assyrian nation was but a vague tradition, and Nineveh, its great city, was a vast heap of rubbish as it is today. Even the Assyrian speech had passed away.”¹ city. This passage gives a vivid picture of the fallen greatness of Assyria, one of the most power- [XIV:9:262] ful militaristic empires known to history, which for all its superb war-strength ended in dust.

From these noteworthy examples which history offers, and from many other examples of near and far times, one may see how prone to fall is mortal glory. Over-weening pride is destined to destruction. However great man's will, he cannot battle against God.

So profoundly were the ancient Greeks impressed with this vulnerability of earthly princes, that they dreaded a too great success; dreaded, above all, the pride that is wont to come with success. For they feared the jealousy of the gods, and believed the only safeguard lay in propitiatory sacrifices. We know today that the only sacrifices God wants from men of success and high position are gratitude, humility, and service; and that the only safety in such altitudes is guidance.

If we reflect we can very easily see why unlimited power of will cannot be granted to mortals. What would become of the universe if men of such gigantic wills as Bismarck or Napoleon should go on attaining more and more of power, here and in the next existence?

Would not the whole universe become an anarchy, a war between demonic wills? We have seen what havoc such conflicts make of the fair earth we live upon. Shall the heavens themselves become but the theatre of war? For selfish, egoistic wills can never attain to unity and harmony among themselves. Each seeks to predominate, but no one is powerful enough to eternally hold rule.

Our very conception of the universe is against this. The word, itself, by derivation, means unity, organization, a revolving of solar systems according to one plan. And whose will shall prevail throughout the universe, save His?

But God's will is not, like man's will, a domination, but a will of love and guidance. It does not seek to crush, but to perfect. What a wonderful example of this was afforded us in the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He did not give commands. He offered opportunities for service. Never did one feel His will infringing upon one's personal freedom. It was offered us only as a guidance, as a gift of love. If we did not accept, it was our loss, and his grief.

Nor did he ever seek to dazzle strangers by the greatness of his station, by any manifestation of His power. Those who had capacity to see, were permitted at times to see him as power. But his power was gently and mercifully veiled from others.

So God works. He could in a moment convince all men of His supremacy. But he chooses not to do so. They must convince themselves. They must discover Him. If they do not choose to do so, they are permitted to conceive of and worship themselves as power, until the time comes for a striking lesson.

Even then God works not in anger, but as the Great Educator, leading us on by rewards and punishments to a knowledge of His Truths. Those who employ their abilities to the utmost are given power. That is their reward. But if they do not ascribe that power to God, they are eventually humiliated. That is their punishment.

Every human will must be turned to God, and revolve about His will. I am so convinced of this, not only from the teachings of God's word, and from the deductions of reason, but also from observations based on life and from history, that wherever I see a human will set itself up to rule and reign in a pride that is forgetful of God, I know a crash is imminent. It is true of individuals, it is true of nations, it is true of our whole planet.

In this day and generation, although we are unaware of it, we are all living perilously near this eminence of pride. The whole Occident has become so confident of its powers over nature through [XIV:9:263] scientific knowledge, so puffed with pride over its achievements, that it has forgotten God. I hesitate to think of the lessons that may be in store for our planet.

If we, as Bahá'ís, cannot turn other men to the consciousness of God, we can at least increase that consciousness in ourselves, until we realize God as “the One Power which animates and dominates all things.”

It is not without reason that Bahá'u'lláh has given us the daily prayer: “I testify that Thou hast made us to know Thee and to adore Thee. I testify that at this moment I am powerless and Thou art powerful, I am weak and Thou art mighty, I am poor and Thou art rich.” If we can say that and feel that daily, we are safe under the shadow of His protection. Otherwise we are in danger of vanity and egoistic pride; for there is no temptation to which man, even spiritual man, is more subject than that of ascribing power and glory to himself instead of to God.

Not only our own safety, but the safety of the Bahá'í Cause, lies in this humility and evanescence. For where there is self-will and pride, there is emulation, envy, recrimination, disharmony, and eventually a loss of all spiritual power from the individual and from the group.

There is only one road to advancement in the Kingdom. “Verily man is uplifted to the heaven of glory and power through Meekness; again, through Pride, is he degraded to the lowest station.”

The spiritual physician

Tablet to Mr Charles Greenleaf

O thou who art attracted to God, may God uphold thee!

I implore God, the Ever-Living, the Everlasting, to assist thee to spread the spirit of life under all circumstances and conditions, to cheer thy breast by the eternal secret and the hidden mystery, as mentioned in the Bible, the Gospel and Psalms, that thou mayest arise to spread the Most Great Glad Tidings in those regions, to express thyself with an effective power which penetrates into the realities of all things, that thy face may brilliantly shine among the beloved, that the utterances falling from thy tongue in the great public meetings may be like the flowing and running waters, and that the Holy Spirit may confirm thee in the most great assemblies—if thy face be sincerely turned to God, thy heart pure, and thou sacrificest to thy Lord thy spirit, thy personality, thy soul and thy heart, so that nothing is left of thee, neither thought, mention, voice, or even a whisper, save the word Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá! Set aside all desires, leave worldly matters, devote thyself to God, be filled with the Spirit, guide the people to safety and bring to them the holy fragrances which emanate from the Kingdom of Abhá.

By the life of Bahá, he who is filled with the love of Bahá, and forgets all things, the Holy Spirit will be heard from his lips and the Spirit of Life will fill his heart, the Lights of the Sign will shine forth from his face, words will issue from his mouth in strands of pearls, and all sickness and disease will be healed by the laying on of the hands.

Bahá is upon thee!

The shrine of the Master

From diary notes of Charles Mason Remey upon his visit to Haifa in March 1922.

Early in the morning following my arrival in Haifa I went up the mountain alone to visit the Holy Tomb of the Master and that of the Báb. I found Mírzá ‘Abbás Qulí within the shrine placing handfuls of freshly cut flowers upon the thresholds of the inner chambers.

The arrangement of the three back chambers of the Tomb, which constitute the tomb proper of the Báb, are the same as formerly, but the three front chambers facing the north, instead of being used for various purposes, as formerly, now form the tomb of the Master.

Curtis Kelsey, who went to Haifa from America in order to install electric light plants at the Holy Tombs and in the Bahá’í Colony, has made an artistic arrangement in his wiring of the Tombs upon Mount Carmel and one quite in harmony with the style and character of the buildings. The black iron lamps hang as formerly, suspended from the high, vaulted ceiling, but he has reversed the shades, thus giving the effect of an indirect lighting system. The Venetian iron candelabra, in the inner shrine of the Báb, which the Master permitted me to make and place there some [XIV:9:266] years ago, is still hanging as before, with its nine tall candles, save that in the central sanctuary lamp, where formerly there hung a glass oil container with a floating wick, there is now an electric bulb. A very powerful electric light is placed on the exterior of the tomb, directly above the main doorway to the north. This is lighted every evening and it forms a focal point on the mountainside and is visible for many miles out at sea.

Several times, in the night, after the household had quieted, Luṭfu’lláh Ḥakím and I climbed up the mountain to the Tomb of the Master, for a few moments of prayer before the door of the Shrine which at that late hour was invariably locked though lights from within might have led one to imagine the building to be open. As is customary in the Orient, burial shrines of importance are kept illumined by night. The Bahá’í sacred Shrines are never left in darkness.

I wish that I might adequately describe the spiritual experience of those nocturnal pilgrimages. The beauty of the spot is beyond description in words. In the clear, scintillating moonlight of the Orient the eye can see for many miles. From this Holy Tomb, Mount Hermon, with its cap of snow, seventy or eighty miles distant, was distinctly visible in the clear moonlight. About the Tomb are fragrant trees, shrubs and flowers. On still nights, when there was little wind, the air would often be heavy with the fragrance of orange blossoms as we knelt on the doorsill pouring out our hearts in prayer and supplication. ...

One evening during the visit, Shoghi Effendi brought with him to the Pilgrim House the original text of the blessed Testament of the Master. We stood about the table as he reverently laid the package thereon, carefully unfolding the envelope from a silk handkerchief in which it was wrapped. As he took the three Tablets from the cover we saw that each was in the handwriting of the Master—written, as Shoghi Effendi called our attention to witness—without hesitation or correction and signed by the Master in several places. We stood with bated breath in the presence of this document of documents in which is contained the wondrous plan for the spiritual organization of the Cause of God and our guidance for a thousand or thousands of years.

The substance of the Testament was, of course, most unexpected. No one could have anticipated its wonderful ordinances. But as one studies it and imbibes its thought he sees at once that no other plan could have been made for guarding and preserving the Cause save the one which the Master has given in his Will. Never have I read anything which gave me the joy and the inspiration that this holy document produced in my heart. It filled my heart with the assurance that the Cause was safely guarded. It gives us a fixed direction toward which to turn and a permanent centre about which we all are to revolve so long as we are in this world.

Apostles of the Master

Two letters from Munírih Khánum, the wife of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

May my soul be a sacrifice to the steadfast in the Cause of God!

The first glad tidings, the first happiness and joy is the return of the Distinguished Branch to the Holy Land and the Holy Shrines. This has gladdened the hearts of all the Bahá’ís.

The second, O spiritual sisters, and handmaids of the Merciful, is that, praise be to God! after the setting of the Light of the—World and the ascent of the Beloved of the World continuous glad tidings and good news have come to the Holy Shrines of the faithfulness of the friends in holding meetings for teaching, in serving the world of humanity, with unity, love, charity and kindness to the people of Bahá. This brightens the tearstained eyes and heals the broken, wounded hearts. In truth it should be [XIV:9:267] so. For in the Blessed Will most of the exhortations are to this effect: “Do not seek repose for a moment. Do not rest for an instant. Go forth to all parts of the world. Be dispersed into every village and town. Be not satisfied until you have given the Message in all the regions of the world.” We must look to the disciples of His Holiness Christ and see what they did after the crucifixion of their Lord. Mary Magdalene was only a woman from Magdala,¹ yet her star shines in the heaven of Christianity. And Her Holiness the Pure, Qurratu’l-‘Ayn, may my soul be a sacrifice to her! although the days of her sacrifice were not very many, yet she became a brilliant star in the heaven of the Cause of God. Among the friends all over the world her name has become a symbol of sacrifice.

In former days there were many steadfast men who sacrificed their pure lives on the field of martyrdom. But such deeds were unheard-of among women. Now, praise be to God! His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá has elevated the station of woman and has proclaimed that in this cycle man and woman are like the two wings of the bird. Neither is superior to the other. Girls must be educated as well if not better than boys. And His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh has said that in this age there will appear women who will be the glory of men. There is no doubt that the promises of the Prophets of God will be fulfilled. And in a short while everything that Bahá’u’lláh said will come to pass.

As Jináb-i-Ávárih has told us, at the present time in Ṭihrán about fifty women, with hearts aflame, and brilliant, prepared to lecture and give explanations, are equipped for all kinds of service. This news has indeed gladdened our hearts. He has named the dear sisters and has asked that this one should write and let them know that this bereft mortal has made mention of them in the Holy Shrines.

O beloved sisters! praise be to God, that the field of service is vast and the hungry souls are many. The seekers and the thirsty ones are waiting, and these women are ready! But alas, that some of the people of Persia are bloodthirsty and unjust! ...

It is reported that two handmaids of the Merciful, one the daughter of the deceased Vazír-i-Mukarram of Işfahán and the other the granddaughter of Núr-i-Nayyirin, also of Işfahán, have started out to spread the Cause in their surrounding country. This news has made us very happy. The description of the meetings in Qazvín, and in the different cities of America also gave us great happiness. It indeed indicates that the hope, the wish of all the friends is the spreading of the Cause of God. We beseech the True One that He will keep them under His protection, and we hope that they may attain to that service which is worthy of His Threshold.

Alas, that now the Light of God has hidden itself and the peerless face has disappeared from among us and the sun of knowledge and forgiveness has set and the cause of joy and the foundation of happiness has chosen absence! ... We hope that in this year the blessings of God and His heavenly bestowals will decree for the Bahá'ís results which will exceed all expectations. We seek mercy for His servants.

The maidservant to the threshold of God,

(Signed) Munírih.

The glorious work of education

To the Friends of God. To them be Glory!

It is plain and evident to everyone that the foundation of all life is education. Were it not for the gift of education no one would have been created, nor would there be any (human) life. In this great cycle and chosen century the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) may my life be a sacrifice to him! has made education important above all other [XIV:9:268] questions, giving it the highest place among God's blessings. In many instances, in different places, in the holy Tablets and the divine Verses he has written and commanded every man and woman, every king, and every well-wisher of the nations to carry on this work, which is the highest and most honourable of all services before God.

In the day of His Holiness 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the question of education has again been given first place. He has praised the promoters of this great work, for education has become a great necessity. He has declared and explained God's displeasure with those who heed not this great command. The writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá are full of this subject. He especially advises the training of girls and women—of the girls of today who are the mothers of tomorrow. It is manifest that the first tutor of the child is the mother. If the mother is not endowed with heavenly morals and is not possessed of merciful qualities, and knowledge, she is indeed not fit for her work as educator. And if she is not prepared to undertake the education of the children this is a sin. It is clear, therefore, that the education of girls is most important.

Therefore, every merciful friend and handmaid of God, in every city and town, should do as much as possible to obey this great command, even if in their respective cities this work is already established.

Because this servant from early childhood has hoped for some means for the education of Bahá'í girls, I one day when in the presence of the Master, besought him that, if it were his wish, we might find here a small school for Bahá'í children, where they could, from the beginning, acquire Bahá'í morals, and learn the history of the Cause. Pointing toward Mount Carmel, he said: "This long mountain will be covered with schools, hospitals and Pilgrim Houses. All that has been foretold will come to pass." I said that I had in mind the little piece of land which Hájí Mírzá Hasan had given. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied:

"There is a piece of land opposite the Holy Shrine. 'Abbás Qulí, the owner, at the Feast of Ridván offered it as a gift, and it was accepted. We must purchase all the adjoining land. That is a good location for a school. It has beautiful scenery and pure air, and is near the Holy Shrines."

At that time the faithful leaf, Miss Sanderson, was at Haifa. She asked permission to share in this work. 'Abdu'l-Bahá granted this request. And the revered Mr Remey drew the plan for the school and presented it for the approval of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

We now have a large piece of land, and the fifteen hundred pounds which belonged to this one have been given to this work. About a thousand pounds have come, from all parts of the world. But the success of this undertaking depends entirely upon the assistance of the faithful friends. We hope that in the day of the Distinguished Branch, with the help of the Holy Leaves and through the exertions of the beloved brothers and sisters, this work will be accomplished.

But this work must be carried out in accordance with the plans and arrangements of Shoghi Effendi, which are, that anyone who wishes to send a contribution to the school will do so in the name of the Holy Leaves, the daughters of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. And the receipt, signed by these four, Dīyá'íyyih Khánum, Rúhá Khánum, Túbá Khánum and Munavvar Khánum, will be forwarded to the donor. The money contributed will be placed in the Bank of Haifa in the name of the aforementioned ladies until a sufficient sum has been collected.

Every great undertaking has had a small beginning; therefore, we must now also be satisfied with a small beginning.

(Signed) Munírih.

Heralds of the new day

Adapted from addresses given in London by Jináb-i-Ávárih, whose great history of the Bahá'í Cause is now being published in Persian in Cairo, Egypt.

Qurratu'l-'Ayn

When Qurratu'l-'Ayn was a child there was in Persia a very celebrated Mullá Shaykh Aḥmad Aḥsá'í. So great a scholar was he that throughout all the Muslim world he had no peer. Shaykh Aḥmad Aḥsá'í was the first divine to attack certain established beliefs prevalent among the Muslims, one of which was that Muḥammad in his living, physical body departed from this earth and ascended into heaven, a belief similar to that held by many Christians with regard to the Christ. There were other Muslims who in their heart disbelieved this teaching, but Shaykh Aḥmad was the first who had the courage to publicly declare against it.

Another Muslim doctrine was that of the resurrection of the body. Shaykh Aḥmad taught his students that the physical body cannot go to heaven, that it will not rise but will disintegrate; while the spirit will be taken up and will dwell in the presence of God. He explained that it was the spirit of Muḥammad, not his body, which ascended.

Again, the Shaykh taught that God always sends teachers to His people, to lead them to His Kingdom, and that this divine bounty had not ceased.

The Muslims believed that there was one—who had been hidden for a thousand years—who would appear suddenly, a great teacher. Shaykh Aḥmad said that the Promised One would not come that way; he would be manifest shortly but would be born in the natural way. This teaching of the Shaykh was of utmost importance to the Muslims, because for a thousand years they had been looking for this person who they believed had been in hiding for that period. And now the Shaykh said he would be born, and would appear very shortly.

Although strictly forbidden by the mullás, these teachings found many adherents, until thousands of people became followers of Shaykh Aḥmad. They were popularly known as "Shaykhí", and by many of the mullás were called atheists.

At last the teachings of Shaykh Aḥmad were carried to Qazvín, the home of Qurratu'l-'Ayn and her relatives. Her father and her eldest uncle, both of whom were mullás, opposed the Shaykh. But her two younger uncles believed him and secretly became his followers. Qurratu'l-'Ayn's father and uncle had many discussions about the Shaykh, calling him, in private, "Káfir", which means, "Turned away from God and not of the Muslim religion". Qurratu'l-'Ayn, then between thirteen and fourteen years of age, listened to these conversations and said, "The Shaykh is right and my father and uncle are wrong." She secured the books and writings of the Shaykh and read them constantly. Whereupon her father and uncle said to her, "Read our books. Read our writings. We know better than he."

Shaykh Aḥmad Aḥsá'í went from Karbilá to Khurásán and thence to Tíhrán where he met

Sháh Fath-‘Alí who so honoured him that he offered to share with him his throne. But the Shaykh refused, and left for Karbilá, on his journey passing through Qazvín.

After the death of Shaykh Aḥmad Aḥsá‘í, his disciple Siyyid Kázim, carried forward his teachings, constantly telling his disciples and students that soon, within a few years, the Promised One would appear. Through the assistance of her younger uncle, who believed in Shaykh Aḥmad and Siyyid Kázim, Qurratu’l-‘Ayn and able to correspond with Siyyid Kázim and secure his writings. She [XIV:9:270] watched eagerly for the Promised One, and often told her younger uncle that unless the new order appeared and the Muslim religion was changed the condition of women in the East would become much worse. She would say, “Will a day come when new laws and revelations will be revealed, and shall I be one of the first to follow those teachings and give my life for my sisters?”

Her longing for the coming of the great Teacher and the new era became so strong that at last she besought her uncle, her father and her husband for permission to make a pilgrimage to Karbilá. She knew that there she would be able to meet Siyyid Kázim. Through the efforts of her younger uncle this permission was at last granted and she set out upon her wonderful journey, accompanied by this uncle. What were her sorrow and disappointment to hear, three days before her arrival in Karbilá, the news of the death of Siyyid Kázim! However, she soon remembered that the Siyyid had left glad tidings of the One to come, and who would come quickly, and her heart was again filled with happiness. She journeyed on to Karbilá and there visited the family of the Siyyid, who gave her access to many of the Siyyid’s unpublished writings, some of which were not even finished. As she read she exclaimed, “Behold, how much the Shaykh and the Siyyid have left us. They have left us a sea of writings.”

There was no one to take the place of Siyyid Kázim and teach his students. So Qurratu’l-‘Ayn came forward and announced that she would take this place, would teach his followers just what the Siyyid had taught and impart to them his knowledge.

This caused much discussion among the Siyyid’s followers. Then thirty-two of the students said, “We will go and hear her once or twice. If we are satisfied we will advise the others to come, and she will teach them.”

It was extremely dangerous and difficult for Qurratu’l-‘Ayn to teach men and for them to come to hear her for in those clays—and even at the present time in many places—women were kept veiled and in utmost seclusion. But Qurratu’l-‘Ayn overcame all difficulties, had a curtain arranged in the room, and behind this sat and taught those thirty-two students who came to hear her. They soon recognized her as the one who could best teach them and saw that she was greater than all the divines in Karbilá. For more than a year she taught these students, and all the time she wept and prayed that when the Promised One came she might recognize him. And she urged the people to watch for him and obey Him who was shortly to come into the world.

When Mullá Ḥusayn-i-Buṣhrúyihí visited the Báb, and became convinced that he was the Promised One, he told the news to Mullá ‘Alí-i-Baṣṭámí, who likewise became a follower of the Báb, the second disciple. Mullá ‘Alí-i-Baṣṭámí then went to Karbilá, and there announced the great tidings that the New Light had arisen. When Qurratu’l-‘Ayn heard this news she summoned him to her presence and asked, “What proofs have you, and where is he?” Mullá ‘Alí gave her some of the writings and prayers of the Báb. She took them, and straightway became a believer. The following day when her pupils came for their lesson she announced the glad tidings that the long-expected time was at hand, saying, “All the promises given by the Shaykh and the Siyyid have come to pass. The Promised One is on earth today!”

And a little child shall lead them

An incident from the early life of the Báb

We now wish to know if Qurratu'l-'Ayn had seen or met or had had any direct communication with the Báb previous to his public appearance and, if not, how she became acquainted with him.

She had heard that there was a young man in Shíráz, twenty–five years of age, [XIV:9:271] who from childhood had lived a perfect life and shown wonderful signs of wisdom and inspiration. But she had never seen him or had access to his writings, and she did not know that the one of whom Shaykh Aḥmad and Siyyid Kázim spoke was this same youth. All that she knew concerning the Báb had been told her by Ḥájí Siyyid Javád, one of the greatest mullás¹ (divines) in Karbilá.

When Ḥájí Siyyid Javád went to Shíráz the Báb, at that time called Siyyid 'Alí Muḥammad, was between seven and eight years of age. Ḥájí Siyyid Javád states:

One night I was invited to the house of the uncle of this little boy, and I perceived some beautiful traits in the little child's character which aroused my interest. This uncle, Ḥájí Siyyid 'Alí, had charge of the little child, as his father had died. I spent the night in the house of Ḥájí Siyyid 'Alí and, in the early morning I heard a tiny, sweet little voice in the next room, which I found to be a prayer room. It was a little child's voice in prayer—such prayers, such a voice, such devotion that I became absolutely enraptured and I, who was a great divine and was known to be very learned became quite humble upon hearing those beautiful words, so that I wanted to open the door and go out and see who that little child was. I waited patiently until dawn, when Ḥájí Siyyid 'Alí came and met me. And then that little child came, and I saw that he was the little child between seven and eight years of age—and he it was who had been chanting in the prayer room. As soon as I gazed upon the child I saw such illumination, and on his face an expression so beautiful, that I felt I could not find throughout the whole human race one like him. Before I could ask Ḥájí Siyyid 'Alí who he was, Ḥájí Siyyid 'Alí said, "This is my sister's child."

When we were having breakfast I asked a few simple questions of the little boy, and he answered me in a deep and grave way, such as one would expect from a very learned person. The child then said, "I am going to school," and left.

I asked where that child went to school and the uncle answered, "He goes to Shaykh 'Ábid to school."

I was so much drawn to the child that I could not stay where I was but got up and followed him to the house of Shaykh 'Ábid.

Shaykh 'Ábid, who was a teacher for the young, was surprised to see me, so great a scholar, so well-known and so famous that the Governor came out and welcomed me into the town, coming to his house unheralded. I at once understood the wonderment in the face of the Shaykh and said to him:

"I have not come to see you. I followed this little child," pointing to him. Then I asked the Shaykh:

"What do you think of this boy?"

As soon as I said this the Shaykh showed great emotion, saying:

"What are you asking me? This child seems to me to be ready to proclaim, to give out a message to the world. What can I say about this child!"

He said, further: "You see that this child comes to my school as a pupil, but in reality he is my teacher and I am his pupil. During class time he says so many wonderful things and goes into so many deep and important questions that I have never heard anything like it in all my life. When the children go out to play one sees him sitting there, reading most important writings. If the children come and insist that he go and play with them he goes and engages them in a way which they do not understand; then he slips away and returns to his work.”

The admiration of this Shaykh for the child so increased my own admiration and wonder that I returned to the house of Ḥájí Siyyid ‘Alí and told him what Shaykh ‘Ábid had said to me. The uncle answered: “I hear so much about this boy. Yet, if I told anything people would [XIV:9:272] only say, ‘he likes to speak well of his nephew.’

Ḥájí Siyyid Javád urged the uncle to tell him more about the little boy. So at last the uncle consented and told him of a wonderful dream which the child had had, when five years old. He dreamed that a pair of scales hung down from heaven. In one side of the scales was one of the prophets; in the other side, which was empty, this little child was placed by an invisible hand. Then this side weighed down the other, and the prophet seemed to be going up and the little boy coming down.

“Then, again,” the uncle said, “we went one day to a public bath. The child slept when there. Suddenly he awoke and said, ‘I dreamed that the roof of the bath next door fell down and killed seven ladies.’ We were surprised, but when we came out of the bath we discovered that this had actually happened.”

If we were to recount in detail the proofs of the truth of the Báb it would take a long time. Suffice it to say that after the Báb proclaimed his mission this uncle and this teacher believed in him, and the uncle was, finally, martyred in his footsteps.

This, indeed, is proof!

All these wonderful incidents about the Báb were related to Qurratu’l-‘Ayn by Ḥájí Siyyid Javád, and thus she came to know him.

When eighteen years old the Báb made a pilgrimage to Karbilá, where he met Ḥájí Siyyid Kázim of Rasht who also recognized signs of the greatness and illumination in this youth. These things and what she had read in the books of old made Qurratu’l-‘Ayn confident that the light was to come from Shíráz. Therefore when she heard that the youth, Siyyid ‘Alí Muḥammad, in Shíráz, had proclaimed his mission she instantly believed in him, and when she read some of his writings these confirmed still more deeply her belief.

When she heard this news and became a follower of the Báb her whole attitude, condition and point of view were completely changed. She now spoke with such power and insight that those who had seen and heard her before were astonished, and exclaimed, “This is not the woman we knew before!” She was so aflame that at any gathering of men or women where she spoke she won the entire attention and the very heart and soul of the audience.¹

What is new in the Bahá’í teachings?

Some of the new teachings of Bahá’u’lláh, specialized for the needs of this radiant century, are the independent investigation of truth, the oneness of mankind, universal peace, a universal court of arbitral justice, equality of men and women, universal education, the unity of science and religion, the underlying oneness of all existing faiths, that work done in the spirit of service is worship, etc.² ‘Abdu’l-Bahá outlines some of these teachings in the brilliant

² These new teachings are enumerated in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s addresses in Divine Philosophy, p. 51 (1st edition); in the Star of the West, VIII:2 p. 31.

Tablet¹ quoted on the inside cover of this magazine, when he likens these principles to the rays of the sun. “The spreading of these rays,” he says, “will deliver the world of humanity from the darkness of ignorance and strangeness and lead it to the centre of all these rays.” That centre is the Sun of Reality from which they have all proceeded. That Sun of Truth has been reflected in dazzling, penetrating power in the mirror of the heart and mind of the great Manifestation of our age, Bahá’u’lláh. The divine Manifestation in every age is the centre of [XIV:9:273] the power which can put the ideals of the age into practice. He transmits the Holy Spirit which creates men anew so that they can live and spread God’s teachings. Whenever he appears on earth he is always the gloriously new element in the solution of the world’s problems. And strangely enough, the thinkers of the age often do not reckon with this method by which God solves their problems. “The greatest divine bounty,” says ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, “is the appearance of the Manifestation of God. How can we ever limit and circumscribe this bestowal! In reality it is the greatest of spiritual gifts.” “Although the stars are scintillating and brilliant, the sun is superior to them in luminous effulgence. Similarly, these holy, divine Manifestations are and must always be distinguished above all other beings in every attribute of glory and perfection in order that it may be proven that the Manifestation is the true Teacher and real Trainer; that He is the Sun of Truth, ... Otherwise, it is not possible for us to train one human individual and then after training him, believe in him and accept him as the holy Manifestation of Divinity. The real Manifestation of God must be endowed with divine knowledge and not dependent upon learning acquired in schools. He must be the Educator, not the educated; ...”²

“A young boy educated in Oxford will not become the universal educator of mankind. One who is in need of the knowledge of the professors of a university will not become the Manifestation of God. Christ was not taught by any man, yet he was a universal educator. Bahá’u’lláh did not study, but his knowledge was immeasurable. He became the instructor of the world of humanity. Even his enemies testify to this fact.”³

“In a word, the holy, divine Manifestation of God must be distinguished above all others of mankind in every aspect and qualification in order that He may be able to train effectively the human body politic, eliminate the darkness enshrouding the human world, uplift humanity from a lower to a higher kingdom, be able through the penetrative power of His Word to promote and spread broadcast the beneficent message of universal peace among men, bring about the unification of mankind in religious belief through a manifest divine power, harmonize all sects and denominations and convert all native lands and nationalities into one native land and fatherland.”⁴

“The virtues and perfections of the world of humanity are infinite, but degrees exist. The outward form may change, but the inherent qualities persist. The lower degree cannot attain to the higher degree. For example, however much the mineral may advance its progress is limited to the mineral world. It is possible for the black carbon to become the brilliant diamond, but it cannot attain to the vegetable kingdom nor obtain the virtue of growth. Likewise, however much the tree may advance it can never reach to the degree of the animal nor is it able to acquire the power of hearing and sight. Its phases of progress are circumscribed, within the circle of the vegetable kingdom. Where formerly it was fruitless, it has now become fruitful. Or, where formerly it produced small and bitter fruit it now yields large and perfect fruit.

“Consequently, however much the creatures may make progress they will not be able to attain to the station of the Holy Manifestations. Although Peter and Paul made infinite progress, yet they did not reach to the station of His Holiness Christ. He was the essence of essences, and they belonged to the world of change and mutation.”¹ “Yea, all are from God—but one man is so exalted that others bow down before him and he is adored by them, like Christ, and Moses who called people to the oneness of divinity and who became the cause of the education of a [XIV:9:274] nation—while another is so degraded that he adores clay, and worships insects and serpents. Are these two one and the same? No, certainly not! Nay, divine Manifestations are a separate creation.

“All are equal in birth, but look how much they differ in intelligence. One is the wisest of the wisest and a founder of the laws of happiness and prosperity; while the other is the most ignorant of the ignorant, and a destroyer of the edifice of peace and honour.

“This shows that Prophets have a station of their own. Many crossed the desert sands of Sinai but it was Moses who heard the voice of God, because divine Manifestations have a spiritual power peculiar to themselves. Mighty nations swayed the world at the time of the appearance of divine Manifestations, but they were all degraded and obliterated. But behold! what a banner did Christ, a single person, having no helper or assistant, unfurl!

“All are from God, but all have different stations. Both man and animals are from God—but what a difference is there between them !”²

Question: “Did Jesus first realize his mission when the Spirit descended upon him in the form of a dove?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “The Holy Spirit was always with Christ.”

Question: “Did he know of it?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “It was hidden from others, but manifest to him. The story about the dove is simply a metaphor. No dove came down. Amongst the people, John the Baptist felt that the Holy Spirit was in Christ. The Holy Spirit was always with Christ. He knew about his mission from early childhood.”

Question: “Did the Báb, Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá also know of their mission from early childhood?”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: “Yes.”

Question: “In a book I read that at the age of twenty-four the Báb realized his mission.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá : “From childhood it was apparent to him, like the sun. The people felt his greatness although they did not know about his future.”³

Thus, whenever “the ever widening circle of man’s knowledge meets the spiritual world the Manifestation of God is sent to mirror forth His splendour.” The enumeration of the universal principles gives only a few of the rays of the world-illuminating sun.⁴ No one can know all the revelation until he has fully known and reflected in his life and deeds the centre and source of it all, God’s new Manifestation.

“The source of all learning is the knowledge of God, exalted is His Glory! and this cannot be attained save through the knowledge of His Divine Manifestations.”

The life of Bahá'u'lláh

Jináb-i-Fáḍil

Part I

The province of Mázindarán, in northern Persia, has played a most distinguished part in the history of that country. Reaching to the Caspian Sea, it is covered, in its northern portion, by a great forest of primeval trees where many nightingales sing their sweetest melodies, and thousands of varieties of fragrant flowers bloom in profusion. In the south are high mountains, upon whose peaks the snow never melts. This mountainous district, now the summer resort of the citizens of Ṭíhrán, was in ancient times a place of retirement for the “herbod”,¹ the mystics and holy people. Here they went for meditation and prayer.

There are many legends regarding the province. It was said that here there would grow a celestial tree, with branches reaching to heaven. The fruit of this tree would be for the life of the nations. Many people travelled to this region hoping to find the wonderful tree. Another legend was that the king of war and hatred had been imprisoned in one of these high mountains. These stories were, of course, parables, describing in symbolic language the coming of the Universal Manifestation of God, whose teachings would encompass the earth and bring peace to all mankind.

In Núr, one of the districts of Mázindarán, dwelt the ancestors of Bahá'u'lláh. A manuscript has been found, giving his genealogy which goes back more than 1,300 years, to the kings of ancient Persia. These ancestors were people of illumined mind, of great wealth and distinction. So pre-eminent were they among the people that they were regarded as a superior order of beings. They possessed immense estates and many cattle, and built for themselves a great palace on the side of the mountain where the magnificent view took in valley and river. In this palace they entertained in princely fashion their summer guests.

Bahá'u'lláh's father was Prime Minister to the Sháh. He was looked upon by his contemporaries as a genius; his beautiful handwriting is to this day used as a model in calligraphy and the samples of it which still remain are highly prized by connoisseurs. He also had bitter enemies, due to his fearless speaking of the truth, and his high position. During the winter he lived in his palace in Ṭíhrán. But in the summer he retired to his country estate at Núr.

In 1817, in the palace in Ṭíhrán, Bahá'u'lláh was born. Although there were other children in the family, the parents had a unique love for this little boy, feeling even in his infancy the radiance of his remarkable power. Over the entrance to his house Bahá'u'lláh's father inscribed a verse which shows an intuition of his son's future. This inscription may still be read: [XIV:10:292]

“When thou enterest the sacred abode of the Beloved “Say, ‘I am at Thy command’.

“This is the home of Love. Enter with reverence.

“This is holy ground. Remove thy shoes when thou enterest here.”

Bahá'u'lláh, when a child, had a dream in which he saw himself in a vast desert and around his head was flying every species of bird. Passing over the desert he came to the ocean. He swam in the ocean and all the fishes came to him and swam around his head. He related this dream to his father who told it to a celebrated Interpreter of dreams. This Interpreter said that the birds and fishes meant the thinkers of the world and that this boy would after a while become so great that all the thoughtful ones of the earth would follow him.

The perfection of character and the radiant spirit of the little child drew to him not only his father and mother, but prominent persons began to prophesy concerning his future. He was so beloved by the people that his father's enemies, even, withheld their attacks, because of this little boy.

When he reached maturity it was supposed that he would, because of his father's high position, enter the government service. But Bahá'u'lláh's purposes were of a different nature.

A very prominent theologian of Persia, a distant relative of Bahá'u'lláh, had a dream. He found himself in a deep valley, beside a beautiful palace. He wished to enter the palace but was told by the people that he must not do so for "The Promised One was within in conference, alone, with Bahá'u'lláh."

The theologian related this dream to many people, and all wondered concerning the spiritual station of Bahá'u'lláh. The theologian said, "Perhaps he has so high a station because he is my relative."

Some thoughtful people replied, "But you, yourself, did not have permission to enter."

This theologian had about a thousand students who met with him in class in order to discuss difficult problems of theology. One day, when their discussion was at its height, Bahá'u'lláh entered the room. After listening for a while he began to speak, and for nearly an hour they listened, wonder-struck, to the torrent of explanation which poured from his lips. The students were astounded, and the teacher marvelled, saying, "We have all studied the books—but here is one who without having studied imparts to us something greater than we have ever heard."

Bahá'u'lláh was by this time regarded by many as a superman, and everyone in the province felt that they must follow his counsel. Then, in 1838, his father died, leaving a vast estate of lands and cattle. Even before his father's death Bahá'u'lláh gave large sums of money to aid the poor.

When Bahá'u'lláh was twenty-seven years old, and living in his home in Ṭīhrán, the Báb declared himself. The people came to Bahá'u'lláh regarding the matter, and he told them, "What the Báb says is true." He also advised his family to study the Báb's writings.

We have no evidence that the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh ever met, yet we know that their spiritual communication was continual. There is a story, which is probably true, that when the Báb was under guard, on the outskirts of Ṭīhrán, Bahá'u'lláh visited him, and the people observed how, contrary to his usual custom, the Báb paid extraordinary honour to Bahá'u'lláh, thus showing his recognition of his great spiritual station.

In the early morning of the Cause, when Bahá'u'lláh's own station was as yet unknown, he powerfully assisted the movement, with utmost effort and sacrifice, comforting the persecuted followers of the Báb and giving large sums of money to assist the spreading of the new teachings. With irresistible logic and perfect wisdom he taught the new principles. He had never in his life been to school, yet he wrote with a style of [XIV:10:293] transcendent beauty, and spoke as one inspired. To the listening people his words seemed like the waves of a vast tumultuous ocean.

The wonderful abilities of Bahá'u'lláh, however, aroused the opposition of bitter enemies who made every effort to halt the spread of the movement. In 1847 he was imprisoned for a number of days because of his efforts in behalf of some prominent followers of the Báb who had been arrested. Shortly after his release a great conference of the believers of the Báb was held at Badasht. There, many distinguished disciples came together to discuss ways and means for spreading the Cause. During this time they lived in tents which they pitched on the plain outside the town. Bahá'u'lláh attended this conference and through his great wisdom unity of thought was achieved among all the different minds. It was into the midst of this imposing conference that Qurratu'l-'Ayn appeared with face unveiled, and declared that a New Day had dawned, the day of the emancipation of women, of the resurrection of souls, when men and women would rise from the graves of ignorance and limited beliefs and would see the Sun of God's Bounty which had appeared from the invisible horizon. Previous to this conference she had written to the Báb that she realized how he, in his wisdom, was giving his new teachings, little by little, according to the capacity of the people, but would he give her permission to teach still more; and if she was rejected she would gladly sacrifice herself to spread God's new Light.

During the great siege of Mázindarán, which occurred after the conference at Badasht, Bahá'u'lláh, taking with him eleven believers, went to the authorities and pled for the besieged. But in answer, he with his eleven companions was arrested, and a great mob gathered from the surrounding district and armed with all manner of weapons tried to kill them. For safe keeping the guards at last hid them in a mosque and the Governor himself interfered to save Bahá'u'lláh and his companions. Some Muslim mullás who had been confounded by Bahá'u'lláh in a discussion of scientific subjects now came forward and incited the people to attack the mosque and inflict injury upon Bahá'u'lláh. The mob became so violent that the guards found it impossible to check them so they made a hole in the wall and through it slipped Bahá'u'lláh and his companions out of the mosque and to safe hiding in a well protected house unknown to the people. Later he and the others were set free and they returned to Tíhrán.

After the martyrdom of the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh travelled to Baghdád and Karbilá where he inspired many, many people through his example and his great illumination. After a year's absence he returned to Tíhrán where a veritable reign of terror had started against the Báb's followers. The Prime Minister sent a request to him, at his summer residence just outside Tíhrán, to depart quickly and save himself. But Bahá'u'lláh refused to do this and remained where he was. Soon, a mob went to his palace, brought him out and compelled him, with hands manacled and bare feet to run for miles, amidst the jeers of the people. He was put in an underground dungeon with a number of believers, his neck, feet and hands in heavy chains and these chains fastened to the floor. Here he was kept for four months. Each day a believer was taken out to be killed by the people in the public square. But the presence of Bahá'u'lláh was so glorious that those steadfast souls crowded with him in the dungeon were supremely happy and joyous. He would chant, "God is our Sustainer", "Sufficient unto us is God". And the rayless cell would be transformed into the light of heaven. In their renunciation and spiritual joy they sang and danced even under the swords of their executioners.

Unable to find any pretext for executing Bahá'u'lláh and because he was of the nobility, the Persian government decided at last to exile him and in this way extinguish the new movement. He was [XIV:10:294] ordered to leave Tíhrán immediately, for Baghdád. He was not allowed time to obtain money or to secure even necessary clothing for himself and his family, but all were mounted on horses and started upon the journey. It was mid-winter and heavy snow storms and bitter cold were the companions of the band of exiles as, surrounded by guards, they hurried along over the perilous mountain roads. After the most tragic sufferings they arrived in Baghdád, in 1853.

From Baghdád the light of Truth shone forth brighter than ever and Bahá'u'lláh taught his universal principles. The "lesser resurrection" was ended and the "universal resurrection" appeared.¹ There were many believers of the Báb who kept the faith but, because of the terrible persecutions, were in hiding. These, many of them, when they heard that Bahá'u'lláh was living in Mesopotamia, in comparative freedom, started out for Baghdád and joined him there.

Humanity is ever prone to oppose its spiritual leaders. And now, many followers of the Báb who had arisen with great courage to accept his teachings, which were far in advance of those preached by the Persian religious leaders of that time, were unable to understand the wonderful and progressive teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. They felt that he was abrogating the precepts of the Báb. Therefore much discussion arose. Another cause of disturbance at that time was the appearance of a malady ever present in the world-love of leadership. This crept in among these early disciples causing many of the Báb's followers to believe themselves important. Bahá'u'lláh had not yet declared himself the Manifestation and they had no excuse for attacking him; yet they realized that one had come among them whose power their love of leadership might find a serious obstacle. On the other hand there were many who possessed true insight; these, as soon as they heard Bahá'u'lláh speak recognized him as their new leader and acknowledged him. Finally, after being in Baghdád for about a year, Bahá'u'lláh decided to withdraw for a while that the believers might decide whom they wished to follow. So, quietly one night he slipped away and not even his family knew where he had gone nor the hour of his departure. In the morning, when his absence was discovered, a wide search was made, in every direction, and to every place where he was wont to go. But no trace nor sign of him could anywhere be found.

For two long years no word came from Bahá'u'lláh, and those followers of the Báb who were sincere and faithful came fully to realize what a great and glorious light had been withdrawn. They were confused and at loss; they were like sheep without a shepherd, like lamps whose light had been extinguished. They now saw clearly that only Bahá'u'lláh was their bulwark and sustainer, their source of light and wisdom.

When he left his home in Baghdád, Bahá'u'lláh journeyed to Kurdistán and into the mountain wildernesses of that country, to a place called Sulaymáníyyih. Here he lived, in a cave, dressed in the garb of a religious hermit. Those wild mountains were full of highwaymen and desperadoes and he who travelled in that region took his life in his hands. But as these people came to know Bahá'u'lláh a great love and respect for him filled their hearts. They did not know who he was, only, they said, that he was the embodiment of divine attributes.

Bahá'u'lláh had a most melodious voice, and in the night, in his cave in the mountains, he would chant in Persian the most exquisite poems and prayers. Then the people near his cave would awake, and rise, and congregate at the mouth of the cave to listen to the wonderful singing. Later, these prayers were collected and printed in a volume in remembrance of those sacred hours. This volume is now in the possession of the believers.

One day, in the hills of Sulaymáníyyih, Bahá'u'lláh came upon a little boy, weeping [XIV:10:295] bitterly. Tenderly he picked up the child and, holding him in his arms, inquired as to his trouble. The little boy replied that his teacher had written a line on his slate and told him to copy it exactly. When he could not do this as well as the other pupils the teacher had beaten him. "Therefore," said the child, "I am unhappy." Bahá'u'lláh lovingly consoled him and said that he would teach him to write. He took the slate from the boy's hand and wrote upon it, in most beautiful handwriting, a thought compelling epigram, then told the child to carry this to his teacher. The teacher upon reading the profound epigram, written in such beautiful handwriting was much surprised and inquired where the one who so wrote could be found. Thus the learned men of that region came to know of Bahá'u'lláh's presence among them.

Soon the fame of his knowledge and wisdom spread throughout Kurdistán and the thoughtful ones, regarding him as a saint, came to him with their problems in spiritual and mystical subjects. Finally the news that a very holy man was living in the mountains in Kurdistán reached the ears of Bahá'u'lláh's family, who immediately said that this could be none other than Bahá'u'lláh and they must set out to find him.

There was a physician, a member of the Persian Consulate, who frequently visited the family of Bahá'u'lláh and felt much sympathy for them because of their great sorrow at his absence. One day this physician came with a story of a merchant who had travelled to Hamadán to sell some bales of goods. On the homeward journey he was attacked by a band of Bedouin robbers who, unable to find his money, cut his throat, carried him back into the mountains, there threw him down and, covering his body with stones left him. A shepherd coming that way a little later, saw drops of blood on the ground and following their trail found the poor merchant, whose heart was still feebly beating. A physician was quickly brought. The merchant was unable to speak, but before he died he wrote upon a bit of paper that there was money secreted in his clothing, which he was carrying to "a renowned saint who lived in the mountains", and he begged that the money be taken to this saint, to be devoted to his cause.

These stories convinced the believers in Baghdád that it was Bahá'u'lláh who was living in the cave in the mountains of Kurdistán. One who was very faithful, said, "I will go and find Bahá'u'lláh and will beg him to return. If he does not wish to do so, I will remain with him." His companions replied that the journey was most dangerous for the country was full of robbers. But he said, "I will go."

After encountering many difficulties he finally reached the cave. He proffered to Bahá'u'lláh many letters supplicating and entreating him to return to Baghdád. At last Bahá'u'lláh consented and started forth with this companion.

His return to Baghdád brought a wonderful impetus to the Cause. His very appearance, so majestic and compelling drew to him people from all walks of life, for one need but look into his face to see that he was not as others. Soon a constant stream of visitors was pouring into his house; the rough Kurds from the mountains, in sheepskin clothing, coming in search of their Master who had so recently been among them; leaders of thought, Jewish, Muslim, Christian, seeking an audience; the various consuls and other dignitaries stationed at Baghdád, who stood silent in his presence, waiting for his words of wisdom. There were also numbers of pilgrims who came to visit the holy shrines established in the cities near Baghdád. Many of these earnest men came to see Bahá'u'lláh to investigate his teachings: returning to their homes they carried the new message.

With Bahá'u'lláh present among them a new spirit shone from the hearts of the believers. He taught them that the way to spread the Cause was for each believer to become a divine lamp of guidance among all the people. The more [XIV:10:296] they were harmed by the enemies of the Cause, he told them, the more must they show forth love and kindness. Then other believers, from all parts of the country, left their homes and relatives and came to Baghdád to be with Bahá'u'lláh, who trained them in these noble characteristics, changing iron into gold, until many were drawn to the movement through the spiritual lives of these early followers.

Then the enemies of the Cause again bestirred themselves. The story is told of a religious leader who was greatly drawn to Bahá'u'lláh. Learning that the enemies were plotting against him he decided to warn Bahá'u'lláh. So he went early one morning to his home, with this intention. He found Bahá'u'lláh beside the River Dajli,¹ walking up and down the beautiful bank which he loved, pouring forth his revelation. The visitor, greatly surprised that Bahá'u'lláh was so undisturbed by his impending danger, waited until he returned to his house, and then told him of his danger. Bahá'u'lláh reassured him, saying, "God is working through invisible means."

In spite of all the persecutions the believers did not become downcast or discouraged. They had supreme confidence in Bahá'u'lláh. They were so aglow with the spirit of sacrifice and devotion to the Cause of God that if their material possessions were taken away from them it made no difference to them, for they were living in the paradise of nearness to Bahá'u'lláh.

During these days in Baghdád many books and Tablets were revealed through the pen of Bahá'u'lláh. The Kitáb-i-Íqán was written during this period, also the Hidden Words, Seven Valleys, Jewels of Mysteries in the Highest Journey, a great Tablet called the Tablet of Jacob, and many other luminous epistles. Bahá'u'lláh wrote and spoke in brilliant epigrams so inspiring to mind and spirit that they were repeated everywhere. Philosophers and poets longed to meet him, and his teachings spread far and wide throughout the Eastern countries. Therefore Baghdád during these years was a great centre of divine light.

Part II

The enemies of Bahá'u'lláh, wishing to exile him from Baghdád, met in consultation. They asked a prominent divine, a very good and sincere man, with many followers, to meet with them. This divine was not a follower of Bahá'u'lláh, but when he heard the plan of the enemies he refused to have anything to do with it, saying that they had never investigated the matter, and therefore could not know the truth; then he left the meeting. The others finally decided to send one of their number to talk with Bahá'u'lláh. This man, also, was good and sincere and when he met Bahá'u'lláh he beheld in wonder the radiance of his spirit. He asked what he should say to those who had sent him. Bahá'u'lláh replied, "You must tell them all that you have seen and felt." The emissary said, "They do not doubt your greatness and knowledge. What they really want is a miracle." Bahá'u'lláh answered, "You have read in all the sacred books that miracles do not appear through the wish of the people, but by the will of God. If God followed the will of the people the order of the world would be destroyed, for the people are many and each one holds in his mind a wish different from the others. However, you may tell your friends that they may consult together and choose one miracle; if I perform this miracle, then they must all believe."

The emissary, rejoicing, returned to his colleagues. While they were considering Bahá'u'lláh's message one said, "If Bahá'u'lláh, through his unseen power should perform this miracle, then would we accept him, and become believers?" To this question they answered, No. So the matter of the miracle was dropped.

At last the enemies of the Cause secured from the government authorities an order banishing Bahá'u'lláh from Baghdád. It first read that he should go, alone. But later this was changed, permitting his family and a few followers to accompany him. The band of exiles left Baghdád and paused, first, in a beautiful garden outside the city. Here they sojourned for twelve days. A tent was pitched for Bahá'u'lláh, and around it the tents for the others. These days in the garden are called "The days of Ridván" and they are of supreme importance, for it was then that Bahá'u'lláh declared, to a few followers, his great mission and began to build the palace of peace and unity for the world. He revealed many wonderful verses which sing the melodies of the New Day of God.

When the twelve days were over, the party, mounted on horses and donkeys and guarded by Turkish soldiers, set out again. The believers who could not accompany them were utterly broken [XIV:11:326] hearted. It was as though Bahá'u'lláh was a king starting upon a glorious journey. Outwardly, an exile—but in his spirit a great light was shining.

The desert of Asia Minor over which they had to travel in order to reach Constantinople is full of jagged mountains—a most inhospitable land whose vast reaches of wilderness are the hiding place of robbers and wild animals. Through the burning heat of this desert wilderness, in the hottest season of the year, Bahá'u'lláh and his party travelled for months. Only once along the way did they pause. The reason for this delay, a rest for the exiles of nine days, was this: they came upon a merchant who had been attacked by a band of robbers and his load of goods stolen. He appealed to the Turkish soldiers accompanying Bahá'u'lláh to help him; but they refused. Then he approached Bahá'u'lláh and besought him to intercede in his behalf. Bahá'u'lláh called the soldiers to him and told them to assist to their utmost this unfortunate man. So the guards were obliged to leave the party of exiles and to scour the country until they found the robbers, rescued the stolen goods and returned them to the merchant: When this was done Bahá'u'lláh was ready to continue the journey.

After four months of travel through the desert the party reached the seaport town of Samsún, where they went on board a ship and sailed along the Black Sea to the Bosphorus, finally arriving in Constantinople. Here they were met by government officials and the whole party quartered in one small house. Four months they stayed in Constantinople, and from this cosmopolitan centre, the highway between Asia and Europe, the fame of Bahá'u'lláh spread like wildfire. Many prominent men visited him here, and left his presence marvelling at the wisdom of his answers to their questions.

Seeing the power of his influence and how the Cause was spreading, the enemies in their jealousy decided to drive him from Constantinople. He was urged by several prominent men to write a letter to the Sultán of Turkey stating his case. But Bahá'u'lláh declined to do this, saying that he preferred to leave his affairs in the hands of God.

The enemies growing more and more afraid of his influence secured an order for his exile from Constantinople to Adrianople, in the extreme corner of European Turkey and a nine days' journey by carriage from Constantinople. Here Bahá'u'lláh and his party lived as exiles for five years, under the surveillance of the Turkish government. In Adrianople he wrote two wonderful Tablets, called the Tablet of Command and the Tablet of The City of Unity. In these Tablets he gives instructions for a united humanity and proclaims to the world his divine mission as the Manifestation of God and the Centre around which all the names revolve and the fulfilment of the prophecies of the Scriptures. He also, at this time, wrote many other glorious epistles, each one a flame of light to inspire and illumine the believers. He wrote two Tablets, one in Persian and the other in Arabic, and called them both "The Tablet of Ahmad". In the Arabic Tablet of Ahmad Bahá'u'lláh says: "Whosoever is sorrowful and disillusioned and disappointed let him read this Tablet; then joy and happiness will enter into his heart."

It was now very difficult for Bahá'u'lláh to communicate with his followers in other regions, due to the strict surveillance of the enemies. However, several of the believers managed to travel back and forth, bringing letters to Bahá'u'lláh and taking back his Tablets of instruction and encouragement. Inspired by his example and self-sacrifice the friends went forth to carry to the ends of the earth the message that the Promised One had come and the Day of Resurrection had dawned, the day of reconciliation and international unity.

After five years in Adrianople his influence had become so great and his fol- [XIV:11:327] lowers so numerous that the enemies of the Cause determined to banish him again, this time alone, and to some very remote place, sending his family and the other members of his party to a different city. When this heart-breaking news was brought to them the little party was panic stricken. They had forsaken every worldly possession and comfort in order to be near to Bahá'u'lláh and now they declared that they could not endure existence away from him.

Then officials stationed at Adrianople, and representing various European governments, came to Bahá'u'lláh and offered him their assistance, that he might go to one of the European countries and live in peace the remainder of his life, or that a protest might be made against his persecutors. But Bahá'u'lláh replied, "No. Reliance is in God, and not in any human power."

His family and the little band of devoted followers were finally allowed to remain with him, and all were exiled together to Gallipoli. Here they were met by an order countermanding the last one and commanding that he be separated from his party.

Bahá'u'lláh now manifested his spiritual authority. He wrote a mighty epistle, called the Tablet of Ra'ís. Although this Tablet was written to the one who, according to earthly sovereignty had power of life and death over him, yet a person unacquainted with the facts would suppose it to be written by a King to his most submissive subject. In this Tablet Bahá'u'lláh speaks with power divine and rejects the command of separation from his family and followers. He also prophesies concerning the bloodshed which would occur in Adrianople.

The order commanding the separation of the party was rescinded and a steamship made ready to carry them all to Alexandria. Arriving there (in 1868), after a five days' journey, they re-embarked in a ship bound for Haifa, Palestine. Three more days at sea brought them to Haifa where, after one night's rest, they were put into small boats and taken to 'Akká, a distance of about nine miles,

The city of 'Akká is surrounded by high walls whose iron gates were closed at night. The streets were never cleaned. There was no water for drinking save that filtered from the sea. These unsanitary conditions, added to a very bad climate, bred a disease from which many died. In fact, there was a saying that if a bird flew over 'Akká it would die. The barracks, where Bahá'u'lláh and his party were imprisoned, was the most unwholesome place in 'Akká. The dungeon-like rooms were rayless and damp, without windows, and swarming with vermin. The soldiers behind the iron gates who were given custody of the prisoners were the roughest of characters, and had government orders to shoot at sight any one of the prisoners who attempted to leave the prison. For some time after they were put into this prison they were given neither bread nor water, and the men, women and children were in a most pitiable condition. When they were finally given some bread it was such that they could hardly eat it. And the water allowed them made them all ill, some of the party dying from drinking it. The enemies of the Cause were sure that the exiles would all die within a few months, knowing that human beings cannot long survive such conditions. And one may imagine what this meant for Bahá'u'lláh and his family, who were of the nobility of Persia and had lived in great luxury. But their invincible faith and the confirmations of the Holy Spirit sustained them, and all through those dark and grievous months their hearts were filled with heavenly joy.

After some time the restrictions were somewhat abated and two of the friends were permitted to go out, once a day, to the bazaars to purchase supplies. They went accompanied by soldiers who had orders to keep strict watch upon them and if they attempted to speak one word [XIV:11:328] other than those needed to make their purchases to shoot them instantly.

Before Bahá'u'lláh arrived in 'Akká a wonderful thing happened. One of his followers decided to go there and open a shop. He had been in 'Akká for some time, and had had no news of his Master's fate, for the place to which Bahá'u'lláh was exiled was kept secret by the Turkish government. Then one day he encountered the two believers buying their supplies. They recognized each other in silent joy and happiness. Through this believer communication with the outside world was established. The physician who attended Bahá'u'lláh and his party when they all became ill through drinking the terrible water of 'Akká soon loved them very much, and he asked to be allowed to serve them. So, when he left the barracks he would carry with him Bahá'u'lláh's epistles and Tablets, to send them to his followers, and would receive their answers.

When the believers learned where Bahá'u'lláh was incarcerated many started out, on foot, across the mountains and the desert, in search of their Great Teacher. After journeying many months they would arrive outside 'Akká. As access to Bahá'u'lláh was impossible they would stand outside the city wall near the sea until Bahá'u'lláh came to the window of his prison room. After looking at him for a few moments they would turn about, their hearts singing with joy that they had seen their Beloved and been recognized by him.

During this imprisonment in the barracks Bahá'u'lláh revealed many wonderful books and Tablets which brought to the far-away friends supreme happiness. At the end of the second year of their imprisonment a tragic event occurred. One of Bahá'u'lláh's sons, called the Purest Branch, a young man seventeen years of age, endowed with a character of superlative spiritual beauty, was one day walking on the roof of the prison. He served Bahá'u'lláh as his secretary and wrote down, at his dictation, his Tablets. As he walked up and down on the roof of the barracks chanting a beautiful prayer he made a misstep over the edge of the roof and fell to the floor below. He was picked up so badly injured that his life quickly ebbed away. Before he died Bahá'u'lláh asked him if [XIV:11:329] he had any request to make. He replied, "My only supplication is that this suffering of mine and my death may be a sacrifice to the friends of God, through which the prison doors may be opened and a greater freedom of access may be given to Bahá'u'lláh."

When this request was made known to the officials their hearts were touched, and because of it and because, little by little, during those two years, they and the townspeople had begun to realize somewhat of the beauty of the lives of these exiles, their love and their unselfishness, the prison doors were opened and they were allowed to secure a small house in the town. Bahá'u'lláh was not permitted to leave the house, but the living conditions were better than those in the barracks. Seven long years he spent, within the four walls of that house, nor did he in all that time look upon a blade of grass or rushing water or hear the singing of the birds which he had loved in his native land. During these years 'Abdu'l-Bahá was a link between Bahá'u'lláh and the outside world. He went among the people, with the utmost kindness, telling them stories, imparting to them knowledge and wisdom. The religious leaders and the government officials learned to love 'Abdu'l-Bahá. So now and then he would take one of these prominent men to Bahá'u'lláh, whose mighty presence was so majestic, whose words were so luminous that many became believers and offered to render any service their positions permitted.

Finally, after nine years' close imprisonment, through the efforts of these influential men Bahá'u'lláh was granted permission to walk in the streets of 'Akká. Later he was allowed to leave the city and have a beautiful garden, called the Garden of Riḍván, about two and a half miles outside of 'Akká. And finally he went to live in a house called the palace of Bahjí, also outside of 'Akká. Here he lived until 1892, when he ascended into the spiritual world.

Bahá'u'lláh was sent by his enemies to 'Akká, Palestine, against his will, an exile and a prisoner. But through this very act of the enemies in banishing him to the Holy Land many wonderful and divine prophecies, of the Jewish prophets and Muḥammad were fulfilled; and many people, Christians, Jews and Muslims, came to see and to follow the new faith.

There is a prophecy in the Old Testament which says that in the Latter Day God will make the valley of Achor a door of hope to all nations.¹ This prophecy could have no physical significance, for the small town of 'Akká, with its high walls and iron gate and its unfortunate inhabitants could never, of itself, become a door of hope for the people of all the earth.

Therefore the prophecy must be interpreted spiritually, and means that from this dark spot will arise a spiritual light which will shine into the hearts of men, everywhere.

‘Akká is very damp and the place is infested with fleas. There is in the Qur’án a strange verse, which says, “Blessed is the man who is bitten by the fleas of ‘Akká.” Another verse states, “Happy is he who eats the onions of ‘Akká”, referring undoubtedly, to the unpleasant odours of the place. Outside ‘Akká there is a well of stagnant, tepid water to which one descends by means of several steps. This well is called ‘Aynu’l-Baqar¹ and Muḥammad prophesied concerning it, saying how happy would be the man who tasted the water of ‘Aynu’l-Baqar. It is impossible that these prophecies should have a literal fulfilment; therefore it is clear that the greatness of ‘Akká will be spiritual.

From ‘Akká the spiritual teachings of Bahá’u’lláh spread through the world. The enemies did their utmost to crush the light, but it became more and more brilliant. The friends arose everywhere to teach, and distribute the Tablets of Bahá’u’lláh. In many parts of Persia they were martyred, but this only united [XIV:11:330] the hearts of the friends more firmly. The movement spread to India and grew apace in Turkey and Russia and certain parts of Europe.

In the wonderful Tablets and holy books which Bahá’u’lláh revealed in ‘Akká one feels that the author is standing upon the highest mountain of the earth, looking down upon humanity with eyes of compassion and universal love, bidding all to climb the mountain and become characterized with the attributes of the sons of God. With one mighty blow Bahá’u’lláh destroyed the separating walls of tradition and dogma and invited all religions and races to realize that they are brothers and sisters and so to live as to attain the pinnacle of prosperity and success. In his writings we find the perfection of all divine religions, a new interpretation of the heavenly books which breaks the seals and establishes unity among the believers in all the world religions. He ushers in the age of the establishment of the Kingdom of God on earth, of divine justice, equality and peace among all the children of God.

The federation of the world

A Tablet of Bahá’u’lláh

He is the Counsellor, the Trustworthy.

Consider the world as a human being. This being was created perfect and healthy, but due to various causes became ill; and its illness was never removed because it was in the hands of unwise physicians. If in any age one of its members was healed, by a wise physician, its other parts continued ill, with various afflictions. And now it has been given into the hands of those who are fostered by the wine of self-conceit. If of these people, a few try, somewhat, to heal their purpose is to profit thereby, either through fame, or official position. Such people as these have not been and will not be able to remove these illnesses, save to a slight degree. And the great remedy, which is the cause of its health—that is, the unity of all the people of the earth into one cause and religion and form of worship—impossible save through one, wise, perfect, confirmed Physician who, from the Eternal World turns his face to this earth and comes to earth for the organization of the world and the uniting of its people—whenever such light has appeared from the Horizon of the Divine Will and such a Wise Physician become manifest from the Dayspring of Celestial Wisdom, these [XIV:10:297] various physicians have become like clouds to veil his radiance.

Therefore, the people of the earth still continue in their dissensions—and the sickness of the world has not passed away and has not been healed. These physicians were not able to accomplish this great work; neither did they permit the Divine Physician, but became beclouding veils to conceal him.

Consider, in these days the Eternal Beauty and the Greatest Name has swept away these veils, and sacrificed himself for the illumination of the world and the unity and salvation of its people. Yet all arose to injure him—until at last he was imprisoned in the prison which is the most desolate of cities, and they closed the doors of entrance and departure. They see the Friend as the stranger and the Beloved as an enemy and regard the peacemaker as the mischief-maker.

O people of wealth and power! Behold how you become a veil, and have withheld the world and its people from the effulgence of the light of the Sun of justice and infinite Bounties and how you see the greatest tranquillity as hardship, and the greatest gift as calamity!

At least listen to the kindly counsels of the Divine Beauty for the organization of the world and the tranquillity of its inhabitants. Every year you are adding to your expenditures, putting this on the shoulders of the people; this is furthest removed from equity and justice, and comes only from the winds of selfishness which are blowing and moving. To stop this is impossible save through a strong, unshakeable peace, which is the greatest cause of the firmness of the principles (which are) the foundation of the people and the nation.

Although the perfect peace and unity they did not receive, the world must be repaired through this (lesser) peace so that its sickness may diminish somewhat. Peace among the rulers was and will be the cause of tranquillity to the inhabitants and people of the country. Through this means they will not need armies and armaments, except in sufficient number to protect their cities and countries; and having established this (peace) the expenses will be less and the inhabitants will be tranquil and they themselves (the rulers) will be at rest. If after this peace (is established) one king should rise against the others it will be necessary for the others, all together, to restrain him.

It is astonishing that up to the present time they have not attained thereto. Although the pomp of kingship and the hugeness of armies are obstacles to some in accepting this peace—the cause of tranquillity for all—these were and will be pure superstitions, for the majesty of man and his honour are only through those things which are worthy of him, not through outer accessories. The people of perception look at the commander as one commanded; count the rich, poor and the powerful, weak; see that their dominion, authority, their wealth their power are dependent upon the people. Therefore, these things will not make the station of man higher, to the people of perception.

The essence of man is hidden in his individuality which must appear through the polish of education. This is man's glory, and all else which depends upon outer things, is not a part of man, himself.

Therefore, they will not look at external smallness or largeness, dignity or honour; and they must attain to the most great peace.

The rulers are manifestations of divine power. It is regrettable that those esteemed souls impose this burden. If in reality they will put the reins of affairs in the hands of trustworthy, faithful and intelligent persons they will find themselves free and at rest. How happy is that ruler who arises to assist God and proclaim His Cause and to illumine the world with the light of justice. It is necessary that all the people of the earth shall love him. [XIV:10:298]

This is that which proceedeth from the pen of the King of Eternity. We ask God that He will graciously aid all the nations with that which will be for their benefit and make them to understand what is good for them in this world and the world to come.

He is Powerful in all things

The oneness of the human world

Louis G. Gregory

The signs of God are numberless in the world today. As light upon the horizon of hearts, as rays from the Sun of Reality, are the teachings of holiness and peace. Among the great principles of unity, from its emphasis and recurrence in the Bahá'í teachings the most brilliant and powerful is that which declares the oneness of humanity. This divine truth is power to the hand that is puny and weak. To the heart frozen by convention it is genial warmth. To the tongue that is mute it is the voice of the angels. The mind cannot resist its logic and the soul is subdued by its spiritual power. Happy therefore is he who perceives its significance. Justice adorns his character. His vision is strengthened and enlarged. He perceives things that are real. All nations are one. All lands are one earth. All races are the great human family. All voices belong to the mighty chorus of praise.

Essential unity, sign of the divine creation, does not destroy essential differences in the world. Distinctions due to appearance, habitat, grades and kingdoms, capacities and powers that vary, all have their bearing in the organization of the world. Yet such differences should not remove that which is basic and fundamental. The eternal bond of love is the universal connection. Yes, wherever organization, itself an expression of love, exists, diversified talents must also be found.

The lowest forms of matter are called by the scientist, inorganic. To him they are lifeless because destitute of organs. But 'Abdu'l-Bahá assures us that even in the lowest forms of matter, such as the earth, there is life. Hence we know that even here there is organization. Science tells us that in the realm of matter there are beings so infinitesimal that a myriad of them united would escape the scrutiny of the eye. Yet in each there is organization which to us attests the divine power. In the highest, spiritual realm, the light of oneness is supreme. Should we not expect to find the Kingdom of Heaven, as befits its lofty state, more perfectly organized than the kingdoms of earth? The unity of mankind does not contemplate the crumbling of all organization, but rather the removal of all friction among all its elements and parts, thereby increasing its effectiveness and power. The uniting power appears in all the kingdoms, but the higher the ascent the greater is its rule manifest. The title of nobility in the divine worlds is service.

The world of man is free to accept or reject what divine wisdom reveals. Evidences of life and hope on the one hand and of collapse and chaos on the other express man's acceptance or denial of the principle of God. The calamities and heart-aches of which man complains are for him a driving force toward his Maker. The breaking down of all plans of relief gradually eliminates all aid save the Greatest Name. This power alone can free man from himself and those idols of hate, fear, error, and superstition which claim his homage.

It is obviously absurd for people to hate because of differences of weight and stature. Is it less so because some are [XIV:10:299] French, others German; some white, others black; some Europeans, others Asians? Rich in imagery, poetic and beautiful in expression are those teachings which unfold the harmony in varied perfection of all the grades and kingdoms of creation. 'Abdu'l-Bahá seemed never happier than when, with his divine eloquence, he unfolded the law of human solidarity, which he indicated must follow the analogy of the other kingdoms created by God. He reminds us of the rubies and sapphires, diamonds and pearls, that compose a diadem; of the many waves of one sea; of the different coloured lambs that together skip and play; of the blue and white doves that find fellowship; of the many trees of one orchard; of the variegated flowers of one garden; of the harmonious notes of one orchestra; of the rainbow with its ethereal and varied splendour, sign of the Covenant of God with all his children. Bahá'u'lláh speaks of mankind as the "leaves of one tree and the fruits of one branch.”

These great Luminaries, who in their Oneness are the Tree and Branch of Divinity, have left no doubt as to their will for the unity of the world. Man may ever find, in the rose garden of Abhá, that variety which gives joy to life harmonized by the eternal and divine Oneness which is life itself. When the light of unity is unveiled in the inner consciousness, man may find new meanings in the endless forms of creation which yield their secrets for his training. The flora of many regions; the changes of season wherein earth unfolds its treasures; valleys and mountains; rivers and shining lakes; the many shades in the turning of the autumn leaves; the sun, now shining with majestic splendour, anon¹ tingeing the cumulous clouds with red; the moon, many in its phases, yet one in its changeless looking to the earth; the stars differing in size, yet each and all contributing to the brilliancy of the heavens; rain and sparkling dews; plains and plateaux; oases and fertile fields; deserts of ice and deserts of burning sand suggest a panorama of beauty that is endless with the signs of the Heavenly Artist, Who is One. All the kingdoms, according to varying capacities, reflect and praise the True One. But while the lower kingdoms show forth many charms, the perfections of the human realm are richer and more beautiful. On an occasion of state, in the city of Washington, the head of the nation, through the aid of an electrical device which amplified the voice, addressed about one hundred thousand people. In this vast throng, with faces turned expectantly in one direction, one could see far greater beauty in diversity than in all the lower kingdoms of creation. For man, who contains in his being endless possibilities of growth, is nature’s sum, plus the virtues of the higher realm. The marvel of this great gathering was that each figure marked a distinct individuality and was the temple of a deathless entity, the human spirit.

Smaller in numbers, yet far weightier in significance, were the gatherings which surrounded ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the East and West, inspired by his words of wisdom and receiving life pulses from his healing sympathy. These happy friends, in meeting ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, contacted with the world of oneness. The joy of faces indicated that the hearts were shown their reality. New visions of happiness came to all as sentiments and powers were directed toward world fellowship. As the divine Educator called forth their virtues, many for the first time responded to the best within them. The creative power of unity, which builds divine civilization, flowed to the hearts. Alike and yet different, distinct yet harmonious, united yet free, many yet one, the friends of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá throughout the world, stand through the glory of sacrifice upon the plane of oneness, transformed by the power of the new day.

Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá have removed the veils of separation and estrangement from all races and nations. All are urged to acquire culture and all are invited to the table of heavenly teachings. The belief, born of superstition, that any race or nation is incapable of acquiring knowledge is forever dispelled. The strong are saved from pride and the weak from aggression. All are given the right to true strength through the Might of God. “The beloved of God are those in whom the Word of God taketh effect.” For those who prize spiritual values this is enough. Yet it may be interesting to note how the scientific lore of this age reflects the light of the Messengers of God: Sir Arthur Keith, of great renown among anthropologists, declares that the terms high and low do not apply to races, but only to civilizations. Jean Finot of the French school, proves the absurdity of race prejudice with the exactness of a demonstration in Euclid. Prof. Munroe of Japan, in one of his admirable lectures, shows how the different civilizations have been successively developed by peoples of all colours, rejecting the theory that there is inherent inferiority on the part of any race, past or present.

It has been proved in many cases that children whose ancestors have been savages for many generations, if put in school and given an opportunity, can acquire the highest culture.

But still woeful is the loss, if divine ideals are lacking. The great war illustrates what people trained by the best of human methods, may yet do to each other. The first discovery of man is his own body and its needs. The next is his relationship to his family. Then little by little he becomes interested in the community, the nation and perhaps the race in its more limited sense. It is pitiable for the world that for the most, development seems arrested here. But now, for those who are willing, the divine bounty widens the horizons of unity to include the world. This attainment is a priceless jewel for man.

A traveller in Persia tells of meeting in that country, where means of locomotion are so limited and common schools so meagre, many people of even lowly life as measured by worldly standards, who discuss and espouse ideals which would honour the sages and seers of earth. These people have been trained by Bahá'u'lláh and his successors to think in terms of humanity and to work and pray for universal welfare. They know and act upon those laws which must govern a united world. Their lives are simple. Their hearts are pure. Their faces shine with divine joy. Yet happier still are the mighty and strong whose human stations do not debar the light divine. The education of Bahá'u'lláh successfully trains all degrees and ranks. Its spirit penetrates all gatherings. One can scarcely attend any gathering of progressive thinkers nowadays without hearing Bahá'í ideals expressed.

It is related that a European king, who was sending a body of his troops to a colony, thus addressed them: "As you go among my subjects across the sea, there is one thought I wish to impress upon you. It is that they are our brothers. If we have any advantage over those people, it is not because of how we look, but because of what we know. And when they know what we know, it is possible that they may do more with it than we have done. So go among them and teach them. And remember that if you insult them because of their colour, you insult me. I know that you intend to do what is right. But this thought cannot be too strongly impressed upon you."

It is clear that all races and nations have much to give to the collective consciousness which brings world civilization. It may be given to some to do more than others, but no wise man will wish to impede the progress of any. Those who are kind will wish to aid the advancement of all. Because human horizons are limited and personal touches are perhaps even more so, men are seldom accurate judges of the capacities and powers of their fellow beings. Men [XIV:10:301] usually allow themselves to be governed by impressions and appearances, while the insight of the Absolute judge penetrates the reality of man. Many years ago one of the great teachers most impressively called our attention to the unerring way in which 'Abdu'l-Bahá looked upon the hearts. The Prophets of God, without exception, have appraised humanity according to spiritual values and standards. They have with one voice commanded unity and have set the example of favouring all people who advance toward God. Such is the badge of distinction in the world of reality.

Down the ages, in all countries and climes, virtues appear which attest a divine power in man. Even among the most primitive peoples this light appears. Even among the so-called savages of the world one may sometimes find a fidelity, a hospitality, a responsiveness to love which put to shame by comparison many of the most advanced. As the poet says:

"I believe that in all ages
Every human heart is human;
That in even savage bosoms,
There are yearnings, longings, strivings,
For the good they comprehend not."

There are flashes of reality in the ancient Sabaeen religion, which in the time of Homer had lapsed into idol worship. In the Iliad, Agamemnon, the king of men, addressing the wrathful Achilles, says:

“If thou hast great strength some god bestowed it upon thee.” Or, as Pope translates: “Know vain man, thy valour is from God!” Thankfulness to the True One augments the power of unity.

Man increases his wealth of divine blessings by sharing them with others. Dispersion, avoidance, hatred, dissipate the forces of life upon every plane. Ill will toward others prevents refreshing sleep, impairs digestion, dwarfs the mind, cankers the soul, disturbs the family, alienates friends, increases foes, and removes one far from God. Hatred between races and nations is now so far-reaching and calamitous as to threaten the existence of all flesh. Greatly to be pitied is he who hates. Those who know would avoid it as they would a pestilent disease. Its subjective harm may be far greater than any injury it may bring to others. But it is certain that love removes hate, and mighty is the power that confirms human service under divine Guidance.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá defines “the reality of humanity” as:

“That universal unity, which is the oneness of the kingdom of the human race, the basic harmony of the world, and the appearance of the bounty of the Almighty.”

The principle accepted, one may view with gladness what it portends in the readjustment to a higher plane, of all human ties. Another attitude perhaps, may be that of elation at sacrifices made, souls awakened, victories won by the sword of the spirit. But the glory of the day is the task that remains. The unification of souls, at home and abroad, is the aim of service to the Beauty of Abhá. Stupendous and splendid is the effort, which God confirms, of forging a chain of love which links all humanity. When this end is achieved paeans of joy will ascend from earth to heaven and the Supreme Paradise will acclaim the bliss of a united world.

The only solution of world problems

One of the interesting signs of the times is the conversion of the well-known suffrage worker of England, Miss Cristabel Pankhurst, to an evangelist of the “Second Coming”. In her first enthusiasm for woman’s suffrage, she says, “I had lived in an atmosphere of illusion, thinking that once certain obstacles were removed, especially the disenfranchisement of women, it would be full steam ahead for the ideal and social international order.” But recent events have convinced her that neither the women nor the men, the workingmen nor the politicians are able to bring in the new international order. “When I really faced the facts,” she says, “I saw that the war was not a war to end war.”¹ “We men and women have not the goodness needed, nor the loving-kindness, nor the wisdom, nor the power, to regenerate the world We (women) are wholly unable, just as the men are unable, even to form, much less to put into effect, the policy that will regenerate the world.” “It is the task, not of humanity, but of Divinity, infinite in wisdom, power and love.”²

Then she discovered the Bible prophecies concerning Christ’s return at the “end of the age”, and that “the establishment of the Kingdom awaits his return.” “Ah! that is the solution!” My heart stirred to it. My practical political eye saw that this Divine Programme is absolutely the only one that can solve the international, social, political and moral problems of the world.”³ “A few years ago,” she says, “there was excuse for the critical having doubts of Bible prophecies. But recent events are fitting into the mould of prophecy so marvellously as to remove all grounds for doubt.” There are the wars and rumours of wars, at least the beginnings of the great Armageddon, the return of the Jews to the Holy Land, the faith of many waxing cold, the fulfilment of the prophecy foretold in II Timothy, Chapter 3, that “in the last days grievous times shall come, for men shall be lovers of self, lovers of money, boastful, haughty, disobedient to parents, ... lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God.”

In her addresses she mentions many such prophecies and is so convinced that the coming of Christ is right at hand that before a great audience in Chicago, recently, she said, “I will return and speak to you in the spring, if He tarrieth.”

There is no more remarkable sign of the times than the vast multitudes in the Christian churches who are watching for the imminent return of the Christ. It is true that they take the Bible prophecies literally, expect him to descend in a material cloud from heaven, with power and great glory, not realizing that they interpret but in part, prophesy in part, and that when the perfect interpretation is come that which is in part shall be done away.

The first great discovery is that he cometh. The second discovery is how he cometh. And this has been given to us in the crystal-clear interpretations of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Science and religion are one truth, they tell us. When he comes he does not contradict the known laws of science. He comes as a thief in the night. He comes as the Son of Man. “Unto us a child is born and unto us a son is given and his name shall be called wonderful, counsellor, ... Prince of Peace.” If he should appear from the sky in a material cloud only a few people could see him, But if he appears in his spiritual reality, like the lightning shining from the east to the west, even the cloud of his body will not prevent the multitudes from beholding the light of his teachings and his world-transforming Holy Spirit. Only when he appears as a spiritual reality can every spiritual eye see him. Meeting him in the air is to be interpreted spiritually; our spirits rising to meet him in the heaven of his presence. His angels are his teachers, visible and invisible, who sum- [XIV:10:304] mon his elect from the four corners of the earth. The resurrection of all those who recognize him and are baptized by his Holy Spirit is the rising from the grave of prejudice and self into the Kingdom of universal peace and love. And he appears after the sun of the heavens of the old religious order is darkened and the stars of the old ordinances and leaderships have fallen to earth. But when he comes he is the same sun of divine manifestation rising from the horizon of a new body, a new city, a new name.

The expectation of Christ's return is part of a world-wide anticipation. Each religion awaits the return of its beloved Prophet. There is a little mosque, we are told, in the Holy Land, where a priest presides, keeping ready the shoes that the Messiah is to wear when he comes to Jerusalem. The Zoroastrians are sure that the great Messiah will be born in central Persia; the Jews that he will appear on Mount Zion, when “the valley of Achor” will be “a door of hope” and “Carmel and Sharon, they shall see the glory of God.” Muslim tradition tells about visiting the One in Acre; the Confucianists say that he will appear in the West; Buddhists pray for the coming of the Beloved Maitreya. Though they may name him by different names, all await the Promised One who will unite the many religions until there shall be one fold, one Shepherd.

Ships that pass in the night

Stanwood Cobb

One of the delights of European travel is the opportunity it gives of meeting people of different races and nationalities and exchanging views with them. The way in which the coaches of European trains are divided into transverse compartments seating six or eight people, facilitates sociability. If the journey is of any length one soon gets into conversation with one's neighbours, especially if one knows French, the universal auxiliary language of Europe.

Many pleasant exchanges of opinion and experience take place at this time, when conversation is a boon to while away otherwise tedious hours. And one can obtain from these sociabilities en route a clear idea and a sincere expression of the native culture and thought, for these casual acquaintances on trains, as on boats, become surprisingly sincere and outspoken.

To Bahá'ís these meetings are of special value because they give an opportunity for spreading the Message.

There are four different types of thought and reaction which one meets with in telling of the Bahá'í Cause. First are those people who are quite satisfied with life as it is. Such people today exist in Europe in only a few countries where conditions of living are still pleasant. Second, are those who lament existing conditions, but are hopeless of any change in human nature of such kind as to effect the desired change in human relationships. Third, are those who desire a change and are working for it along some line which appeals to them as adequate. Fourth, are those who despair of life as it is, see no way out of the difficulties, and consequently grasp eagerly at the teachings of the Cause, finding there a ray of hope.

The first class is, as already mentioned, not common in Europe in this epoch of misery and threatening downfall of [XIV:10:306] civilization. The second class I should say predominates. These must be awakened to a faith in divine power and to a realization that human nature, through the sublimation of religion, can be changed. The third class is not at present susceptible to the Cause, though perhaps sympathetic and appreciative. Some of this class are working along spiritual lines similar to our own, and not only they but their work is in reality part of the Kingdom. Another group of this class is working along anti-religious lines. That is, they not only have no faith in the power of religion to change human nature and to effect a more perfect organization of mankind, but they are actually opposed to religion, believing it an instrument of the upper classes for the suppression of the working class. This group composes a very large number of those who are today working most earnestly to change human conditions for the better. It is a pity that the sins of the church have in the past furnished some grounds for this hostility to it, because there is a great deal of nobility, idealism, and spirit of self-sacrifice in this group of workers, qualities which if permeated and guided by the Holy Spirit could accomplish great good for the human race; but which if spent in strife and race—warfare will serve, as 'Abdu'l-Bahá has said, only to usher the human race into greater misery and hardships. The last class is increasing rapidly in those countries in Europe which are in suffering and want, and their hearts are fertile ground for seeds of Wisdom and of Truth. They need only proper gardening to bring forth the flowers and fruit of the Kingdom.

One meets all these classes of people in the course of travel. For instance, in riding from Hamburg to Berlin, we met a man of the second class. He was a man of the very highest intelligence, and as I observed, extremely sensitive and sympathetic toward the sufferings of others. He had been a naval officer during the war. He had thought much on life, and was a brilliant conversationalist. Since he knew English well, we could talk all the more readily with him. He had with him his wife, a Norwegian, two adorable children and a maid. They did not know English. He confided to us his chagrin that his wife was bringing up the children according to the old conventions. Here was a soul innately gentle, and loving, of high ideals, seeking the welfare of humanity, but alas, by the faulty means of further death and destruction. He was of course impervious to the Cause, for he was a complete enthusiast in his own belief.

On the train from Berlin to Weimar, we got into conversation with the conductor, who seemed a gentle and simple soul. He had been in the war. He did not want more war. His face lit up when we told him of the Cause. Anything that could prevent war seemed to him praiseworthy. He took with great pleasure the little booklet (number nine) we gave him, and said goodbye sweetly as he left the train at the end of his run.

An amazing incident took place on the train from Bad Gastein to Innsbruck. We were in a small compartment with only one other occupant, a lady from Vienna. Her conversation showing her to be against war and distressed at the continued militancy of Europe, I asked her if she had ever heard of the Bahá'í movement. "Why, yes!" was her answer. "Two American ladies on this very train were telling me about it. They got off an hour ago at Bischofshofen. They could not speak German much, but they were so eager that they made me understand. They took my address and are going to send me literature."

What an impression it must have made on the Viennese lady to meet two Bahá'í parties in succession. She might suppose that half America was Bahá'í. I saw vividly in my mind's eye the day when Bahá'ís will really be as numerous in America as it might seem to the stranger from her two encounters.

In Persia, where the Cause has made [XIV:10:307] such headway, it is the common saying that if four people happen to gather together one of them is sure to be a Bahá'í. Some years ago the then Persian consul to Cairo, who was a Bahá'í, told me that in Tīhrán he happened one day to be in a group of four people, one of whom undertook to combat this current saying. "How ridiculous," he said, "is the thought that four people cannot gather together without one of them being a Bahá'í! Here we are together, and none of us are Bahá'ís!" He, himself, was not a Bahá'í, but the other three men, unknown to him, were all Bahá'ís. God speed the day when such a saying will become true in America.

This Viennese lady was deeply touched with what we told her. She read booklet number nine with avidity, and said when she finished it, "I believe everything in it." We have her address, which we also sent to Herr Herrigel, and we trust she will continue in contact with the friends and with the Cause. Her interest and zeal were as much an inspiration to us as our message was to her.

The Austrians seem especially susceptible to the Cause. They are a kindly, sweet-tempered people, grateful for help given them in their national distress, and ready to take up humanitarian ideals, longing, particularly, for something to restore hope to life.

Another friend we met again with pleasure was Monsieur D___ from Budapest—a scholar and thinker, official translator in seven languages, a Pole by birth, citizen of the world by virtue of his natural intelligence and breadth of mind, he had found himself in complete accord with the Bahá'í teaching; and he is eager to start an assembly in Budapest upon his return there in September. His wife, a sweet Viennese lady, we found amiable and friendly, as indeed are all Viennese. Monsieur D___ urged us to visit Budapest in September and help him to start an assembly. If we cannot do so we trust someone else will be able to help.

These are some of the "ships we passed in the night". There were others to whom we cannot give space here. Then, there are the Bahá'í friends whom it is such a joy to meet. I am writing this at Hotel des Alpes, Mont Pelerin, where Lady Blomfield is also staying. Each afternoon she reads to us from the book she is writing, episodes in the lives of the Báb, of Bahá'u'lláh, of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and of those noble souls, particularly the women, associated with them in the Cause of God. These episodes, which she has gathered from 'Abdu'l-Bahá and from his family, she has recorded with such vividness that as she reads them to us we seem to live in the days of the Báb, to glory and to suffer with him and his martyred friends.

Through Lady Blomfield we met also A. Ḥusayn Işfahání, who is completing his studies at Lausanne,—an earnest, radiant Bahá'í, of the kind to make one see a brilliant future for Persia. He believes that in twenty or thirty years his country will be preponderatingly Bahá'í. What a glorious prospect, not only for him, but for us all to look forward to. For when Persia becomes Bahá'í, it will shed the blessings of the Divine Civilization not only on its own citizens, but upon the world.

The life beyond

Stanwood Cobb

At the end of every religious epoch, just when the spirit of religion is being born anew through the agency of a Manifestation of God, humanity finds itself in a lamentable condition of scepticism and disbelief. Not only does it deny God, but what is more extraordinary, it denies itself. That is to say, it denies the eternal existence of its own soul, thus putting itself on a level with the beasts and voluntarily abnegating its high estate as children of the Most High God and heirs to a spiritual kingdom.

The superb faith in the future life brought to the world by Christ which so inspired his early followers as to destroy entirely the fear of death, has almost entirely departed from the world of Christendom, yea, even from the hearts of those who call upon his name.

Not only does the materialistic science of today deny the continued existence of the soul; but those who still adhere to the teachings of Christ hold only a tenuous faith in it. The current phraseology of the day in regard to death is similar to that in the pagan days when Homer sang and lamented the fate of those deprived of this bright earth life. Yes, in the Occident death today is universally viewed as a misfortune, a deprivation, a substitution for existence of non-existence, or at best of a tenebrous¹ existence which is a poor exchange for the glories of our earth life illumined and warmed as it is by the rays of a visible sun.

It is just because humanity is prone to lose the vision, prone to reverse the order of things and put the finite before the infinite, the mortal before the immortal, the material before the spiritual, that it becomes necessary for God to send a Messenger to renew the vision and bring again to humanity the interpretation of this life as a fragment only of complete individual existence.

For the most part, the message of these Spiritual Teachers is one of joy and of great promise. But there is another aspect to their teaching, a necessary corollary to a future life of joy for the spiritually minded. If there are to be rewards for the spiritual, there are also to be punishments, or let us say deprivations, for the unspiritual.

This dual teaching of reward and punishment after death has been one of the most important factors in the spreading of the great world religions. In the teachings of Buddha, of Christ, of Mu- [XIV:11:331] ḥammad, as well as in the teachings of the apostles of these Manifestations, the doctrine of a judgement day, of a time when one's deeds would determine one's subsequent state of existence was greatly emphasized and became an inspiring though stern incentive to the acceptance of the said religion and to the living of a spiritual life.

The vivid symbols and allegories used to warn an ignorant, concrete-minded humanity such as existed in the time of Christ and of Muḥammad, such as exists still in large numbers, have been rightly interpreted by modern intelligence as standing for spiritual rather than material rewards and punishments.

This interpretation of eschatology has not prevailed so long but what many Christians still living can look back to the day when the first proponents and expounders of universal salvation, or Universalists as they are called, were considered as anathema by the literal minded.

My grandfather, Rev. Sylvanus Cobb, was among those who first ventured to interpret away the hell fire and brimstone which had perfumed the nostrils of the devout. He attacked especially the sort of revival sermons delivered by one celebrated contemporaneous divine, who was wont to draw such vivid fire and brimstone portrayals of the judgement day that women screamed and fainted.

That mankind is prone to the concrete is evidenced by the luminous portrayals of the punishment of evil doers in the next life which adorn not only the walls of many a Christian church and monastery, but also the walls of Buddhist temples in the East. I have myself seen in the monasteries of Greece and of Bulgaria depictions of the tortures of the damned which show a belief as regards God only possible to men in whom the spirit of revenge predominates, to the exclusion of all mercy.

The Universalists were right in seeing such punishments as incompatible with the Divine Mercy, and in interpreting the teachings of Christ as referring not to material things but to the inner, spiritual evolution of the soul; and to a system of intrinsic rather than extrinsic rewards and punishments. Also they were right in calling the attention of theologians to the fact that the Greek word "aeon" which had been wrongly translated as "eternity" meant rather an "age" or "epoch", thus overthrowing the theory of eternal punishment and substituting for it the theory, much more comforting, of universal salvation.

This doctrine of universal salvation, opening up vistas of eternal progress, opportunities of gaining the spiritual qualities even after the soul has passed through that mystic corridor of Death into a land the nature and laws and customs of which no man fully knoweth—this comforting doctrine has by now permeated the religious thought of advanced thinkers in every sect or denomination. And that is well.

But as usual the reaction to one extreme has led to the opposite extreme. Those who still, in this age of agnosticism, keep the faith of an eternal life, hold too careless a thought in regard to it. It is assumed that everything will be all right there; that God is merciful and kind and wishes everyone to be happy; that somehow death initiates one into the spiritual life of immortality and the blessed state of the saints.

This careless and false assumption is destroying the very essence of the teachings of the Christ, and of every great Founder of Religion. To interpret the system of rewards and punishments of the religious books as symbolical is well. But by some kind of legerdemain to whisk away every degree of reward and punishment is to controvert the teachings not only of the Holy Books but of nature and existence as well. In the universe that we see and know around us [XIV:11:332] nothing comes unearned. Effort is the price to be paid for every good thing. And the result of non-effort is sorrow and pain.

And this, too, is compatible with, nay, part of, the mercy of God. For the thing of chief importance to man, as to the stages of life below the human, is effort. Nothing earned without effort—this is the universal motto, this is the law on which the universe is run.

Applying this law to the doctrine of a future life, one comes face to face with this astounding truth, that immortality has to be earned! It is not a quality inherent in this earth life, nor a gift lightly laid at the feet of all who die. How simple and cheerfully unthinking, to assume that the mere event of death can change an unspiritual person into a spiritual one, or usher devotees of the sense-world into an experience available only to those who have during this earth life developed their spiritual susceptibilities!

To maintain this untruth is to deny those stern and mighty laws upon which the universe is built—the law of gravitation, the law of cause and effect, the law of evolution.

Bah'ú'lláh, though in the main bringing to mankind a message of joy, announced also those sterner truths which the world has shrunk from facing. "Sanctify your souls, O ye peoples of the world, that haply ye may attain that station which God hath destined for you

“The essence of these words is this: they that tread the path of faith, ... must cleanse themselves of all that is earthly Then will they ... become the recipients of a grace that is infinite and unseen, inasmuch as man ... can never enter the abode of immortality, ...”¹

Again, interpreting the meaning of the judgement day as taught by former prophets: “The paradise and fire in the apparent life were and will ever be the acceptance and the rejection; and after the ascension of the spirit, there are paradises which have no equal, and also fire which has no likeness, which are the fruit of the deeds of the advancer and opposer.”

It is impossible to consider this life apart from the future life. It is all one great whole. The thought of what is to come after death is not only a great comfort in times of earthly stress and suffering, but is also a powerful influence toward right conduct in this life.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá has said that without this vision of the next life there cannot be enough incentive to ethical action here. The rewards and punishments which are assigned here for our actions are as nothing to the more important results of our earthly deeds which come to us in the hereafter.

That is why every Manifestation emphasizes the life hereafter in connection with the teaching of how this life should be lived.

And just what are the rewards of a spiritual life here? Always, the universal laws are just, logical, beneficent. And the result hereafter of developing a spiritual nature here is just what one might suppose it to be, the power and ability of enjoying spiritual things.

But here is the impressive fact. The next world is a world of spirit, not of matter; and spiritual things are the only things one can enjoy there. No other source of happiness exists.

The terrible deprivation in the hereafter of those who have not developed the spiritual life here must by this become apparent. There is no immediate possibility of happiness for them in the heaven-world. Because they have not developed the powers to use and appreciate the things of the heaven-world, they are born into it, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá says, deaf, dumb and blind.

True, they have a sort of existence there, but as the existence in this world of a stone compared to that of a human being. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá used another figure, even more appalling, in saying of an immensely wealthy man held as great in the eyes of this world, that in the next [XIV:11:333] world he would be rolled up like a scroll and put away.

Is there any salvation possible, then, for those who die sinners and are ushered into the next world in a state of evil? There is a possibility of progress, but not by self-effort; only through the grace of God and the prayers and efforts of the saints. That is because the activities of the beyond-world are not as here. Heaven is not a place for the exercise of self-will, for self-development. This world is the stage of existence designed for us for self-improving, for struggle against the obstacles which evil sets in our path. The purpose of this earth life is through it and by means of it to become spiritual.

Oh, if mortals would only realize the importance of this truth, they would drop everything and seek the Kingdom. Christ has compared it to a hidden treasure, or to a pearl of great price, for which the man aware of values would sell all he had of other wealth.

That is why all the prophets emphasize the importance, the necessity of salvation here and now. To be born once is to be but an earth-being. We must be born again to become inhabitants of the Kingdom, spiritual beings, children of God.

And again I say let us not deceive ourselves. Death does not initiate us into these glories. The man who is born again, of the spirit, perceives the realities and attains the joys of the spirit here and now, and forever after. And the man who dies, not in the spirit, faces an existence the tragedy, the suffering of which melts the hearts of angels and causes God Himself, in His great pity, to descend to earth, as it were, in the persons of His Manifestations, to warn humanity of these stern laws, these laws stern yet beneficent.

“Salvation” is the message of these Great Ones. And the means of “salvation” also they give us, by their word, their lives, by the immense, incalculable influence of their divine enlightenment and spiritual power.

Love, prayer, aspiration toward God; and toward man love and good deeds. This is the way to salvation.

Shall we say that man is to become good in order to enjoy the after-life? Or shall we say that becoming good, the rewards of heaven are his?

It matters not which way we look at it. It is all one. And the one essence of it all is Love. Love is the fulfilment of the law, and love is heaven.

So it is plain that the immortal life is a spiritual condition. Not securable by the physical process of dying. Not a mere sequence to this earth-life. But a condition, above time and place, a station to which we may attain while still in the flesh.

And having attained, while here, immortal life, we go on from joy to joy, from miracle to miracle of God’s love, travellers in the heavenly world fully equipped for the strange, marvellous journeys there.

And not having attained immortality while here, we enter the other world crippled, halting, still-born, helpless, deprived of the ineffable glories—yea, deprived of every source of happiness.

So it is well while living here to think of the hereafter. It is well to practise the spiritual life. It is well to be severed from the world. Then shall life, even this life, become more glorious the nearer one approaches the limits of the earth-journey.

And for those whose spiritual senses are developed, who wait equipped for the far journey, the departure shall not be tragic. Death shall lose its sting. Of those who die spiritual, it is true that ere the heart stops beating the soul is welcomed into paradise; and the body makes no opposition to the going, lays no claim upon its master, holds not back as holds the body of the sense man his soul back in ghastly struggle. So the good die peacefully. And in the future ages yet more peacefully, rapt in heavenly essences and perfumes, lulled by Abhá chants.

The angel in the garrison

Horace Holley

Part I

The attempt of modern science to establish a psychology as definite and as authentic as biology is like the fish’s efforts to leap a waterfall’s upstream. Long ago has our racial consciousness slipped over the brink of spiritual power into the shallows below.

Our self-knowledge has come to be determined by that inferior level where power may sometimes, indeed, flow in as from above, but where power is neither to be created nor maintained. Perhaps it would be more accurate to assert that psychology has ceased even attempting to re-ascend the stream: officially, at least, it is more like the second generation of fish that, spawned beneath the falls, feels only a vague instinct of the height which gives its own waters renewal. In modern psychology, as taught in the schools, there may be much logos, but there is no psyche. The mind’s camera has been exposed in a darkened room.

For the essence of this matter is that the psyche is not spiritual fact observable, but a spiritual power to observe all fact. It is not a series of mysterious observations which can be organized into authentic knowledge, it is a mysterious but authentic gift to know. It is not an image of things within which may or may not be real; it is an inner eye which may or may not be possessed. True genius, scientific as well as religious, has always been aware of this fact.

The method of this "psychology" was borrowed, of course, from natural science. Natural science is organized knowledge, definite fact, authenticate observation. Its field of observation is nature; its power of observation is intellect. Now intellect transcends the phenomena of nature as the physical eye transcends the objects upon which it turns its vision. The intellect may, indeed, misapprehend the significance of phenomena in particular instances, as in particular instances the eye may erroneously determine perspective, but from the very nature of things the most unintelligent mind cannot fall to a level of consciousness lower than the phenomenon itself. Its relative advantage remains secure in the same way that the relative advantage between vision and visioned remains secure to the eye. Here there can be no question of the knower slipping downstream with respect to the thing known. Man is fast anchored upstream to the rest of nature as the animal is anchored upstream to the plant, or the plant to the mineral. The problem of natural science, therefore, was never the problem of establishing its own power to know, but merely to establish authentic knowledge of things knowable from the beginning. The mind has grown more accurate through training, but the mind was trained, not created, by its dealings with natural phenomena. Mind created science, science did not create mind. But because our age has been influenced, with respect to consciousness, by the authority of the natural sciences more than from any other source, we have come unquestioningly to accept the dictum of science concerning the proper method of investigating consciousness itself.

But the essential superiority of the knower to the known which obtains between rational intelligence and natural phenomena by no means determines the relation of knower to known as between rational consciousness and the essential nature of man. The most that any psychologist can claim for his own consciousness is that it exists, but its existence, obviously, is conditioned by its po- [XIV:11:335] sition relative to the entire stream. The psychologist's self-consciousness may appear to him complete and aware of no higher existences, but this very completeness may conceivably correspond to a mere stagnant pool shut off from the main current. For even the most dogmatic psychologist cannot avoid the differentiation between minds, the differentiation manifested perceptibly between Shakespeare and his readers, for example, or between Christ and his followers. But the materialistic psychologist explains all such differentiation without altering the essential character of his own consciousness in the least—without even, apparently, realizing any need for altering it. He explains genius, whether religious or artistic, by establishing its factors in terms of heredity, environment or physiological status. Genius appears to him either a greater accumulation of elements present in every mind, or their mere superior arrangement, or, on the contrary, their disarrangement into abnormal states. In other words, he translates the phenomena of consciousness into a medium lower than consciousness itself. He breaks consciousness up into elements similar in degree to the elements which are the raw material, the objective, of natural science. Since the psychologist cannot remove the manifestation of genius—its religion or its poetry—he solicits every possible circumstance of heredity, environment and physiology to sustain his own inherent, unalterable conscious perspective, thereby, for the unwary, obscuring the very fact at issue: that genius is not the power of impression but the power of expression. Genius renders from the inside out, while the psychologist can only register from the outside in. He consequently emphasizes heredity, environment and physiological status because these are all three alike external, material conditions supremely significant to minds whose power of impression surpasses their power of expression, though they are supremely insignificant to minds conscious of possessing an independent creative force. This is not to assert that heredity, environment and physiological factors do not condition expression, for they do; but their influence is limited to conditioning the form, the extent and sometimes the direction which expression assumes: not one of them singly, nor all combined, can explain the force by which they are shaken into significant patterns of character and art. Heredity may be as the oil of the lamp, environment may be as the coloured globe, and physiological status as the wick, but genius is the flame. To establish the formula of genius in terms of neurotic instability is to betray unmistakably at last the spiritual prostitution to which science has fallen in these latter days. Its triumph is the triumph of logic merely, which convinces only those who start from the same premise; an ominous triumph in this case, since the authority of science has been able to transform much of the world's reverence for valuable spiritual gifts into indifference or sympathetic contempt as for the victim of some mysterious mental ill.

Though responsibility for accepting a material psychology may be forgiven the general, it is more difficult to overlook the responsibility of the scientist himself. He should have recalled the early history of his own subject, the days of Galileo and Kepler, when reason itself, as the power of establishing authentic laws of matter, was upstream to the priest's consciousness; when the priest, consequently, began his attack against reason by denying its validity and ended by condemning it as a dangerous perversion of human nature. In those days the scientist had to defend himself against a consciousness intellectually so much lower that its attack must have seemed as unreasonable to him as would be the attack of so many trees. But today the psychologist himself, since he cannot create art must obviously be downstream to the artist, just as, since he cannot create devoted faith and self-sacrifice among multitudes of people over centuries of time, [XIV:11:336] he must be even farther downstream with respect to the founders of religion. Had the modern materialist, however, realized the case of his own predecessor, he might have felt himself into the profound truth so far denied his reason; that while language is universal, experience is confined to those inhabiting the same spiritual domain. Religious conviction today, in a world of rational materialism, occupies the same position relative to the scientist as the scientist, in those days of dominant theology, occupied relative to the priest. The position is that of a Macbeth against whom advances the nightmare of Birnum wood.

Into a world rationalized as regards ideal if not action, religion has unexpectedly returned, renewing in men the strange lost sense of the soul. Slipping easily through the meshes of biological "truth", and become a force in consciousness itself, this spiritual renaissance cannot be denied—like an angel in the garrison it can only be recognized and obeyed. By individuals, religious experience can be cherished for its own sake in the very teeth of reason; but one may be certain that in this pragmatic age religion may not establish social forms until science has come to terms with its every claim. The task of testing religion, of course, was never rightly the province of biology, and only appeared so while religion was considered in the perspective of history. In the personal perspective, which its return compels, the task falls once more to psychology. But the psychology born of natural science, as shown, rests upon an absolutely false premise. Its premise does not contain that easily vulnerable falsehood which can be disclosed in terms of the correspondence of phenomena; its premise is the more impregnable falsehood consisting in the fact that the psychologist himself is essentially incapable of fulfilling his function. It is not his method which fails, but his experience. He develops his mental film capably enough. The trouble is that the film is blank.

To indict the psychology, therefore, is to indict the psychologist himself. But to indict the psychologist is also to render verdict against the society accepting a premise whose error it never required an elaborate laboratory or special instruction to expose, but only the determination of the individual heart to safeguard its own fairest hope. Society accepted a material psychology because its strongest determination fell in the material world. Spiritual affirmation there has been, even under the reign of the gods of coal and iron, but affirmation which cast back to the days when science could reasonably be ignored. Increasingly now there is spiritual experience among those who would not ignore science even if they could, but these minds still hesitate to press their claims against an authority traditionally opposed to that claim, and one whose method and positive achievement they rightly admire.

The scientific mind came to be considered the true type of supreme intelligence as the result of three distinct influences: the triumph of science over theology in the question of facts; the positive achievement of science in its own field; and last but not least, the rise of universal education. The rapid spread of literacy, and the growing need of education as part of one's equipment for labour, served to identify science with the new effectiveness and advantages of education itself. Knowledge came to imply book knowledge, and the reader of books attributed his own new sense of increased power, naturally enough, to the sources from which it was chiefly supplied. The triumph of natural science as ideal standard of truth was made complete by the basis it seemed to render all men for a conviction of intellectual self-sufficiency. But universal education was made possible only by enthroning the lowest of all intellectual faculties, memory. Memory alone will give the [XIV:11:337] student possession enough of his texts to meet an institutional standard, because institutional standards necessarily make education a matter of receptivity; and the mastery of only a few books under this system creates in the student's mind the conviction that he could, if he so desired, succeed to the heritage of all human wisdom. All human wisdom supposedly being reducible to three feet of wood-pulp and leather. It would be merely a question of adding more rungs to the ladder already begun. This feeling on the part of students has created a tendency on the part of their masters to re-write all old works for which a new need was felt—especially history and philosophy—and to re-write them in terms of the modern standard. In the process of translating history and philosophy into the language of economic values, much unsound material undoubtedly was cut away; but the translators cut away also even more material which had permanent significance as witnessing the faith of men in their own spiritual destiny. Faults of an unscientific material were attributed to the maker's mind; an easy superiority of fact was considered an equally easy superiority of intelligence. Thus another influence was added to the economic pressure already operating toward opportunism, and co-operating with it prevented the average person from perceiving the gap intervening between the receptive mind, whose faculty is memory, and the creative mind, whose faculty is insight. The heritage to all human wisdom, the proud boast of democracy in education, is a heritage of external fact merely. To the true heritage of wisdom, the quality attaching to minds independently of their material, there have appeared few heirs; for minds so trained, so penetrated from the beginning with the need to go on, ever on, through field after field of fact, seldom have opportunity to realize that there soon comes a point where the longest ladder will not serve, but wings are required. Never suspecting his own inadequate psychic instrument, the modern layman does not suspect the inadequacy of the scientist's intelligence for the task of psychology. The scientist, indeed, has only succeeded to the Parthian victory of the priest—that victory whose tragedy consists in the fact that, having been too easily won, it leads the victor to overestimate his own powers.

For these reasons, then, the nineteenth century was content to huddle upon one small island in the sea of human consciousness. It not only cut itself off from the larger area of ancient experience, but even vaunted its own ability to do so as the symbol of truest intellectual freedom. But that small island has been revealed in all its abject desolation by the War. Two waves of experience, rolling from opposite directions, have overwhelmed it forever: the soldier's consecration to a spiritual power not received from without but welling up in his own being, and the civilian's realization that social stability, even for prosperity on its lowest terms, requires a directive force not resident in the scientific ideal. The scientific ideal has served not life but death, thereby revealing itself less as the criminal to be punished than as the servant to be put under control. Its authority to establish a final standard of truth has, at any rate, been discredited; the problem now is rather to organize a new conviction than to reinterpret an old doubt.

III

As a matter of fact, at the very moment when the cleavage appears between consciousness and natural phenomena, the real contribution science has made the race in the way of thought now first becomes evident. Turning once more, in the light of personal aspiration, to direct contact with spiritual conviction in its original sources, we are struck by the fact that this conviction, from lack of precise and mutual knowledge, possessed an inadequate instrument of [XIV:11:338] thought by which to express itself to other minds. The soul of the older, pre-scientific race expressed itself as a kind of poetry, by allusion and image; expression whose content is therefore necessarily limited to those sharing the key. Real enough to the possessor, religion became dark and shadowy in the process of transfer from one to another mind. Viewed from the perspective of inexperience, its concepts are as actors whose backs are turned to the audience, losing the plot in the mazes of half-heard echo. The man of religion spoke a language apart, a lover's language, certain that his every winged word would find a nest in the heart of him moved by the same passion; unable to image that passion completely to the cold. In other words, religion was given the race in the form of implicit knowledge, a knowledge continually betrayed when translated into the medium of customary speech. But science, creating an external universe mutually perceptible and firmly grasped, has made knowledge explicit. Steeped in the habits of explicit thought, the modern mind differs from the ancient mind not so much in thinking different thoughts as in thinking the same thoughts in a different way. Science has placed the transfer of experience upon a new, socialized basis. The actor now faces his audience, revealing the whole plot. One mind can give its all to another mind through their mutual possession of the same external universe. Slowly but surely knowledge has been turned inside out. This fact, the necessity of science, is also the opportunity of religion. For the first time may we perceive another's soul as positive light in the world of communicable thought, not merely as negative, shadow. For the first time is the mystery of being captured from knowledge, where it perishes, and given the knower, where it lives on. For the first time also can religion be socialized above and beyond ritual and form on the plane of explicit instruction. And the development of mind as self-consciousness from thought implicit to thought explicit actually turns both ways, enabling us to perceive at last that religion and science required one another from the beginning—that the relation of one to the other, in fact, is nothing more or less than the relation of soul and body in the social organization.

The angel in the garrison

Part IV¹

If the real problem at issue were the difference in degree which exists between the consciousness of the material psychologist, or the believer in material psychology, and the man who has undergone spiritual experience, the argument would stick fast on the shoals of practical impossibility. But this is not the problem at issue. However it may appear, spiritual experience is not a personal, untransferable gift, like talent or temperament. The chief point to be examined is less that the "spiritual" mind differs from the "material" mind in degree than that, wherever on the stream of reality the latter happens to be located, it faces the other way. The material mind faces downstream. This is the source of their disagreement, that the scientific attitude has its back to the religious attitude. The scientific attitude is concerned with a reality not only downstream to spiritual attainment, but downstream to its own being. Its point of view upon the human drama is the point of view of the lower natural order. The properties of its spectacles it attributes to its eye.

The basis of science is the conviction that conscious states derive as effects from physiological conditions. This conviction is one capable of proof. The proof itself is unquestionably sound to those establishing it. The proof consists of fact as well as theory, of demonstration as well as hypothesis. The proof cannot rationally be denied, but actually, however, it can be overstepped. For physiological conditions, while they do determine states of consciousness, and do so in human conduct as rigorously as the procedure of mathematics, are causal only for the minds facing downstream. The law holds, but it is not the only law. For minds facing upstream—even from the bottom of the stream itself—another law, apparently contradictory, operates. For the consciousness which has learned to seek its reality upstream, in the spiritual order, that which was cause becomes effect, and that which was effect becomes cause. Consciousness dilates, aware of itself as knower rather than mere repository of knowledge, as steadfast love rather than capricious lover; regards its previous state as death compared to life, as seed compared with flower; and stepping as it were from the moonlight of reflected being into the sunlight of being direct and essential, perceives the tyranny of nature replaced by the intimate regard of one all-sustaining Friend. This is the difference, then, between the two attitudes we call spiritual and material: that the spiritualized mind faces the sun of life, the materialized mind its own projected shadow.

Much confusion exists as the result of the terms “inner” life and “outer” life, which serve less to distinguish the upstream from the downstream of consciousness than to oppose inactivity to activity of conduct. The mind turned upon itself for nourishment too frequently asks for bread and receives a stone. The mind’s sustenance is actually not what it contains, in the way of acquired ideas or even personal talents, but what it receives, in the way that a spring receives fresh water or a flower receives light. The well-stored mind, especially the mind with a talent, undoubtedly has, in comparison, a semblance of independent “inner” life, but this independence is by comparison merely, as by comparison the camel is able to go without food. The real life of man is not thought but recognition of God. The first step toward real life is not to acquire more ideas, but to effect a different attitude. In other [XIV:12:363] words, the first step is to turn consciousness about from a downstream perception to a perception upstream. This involves the mind as the mirror of reality, not as the storehouse of impressions. Memory and imagination are not concerned; what is concerned is insight, the dove sent forth from the ark of consciousness to find a point of dry land.

Here lies the preliminary difficulty which diverts many modern minds from spiritual attainment to psychic development—that in and by itself the intelligence is not a boat which can readily be turned about, but rather like the breath by which the mirror is obscured. The capacity of minds to take on new ideas and discard old ones is not like the ship’s freedom of movement about the sea, but the passenger’s freedom about the ship. It does not avoid the consequences of wreck, if toward wreck the vessel is directed. All the customary faculties, memory, will, reason, which in the material mind are concerned with the lesser interest, and exist in terms of the lesser interest, must be detached, from that object and made to function for a different end. That change in the character of consciousness which transmutes material into spiritual being depends upon an awareness of self not as passenger in the ship, but as the ship itself.

Spiritual development, consequently, is a matter of humility, that humility which follows the loss of the sense of independence self-contained. The true nature of humility is not hateful self-abasement, but the perception of an object of devotion which creates a joy so profound that self is forgotten. An example of real humility is the youth possessing elements of greatness in art. At this stage, the mind is downstream to attainment, but pointed upstream to attainment in others because this attitude serves the instinctive best interests of the awakening mind. It receives impressions from the masterpieces of art in the only way that impressions retain their dynamic quality, by giving them entrance into the mind as from above, in terms of the same qualities by virtue of which the masterpieces were originally created. It reverences that aspect of other minds which it reverences in itself. Genius is far nearer the attitude of humility than is mediocrity. It is the capacity for humility which sets one upon the way of power. That capacity is never a matter of the physical will, whose instinct is to dominate, but of the spiritual will, whose nature is to be inspired. In the spiritual world, the virtues arrange themselves in a scale the reverse of the physical virtues. Possession and domination follow last; the foremost are obedience and response.

However, obedience and response bring strength only to the mind that has found levels of being higher than its own. To respond to new impulses within self, originated by self, merely substitutes one incapacity for another. Darkness cannot drive itself away, it flees only from light. Efforts to achieve religion through a mere understanding of new ideas may change the image in the mirror; it will not remove the blur. One confronts the fact here that religion has nearly everywhere been reduced to the lower terms of knowledge or conduct, so that society closes round the inquiring mind a darkness like its own. All things of all lives can be explained in terms of material intelligence, for every experience entering the material intelligence, either at first or second hand, takes on the shadow of the closed room. The problem as to whether spiritual reality actually exists is not like the question as to whether a certain picture hangs in a locked room, which depends upon the picture, but the question is whether the picture contains the quality of beauty, which depends also upon the inquiring eye.

The book of Job is the eternal drama of the search for God, for spiritual reality, on the part of a consciousness surrounded by materialism. The name of religion is constantly employed, and [XIV:12:364] the authority of religion freely acknowledged, but the miracle of the spiritual life cannot be performed. Job himself was one with his environment until cast outside its resources by extremity of misfortune and pain. Even when feeling himself outside, he turns again and again to it for consolation. Job's friends typify the various ideas held about the spiritual life by complacently darkened minds. One and all, these are but material attitudes disguised under the terminology of faith. One and all, they represent mind in its relation to the downstream of experience—their content is derived from the usages of society, and all they actually know of the eagle is the empty nest. The God of Job's friends is nature adapted to the social organism. But the walls of Job's mind have been broken through as by the weight of a falling tree. He has learned the limit of darkness for the first time through the power of light. Little by little his being adapts itself to the direct rays of the sun, until his intelligence formulates the astonishment of the sprouted seed. He stands outside himself as the sprout stands outside the seed; all his senses respond to their vital power of expansion through a new cycle of growth. From being one who had derived all his happiness from possession, he becomes one who brings to possession a greater joy. From being dependent on things, he learns to render the material world to his new vision as means to an end. He learns that spiritual reality is not the mirage of social prosperity, but social prosperity is its mirage. He learns that the way to God is not that narrow, crowded gate which typifies social competition, but the freedom of every sail to receive the wind once the sail has been unfurled. The path of the spirit brings many agonies, but these have to do with unfurling the sails; never do they mean that the wind has fallen to a dead calm.

In his endeavour to reach upstream to that self we make remote under the cloudy title "soul", Job left behind every element of thought and emotion, every faculty and attribute, and breasted the current only by becoming one selfless detachment from desire. His consciousness passed as it were through the narrow door of death, where the back carries no burden and the hands no gift. His lost lands and his lost loves merely objectify his loss of the habitual factors of self; his physical agony in the same way represents supreme mental confusion, the quivering patches of shadow and light. But on the further side of that door, when the process came to fulfilment, to Job was rendered back his memory and will, his desires and thoughts and emotions, his recognitions and relationships—all the possessions of self by which being is maintained. But their moment of annihilation in “death” had severed their attachment to the physical centres of life; and their return was as the agencies of spirit. Immortality ascended into his life as sap to the bud in spring. Without physical death, he entered heaven from the earth of his own nature. The heaven he entered was not merely that easier environment which allows “soul” to exist as summer allows existence to the butterfly; it was itself established through the power of his own new perception. Soul does not come by wishing for heaven—heaven comes with the attainment of soul. All the emphasis religion brings to bear on life, in material societies, is vain and sterile by reason of our submission to the mere continuity of time. We remain on the surface of self as the fly upon water. We recognize the supreme transformations of death, but we attribute them to the physical death shared by the serpent and the weed. We develop the strength of giants for the downstream of things, but for their upstream reality we remain as children in the womb. The defensive armour we have cast from our bodies we still retain for our minds. We avoid the Armageddon of self by keeping within that darkened cave where the sun of truth enters not. [XIV:12:365]

There are three stages in spiritual development; the first is that in which consciousness is like the passengers in a ship, borne they know not where; in the second stage, consciousness becomes as it were the ship itself; but in the third stage it seems like the very sea. To the ship, storms are ominous, fatal—to the sea they are passages of its eternal music, evidences of its greatness, renewers of its power. From this condition the soul looks out upon the world neither as conqueror nor slave, but as an actor in the drama of God.

The reason that a spiritual leader like Gandhi seems to be recognized by the world more readily than is the spiritual Servant, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, comes from the fact that Gandhi’s influence operates directly in the field of politics, which everybody understands and most people consider supremely important, while ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s influence operates directly upon the unseen world of the soul, which alas few people give the first or in fact any vital place in the scheme of life. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was and is invisible to all save those who are truly humble: to them he is more visible than the sun. In the steadfastness of this supreme conviction the friends of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá may gaze serenely out upon the epic happenings of the day, beholding Job relived in the struggles and agonies of humanity itself; pain multiplied everywhere as never before, until through darkness as of annihilation, men become aware of the sound of the Voice of God.

The scientific religion

Kate Kempner

Professor Auguste Forel, the famous French psychiatrist, out lines in a pamphlet, Homme et Fourmi, (Lausanne 1923) a so-called programme human practicable—a practicable programme for mankind which in some form or other must be adopted, if humanity is to survive the destructive forces of civilization—war, alcoholism, etc. Among other points Professor Forel states the necessity of a universal international auxiliary language, as well as that of a universal religion, which he calls the scientific, synthetic, super-national religion of the Bahá’ís for the commonwealth of the world—without dogma, without clergy. He says that in 1920 he learned of the existence of the Bahá’í Faith, founded almost seventy years before, in the Orient, which gives itself to the service of mankind, to which Christian, Buddhist, Muslim, Brahman, Jew or Monist can belong, which leaves aside all discussion of the metaphysical nature of God, the Devil, paradise, hell, etc.

When Professor Forel found the Bahá'í Movement; he who previously had been opposed to the existing religions, because he saw nothing but creeds and sects, obscuring the reality of religion, became a follower of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

He founded a Bahá'í group in Zurich, Switzerland, and professes that according to his opinion [that the] Bahá'í Faith is the religion of the future.

The Bahá'í peace plan¹

'Abdu'l-Bahá's plan for universal peace begins with certain divine principles. Its central note is universality: "Every universal cause is divine and every particular one is temporal. The principles of the divine Manifestations of God were, therefore, all-universal and all-inclusive.

"Every imperfect soul is self-centred and thinketh only of his own good. But as his thoughts expand a little he will begin to think of the welfare and comfort of his family. If his ideas still more widen, his concern will be the felicity of his fellow citizens; and if still they widen, he will be thinking of the glory of his land and of his race. But when ideas and views reach the utmost degree of expansion and attain the stage of perfection, then will he be interested in the exaltation of humankind. He will then be the well-wisher of all men and the seeker of the weal and prosperity of all lands. This is indicative of perfection."²

To overcome the antagonistic forces of nature, its narrowness, its prejudices, its selfishness, its instinct of the survival of the fittest, its accumulated traditions of war, the successful peace plan must be based upon the adamant law of the universe—the universal justice of God. Only that peace plan which has God behind it can hope to be triumphant.

This, then, in part and in outline is the divine peace plan revealed by Bahá'u'lláh over fifty years ago, and presented by 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the last twenty years to all parts of the world.

1. All must investigate the truth with an independent mind, with the eye of [XIV:11:340] justice, if they are to find God's new path to universal peace.

2. The foundation of the palace of peace is the consciousness of the oneness of mankind. All are God's children. He is kind to all. He loves all. He nourishes all. "In every century a particular and central theme is, in accordance with the requirements of that century, confirmed by God. In this illumined age that which is confirmed is the oneness of the world of humanity. Every soul who serveth this oneness will undoubtedly be assisted and confirmed."³ "Therefore we must promulgate divine teachings", "proclaim the oneness of the world of humanity", "that ignorant, religious, racial, political and even patriotic prejudices may vanish and the earth become one home and all people be unified."

3. To establish universal peace all the nations will need to hold a universal conference and establish a Parliament of Man, a supreme tribunal which shall represent every nation of the world, its people and its government. Its representatives in this universal conference should be "two or three persons who are the choicest men of that nation, and are well informed concerning international laws and the relations between governments and aware of the essential needs of the world of humanity in this day. The number of these representatives should be in proportion to the number of inhabitants of that country.”¹ These representatives should choose the members of the International Court of Arbitral Justice. The organization of this World Society of nations and its supreme tribunal should be written into a universal treaty, in which “the limits and frontiers of each and every nation should be clearly fixed, [and] the principles underlying the relations of governments towards one another definitely laid down, ...”,² and its special, national interests preserved.

4. In this treaty “the size of the armaments of every government should be strictly limited, ...”³ “By a general agreement all the governments of the world must disarm simultaneously. It will not do if one lays down the arms and the other refuses to do so.”⁴ “Once the Parliament of Man is established and its constituent parts organized, the governments of the world having entered into a covenant of eternal friendship will have no need of keeping large standing armies and navies. A few battalions to preserve internal order, and an International Police to keep the highways of the sea clear, are all that will be necessary. Then these huge sums will be diverted to other more useful channels, pauperism will disappear, knowledge will increase, the victories of Peace will be sung by poets and bards, knowledge will improve the conditions and mankind will be rocked in the cradle of felicity and bliss.”⁵

5. All the nations having chosen the Supreme Tribunal, all mankind should enforce its decisions. “First; the financiers and bankers must desist from lending money to any government contemplating the waging of an unjust war upon an innocent nation. Second: the presidents and managers of the railroads and steamship companies must refrain from transporting war ammunition, infernal engines, guns, cannons and powder from one country into another. Third: the soldiers must petition, through their representatives, the Ministers of War, the politicians, the Congressmen and the generals to put forth in clear, intelligible language the reasons and the causes which have brought them to the brink of such a national calamity. The soldiers must demand this as one of their prerogatives. ‘Demonstrate to us,’ they must say, ‘that this is a just war, and we will then enter into the battlefield; otherwise we will not take one step.’”⁶

As a last measure, all the nations will use their limited armies and their international police to bring the offending nation to submit to the decisions of the Supreme Tribunal.

6. To render successful the army of peace and to make it triumphant the society of nations will need to enlist every force that makes for the unification of mankind: [XIV:11:341]

- a) A universal language, to be chosen by the world conference and taught in all the schools of all nations in addition to the mother tongue.
- b) Universal, full participation of the women in the suffrage and the political counsels of the nations. “If, in the future, women like unto men are given the franchise assuredly they will prevent the occurrence of war.”⁷
- c) The establishment of a just economic order to be established by the united assemblies of the governments of the world, “so that neither the capitalist suffer from enormous losses nor the labourers become needy. ... When such a general plan is adopted by the will of both sides, should a strike occur, all the governments of the world collectively should resist it.”⁸

d) Universal education for peace. “The education of all the children of all the religions, under a universal standard of instruction and a common curriculum.” “The duty of educated men is to teach in the universities and schools ideas concerning universal peace so that the student may be so moulded that in after years he may help to carry to fruition this most useful and human issue of mankind.”

7. The supreme force for unity and peace is religion. But to be successful religion must be stated in accordance with modern thought, united with modern science. True religion and true science will then flood the world with light upon light. Fundamentally there is only one truth, one reality, one religion—the oneness of God, the oneness of mankind, the power of the Holy Spirit.

8. Divine civilization through the spiritual conquest of nature is the goal of the radiant century before us. Material civilization is the lamp; divine civilization is the light.

“Thou observest that at present the East and the West are enveloped in the darkness of the world of nature. Almost everybody is pursuing material interests. They are like unto other animals that are drowned in the world of nature. The cow is an absolute materialist and is completely enslaved by nature. She has no knowledge of the world of humanity and has no trace of spiritual power. She is drowned in the world of nature. She is, according to the phraseology of the civilized ones, a great naturalist, because she comprehends nothing but perceptible objects and counts them as a determined fact. She has not perceived the fragrance of spiritual feelings, human discoveries and intellectual sciences. She is a pure materialist.

“In short, today the life of the world of humanity is the teachings of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, provided they are practised, so that they may raise the pavilion of the oneness of the world of humanity, uproot the antiquated and decadent prejudices and emancipate (all) from the blind imitations of the people of superstition, or, according to the saying of Christ, bring the second birth, and the birth from the spirit be realized.”

“The teachings of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh like unto the rays of the sun illumined the East as well as the West, vivify the dead and unite the various religions. They prove the Oneness of God, for they gather all communities of the world under the pavilion of the oneness of the world of mankind.

“Consider how stirred the world is and in what a commotion are the people of the world. Heavenly Power is needed to do away with this stir and agitation. Otherwise, this great Cause will not be realized through human power. Human power, no matter how strong it may be, it illumines like unto an ignited lamp a limited space and trains a small number of souls. It is the sun which illumines all regions, and it is the Heavenly Power which gathers around a single spot all the sects and communities. Strive therefore, that thou mayest serve this remarkable Power and attain unto profitable and far reaching results.”¹

Extracts from tablets of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Addressed to Mrs Isabella D. Brittingham

O thou who art spreading the fragrances of God! Verily, thy letter was received and I was informed of thy chanting the Verses of God in the spiritual assemblies, of thy excellent speech and eloquent address in the illumined gatherings. I ask God to confirm thee by the Breaths of the Holy Spirit, so that explanations may flow from thy tongue like unto the flowing of the river and the meetings may be shaken by thy stating the proofs of the appearance of the Kingdom of God and the diffusion of the fragrances of God in this wonderful, glorious and excellent century.

¹ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Japan Will Turn Ablaze, p. 36. [Last three paragraphs.]

O handmaiden of God! Verily, God has confirmed thee in spreading the fragrances of God in those climes. Be a pillar of fire and a cloud of light and a blessed tree in the vineyard of God, the Precious, the Forgiving.

As to trials (tests in the path of God), verily, they are necessary. Hast thou not heard and read how there appeared trials from God in the day of Jesus, and thereafter, and how the whirlwind of tests became severe? Even the glorious Peter was not rescued from the flame of trials, and wavered. Then he repented and mourned the mourning of a bereaved one and his lamentations reached unto the Celestial Concourse. Is it, then, possible to be saved from the trials of God? No, verily. There is a great wisdom therein, of which no one is aware save the wise and knowing.

Were it not for tests genuine gold could not be distinguished from the counterfeit. Were it not for tests the courageous could not be known from the coward. Were it not for tests the people of faithfulness could not be known from those of selfishness. Were it not for tests the intellects and faculties of the scholars in the great colleges would not be developed. Were it not for tests the sparkling gems could not be known from worthless pebbles. Were it not for tests the fisherman could not be distinguished from Annanias and Caiaphas who were amid glory (worldly dignity). Were it not for tests the face of Mary, the Magdalene, would not glisten with the light of firmness and certainty unto all horizons. These are some of the mysteries of tests which we have unfolded unto thee that thou mayest become cognizant of the mysteries of God in every cycle. Verily, I pray God to illumine the faces as pure gold in the fire of tests.

As the servants and the handmaidens of the Merciful stand firmly and persevere, the good seed will soon grow in the field and bear the fruit of blessing. Then will spirituality and fragrance prevail and joy and rejoicing come from the Heavenly Sphere, sorrows and toil shall be forgotten and eternal peace and rest appear.

Regarding the two wings of the soul, these mean wings of ascent. One is the wing of knowledge, the other of faith, for these are the means of the ascent of the human soul to the lofty station of divine perfection.

The story of the princess

Adapted from lectures given by Jináb-i-Ávárih in England.

Shamsí-Jahán Khánum, whose [first] name means “Sun of the World”, was a granddaughter of Sháh Fath-‘Alí and a relative of the then Sháh. She was interested in religion and had made a pilgrimage to Mecca. Because of this pilgrimage she was called Hájí Khánum. She heard that Qurratu’l-‘Ayn wrote beautiful poems, and as she herself occasionally wrote poetry she longed to see the poems of Qurratu’l-‘Ayn.

One day she and her maids went out, under pretence of taking a walk. They came to the garden of the Kalántar¹ and entering it Hájí Khánum gradually approached the house in whose top story Qurratu’l-‘Ayn was imprisoned. The Princess later wrote a book of poetry—it is in her own handwriting and in my possession—in which she describes her experience. When she reached the building she turned to God and said, “O God, if this Cause is true, make Qurratu’l-‘Ayn come forward and let me see her.”

“As soon as I had thus prayed,” she writes, “the window of the top story suddenly opened and Qurratu’l-‘Ayn, like a brilliant sun, looked out and called to me, ‘What dost thou want, O Princess?’

¹ The Mayor or Governor. See Life of Qurratu’l-‘Ayn, Star of the West, XIV:5, pp. 138–143.

“I was so astonished that I stared at her, solemnly, and then began to cry. She smiled and laughed at me and when I saw this I was deeply affected. It seemed to me strange that I, a Princess and quite free, should be walking into this garden and crying, while she, a prisoner in that little room, was laughing.

“I said to her, ‘O Lady, I would like to know why you are imprisoned?’

“She replied, ‘Because I have spoken the truth. Why did the descendants of Muḥammad fall into captivity? Because they, also, spoke the truth.’

“I asked her, ‘Where is the truth?’

“She said, ‘The centre of truth appeared in the world and they killed him.’

“I asked her, ‘Is it the one they killed in Tabríz?’

“‘Yes,’ she answered. ‘He was our Promised One, your Promised One and mine, and they martyred him.’ [XIV:12:360]

“Then I asked, ‘Who were those people who were in the Fortress of Ṭabarsí?’

“She said, ‘They, also, were his disciples.’”

The Princess now writes, “At this point in our conversation the guards suddenly heard me and came rushing into the garden; but before I was aware of their approach Qurratu’l-‘Ayn called to me, ‘O Princess, go, lest you fall into trouble!’ and she shut the window and withdrew. Then the servants of the Kalántar came up to me and said, ‘What are you doing here, Lady?’

“Vexed with them, I replied, ‘I came here for a walk.’

“Although they knew what was my object yet, out of respect, they merely replied, ‘Very well. Now that you have finished your walk, kindly leave the place.’

“For several days after this I wept and cried, and I longed to see once more this lady, the prisoner, until at last God heard my prayer and again I saw Qurratu’l-‘Ayn, at the wedding of the son of the Kalántar.”

While Qurratu’l-‘Ayn was a prisoner in the house of the Kalántar one of his sons married a young girl. The night of the wedding, when all the Princesses and the ladies of the Royal Household were assembled in the Kalántar’s home, one of these royal ladies said, “It would be interesting to see that Bahá’í lady who is a prisoner here.” All the ladies joined in her wish, and asked for Qurratu’l-‘Ayn. Finally they sent a message to the Kalántar beseeching him and saying that it would be a real joy, and a wedding present if he would let them see the prisoner.

They sent for Qurratu’l-‘Ayn and brought her from her prison room to the wedding feast. One of the Princesses described her thus: “When I saw her my heart was filled with happiness. When Qurratu’l-‘Ayn entered the room, she was so beautiful and so dignified, and when she spoke it was with such power that we in the room gradually turned to her and came and listened to her, and forgot all about the wedding.” She spoke with great enthusiasm—and now she related her sorrows, in stories, and the ladies began to weep, and again she told them stories that made them laugh, and as she walked up and down the room she chanted her poems in so wonderful a way that everyone was astonished. No one of the ladies wished to hear or to see any more of the wedding festivities; nay rather, they listened to her almost the entire evening. And as a result of that night’s experience many of those ladies, of whom the Princess, Ḥájí Khánúm, was one, became firm followers of the Cause.

From this night all the ladies of the Kalántar’s household were greatly attached to Qurratu’l-‘Ayn. They asked the Kalántar’s permission to have her live in the house with them, rather than in the little room in the garden. So she was brought to the house and was closely associated with the ladies there. One of the maids in the house of the Kalántar tells that Qurratu'l-'Ayn, the prisoner, radiated such love, greatness, power and majesty to everyone there that all, both ladies and maids, became so devoted to her that they would have given their lives for her.

Some years later, the Princess, Hájí Khánum, heard that one of the sons of Mírzá Buzurg, Minister of Persia and the father of Bahá'u'lláh, had become the leader of the Bábí Movement, but she did not know which of the sons this was. She questioned a friend who, misinformed herself, told her that Mírzá Yaḥyá Azal was the one.

For ten years the Princess waited, constantly expecting this son of Mírzá Buzurg to take the place of the Báb and very eager to see him. At last she started forth on a pilgrimage to Karbilá and on the way arrived in Baghdád. Here she made inquiries for Mírzá Yaḥyá Azal and was shown his home.

She sent a friend with an invitation to [XIV:12:361] him, saying, "I wish to talk with you for about an hour."

When Mírzá Yaḥyá heard the name of the Princess he was frightened and said, "This Lady is of the Royal Family and will cause us trouble. Do not inform her and do not let her come here to me."

When this was repeated to the Princess she was astonished, and said, "If this man is the right one, the true one, then how is it that he does not know of my longing and my love for the Cause?"

Again she sent a message to him, saying, "If you are afraid that I will betray you then send someone to burn the tip of my tongue or to cut my tongue so that I will not be able to speak. I want only to see you for a little while as you are from God."

This answer made Mírzá Yaḥyá still more afraid, and he said, "Do not let her come here at all."

The Princess became angry at this answer and she decided to return to Persia and to re-convert to their old beliefs those whom she had taught.

Suddenly, one of the servants of Bahá'u'lláh came to her, and said, "Do not be depressed and sad. The light, the truth is somewhere else. The one whom you seek is the brother of Azal, and he has sent me here to invite you to come and see him tomorrow."

The Princess now became very happy, and she spent the whole night in prayer, weeping and waiting for the day. She reasoned with herself, saying, "Suppose, tomorrow, I go, and am not able to ask the questions which distress me! I had better write them down."

So she wrote all her questions on a piece of paper which she put under her pillow, in order to be ready to ask them the next day.

Early in the morning the servant of Bahá'u'lláh came to her, and said, "Bahá'u'lláh invites you to come, and to bring your questions with you."

She was amazed, and she thought, "Who has told Bahá'u'lláh that I have questions!"

Constantly she said to herself, "This one is the true one, and not Azal."

In an entirely new frame of mind, she went to the home of Bahá'u'lláh, taking her questions with her. When she arrived Bahá'u'lláh was walking up and down inside the house. The moment she saw him, the Blessed One, she fell upon her knees.

Bahá'u'lláh came forward and raised her up, encouraging her, and saying, "Do not be troubled; all is well." Then she wept for joy, and unhesitatingly she accepted his Reality, saying, even, "Thou art God."

He answered, "No, God forbid. God is far beyond being in a body."

She said, "If you are not God then who told you that I am depressed and that I was going back to Persia and that I have questions to ask."

He said, "Nay, I am not God, but God told me of these things."

Before she looked at her questions, he began to answer those very questions which she had written down.

This story was recorded by the Princess herself, in her own hand-writing, and the book is in my possession.

After a time, she left, but Bahá'u'lláh promised her that she should see him again. She hoped to meet Bahá'u'lláh in Adrianople, but was unable to do so. At last, after ten years, she saw him in 'Akká. She sold all her property in order to secure the money for the journey, and married a man quite outside her own social station, that she might be able to go to 'Akká to see Bahá'u'lláh.

In the East, if a Princess marries a merchant it is considered an extraordinary thing, for she forfeits her rank. But this Princess was so devoted to the Cause that she married Ḥájí Şádiq Káshání, a Bahá'í, and out of her own funds she paid their travelling expenses to 'Akká.

XIV:12, March 1924 [XIV:12:365]

When a soul meets the Master

Fred Mortensen

In my youth my environment was not of the best and being around boys of hard character I guess I determined to be as tough as any, which I very easily did, though inwardly I always had a feeling to be above it all. Still I always felt that I should do in Rome as the Romans do. So I violated any law I saw fit, man's or God's. Strange as it seems to me at times, it was through coming into contact with these laws that I received the opportunity to be guided into this most wonderful Revelation.

My dear mother had done everything in her power to make me a good boy. I have but the deepest love for her and my heart has often been sad when thinking how she must have worried for my safety as well as for my future well-being. Through it all and in a most wonderful way, with a god-like patience, she hoped and prayed that her boy would find the road which leadeth to righteousness and happiness. But environment proved a great barrier to her aspirations and every day in every way I became tougher and tougher. Fighting was a real pleasure, as welcome as a meal, and breaking a grocer's window to steal his fruit or what-not was, as I thought, a great joke.

It happened that one night the "gang" was strolling along, just doing nothing in particular (looking for trouble I guess), when one of the gang said, "Oh look at the swell bunch of bananas." "Gee, I wished I had some," another said. "Do you?" said I. About this time I heard a dog barking inside the store, and looking in, I saw a large bulldog. That seemed to aggravate me and, to show my contempt for the watch-dog, I guess, I broke the window, took the bananas, passed them around and we merrily strolled up the street and I suppose would have sung the song, "Yes, we have bananas", if it had been out at that time.

Making the Jews feel that they were back in Russia was lots of fun. I can't begin to tell you how we enjoyed persecuting them, stealing their wine; breaking their windows, in fact doing everything but setting fire to their homes. I [XIV:12:366] plainly remember that it cost me sixteen dollars to pay for broken windows, to keep out of jail.

The great evil that did so much to make us hard, was the saloon with its attendant evils. My! how tough I have seen fine young fellows become under the influence of liquor. I could tell you many things of a lawless nature, but I write of these few to show what the power of Bahá'u'lláh can do in this day.

I was a fugitive for four years, having walked out of jail while awaiting trial. Then a young fellow was being arrested and I, of course, tried to take him away from the policeman. While this was going on a couple of detectives happened along and in my haste to get away from them I leaped over a thirty-five foot wall, breaking my leg, to escape the bullets whizzing around about—and wound up in the “garden at the feet of the Beloved” as Bahá'u'lláh has so beautifully written it in the Seven Valleys.

At this time I was defended by our departed, but illustrious Bahá'í brother, Albert Hall, to whom I owe many thanks and my everlasting good will for helping to free me from the prison of men and of self. It was he who brought me from out the dark prison house; it was he who told me, hour after hour, about the great love of 'Abdu'l-Bahá for all his children and that he was here to help us show that love for our fellowmen. Honestly, I often wondered then what Mr Hall meant when he talked so much about love, God's love, Bahá'u'lláh's love, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's love, love for the Covenant, love for us, from us to God, to His Prophets, etc. I was bewildered. Still, I returned, to become more bewildered, so I thought; and I wondered why. It was, as I now know, the power of the Holy Spirit drawing one, who wished to be drawn.

Thus the Word of God gave me a new birth, made me a living soul, a revived spirit. I am positive that nothing else upon earth could have changed my character as mine has been changed. I am indeed a new being, changed by the power of the Holy Spirit as manifested through the breaths of God's Chosen Ones in this day. I have been resurrected and made alive in the Kingdom of Abhá.

Again through the attraction of the Holy Spirit I was urged, so it seemed to me, to go to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He was at Green Acre, Maine, at this time, and when I heard the rumour that he might go back to his home (Palestine) and not come west, I immediately determined to go and see him. I wasn't going to miss meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá after waiting so long to see him.

So I left home, going to Cleveland, where I attended a convention of printers for a few days. But I became so restless I could not stay for adjournment. How often I have thought about that trip of mine from Cleveland to Green Acre! The night before leaving Cleveland I had a dream that I was 'Abdu'l-Bahá's guest, that I sat at a long table, and many others were there, too, and of how he walked up and down telling stories, emphasizing with his hand. This, later, was fulfilled and he looked just as I saw him in Cleveland.

As my finances were low I of necessity must hobo my way to Green Acre. The Nickel Plate Railway was my choice, for conveyance to Buffalo, New York. From Buffalo I again rode the rods to Boston, a long ride from around midnight until nine next morning. The Boston and Maine Railway was the last link between 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the outside world so it seemed to me, and when I crawled off from the top of one of its passenger trains at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, I was exceedingly happy. A boat ride, a street car ride, and there I was, at the gate of Paradise. My heart beating double time, I stepped onto the soil of that to-be-famous centre, tired, dirty, and wondering, but happy.

I had a letter of introduction from Mr Hall to Mr Lunt, and in searching for [XIV:12:367] him I met Mrs Edward Kinney, who, dear soul, was kind enough to offer me a bed. She awakened me next morning about six o'clock, saying I'd have to hurry if I wished to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Arriving at the hotel I found quite a number of people there, on the same mission, to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Being one of the last arrivals, I was looking around, to make myself comfortable, when someone exclaimed, “Here he comes now.” Ahmad Sohrab did the introducing and interpreting. When Ahmad introduced me to him, to my astonishment he looked at me and only said, “Ugh! Ugh!” not offering to shake hands with me. Coming as I had, and feeling as I did, I was very much embarrassed. After greeting several others and when about to go to his room, he suddenly turned to me and said in a gruff voice (at least I thought so), “Sit down,” and pointed to a chair—which I didn’t care to do, as elderly ladies were standing. But what was I to do! I meekly obeyed, feeling rebellious over what had happened. Such a welcome, after making that difficult trip! My mind sure was in a whirl.

The first man to receive an interview with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was a doctor; he had written a book on love. It seemed but a minute until Ahmad came down and said, “‘Abdu’l-Bahá wishes to see Mr Mortensen.” Why, I nearly wilted. I wasn’t ready. I hadn’t expected to be called until the very last thing. I had to go, and it was with a strange feeling in my heart and wondering, wondering what would happen next. He welcomed me with a smile and a warm hand-clasp, telling me to be seated, he sitting before me. His first words were, “Welcome! Welcome! You are very welcome,”—then, “Are you happy?”—which was repeated three times. I thought, why do you ask me that so many times? Of course I am happy; didn’t I tell you so the first time?

Then, “Where did you come from?”

Answer: “From Minneapolis.”

Question: “Do you know Mr Hall?”

Answer: “Yes. He told me about the Cause.”

Question: “Did you have a pleasant journey?”

Of all the questions I wished to avoid this was the one! I dropped my gaze to the floor—and again he put the question. I lifted my eyes to his and his were as two black, sparkling jewels, which seemed to look into my very depths. I knew he knew and I must tell, and as I answered I wondered what Ahmad thought—if I was a little unbalanced.

I answered: “I did not come as people generally do, who come to see you.”

Question: “How did you come?”

Answer: “Riding under and on top of the railway trains.”

Question: “Explain how.”

Now as I looked into the eyes of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá I saw they had changed and a wondrous light seemed to pour out. It was the light of love and I felt relieved and very much happier. I explained to him how I rode on the trains, after which he kissed both my cheeks, gave me much fruit, and kissed the dirty hat I wore, which had become soiled on my trip to see him.

When he was ready to leave Green Acre I stood nearby to say goodbye, and to my astonishment he ordered me to get into the automobile with him. After a week with him at Malden, Massachusetts, I left for home with never-to-be forgotten memories of a wonderful event—the meeting of God’s Covenant, The Branch of that Pre-Existent Root; that wonderful Moon that shall shine as the Sun, as the light of seven days and to whom all shall bow and praise His Holy Name.

A few weeks later I again had that wonderful privilege to be near the Covenant for a few moments.

These events are engraved upon the tablet of my heart and I love every moment of them. The words of Bahá’u’lláh are my food, my drink and my life. I have no other aim than to be of service in his pathway and to be obedient to his Covenant.

This is the Power of his Spirit, his love and his mercy to me.

The preservation of Divine guidance

When the divine Manifestation of God leaves the world how will the purity of his teachings and the unity of his Cause be preserved?

Because this question has not been explicitly answered in any of the religions of the past, there have arisen innumerable sects, due to misinterpretations of the teachings and to the ambitions of self-seeking leaders.

In the supreme plan which Bahá'u'lláh has revealed for the establishment of religious unity in this Latter Day, the divine word promises that God will in the future raise up a glorious succession of “temples of unity” who will preserve the purity of his teachings and the unity of His Cause. These “temples of unity” will be descended from the temple of the Manifestation, “to speak in the Kingdom of creation of their Lord, The Supreme, The All-Glorious, and be of those who obtain light by the light of their Lord. ... Verily we have ordained this Temple (the body of the Manifestation) the beginning of the existence of the new creation, that each one may become convinced that I am indeed able to do what I wish, by merely saying, ‘Be’, and it is. By the shadow of each letter of the letters of this Temple, We will send forth people whose number is not known to any save God, the Protector, the Self-Existent; and from it (the Temple) God shall create certain people who will not be veiled by the illusions of those who acted wrongfully against God, and they will drink, at all times, the pure water of life: Verily are not they of those who are successful? ... in their faces the brightness of the Merciful is manifested, and from their hearts the mention of My Hidden and Mighty Name is heard. ... God hath preferred them to all creation, but indeed the people do not know. They move around the Command of God just as the shadow moveth around the sun ... [XIV:12:371] by the movement of these people all things will move, and by their quiescence all things will rest. ... through them the earth was stationed, and the clouds gave out rain, and the table of Knowledge descended from the Heaven of Bounty—were ye of those who understand. These people are the keepers of the Command of God on earth, protecting its beauty against the dust of surmise and suspicion.”¹

In past history, also, we have had a succession of guardians of the Covenant. For instance, Abraham revealed the Covenant of his day; his descendants, Isaac, Jacob and the gracious Joseph guarded the covenant. The Hebrew prophets, Elijah, Amos, Isaiah and the rest came in succession, with the voice of authority, to guard the commands of God. God said to Jeremiah that through him (Jeremiah) was determined the station of the nations. Through Jeremiah He poured the life of the world. He made Jeremiah the spiritual heart of humanity.² Yet his countrymen put Jeremiah in prison and did not recognize his divine station for nearly a hundred years—until his prophecies of the return from the Babylonian captivity to Jerusalem were fulfilled.³ So it is through religious history; the people do not recognize their Guardian, they do not know where the divine voice is speaking, and so they crucify the Prophet whom God sends to save them.

In this radiant day of unity God is sending His Guardians in the family of His Manifestations, in lineal descent, that all may know them and be blessed and protected by them. In this day, as Isaiah prophesied, “Thy teachers” shall not “be hidden any more but thine eyes shall see thy teachers.”⁴ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá took a covenant with his disciples in his last Will and Testament that all shall follow and obey the guidance of God as it speaks through the Guardians of his Cause, and the Universal Spiritual Assembly of which they shall be the life-long head, for both are “under the unerring guidance of His Holiness the Exalted One”.

So a new firmness in the Covenant becomes manifest since the ascension of the Master. Those who love and follow the dayspring of Divine Guidance as it speaks through the pure and selfless spirit and pen of the Guardian of the Cause revealed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá—they are of those who are successful.

Utterances of Bahá’u’lláh

Justice is loved above all. In these days the face of Justice hath become clouded with dust; calamities and afflictions have prevailed, covenants have been violated, and promises broken. The people have become ignorant, unable to distinguish between that which will open their eyes and that which blindeth them; that which leadeth them astray and that which guideth them into the Right Path.

If in these visible days and present world, matters appear from the Realm of Decree contrary to your wishes, be ye not depressed; for Happy and Divine Days shall come and Spiritual World of Holiness shall become manifest, were ye to exchange the Garment of Mortality for the Garment of Immortality and enter the Station of the Paradise of Abhá!

O people, avail yourselves of the Day of God, verily to meet Him is indeed better unto you than that upon which the sun riseth.

The beginning of Wisdom is to acknowledge that which God hath made manifest because through it order hath been firmly established for the preservation of the world. Each one of the Revealed Words is a Strong Fortress for the world. Verily thy Lord maketh to appear in every century that which lie desireth, as a Wisdom on His part. We have ordained unto every land a destiny; unto every hour a fate; unto every Utterance a time; unto every Circumstance a Word! We have committed to the charge of every land the Sun of Knowledge, so that when the time cometh from it will beam a Command on the Part of God, the All-Knowing.

The Light of men is Justice. Adorn the Temple of Dominion with the Embroidered Garment of Justice and Virtue, and its Head with the Diadem of the Celebration of your Lord, the Creator of Heaven and Earth.

Assist with the Hands of Justice the broken hearted, and crush the great oppressors with the scourge of the Command of your Lord, the Powerful, the Wise.

The day of God

Supplication revealed by Bahá’u’lláh

Praise be to Thee, O God of Names and Creator of Heaven! Praise be to Thee, for Thou hast made known unto Thy servants Thy Day, wherein the River of Life streamed forth from the finger of Thy Generosity, and the Fountain of Revelation and Unity became manifest by Thy Manifestation, to all who are in Thy earth and heaven.

O God! This is a Day the Light of which Thou hast sanctified above the sun and its effulgence. I testify that this Day is illumined by the Light of Thy Face and by the effulgence of the dawning Lights of Thy Manifestation.

O Thou, my God, and the Beloved of my heart! With the name of this Day Thou hast adorned Thy Tablet, which is known only to Thee. Thou hast called it The Day of God. Nothing is to be seen therein but Thy Supreme Self, and naught is to be remembered save Thy sweetest Name. Wherefore, when He appeared, the foundations of nations trembled, the learned were bewildered and the wise men were confounded, save those who came near unto Thee, took from the Hand of Favour the pure wine of Thy Inspiration, and drank in Thy Name, saying: "Praise be unto Thee, O Desire of the Nations! Praise be to Thee, O Beloved of the hearts of the yearning!"

Education must include the spiritual ideals of world peace and brotherhood

A compilation from the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

"The duty of educated men, especially university presidents of the nation, is this: To teach in the universities and schools ideas concerning universal peace, so that the student may be so moulded that in after years he may help carry to fruition the most useful and human issue of mankind."

"The schools should be free from all religious and racial prejudices, for these often prevent good results from being obtained. All schools and colleges should have these three foundations.

"First: They should be sincere in the service of training the souls. They should discover the mysteries of nature and extend the circle of art, commerce, etc., so that ignorance and the lack of knowledge will pass away and the lights of science and knowledge shine forth from the horizon of the soul and heart. In all schools and universities, a general rule for training should be made.

"Second: Training in morality is necessary, so that the pupils' good conduct may remain unchanged and so that they may progress in a most befitting manner, become possessed of lofty ideas, lovers of the world of humanity, and so that they will hold fast to the spiritual perfections and to that which does not displease God.

"Third: Service to the world of humanity should be obligatory. Every student should know, with perfect certainty that he is the brother of the people of all religions and nations and that he should be without religious, racial, national, patriotic or political bias, so that he may find the thoughts of universal peace and the love of humankind firmly established in his heart. He should know himself as a servant of human society of all the countries in the world. He should see God as the heavenly father and all the servants as his children, counting all of the nations, parties and sects as one family. The mothers in the homes, the teachers in the schools, the professors in the universities, and the leaders in the lofty gatherings, must cause these thoughts to be penetrative and effective, as the spirit, circulating in the veins and nerves of the children and pupils, so that the world of humanity may be delivered from the calamities of fanaticism, war, battle, hate and obstinacy, and so that the nether world may become the paradise of heaven."

"In this age every face must turn to God! so that spiritual enlightenment will go hand in hand with material education. Material education alone cannot make the world happy.

Spiritual civilization must assist the material. The material civilization is like the lamp, but the spiritual civilization is like the light in the lamp. The lamp without the light is a useless thing.”

The world of the soul

If we search and investigate and travel through the world of the human soul we find it a boundless, measureless and fathomless reality, a reality which is unique, an ocean which is unfathomable and a world which is infinite. Ancient thinkers said there are two worlds: one is the world of human soul and the other the world of nature; both are two unlimited books of God full of knowledge and wisdom and signs of the power of God. They described the philosopher as one whose inner world was a mirror on which was reflected all the images of the outer world; the philosopher became the prototype of all the discovered truth of life.

When we ponder carefully over the soul of man we realize that the effects of the soul conditions are manifest in all the motions and activities of the external man. For example, if the soul is functioning in a vibrant, spiritual, optimistic and happy environment its effect will be instantaneous and most powerful on the physical body. On the other hand, if the soul is in the grip of fear; if it is weak or in a state of melancholy, the body will immediately respond to those vibrations. Fear and imagination have a great effect upon the body of man. For example, if a person is swimming and permits fear to take possession of his soul, he will immediately lose confidence and also control of his movements. If he is walking upon the ridge of a mountain or the top of a high building and fear enters in, he will tremble and fall. A ropewalker illustrates this principle very aptly. Through the reasoning faculty such perfect control is maintained that he walks upon the rope with perfect poise.

Also, the effect of the inner man upon the outer is not limited to the man himself, but has a general effect upon others. If, for instance, someone begins to yawn from fatigue in a group, others will soon follow his example, or if he is full of vivacity and happiness he will electrify [XV:2:48] others around him. These few illustrations point the clear fact that the world of the soul has independent existence; its effect is creative; it reverberates with the vibrations of joy and sorrow, pain and pleasure, friendship and estrangement.

Inasmuch as the soul has this inventive and creative power in the kingdom of imagination, how much more universal will be its scope if it is strengthened and buttressed by the spiritual forces of God. Thus if the soul of man is reinforced by the divine powers and energies, not only his own body will become a perfect example of health and radiation and joy, but he will radiate like the sun those rays of happiness to all who come in touch with him.

The Manifestations of God, the prophets of divinity, are those spiritual educators who have initiated a system of spiritual training based upon this law. The benefit humanity will draw from this system will be commensurate with its application in daily life.

One branch of this system of spiritual education deals with the inculcation of ethics in the lives of men. For example, in the soul of man there are certain tendencies or qualities: one is fear, another courage, another rashness. Now extremes in any direction mean disease and the Manifestations of God come to teach us that fear is evil, recklessness is unwise and that courage is the golden mean. Also, we have a trinity of other tendencies; squandering as one pole and avarice the other. One may be so avaricious that, as the Persian poets express it—the palm of his hand is as dry as the surface of [the] Sahara. The spendthrift wastes money, while generosity again is the golden mean. Also justice is the golden mean between tyranny and a lackadaisical acceptance of humiliation or adversity. Contentment and chastity are two other characteristics that have their extremes.

These five qualities are the five golden rules of ethics. These five pathways lead to a happy, contented life as revealed in the sacred books and taught by the Manifestations of God. If we simply read them, kiss the sacred books as a sign of respect, place them on the shelf and forget them, this will do us no good at all. Theories and words may have an effect upon the lives of men, but Bahá'u'lláh tells us that in the last analysis deeds are the criterion of right and wrong. One may write a most inspiring book or give many lectures on these five qualities without any effect whatever, but if he arises and by his deeds manifests the quality of generosity, for example, by dispensing a portion of his fortune for the alleviation of suffering humanity, his action will have a great effect. The Manifestation of God points to us the road and tells us this is the pathway. If we walk in it, we shall reach a certain destination, but the walking must be done by ourselves; nobody will help us.

This fact is illustrated by the example of a man giving a banquet and preparing all kinds of dishes and when invited to eat, the guest replies: "It is too much trouble—eat it for me." We know the condition of such a man. Those who have not heard about this system of spiritual education are not so much responsible for carrying it out in their lives, but those who affiliate with it and go under its banner are those among the rest of the world who should characterize themselves with its qualities and embody its principles in their lives.

During the last seventy years Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, through their lives and teachings, have trained and educated their followers to be ever watchful—not of others but themselves.

Now this moral training of the soul is one of the branches of spiritual education and we can never characterize ourselves with these golden qualities unless we begin at home with the self within us and try to control that self in order that we may be able to convey the same knowledge of triumph and victory to others.

Progress only through spiritual power

A compilation from the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá [XV:3:65]

It is impossible that 'economic contentment' be realized by the people of the world save through the transforming Power of Faith. For Faith is the solver of every problem. Therefore you must strive to strengthen the foundation of the Religion of God. Through the Power of the Religion of God every difficulty will be disentangled. The Power of the Religion of God will humble the kings and set at naught the crooked motives of those who are in supreme authority. Then endeavour ye that the Power of True Religion which breathes the Spirit of Life into the dead body of the world of humanity may be promulgated. This is the antidote for the poisoned body of the world and a quick healing remedy for the rancorous disease of man.

The life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Part I

Jináb-i-Fáḍil

The life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá is very significant among the lives of the past heavenly educators. If we study the history of the former manifestations of God we realize that the first portion of their lives has been free from anxiety and persecution, while the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá from the day of his birth has been one of vicissitude, trial and painful ordeals.

Moreover, the enemies and foes of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá never ceased to plan and scheme to persecute and bring about his exile and banishment, and to annihilate his revelation. And these people had more general power than the enemies of the former prophets.

One of the Divine Allegorical incidents was that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was born in Tīhrán the same night upon which the Báb proclaimed his mission in Shíráz that is, 23 May 1844. Bahá’u’lláh gave the name of his father to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This name was ‘Abbás but he always called him Master—Áqá—even when he was a little child.

The first few years of the life of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá were spent amid the most tragic and dramatic events of the life of Bahá’u’lláh. He was the centre of the movement, every tragic event revolved around him and his home was the rendezvous of all the Bahá’ís. All the news and all that transpired in the Cause was brought to him.

His home was well known as the headquarters of the Movement and often groups of rowdies would throw stones and try to hurt the inmates. When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was a little child groups of urchins would surround him and try to stone him. Even at the early age of eight or nine years ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had ready witnessed the plotting of the enemies and had seen the friends martyred and guillotined. Up to this age he had seen many headstones of heroes and heroines who had gone to their death with radiant acquiescence.

Most of the time Bahá’u’lláh was absent from home travelling in the interest of the Cause, and visiting the friends in prison. His property was confiscated and both day and night his household was in danger, so there was no opportunity for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to go to school and learn the things which other children have to learn.

Nevertheless such deep and abiding attachment, such tender regard, solicitude and affection existed and was evidenced between ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and Bahá’u’lláh that even in those early days some members felt deeply that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would eventually unfold, develop and explain the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh.

While Bahá’u’lláh was going about or in prison, at a tender age ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the object of regard and reverence of his family; all looked up to him as the head of the family in spite of his youth.

At the age of nine the great exile began. The government banished Bahá’u’lláh with his family in 1852 to the city of Baghdád. During a long cold part of the journey ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was so thinly clad that his toes were frozen twice and the effect was felt by him all the days of his life. Often when he was tired out during the hours of day or night his feet would itch and ache.

During the twelve years of Bahá’u’lláh in Baghdád and Sulamániyyih of Kurdistán and the cave of the Mount of Sar-Galú¹ where he went into retirement for the purpose of uninterrupted communion with God, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was the cause of happiness to his family as well as its hope.

In that period of time when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was between the age of nine and [XV:3:74] twenty he associated with many theologians mystical and philosophical groups. He opened the treasures of his innate knowledge among them, he entered into those deep subjects and elucidated them in such a clear manner that they marvelled at his unlimited fund of information and asked him from what source he had received it. He answered them in these symbolical words: “I received them from my Father.” Therefore, they titled Him—“Eminent Wise Youth.”

The physical general appearance of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was very pleasing. His face and form were beautifully proportioned and he was considered a very handsome youth. He radiated a heavenly spiritual power and carried himself with kingly dignity. As he walked along the streets people admired his carriage and physique, he had such strength and power in his bearing. One of the qualities of the character of 'Abdu'l-Bahá even when he was a youth was his great spiritual fortitude. He had innate poise and balance which no vicissitude could destroy; no one had ever seen him angry and he was never moved or swerved by any outside influence. His physical endurance astonished everyone. He seemed like a great ocean without a ripple on its surface.

Another characteristic of 'Abdu'l-Bahá worthy of emulation was His extreme generosity. In this loving kindness he gave freely of everything he had. It is related that in the home of Bahá'u'lláh there was a beautiful rug upon which he used to sit. One day a poor Arab brought a load of wood to the house. He saw the rug and was very much attracted by its beauty. He handled it caressingly and exclaimed: "Oh, how wonderful it must be to have such a splendid rug to sit upon!" 'Abdu'l-Bahá heard him and said: "If you like the rug, take it." The man would not believe it was really a gift, but for fear he would lose it, he put it over his shoulder and began to run, looking back every few minutes to see if anyone was coming to take it away from him. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "Go on, no one is going to take it away from you." 'Abdu'l-Bahá had a wonderful sense of humour.

When he was but a child he was taken to the mountains to see his father's sheep. There were thousands of them; the shepherds gave him a feast. At the end of the day the chief shepherd came to 'Abdu'l-Bahá and told him he must make a present to the shepherds. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "I have nothing."—the man said, "But you must give something."—So 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "What about the sheep?"—and he gave them all the sheep. When Bahá'u'lláh heard this he laughed and said, "We will have to protect 'Abdu'l-Bahá from himself someday he will give himself away."

Another characteristic of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was his sociability, courtesy and politeness shown to all degrees of society. He associated with the highest officials, and with people of all ranks, giving them his divine knowledge and thereby raising them to a higher level of comprehension. Likewise he went among the most lowly in the same attitude.

In the East people spend years and years of their time trying to perfect themselves in penmanship. It is considered an art of the highest order and a man will spend twenty to fifty years teaching people this calling. 'Abdu'l-Bahá's penmanship was so beautiful and so perfectly in accordance with all the sacred writings of the East that samples of his work were used to copy from. His knowledge of the Arabian and Persian writing was so great that it seemed a miracle to the people though he never studied in his life.

His range of vision was miraculous, and when talking to Arabs they felt the utmost reverence for him. With philosophers and learned men he carried on conversation which astonished them. Without previous study on any of these subjects he could understand and converse and raise the thought for them to [XV:3:75] a much higher level than they themselves were able to reach.

When Bahá'u'lláh was sent forth to his second exile with his family and followers for four months and had to travel through the most inhospitable desert and villages in Mesopotamia, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was constantly protecting and helping him.

During the exile of Bahá'u'lláh and his family for four months in Constantinople and five years in Adrianople, the spiritual attraction of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in his association with many important people was manifested more and more, and won them to him in such a manner that they tried to remove the difficulty of Bahá'u'lláh and help him. For example, the Turkish Governor of Adrianople became so intensely interested that he spent days and nights listening to his conversations. When the order came for the next exile he was unable to give it in person as he was too much affected by sorrow at parting and was obliged to send the summons by letter.

When Bahá'u'lláh and a group of his followers were exiled to 'Akká and were imprisoned in the barracks, as a result of the terrible climate of the city and the loss of nourishing food, the very unhealthy water and abominable conditions of the prison, they were all sick, and some of his followers were relieved by death. Through these dire conditions 'Abdu'l-Bahá was untouched by disease and continually ministered to the needs of the afflicted ones, giving them necessary remedies and cooking their food with his own hands. Thus through his protecting ministrations they all recovered.

After these two years of the terrible imprisonment of Bahá'u'lláh in which no one of his followers was permitted to enter that city to visit him, and the nine years following when Bahá'u'lláh was confined to one little house in 'Akká, through the instrumentality of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and his association with eminent people Bahá'u'lláh was finally, at the end of eleven long years of imprisonment and hardship, permitted to leave the dreadful city of 'Akká and go to a large comfortable house called the Mansion of Bahjí which had beautiful gardens that were brought into existence by the efforts of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In this beautiful place Bahá'u'lláh spent the rest of his days, but 'Abdu'l-Bahá remained in 'Akká with his family, meeting everyone, attending to the solution of problems, interviewing statesmen, governors, lawyers, etc., in regard to different cases. To him all people came for the solution of their difficulties.

'Abdu'l-Bahá protected the Cause from all objections and opposition. Thus Bahá'u'lláh was left free and unhampered to prepare his message for the world and his followers were now able to visit him. One day of each week of his extremely busy life 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to visit Bahá'u'lláh at Bahjí. On these occasions he always walked, thereby showing his attitude of humility towards his father. But after Bahá'u'lláh told him that he must ride, he obeyed him. He would leave the city of 'Akká riding, but when the Mansion of Bahjí came into view he would dismount and walk. On the other hand, upon the recognized days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visits to Bahjí, Bahá'u'lláh would watch for his coming from a second story window, and as soon as he saw him approaching he would call to his household saying, "The Master is coming, go and meet him!" No sooner would father and son meet than one would witness the utmost humility of the son and utmost love and devotion of the father, making the most dramatic picture conceivable. At these times no one was permitted to enter during their conversation, not even the family. No one could understand this mystery between son and father. It makes one recall the words of the Bible where it is declared, "The Father is in the Son and the Son is in the Father." There has never been in the world a relationship so sweet and perfect, with so much [XV:3:76] trust and confidence on both sides. In every way 'Abdu'l-Bahá was the prototype of Bahá'u'lláh. They were the same height, their voices were alike, and their manner of discerning.

These were enough to make clear that the glory of God was shining in him, and would continue to shine in him after the ascension of his father. Yet Bahá'u'lláh wrote in almost all of his writings, clearly as well as symbolically, of his station. In the "Tablet of Beirut" he calls him the "Mystery of God". Particularly, in the most Holy Book he said emphatically that the people must turn their faces towards 'Abdu'l-Bahá who was the Branch of the everlasting tree. He also declared that 'Abdu'l-Bahá held the keys that would open the Holy Tablets and Holy Books. Finally, he proclaimed the station of the Centre of the Covenant, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in the Tablet of the Covenant, which he sealed and gave 'Abdu'l-Bahá. In nine days after the ascension of Bahá'u'lláh, in 1892, the seal was broken by 'Abdu'l-Bahá amid the group of Bahá'í friends and it was read by them.

Thus 'Abdu'l-Bahá ascended the throne of the Covenant of Bahá'u'lláh and the glory of his father began to shine through him, to guide, like a shepherd the children of men to the oneness of God and the brotherhood of man.

Verily, it seemed that Bahá'u'lláh had not departed but his sovereignty was still living in the garment of servitude. The pen of 'Abdu'l-Bahá began to move for all the world, spreading the breath of life in the utmost humility and kindness as did the pen of Bahá'u'lláh in the form of lordship and command.

Now at this time 'Abdu'l-Bahá, with his great executive power, began to establish the Cause of God in the hearts of humanity. He sent more teachers and workers to different parts of the globe, and a new life was manifested among the friends. Thousands of epistles, perfect jewels of wisdom and knowledge concerning the affairs of life and about religion and divine philosophy, were revealed by him to the world.

All these activities increased the envy of the enemies of the Cause. They had thought that at the passing of Bahá'u'lláh everything would come to an end. Now, however, witnessing the renewed power and strength in 'Abdu'l-Bahá they increased in activity and numbers, and a new group whose jealousy had lain dormant in Bahá'u'lláh's lifetime now arose against 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Those who merely met him visiting the prisons, entertaining the governor, officials and other guests, and who saw the increasing number of pilgrims from different countries, would hardly suspect that enemies of the Cause existed; for though their persecution continued day after day for years. 'Abdu'l-Bahá tried to lead his enemies and those envious of him with the utmost kindness into the path of unity and service. But their envy was too great, and they paid no heed to his advice, opposing him more and more, till at last 'Abdu'l-Bahá left 'Akká and his family and went alone to Tiberius and to Elijah's cave in Mount Carmel, there to supplicate and commune with God.

Humanity always rejects its educators, choosing to follow personal desires, even distorting religious teaching into an excuse for disobedience, and those who are regarded as foremost in religious matters are dominated by their pride to deny a Saviour. Nearness to God and His Manifestation is a spiritual union, not a physical relationship. A spiritual soul, however remotely situated from a manifestation, can nevertheless be more closely attached to that Manifestation than anyone related only by ties of blood. The foremost followers of a religious teaching are like mirrors before a sun, but as their light is reflected and not self-created, should they turn from the sun their light will cease to shine. Thus, Bahá'u'lláh said, a spiritual educator is a divine balance, and the people of the world are weighed by him. [XV:3:77]

The efforts of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's enemies were known only to those few who were intimately close to him.

In spite of the fact that 'Abdu'l-Bahá refrained for the time being from teaching the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh on account of official prejudice against it, the people through his counsel and guidance began to recognize his great station. 'Abdu'l-Bahá worked with such ease, assurance and poise that he gave confidence to all who visited him. The doors of his house were never closed; they remained open from sunrise to sunset. All manner of people came to him to adjust their problems. Men and women poured constantly in and out of the house, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá was always ready to uplift and counsel the downtrodden.

Different religions leaders and government officials came to him to present their questions. Even the Arab Bedouins and their shaykhs had the greatest devotion and respect for him, journeying great distances to see him. They regarded him as a holy patriarch and received from him gifts, both spiritual and material. Such was his influence that his simple word was willingly obeyed by them when often governmental authority failed.

The fame of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's generosity and love became such a protection that frequently visitors travelling through the desert to him were not only free from Bedouin attacks, but were also accorded safe conduct.

His simplicity of life forbade his personal use of the costly gifts pressed upon him by his friends in many countries, and he preferred to pass on these offerings to people in need.

A wonderful sight at 'Akká was to be seen every Friday morning before the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. From early morning, the square would be crowded with the poor, the aged, and cripples, men, women and children. 'Abdu'l-Bahá would come out with some of his friends, and the people would crowd round him, yet reverently, like children round a father. He would move from one to another, speaking kindly advice and comfort and putting money into their hands. He was especially kind to widows and their children.

It was indeed a miracle that a prisoner, persecuted and faced with opposed from so many powerful authorities, could thus gain such influence over all kinds of people with spiritual weapons only. As long as 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived the people felt perfect confidence in the future no matter what happened. They felt he was a divine father to whom they could go at all times, a master to whom they could turn at any moment. He continually ministered to their sufferings, often choosing to go on his errands of love at night.

But all the time his enemies had been watching their opportunity to vent their jealousy. They secretly sent many false reports to the Government in Constantinople, and circulated forged letters purporting to have been issued by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Each time the governor or other officials of the prison city were changed, they would bribe them to unite with them in their opposition to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. However, although disheartened by these continuous intrigues, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's power rose supreme above such hatred and won over those officials whom his enemies had persuaded to oppose him.

During this time of persecution, surrounded by spies and enemies, 'Abdu'l-Bahá accomplished the difficult task of having the remains of the Báb brought from Persia to Haifa. He had constructed the shrine on Mount Carmel which was to be the resting place of the body of the Báb. This edifice was made the subject of a new attack. With the co-operation of a few of the prison officials 'Abdu'l-Bahá's opponents sent false information to the Government that he was building a fortress on Mount Carmel and had so much influence with surrounding and foreign powers that the Turkish Government would not be able to withstand his power. This false re- [XV:3:78] port caused the Sultán such alarm that he ordered 'Abdu'l-Bahá to be either drowned or exiled to the heart of the African desert.

His friends, anxious for his safety, begged him to leave 'Akká; but saying that it was his duty to stay, he sent them away to different places in Egypt, and disregarding all threats, remained with certain members of his family in 'Akká.

When the Governmental Investigation Committee arrived in 'Akká the enemies of 'Abdu'l-Bahá associated with them to induce them to make a false report. Accordingly, without visiting 'Abdu'l-Bahá or finding out his version, information was sent that the rumours were true. While these plots were progressing and the atmosphere was tingling with suspicion, everyone was amazed to see that 'Abdu'l-Bahá was planting trees and building a house as though nothing would happen.

When the judge sent for 'Abdu'l-Bahá to present himself in court the sorrow of the friends was unbearable. They feared he might be taken away immediately and they would never see him again. However, 'Abdu'l-Bahá reassured them, saying that his greatest joy and happiness would be to be hanged there in Haifa. Bahá'u'lláh had a wonderful felt cap or headdress which was called a crown and this had been treasured by 'Abdu'l-Bahá after the ascension of the Blessed Perfection. Several times the friends had suggested that 'Abdu'l-Bahá should wear this but he always replied, "There would be but one occasion to wear it—if I were to be crucified." At this time he asked the family to have the headdress ready.

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá entered the court he found the charges and false testimony prearranged. After admonishing his accusers for persecuting the Cause of Truth as had always been done in former ages he said, “If you desire to condemn me, I am ready and willing to sacrifice my life and will sign any indictment you prepare, for it will bring me great happiness to be martyred as were the promulgators of Truth before me.”

Just at this darkest hour, when events were most ominous for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and the Cause, the whole situation changed with a miraculous suddenness. The revolution of 1908, by the Young Turk Party, brought entire freedom to him who had been the world’s Greatest Prisoner.

Impressions of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Shahnáz Waite

When I first saw ‘Abdu’l-Bahá I was alone and I came face to face with him all unexpectedly. He stood not over four feet from me. It was in the upper court of his prison home in ‘Akká, with the blue sky overhead and the sun light shining down brightly upon him, the hour being but a little past “high noon”. I might have thought him a member of his family, but every atom of my being, my heart and soul cried out—“This is He.” The face of my dreams of him stood before me with that heavenly smile of welcome. The Light of Infinite Love was radiating from his countenance. Majestic, and yet sublimely tender, he was looking right into my eyes. I gave a start as if I had suddenly been plunged into an ocean of Light, then stood transfixed. It seemed as if I had come upon him unawares and saw the Glory of the Lord shining forth around him; and I know I must have felt as did Mary Magdalene when Christ revealed Himself to her in her vision after the crucifixion “The Risen Lord”. He was dressed all in white. His hair fell in soft waves about his shoulders and his head was crowned with a white turban bound around with a white cloth. His step was firm and kingly. I walked toward him and as I stood and looked up into those marvellous eyes, I knew that every thought, every act of my life was known to him. Yet knowing this, I could fearlessly, unwaveringly meet his gaze, realizing all my sins and weaknesses, yet knowing he understood me as I could never understand myself and that he was indeed Infinite Love Incarnate. Later he came to greet us in Dr Moody’s room and I was fully confirmed—this was truly ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but a very different one I felt from the one I had first seen. As he firmly grasped my hand with that welcoming pressure that comes deep from the heart, a hand shake that warms you through and through, I saw the divinely human man, the personification of my highest ideals of an earthly father.

In height, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in reality but medium, yet he held himself so superbly, with such commanding dignity, and carried his head so high, and with such an air of majesty, that he ever gave the impression of great height. His voice was wonderful, full and vibrant; each word was uttered with marked distinctness and with that tonal quality, which leaves a faint echo, as it were, or wave vibration such as comes from a beautifully toned bell. All through the day it rang out, first in one place, then another; for with astonishing rapidity ‘Abdu’l-Bahá seemed to be everywhere—now in the garden, now in the room close beside the entrance, now in a guest’s room,—or you could hear him calling someone in the “family section” of the “prison home”. Always when I heard his voice, I felt its vibrations most deeply. Like his face, his voice expressed every emotion, from tones that are stern and emphatic to those as tender and loving as a cooing dove’s.

His eyes defied description. I only know that to me they seemed grey with a circle of white around the iris which at times became luminous. Sometimes in the light I caught a shade of blue, and again by lamplight they seemed brown; ever changing were they and wonderful. Like his face and his voice, they too expressed every emotion felt by him.

I was deeply impressed by His naturalness, his lack of conventionality and set form, and his refreshing simplicity. Divinely simple and simply Divine was he.

“If tremendous progress in a short time be desired by a people in any social reform, any undertaking for the good of humanity, they must lay hold of the Spiritual Potency. Then will their advancement appear phenomenal, their success magical. This spiritual potency will enable the worker to keep before the eye of the mind the picture of the divine civilization that kingdom for the coming of which we have been praying for nigh two thousand years.”

The golden rule

“All things therefore whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, even so do ye unto them; for this is the law of the prophets.”

The Golden Rule may be well said to have existed always and to be a part of all religions. It is practically certain that no land which had at any time laid claim to a more or less true form of civilization has omitted some phrasing of this basic ethical teaching from its moral or civil philosophy.

In the oldest book in the world, the instructions of Ptah Hotep in Egypt five thousand five hundred years ago, 3,550 years before Christ, is found this instruction: “If thou be among people make for thyself love the beginning and end of the heart.” Sixteen hundred years before the birth of Jesus, there ran an Egyptian “vile” to the dead: “He sought for others the good he desired for himself. Let him pass on.” Again before Christ—3,400 years—when the Hindu Kingdoms were being established along the Ganges, it was written: “The true rule of business is to guard and do by the things of others as they do by their own.”

Twenty-five hundred years ago, 600 years before Christ and 150 before Plato, Laotze wrote in China: “Re-quite injury with kindness.” “To the not good I would be good in order to make them good.” Confucius advised: “What you would not wish done to yourself, do not unto others.”

The books and scrolls of the Hebraic law taught this truth. In a time-stained parchment believed to have been first inscribed some 2,500 years ago, is to be read: “Whatsoever you do not wish your neighbour to do to you, do not that to him.” And to strengthen this, the teachers of 600 BCE added immediately: “This is the whole Law. The rest is mere exposition of it.” And in the Law of Moses it is written: “Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.”

The Greeks in 1070 BCE came yet nearer the wording of Jesus with: “Do not that to thy neighbour which thee would take ill from him.”

At the first Buddhist Council held at Rajagriha in 477 BCE the scribes almost duplicated the advice of Egypt’s priests, writing: “One should seek for others the happiness one desires for oneself.”

When Alexander of Macedon marched into Persia in 334 BCE he found there before him the most usual of all these closely paralleled formulae: “Do as you would be done by”—ran the Zoroastrian precept.

A century and a half before Christ the Law of Rome once more repeated the theme: “The law imprinted on the hearts of all men is to love the members of society as themselves.”

And Christ Himself declared that the Golden Rule “is the law and the prophets.”

Again Muḥammad gave yet another expression to it, for the Qur’án instructs: “Let none of you treat his brother in a way he himself would dislike to be treated.”

Finally in this day is added still another instruction in the Revelation of Bahá’u’lláh—“O son of man! If thine eyes be turned towards mercy, forsake the things that profit thee, and cleave unto that which will profit mankind. And if thine eyes be turned towards justice, choose thou for thy neighbour that which thou chooseth for thyself.”¹

Part II

Jináb-i-Fáḍil

When the successful efforts of the young reformers of Turkey abolished the unjust prisons of a despotic monarch, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá went forth from the dark stronghold of ‘Akká into the light and freedom of Haifa and Mount Carmel. Here for eleven months after the stifling atmosphere of ‘Akká which had seriously affected his health, he breathed the pure air of the Mountain of God and passed his time in spreading the divine teachings. He was like a bird which had become free from the cage; and one day, without informing any one, he took ship and arrived at Port Said in Egypt, which was his first journey of freedom after the long years of exile and imprisonment.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá possessed a great love for the beauty of nature, which is a mirror of the beauty of God, and he was extremely happy in the pure atmosphere of Egypt with its tropical trees and flowers. This was indeed a period of rejoicing when eager Bahá’ís from different nations, of every race and colour, gathered round him with love and unity, hearing his deep teaching and happy with his happiness.

Although at the beginning of his stay in Egypt through false traditions the religious prejudice of the people was aroused against ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and some of the newspapers printed incendiary articles against the Cause, before very long many theological groups, editors, and other prominent people, in their visits to him, became satisfied from the river of his knowledge and wisdom. They were attracted by the great power of his love; and realizing the necessity of the Bahá’í teachings in this miraculous age, opened their lips in praise and thanks to him.

During the morning hours at this time the news-vendors would bring the papers containing incendiary articles to the place where many Bahá’í visitors were residing, and some of the friends desired to make reply to them. On one occasion the friends brought the papers to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, expressing this wish. However, he said: “These are the heralds of the Kingdom. God is using them to inform the people of our arrival. Let them write anything they like. They will come to investigate, realize the truth and themselves make answer.” And after a few days this came to pass.

During those eleven months the name of the Bahá’í Cause and the greatness of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá became more and more apparent and many souls were satisfied through drinking the pure teachings of Bahá’u’lláh. Although his journey to Egypt caused many of the Persian believers to beseech him to visit Persia since many thousands of them had been unable to meet him while at ‘Akká, the religious prejudice of that land prevented him. His sojourn in Egypt also made his occidental friends eager to have him in their free country where his teachings might be heard without restraint. As their visits to ‘Akká had been accomplished through many difficulties his friends of Europe and America wrote ‘Abdu’l-Bahá many imploring letters urging his presence in their midst and these urgent appeals finally brought about the journey of this majestic spiritual teacher to the land of freedom in the west.

The year 1911 marked the journey of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the western world. After spending some months in Europe, he returned to Egypt. The following year, in 1912, his longest and last journey began. He spread his wings and soared to the United States and Canada [XV:4:109] and later to England, Germany, Hungary, and France.

During this year of travel some of the friends of 'Abdu'l-Bahá were anxious for him to take passage on the steamship "Titanic", but he declined and afterward his wisdom became apparent when this great vessel sank in the depths of the sea.

His western journey consumed almost two years during which time he spoke in many different churches, synagogues, universities and various societies, spreading the teachings of this Cause—the principles of the oneness of the world of humanity and the organization of the world under the banner of universal justice and love. He declared that the world of humanity is entering a new cycle and the spirit of Bahá'u'lláh is its spirit and its light. His effective call was reflected in many magazines and newspapers of Europe and America and resounded in the ears of the whole world, especially throughout the west. The scholars and thinkers who visited him were attracted to his unique personality and many of them said they had been longing to meet and know such a being—a mirror of the teachings of all the prophets, picturing the real life of the spirit.

Undoubtedly the journey of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to the West was in reality a journey to all the world, a unique historical journey, and we shall see in due time that the thought of the entire world was transformed. 'Abdu'l-Bahá planted in the atmosphere the seed of spiritual understanding and of reconciliation among the races and nations, the result of which will accomplish the unity of the world. In the Bahá'í world this journey created an irresistible motion which will increase age after age.

Also in his journey to Europe and America the purpose of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was to warn the people of the coming of the world war and he explained the prophecies of Bahá'u'lláh revealed forty years before referring thereto. In his various lectures he declared that a great war was impending and the rulers of the nations, the men of power and authority, were under great responsibility. He called them to extinguish the fire of this on-rushing conflagration through the means of an International Court of World Parliament. Although many could not believe at that time the seriousness of his warning he assured them of the imminent danger. After his return to the East from this journey, he said in many large groups: "We crossed oceans and seas and knocked at the door of Europe and America warning them of the great calamity, but they were in such deep slumber they could not be awakened."

In 1913 he returned to Egypt and to Haifa where many oriental Bahá'ís of different religions and nations who were most eager to visit him welcomed him and gathered in his presence like moths around the candle of love. Afterward, when the great war began and the door to Palestine was closed, when famine and difficulty arose, the heads of many families being killed and others cast into political prisons among the Jews, Muslims and Christians in these tragic conditions the home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá became the door of hope for all the afflicted people. He protected them and helped them like a kind father and the people were filled with hope and happiness because he was living in their midst.

Although after his return from the West to Palestine some of the jealous objectors opened a new door of opposition and sought to cause some of the Turkish generals to oppose 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the general situation had become different; and especially after the war the tree of the freedom of religious thought, which is one of the great principles of Bahá'u'lláh, had spread its shadow in that land. The opposition was without effect and the light of 'Abdu'l-Bahá was reflected without veils to the entire world.

When Bahá'u'lláh departed this life in 1892 the Cause had not been spread [XV:4:110] in the west but from the time Bahá'u'lláh left this world to the year 1903 when the Constitution was declared in Turkey 'Abdu'l-Bahá passed through the most dramatic period of his life, due to the opposition of his enemies, and during this same time, through his divine power, he promulgated the Cause in Europe and America. The boundaries of the movement were extended, the number of the believers was increased and the influence of the Cause was felt more and more. Thinkers in every country began to investigate the movement so that during those sixteen years the history of the Cause is replete with many dramatic events.

The vision, revelation and might of 'Abdu'l-Bahá were so divine that long before the Cause was established in western countries he had issued a request to the friends in Persia teach children English, and amidst all the trials and vicissitudes of 'Akká and Haifa he established a school wherein the younger Bahá'í generation might have contact with occidental education, knowing well that the time would come when they would have to act as interpreters or teachers in promulgating the Cause.

The last years of the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá were passed in Haifa where, like a perfect gardener, he protected and trained the garden of the Bahá'í Cause, until the 28 November 1922, when he ascended from the sunset of his home to the highest world. This was indeed the midnight of grief and sorrow for his family and the Bahá'ís of Haifa and 'Akká as well as the surrounding region. No one was able to sleep; the grief of even the little children was uncontrollable. The sounds of weeping and lamentation resounded around the great home of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and many other homes throughout the whole night until morning.

When the news of this grievous calumny reached the outside world through cable the body of the Bahá'í Cause in all the globe was shaken and its blood congealed. It was realized that not only the great Trainer of souls had passed, but the kind Father of the entire world. The wonder of this most great bereavement was the fact that so many outside the Cause joined with the Bahá'ís in their sorrow. The following day when the blessed remains were conveyed to the top of Mount Carmel to be entombed in the resting place of the Báb, which 'Abdu'l-Bahá had prepared for himself also, from the Governor of Palestine and other dignitaries, leaders of various religions, poets and distinguished men to the poorest widow and orphan of Haifa—all joined in lamentation for the loss of this heavenly bounty. The entire population of the city joined in the long procession wending its way up the slope of Mount Carmel.

'Abdu'l-Bahá was seventy-seven years old at the time of his ascension and during his varied life of exile and imprisonment had known unthinkable suffering and hardship. Through despotic power, through the prejudice and jealousy of religious ignorance, he had contended with unimaginable opposition from every side, both to himself and his teaching. In reality, the power of the Spirit protected his body so that all his years were passed in the promotion and administration of this Cause. Not for one moment was his thought free from his great purpose and not a single moment of his life was lost. Such a great work of brain could not be sustained except by such a powerful spirit. Let us clearly realize this point; if the immense volume of his personal and general Tablets, which were spread throughout the East and the West, were divided among the hours of his life we should see how great was his capacity. The work accomplished was of far greater magnitude than his years signify. The spiritual duties which he had performed and his sacrifices for the sake of his teachings were beyond imagination. In the last hours of his life he was like one having fully accomplished his task and about to take a journey. [XV:4:111]

Therefore almost suddenly, with but slight illness, he ascended from this world to the world of immortality. He called himself "'Abdu'l-Bahá" and in his life he was 'Abdu'l-Bahá because all his thought and speech was of Bahá'u'lláh in explaining and spreading his blessed teaching. One could see in him only the embodiment of the Bahá'í Teaching. In reality, it was a divine necessity that Bahá'u'lláh should have such a Servant and that this great being should sacrifice himself for such a Glorious Light, to be an example for all the world.

'Abdu'l-Bahá accomplished his spiritual work and spread completely the teaching of Bahá'u'lláh, even his objectors and jealous adversaries gradually coming to accept and obey him, through the following great powers:

First, the power of his pen, whose comprehensive and effective eloquence and sweetness were such that no one could resist. Each one of the friends to whom a Tablet was addressed realized that it was written to him alone and was like a book of counsel for his especial life.

Second, the power of divination by which 'Abdu'l-Bahá knew each soul better than the soul knew himself. Also in reading letters he possessed this power, and he said "My heavenly Father gave to me a power by which I may know from the written word the spirit of every soul."

Third, the power of love and forgiveness which was so great in 'Abdu'l-Bahá that when his enemies saw the practical evidences of his love they thought he could not know their opposition. It was often declared that he loved his enemies more than his friends and on one occasion when one of the friends was telling him about someone whom he was helping very much who was his enemy even to the extent of seeking his life, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "I know him very well but he is sincere. I love a sincere man even my enemy. His opposition is from ignorance and after a while he will realize and repent." On another occasion he said to one of his visitors: "You come to Haifa where the atmosphere is pure. This is the fountainhead of the river and the water is pure. Here there is nothing but love and purity. God created me for love to all his children without exception, even my enemies."

Fourth, his generosity that was so great as to suggest an absence of the sense of worldly value. The precious gifts brought him from different parts of the world for his own personal use would later be found in the possession of others. Every one received from the hand of 'Abdu'l-Bahá some gift, while at the same time his family lived in the utmost simplicity.

Fifth, his fearlessness. At a time when he was most strongly opposed by government and populace he would walk and speak among the people with such power as though an army were stationed behind him. His confidence in his spiritual connection with God, his severance and spirit of sacrifice were above the power of imagination.

Sixth, his wisdom and administrative capacity that suggested always the ability to administer the affairs of the whole world. He gave to each soul high or low, rich or poor, in the east or in the west, whatever was in accordance with the spiritual necessity. His power was manifested to each soul according to the degree of capacity.

Seventh, his spiritual knowledge through which 'Abdu'l-Bahá possessed the power to open all the sacred books and the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh.

Eighth, his power of explanation and teaching the Cause in such a logical, scientific and reasonable way as to reflect completely the spirit of this age.

Ninth, the invisible confirmation that was with him every moment of his life like the Shadow of God behind him. If every detail of his life could be seen with the telescope of deep intelligence it would reveal what a great, invisible Power and Will assisted him constantly.

Music its material and spiritual significance
Compiled by Shahnáz Waite

“We, verily, have made music as a ladder for your souls, a means whereby they may be lifted up unto the realm on high; make it not, therefore, as wings to self and passion.”¹

Truly it is said, “Music washes away from the soul the dust of everyday life.” Let me hear the music and songs of a nation and I will tell you the nature and characteristics of its people. Andrew Fletcher once said, “Give me the making of the songs of a nation and I care not who makes its laws.” Another has written, “Music is allied to the highest sentiments of man’s moral nature love of God, love of country, love of home and love of friends. Woe to that nation in which these sentiments are allowed to decay.”

Ever ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is calling us to love and unity, to divine harmony, which is the true Song of Life. Let me quote from Mr MacNutt’s talk on this subject: “Throughout all of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s words there was shining one fixed eternal principle. As a great composer constructs a composition in a certain key—the key of F for instance—commencing his symphony in this key, then enlarging and opening his phrases and developing his subject into other keys, but always coming back to the primal key and finishing his melody in it, showing the consistency, the roundness and wholeness of his conception, so ‘Abdu’l-Bahá revealed to us the Spiritual Symphony of true Religion, setting forth all his teachings in the eternal living key of Love; enlarging and developing His theme into different subjects, disclosing exquisite blendings, but always coming back to the primal theme, back to the great Spiritual Motive of the Symphony, the Love of God, the motive which controls the universe, the motive around which the universe is constructed, the great Principle of Love.”

In the final analysis of all things, physically mentally and spiritually, we are brought face to face with the great truth that Life is Love, and Love is Life, and its audible Voice is Music.

“Music is one of the important arts. It has great effect upon human spirit. Musical melodies are a certain something which prove to be accidental upon etheric vibrations, for voice is nothing but the expression of vibrations, which reaching the tympanum, effect the nerves of hearing. Musical melodies are, therefore, those peculiar effects produced by, or from, vibration. However, they have the keenest effect upon the spirit. In sooth, although music is a material affair, yet its tremendous effect is spiritual, and its greatest attachment is to the realm of the spirit. If a person desires to deliver a discourse, it will prove more effectual after musical melodies. The ancient Greeks, as well as Persian philosophers, were in the habit of delivering their discourses in the following manner: first, playing a few musical melodies, and when their audience attained a certain receptivity thereby they would leave their instruments at once and begin their discourse. Among the most renowned musicians of Persia was one named Barbod,² who, whenever a great question had been pleaded for at the court of the King, and the Ministry had failed to persuade the King, they would at once refer the matter to Barbod, whereupon he would go with [XV:5:130] his instrument to the court and play the most appropriate and touching music, the end being at once attained because the king was immediately affected by the touching musical melodies, certain feelings of generosity would swell up in his heart, and he would give way. You may try this: if you have a great desire and wish to attain your end, try to do so on a large audience after a great solo has been rendered, but it must be on an audience on which music is effective, for there are some people who are like stones, and music cannot affect stones.”³

“Music is an important means to the education and development of humanity, but the only true way is through the Teachings of God. Music is like this glass which is perfectly pure and polished. It is precisely like this pure chalice before us, and the Teachings of God, the utterances of God are like the water. When the glass or chalice is absolutely pure and clear and the water is perfectly fresh and limpid, then it will confer Life; wherefore the Teachings of God, whether they be in the form of anthems or communes or prayers, when they are melodiously sang, are most impressive.”

“It was for this reason that His Holiness David sang the psalms in the Holy of Holies at Jerusalem with sweet melodies. In this Cause the art of music is of paramount importance. Bahá’u’lláh, when He first came to the barracks (‘Akká) repeated this statement ‘if among the immediate followers there had been those who could have played some musical instrument, i.e. flute or harp, or could have sung, it would have charmed every one.’ In short, musical melody forms an important role in the associations, or outward and inward characteristics, or qualities of man, for it is the inspirer or motive power of both the material and spiritual susceptibilities. What a motive power it is in all feelings of love! When man is attached to the Love of God, Music has a great effect upon him.”¹

In the notes of Mrs Mary L. Lucas, a soprano soloist, taken while on her visit to the Holy Land, she records her instructions from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in her book, A Brief Account of My Visit to Acca, from which the following is quoted:

“There was an utter absence of any desire or effort to impress one with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s greatness, which is majestic in its simplicity. When we consider that he has never been enrolled in any school, has always been an exile and a prisoner, has had no access to books, that in spite of all this, his knowledge is unbounded, truly we must marvel! An illustration of this is found in His answer to the musical question I put to Him. I have all my life been interested in music, have studied in America and Europe, and when I asked the Master some special questions in regard to this subject, I was amazed in one sense at His familiarity with it.

“He has never heard any music such as we are accustomed to, having been a prisoner all his life, and yet his knowledge far exceeds that of people who have had great advantages. This fact net only applies to music, but to all things.

“This was my question: ‘I used to be very critical of people; would judge them; if they did not meet with my approval I would dislike them, but when I heard beautiful music all these feelings were forgotten, and the most intense love for these people, for animals, for the whole world, filled my heart and being.’

“I asked for an explanation of this, and I give you the answer. The Master spoke one whole luncheon and dinner consecutively on this point, and has given us but a crumb of His great wisdom:

“This wonderful age has rent asunder the veils of superstition and has condemned the prejudice of the people of the East.

“Among some of the nations of the Orient, music and harmony was not approved of, but the Manifested Light, Bahá’u’lláh, in this glorious period has revealed in Holy Tablets that singing and music are the spiritual food of the hearts and souls. In this dispensation, music is one of the arts that is highly approved and is considered to be the cause of the exaltation of sad and desponding hearts.”¹

“Music is most important. Music is the heart’s own language. Its vibrations uplift the spirit; it is very beautiful and a great art.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá then looked away off out of the window, His face became illumined, and He said softly in English, “Music! Music!” As if the words brought forth divine melodies to His ears, as if He were listening to the ‘Choir Invisible’.

“Let us listen to a symphony which will confer life on man; then we can obtain universal results; then we shall receive a new spirit; then we shall become illumined. Let us investigate a song which is above all songs; one which will develop the spirit and produce harmony and exhilaration, unfolding the inner potentialities of life.”²

Hooper Harris

You write me that many of the friends are anxious to know my impressions of ‘Akká and of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. How shall I write so as not to feed the fires of superstition on the one hand, or fail to do justice to the greatness of the subject on the other? There are times when we find the symbols we call words entirely inadequate and when we know that, in spite of all effort to avoid it, we shall be misinterpreted and misunderstood. There are some who, if we allow the heart to express itself freely, will accuse us of emotionalism and over-credulity; and there are others who, if we restrain the heart and write of facts as facts, setting them forth in their physical aspect only, will accuse us of lack of spiritual comprehension. However, acknowledging responsibility to God alone, I shall endeavour to convey to all interested something of the impressions I received on my visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at ‘Akká.

I would to God that all the people of the world could have seen and known ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as I saw and knew him! Then, indeed, would war, strife and conflict cease, the fires of hell and hatred cease to burn, and peace and goodwill reign on earth.

However, if we write of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá as a personality, as a man, we must describe him as the simplest and most humble and most natural man in all the world. He indulged in no poses, made no pretensions, asserted no superiority, claimed no special privileges, and in no way whatever sought to impress one with his dignity and importance. He ate with you, walked with you, talked with you, asked about your health, discussed the simplest matters with you and answered your most trivial questions. In every sense of the word, he was natural; and in every sense of the word, simple. The physical eye observed no halo, saw no sign of supernatural power, detected nothing in fact that might not be noticed in any really good, and naturally dignified man. In a word ‘Abdu’l-Bahá appeared to us so simple and so natural that we wondered what it was that some were able to see in him, who have set in circulation stories that have appealed powerfully to the imaginations of many and which may easily in time pass into records of signs, wonders and miracles. We found it difficult at first to realize that this simple, dignified, kindly and lovable man was the centre of a spiritual power, of a knowledge and inspiration that was recreating the world, and was the object of a love and devotion that no man in the history of the world except Bahá’u’lláh, his father, ever received in his life time.

And this love and devotion was not confined to his followers, but was seen in those who knew nothing of the religion of which he was the centre. We saw high Turkish officials,

Turkish women of high rank, and people of all classes and conditions come to consult him on their most important matters, to seek consolation and advice from him in their domestic troubles, and to ask for his prayers. Twice a week we saw the poor gathered around him to receive gifts at his hands, their only benefactor, their only real protector, in this prison city of squalor and wretchedness; we plainly saw, even with the physical eye, that there was something in this simple, unpretentious man which caused all around him to lean upon him in all things, and to regard him with an unusual love and devotion. What was it in this man that conquered all who met him? This man to whom all about him [XV:5:133] went in their troubles, but who, himself, if he had any troubles, never mentioned them, except to rejoice over them as victories? This man who was so universal that from him we never heard the word "I".

As I write these words tears fill my eyes and run down my cheeks. I whose heart has often seemed to me like a stone; a man hard-headed and combative by nature; accustomed to indulging in plain speech, and, in argument, to giving and receiving blows; one who has never been regarded as sentimental or emotional; I, as I recall my impressions of this man, am obliged to confess that my heart melts like wax, that the tears blind my eyes, and that all desire for controversy and argument, except as God may will, has been taken out of me. What, I repeat, was the strange power of this man, so simple, so natural, so unassuming who asked for himself no special consideration or reverence whatever, but who continually pointed us to the things of the Spirit and to God?

To tell this so as to make myself understood is beyond any power that God has given to me, or to any man. There are some things that the heart can comprehend, but the tongue cannot utter.

In a Tablet to me, 'Abdu'l-Bahá once wrote, "Turn with thy heart to the heart of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the hidden mystery will be revealed to thee." I have obeyed this command, and the mystery has been revealed to me—but I cannot express it in words—not even he can do that. The mystery, however, is no mystery at all to those who met 'Abdu'l-Bahá heart to heart. Only through the Spirit can the reality and power of this Man be apprehended. One is reminded of the Words of Jesus: "No man cometh unto me except the Father draw him."

In spite of all I have said, however, I will try and give you an outer description of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He lived a life of imprisonment, of constant anxieties and of hardship, and when I saw him he looked his age, but no sign of physical weakness was apparent. On the contrary, he impressed you as being full of strength and energy, an example of splendid manhood. His hair and beard were grey, and the thoughtful lines on his face and forehead were in keeping with his years. His beard was not very long nor full, but of silky, fine quality. His hair, which was the same colour as the beard, he wore about level with the shoulders. His nose was large, slightly aquiline and finely moulded. His mouth was large and firm, but without in the slightest degree being hard, indicating a combination of firmness and kindness. His forehead was high, broad, and full, giving the impression of great intellectual power.

The wonderful thing about the Master's physical personality was his eyes. At this writing I must confess my inability to tell what it was about them that made them so remarkable. Whether they were black or blue or grey, or a combination of colours, I cannot say. In fact they seemed to change even as I looked at them and into them, as I did more than once. Of this, however, I am quite certain—that I cannot think of 'Abdu'l-Bahá nor pray without seeing those indescribable eyes.

However, one tires of physicalities. The important matter is to try to realize the fragrances of the Spirit that were wafted from that White Spot ('Akká) and from that pure heart. Truly, there was that at 'Akká which was not to be seen with the physical eye, heard with the physical ear, or understood with the intellect—a something that the heart felt and the soul alone apprehended and which cannot be reduced to the physical symbols we call words.

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke, a something was set in vibration over and above the physical words, a something which was spirit and life and which bestowed spirit and life; and it would seem that the outer words were merely a means of contact or a physical medium of connection between the soul and this Spirit and Life that was imparted to the soul. That which the soul received from the words was far more than the mere outer form of the words would seem to warrant.

For instance, I asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for [XV:5:134] the answer to a question that had troubled me for a year or more. He answered me in a few words without apparently any particular effort at explanation—yet his simple statement conveyed to me immediately an understanding of the whole matter that perfectly satisfied. Perhaps the same words spoken by another would have made no impression, for they were in the form of a simple statement without proof. Uttered by him, however, they seemed to change the whole current of my thought, create a new consciousness in me and supply me with the power of comprehension; so that a matter which had puzzled me for more than a year was cleared up in an instant. I trust this will convey to you my meaning—that the real power at ‘Akká was the power of love and knowledge, purely spiritual in its manifestation, a matter of the heart and of the soul, and had no connection whatever with physical miracles and phenomena.

To realize who ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was, to understand his relations to Bahá’u’lláh and to Christ, to comprehend that he needed no other glorification, commendation or exaltation than that he was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, to know why it was that he commanded that no other name or title should be given to him, and that by no explanation or interpretation could the station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá be made any more glorious than it was, one must be able with the spiritual eye to see the things of the Spirit.

If we are to be content, as he was content, with his simple designation as the Servant of Bahá, and have no desire to refer to him by any other title—like him we must realize that we are nothing and that God is all, must eliminate the ego, surrender the self and allow God to do His work in us, instead of imagining that we have any power to accomplish it within ourselves.

To be able to apprehend the station of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá is to apprehend, at least in part, the great truth of renunciation, of absolute surrender to God. Surrender to God! How easy to say, but how difficult to really understand and do! It means to be conscious of our nothingness, and to open our souls and let the fragrances of the Spirit blow through them, to feel that God in us is doing our seeing, our willing, our thinking, and relieving us of the responsibility. It is to understand that He is the great burden bearer, on Whose shoulders is the government of all things. Here is a vicarious atonement worth having, a vicarious atonement that brings rest and peace and real salvation.

Who are we and what can we accomplish? It is true that the station of man is very high, but it is high because of his capacity to receive from God. The breeze of the Spirit blows by the rocks, by the trees and by the animals, but they are unconscious of it. Man, however, has the power not only to become conscious of it but also to be the instrument of it in the enlightenment of mankind and the vivification of the world. And this is a matter of simple faith. When we realize that we are nothing and know nothing, and stand humbly before God, we shall be clothed upon by the Spirit.

Jesus said: “Consider the lilies, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin and yet I say unto you that Solomon in all His Glory was not arrayed like one of these.” With all our toiling and spinning and fretting, the best that we can do is to clothe ourselves with mere garments of fig leaves, with mere symbols to hide our ignorance. However, those who have found the secret of turning to God in perfect self-surrender and sure faith receive a spiritual garment inexpressibly beautiful. The secret of real spiritual power is the renunciation of the self and dependence upon God.

This spirit of renunciation and of absolute submission and surrender to God is the Spirit in which one was bathed at 'Akká. The lesson of complete reliance upon God for all guidance and for all knowledge is the great lesson we received there, for when we submit to God we realize His Love in us and it radiates from us. The Master has said that when [XV:5:135] we "receive the confirmation of the Holy Spirit we need no other teacher." However, we cannot get that confirmation until we learn to rely on the Spirit wholly.

I trust that we all may learn this great lesson, and cutting ourselves from all outer personalities, lean entirely upon the Inner Reality of which the Prophets are the authoritative and confirmed outer Manifestation. To be free from personality, we must be free from our own personality. Once we have attained this freedom, other personalities will cease to trouble us. Escaping our own personality, we must find refuge in the Love of God.

XV:5, August 1924 [XV:5:135]

'Abdu'l-Bahá

"The mission of the Prophets is no other than the advancement of the education of the world of humanity. The Prophets are the real teachers or educators. The Prophets are the Universal Instructors. ...

The Greatest proof of a Manifestation is the Manifestation Himself. We do not have to prove the existence of the sun. The sun is independent of proof. He who has sight can see the sun and prove it for himself. It is not necessary to seek for other proof. For instance, it is a fixed fact that nothing could grow upon the earth without the light of the sun. It is easily proved that without the sun's heat and light no animal life could exist. The sun's light is indispensable its heat essential. This is the sun's greatest proof. ... The great Prophets did not enter school to be taught of men, yet so many things did they manifest that at last we must admit that the world is not able to destroy the wisdom of the Prophets or grow without them. ... There must be a Standard. ... The Light of God will shine, must shine. ... Although the Christ was not a great and honoured man; although He was of such poor and humble condition that He was born in a manger, yet He changed the whole world by His Power and Divinity. What proof could be greater than this? How can anyone deny His proof! In the same way Bahá'u'lláh came from Persia which is not an important nation of the world. He did not go to school and yet so much knowledge was manifest in Him that we must confess that it is impossible to deny His wisdom and His divinity. ... The Manifestations of God are sent when most needed."

"We must love all humanity as the children of God. Even if they kill us we must die with love for them. It is not possible for us to love every one with a personal love, but we must love all humanity alike.

"There are many stages or kinds of love. In the beginning God through His Love created man. Man is the highest product of His Love and the purpose of Man's existence is to reflect this Love of God in his soul. But man in his egotism and love of self turns away from his Creator and thereby prevents the accomplishment of his divine plan. The Manifestations appear to show man the way to God through Love. By them, man is brought to the condition of severance from his egotism and being absorbed into the Ocean of Love Divine.

"There is a profound, a divine wisdom in Love. The Light of God shines in the eyes when the heart is pure. The home of Religion is the Heart.”

XV:6, September 1924 [XV:6:157]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

“The heart of man is a garden. The real garden is in order, well planted, watered and cultivated. This is not so with the jungle. The jungle gives no evidence of cultivation. Where there is no gardener, disorder prevails. Wild growth produces nothing. Human education is of great importance. It is especially necessary to educate the children. They are the young tender trees of God’s planting. But the supreme education is Divine Teaching. Through it the most ignorant become wise and the lowest are elevated to the loftiest heights. This transformation in man is made by the Manifestations of God. Through them the wicked become righteous, the weak firm, the barren fruitful. One day’s education under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit is better than ten years’ material training in the universities of the world. Bahá’u’lláh has said that two steps are necessary for human development: Material and Divine Education. ... Education makes of man a man. Religion is Divine Education. There are two pathways which have been pointed out by the Heavenly Educators. The first is Divine Guidance and reliance upon the Manifestations of God. The other is the road of materialism and reliance upon the senses. These roads lead in opposite directions. ... Divine Education is the sum total of all development. It is the safeguard of humanity. ...

“In this age every face must turn to God, so that spiritual enlightenment will go hand in hand with material education. Material education alone cannot make the world happy. Spiritual civilization must assist the material civilization.

“The powers of mind are the bounties of God given to man to lead him toward spiritual happiness.”

Man and the ant

Stanwood Cobb

Dr Forel is the world’s great authority on ants. His collection now lodged in the museum of Geneva is the largest in existence, He has added three hundred to the known species. In addition, he has in former days been a psychologist of note, a great temperance worker and a distinguished humanitarian. His connection with the Bahá’í Cause is remarkable. At the age of seventy, discovering that Bahá’u’lláh had years ago enunciated principles such as his own soul had evolved and longed to see put in practice, he felt it but logical to call himself a Bahá’í and follower of that great Prophet. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, a few years before His passing, wrote a long Tablet to him in answer to his inquiries in regard to the nature of existence This Tablet, satisfying the venerable scientist’s metaphysical inquiries made him a still more devoted Bahá’í.

This is not a fable, but a little pilgrimage to the home of Dr Auguste Forel, who admires the life of ants more than he admires the life of men. In his latest book, Man and the Ant he asks in all seriousness—“What can we do to become more like the ants while still remaining human beings?”

Man, he finds, has not yet reached the stage of true social development. “By hereditary disposition man a natural egoist,—individualistic, passionate, rapacious, dominating, vindictive and jealous, eager to exploit his fellow beings, to tyrannize and oppress them in order the better to enjoy life himself. “But,” he goes on to say, “the social instinct of the ant, little by little accumulated in his hereditary memory and co-ordinated by it, is much more sapient than that of the ‘homo sapiens’ of Linneus.”

It was this lover of the insect the life of which represents the most successful social organization on this planet,—it was Dr Auguste Forel, specialist in psychiatry, lifelong ardent worker for temperance, and the world's greatest authority on ants, whom we were privileged to visit.

"I have just received your card," he wrote, "and I pray you to come and dine informally with us at noon Monday next. Our house is called 'The Ant's Nest' and is fifteen minutes from the station of Yvorne. I will come to meet you if you will telephone the exact time of your arrival."

So Monday morning found us,—my wife, Lady B., and myself, starting on our pilgrimage to greatness. Through the windows of the train shone kaleidoscopically the splendours of the Lake Geneva littoral, Vevey, Montreux, Territet that scenic gem, the Castle of Chillon, Villeneuve, and at last Yvorne charming village at the entrance of the Rhone valley on the Simplon route and the goal of our journey.

Upon our descent, there peered at us, through blue glasses, eyes the keenness and intelligence of which were later revealed to us in the privacy of the home; and there advanced to greet us a man old in years, crippled physically by a partial paralysis, but with a mind and heart of eternal youth.

On the twenty minutes' walk to his home he talked to us eagerly of his work for temperance, emphasizing chiefly his efforts to raise the Good Templars above the dogmatism of nationality and religion, so that they could concentrate fully on the one important problem of temperance for which purpose they were organized.

"Why," he had said to a bigoted Protestant clergyman who was at odds with a Catholic priest in one of the [XV:6:167] Austrian chapters of the Good Templars, "Why spend your time arguing about the next world when you should be working to perfect this?"

By such sturdy common sense, by his insistence upon universality, he finally won his point and achieved the neutrality, as regards politics or religion, of the Good Templars in Austria, Bulgaria, Hungary and Switzerland,—countries in which riotous differences had long been a source of controversy and difficulty in the work for temperance.

Dr Forel, it will be remembered, was one of the first to demonstrate the evil effects not only of drunkenness, but also of that habitual moderate drinking which produces upon the body the effect called "alcoholism". Strong as are the arguments for prohibition furnished by the disasters, individually and socially, of drunkenness, they do not weigh with the average mind as heavily as the facts which have come out as a result of the psychological tests into the state of chronic though mild "alcoholism". It was the proof furnished by Forel and others, that even mild habitual consumption of alcohol produces temporary paralysis and chronic degeneracy of the nervous tissue, diminishing greatly the quantity and quality of the work done in such a state, that brought into the temperance movement in America the rank and file of manufacturers and business men. The financial and moral support given the prohibition movement by these men of affairs was one of the chief causes of the successful passing of the Nineteenth Amendment.

"America is ahead of Europe," said Dr Forel. He is still working indefatigably for prohibition in Europe, where whole populations are alcoholized. On purchasing his own estate at Yvorne he had the vines pulled up, and turned the vineyard into a fruit and vegetable garden. He himself neither drinks nor smokes, and his diet is of the simplest. He has worked ardently for temperance since 1885.

He told us with deep disgust of how in a recent trip to Brussels, in searching for lodging, he happened into a house where four drunkards surrounded one poor woman with their noise and ribaldry. To him these things seem disgusting and abnormal, and cause him to point to the life of the ant as more admirable than our own.

While talking we pass through the simple village of Yvorne and reach the "Ant's Nest" where Madame Forel greets us with simple and unaffected cordiality. While we wait for dinner Dr Forel tells us of his studies in hypnotism and the cures he has effected by use of it. On the wall he shows us an oil painting done by a graceful patient of his, who after a fall from his horse had been unable to paint until healed hypnotically by Dr Forel. Often he has used hypnotism to cure inebriety.

Finding I was interested in the subject and could read German, he gave me before leaving a copy of his book "Der Hypnotismus, oder die Suggestion und die Psychotherapie",¹ not yet translated into English or French. Dr Forel, by the way, writes with equal facility in German or French, the greater part of his writings being in the latter language.

Madame Forel now announced dinner, and we were shown to our places around a long table where were gathered in addition a daughter, a daughter-in-law, a guest, and seven grandchildren spending here their summer holidays. Truly did the house deserve its name!

But all went smoothly, as in a true ant society. The children were quiet and happy, the adults enjoying simultaneously a good dinner and an inspiring conversation, while Madame Forel, unflurried, dispensed food and hospitality.

After dinner came the longed for visit to Dr Forel's study, which was of the kind that every writer and scholar [XV:6:168] longs for,—large, lined with bookshelves overflowing into two rooms. Space in which to think, space in which to gather materials for study. On different shelves were collected pamphlets and books bearing upon the subjects he was most interested in. In addition to his specialty, the ant, he has made a deep study of the chief problems of humanity.

War and Peace, Prohibition and other humanitarian subjects have absorbed his attention and attracted his pen.

Then we are shown his own publications, most important of which are his "Fourmis de la Suisse" and "Le Monde Social des Fourmis".² In addition to his bound books were two shelves full of articles and pamphlets written by him. There were also translations of his works into Russian, Dutch, Italian and other languages.

With trembling hands he took down and showed us the most precious volume of his library, "Recherches sur les Moeurs des Fourmis Indigènes"³ by Pierre Hubert, Geneva, 1810; a book which his grandmother, noting his already deep interest in ants, had presented to him at the age of eleven, and which had inspired him to make the study of ants his life work.

In answer to my question as to how early he had begun to study the ant, he told me that this passion was manifest from the age of seven. At the age of eleven, indeed, he made a discovery in regard to slavery among ants which not even Hubert nor other writers on the ants had noted. During his school life he spent every Saturday afternoon and every Sunday in observation of these fascinating insects. In addition to this he utilized every opportunity he could while walking the two miles to and from school each day.

He also remarked that while his theories had changed with the years, the actual observations and facts noted as published in his first book on the ant at the age of twenty-four, "Fourmis de la Suisse", have stood the test of fifty years of maturer research and are included practically unchanged in the latest edition of his work. This, he thought, was a striking example of the superiority of fact, as derived from direct observation, over theoretical speculations.

I thought as I heard from his own lips of the early display of his great life specialty, how important it is not to belittle or restrain the hobbies of childhood; how these hobbies may and very likely will prove of greater import than the studies inflicted upon the child by the maturer judgement of a teacher or of an educational system.

Evidently Dr Forel has the same opinion, for in his book "Man and the Ant" in which he compares the social life of each and draws lessons from the life of the insect to benefit the life of man, he says, "The universities must be decentralized as well as the scholastic authorities of all ranks, in order to liberate the pupils from the yoke of bureaucracy and from the terror of examinations. The pupils should be organized as in the "New Schools"—(schools of the freer type in Europe corresponding to the "Progressive Schools" in America)—and there should be the least possible obligatory instruction."

After a most interesting tour of his library, in which among other things we noted the pictures of Goethe, Haeckel, and Darwin, favourites of Forel (though he told me he found Haeckel much too dogmatic, contrasting unfavourably with the modesty of Darwin),—he insisted upon our sitting down in a trio around him while he bestowed upon us the greatest possible pleasure, that of hearing him expound to us his chef d'oeuvre, "Le Monde Social des Formis".

Holding the five volumes one after another on his lap and turning the pages with his left hand on account of the paralysis of his right hand, he gave us for upwards of an hour a lecture on [XV:6:169] the life of the ant illustrated by the pictures in his book.

How wonderful is the mind of genius, never aging. This great thinker, crippled in body and brain though not in mind, expounded to us the habits and life of his beloved insect with the joy and enthusiasm of youth, and with a mental clarity which defied all infirmities.

"See," he said, "I will show you something very interesting. The ant has a social stomach."

What that meant we were soon to see by aid of an illustration showing the ant as having two stomachs, the anterior one being the social stomach, the posterior one only being devoted to individual uses! Over fifty years ago, Forel told us, he had demonstrated the uses of this social stomach. Segregating several ants and causing them to fast for two days, he had then allowed one kept separated from his mates to partake of a liquid food dyed blue by means of cobalt so as to aid observation.

A marvellous thing was noticed. With a self-abnegation that only the ant is capable of, this little creature did not absorb the food but kept it stored in his social stomach. As soon as he was allowed to go to his mates he regurgitated this food and fed them with it, not until then permitting a small amount to enter his own stomach for personal nourishment.

The opening from the social to the individual stomach is controlled by four valves which seem to operate by will. But this will, as has been shown, is not one of egoistic greed, but of social self-sacrifice. In general, Forel told us, nineteen-twentieths of the food eaten is devoted to social uses, and only one-twentieth to personal uses.

Can one refrain from admiring such abnegation of self; or from drawing from it an application to our human needs? Forel does both. His interest in the ant is illumined by a vision of what humanity might be, were it organized on this social basis.

Many other wonderful things Forel explained to us,—things which are perhaps commonly known but which took on new life from his zeal: the keeping of slaves; the devotion of ant nurses; ant-battles; assassin ants who steal into nests and kill the ant-larvae; and other fascinating details of ant life.

One subject explained by him is worthy of full elaboration here. When ants are attacked they secrete and eject a sticky substance which gums up the antennae of their foes. Since ants not only smell and touch through their antennae, but use them largely instead of their eyes for guidance, an enemy with befouled antennae is as helpless as a wireless station similarly injured. But what most interested Forel in this affair was the marvellous chemical power of the cell which manufactures on sudden demand this gummy substance. He showed us a picture of such a cell magnified five hundred times. There being no heart in the ant, each cell has control of its own supply of blood. Upon notice of danger, this particular cell draws from the blood at its command the chemicals necessary for the manufacture of the gum.

Forel's observations in the world of nature furnish him with the material for his philosophy which is strongly monistic. In the intelligence, skill, and self-sufficiency of this little ant-cell, which magnified five hundred times is not as large as a cent, Forel sees a world of significance. In the microcosm he sees the macrocosm. He is not only a naturalist of the highest order, but a great humanitarian and philosopher.

He condemns mankind for being far too egocentric. Though wonderfully advanced in the arts of civilization, man has failed to develop a social instinct sufficient to organize the world he lives in. He has still the savage instincts of the jungle, and his inherited anti-social individualism threatens now to destroy [XV:6:170] the very civilization which his intelligence and creative imagination have built up.

Forel, for the last decade, has been working out an ideal program for humanity based upon the social life of the ant. He has elaborated a very feasible method of international union which would inhibit aggressive nationality and abolish war. His programme also includes ideas which if put in practice would bring to pass a world culture based on the enlightened application of science to social problems, on justice and unselfishness.

It is a splendid civilization which Forel has envisioned. "The world or organization of the nations is inevitable," he said. "There is bound to be a world state, a universal language, and a universal religion. The Bahá'í movement for the oneness of mankind is, in my estimation, the greatest movement to day working for universal peace and brotherhood."

At this moment the bell rang announcing tea, and we descended to the dining room to partake of that farewell hospitality before starting for the train. Dr Forel was tired, but as his wife assured us, not harmed by his mental and physical exertions of the day. These last moments with him were the sweetest and most intimate of all.

"I regret," he said, "that I cannot do more now for humanity. As you see, I cannot lecture, nor work much."

It is to be noted that Dr Forel has little use for the life of thought only. His observations of the ants, and his own good heart make him value above all things action for the common good.

To comfort him I said, "But by thinking and acting in the past, you can act now without acting. It is like money accumulated in the bank, which earns interest. So your past life of thought and achievement goes on producing its influence, though you are crippled as regards activity."

He was pleased with this idea, but said, "One must not exaggerate personality."

How absolutely modest he is! There is no shadow of a thought of personal greatness, of fame, in his consciousness. Only a love of work, of truth; and a burning desire to further a happier organization of humanity, along the lines of social service exemplified by the ant.

It is for this vision of a socialized humanity that I love Forel; of a glorious civilization where each serves each and work is for the benefit of all, not for self only. This is the dominant thought and motive of his life.

Forel, humanitarian, thinker, I salute you in spirit as I saluted you when I left your house, humbly and lovingly. And I catch in return your smile, wise and kindly, and your great word of farewell:

“I regret that I cannot work more for the cause of humanity.”

Faith a profession

George Orr Latimer

Moritz Bonn, chief German Lecturer at the Round Table discussion of the Institute of Politics at Williams College this year, has recently made the statement that “war, at least in continental Europe, has had one far reaching result: it has killed faith. Its teachings are contrary to the Christian religion. ... when whole nations are imbued with the belief that their interests are the only thing that matters, when they are willing to spend their lives and the lives of their enemies by the million for their national ideals, their God becomes a mere tribal God.”

This perhaps expresses the popular conception of the meaning of faith, namely a personal attitude by which divine revelation is subjectively appropriated according to the individual's conception of God's purpose and design. Then follows a specialized doctrine, a chosen peopled particular church, a superior nation created through an appeal to the limited personal emotions, highly coloured by racial prejudice and lack of common sense—this is the faith complex of today, something that neither originates from logical processes, nor from immediate inner experiences. To this kind of profession of faith Abraham Lincoln found no time to concern himself with, stating tersely: “I found difficulty in giving my assent, without mental reservation, to the long, complicated statements of Christian doctrine which characterize their articles of belief and confession of faith.”

What then of other kinds of faith; is the fate of the western world limited by a dying religious belief? Surely there are other faiths, whether in a state of decay or not, that form a vital part of the life of the world. For instance there is scientific faith, such as the belief in the nebular hypothesis or the theory of relativity; a faith that offers a complete substitution for the decadent religious faith. There is the faith in a certain political party to solve the social and economic problems of the nation; there is the reliance in a physician's skill to cure the ailments and afflictions of the body; the trust in the ship's captain to navigate the waters safely in all kinds of weather; there is the sense of security for one's life and property by the due process of law; there is the confidence in the national banking system, upon which are based the delicate and complicated methods of local and international credits—in fact all manner of faiths which vary in form and degree from the trust in the city's fire department and the proper sanitation methods of the milkman to the devout muezzin who never fails to call the faithful to prayer, so that waking or sleeping our every moment is the expression of some form of faith.

If faith has died in Europe, it has likewise been severely shaken in America. Recently Dr Richard C. Cabot, author of “What Men Live By” and at present holding the chair of Social Ethics at Harvard, has pointed out that the web of espionage woven during the late war has become a cancerous growth in the life of our everyday human relations. The spy system at best he says is “something occasional, an exception to be banished as soon as the crisis is over.” However, the system is one based on deceit, treachery and the betrayal of confidence—and it has not been banished. The recent disclosures in the Department of Justice and the Veterans Bureau at Washington have disclosed the painful facts of the spy system at its worst and have almost undermined one's faith in party politics. The idea “to get something on someone” [XV:8:228] has enhanced this uncivilized system. Secret societies that attempt to take law and order into their own hands still further aggravate the condition and relationship of mankind. This vast spy system has reached into the legal, social and educational worlds, and much more seriously in the industrial world where employers hire workmen to betray their comrades and in retaliation labour unions employ spies against their employers. Betrayal and bribery do not bespeak confidence, rather do they breed distrust and a warping of the moral fabric. News agencies search the world to discover material for future reference regarding one's private life in case that individual should at some time enter the arena of social or political service. The cinema world portrays, with its questionable educational value, the weaknesses of modern family life, thus undermining the sacredness of the home. Even the extreme Fundamentalist has girded himself with armour to "fight for the faith", little realizing that faith is not something to be fought for, but is in itself a conquering power.

O ye of little faith, where is that self-trust that Emerson calls the essence of heroism? "Our fears do make us traitors." Shall we too die for want of faith and assurance, metamorphosed by the fear complex? The body politic is sick on account of lack of altruism. The want of a common faith is the life-destroying ill of humanity at the present time. Everywhere, in the old world and in the new, man has become a worshipper of the idol SELF INTEREST. Everyone is striving for self-advancement at the expense of his fellowman. Faith is blind and dying.

What then is the faith of the future? It is not a mere confession. It is a profession and a practice. To the Bahá'í it is "first of all conscious knowledge, and second the practice of good deeds." It is confidence, as 'Abdu'l-Bahá points out: "The greatest divine bounty is a confident heart."¹ It is assurance of a new heaven and a new earth for man. It is the vision fulfilled of that famous Italian patriot, idealist and apostle of the new democratic evangel, Joseph Mazzini, when he declares: "The first real earnest religious faith that shall arise upon the ruins of the old worn out creeds will transform the whole of our actual social organization, because every strong and earnest faith tends to apply itself to every branch of human activity; because in every epoch of its existence the earth has ever tended to conform itself to the heaven in which it then believed—in form and degree varying according to the diversity of the times—of the words of the Dominical Christian prayer: "Thy Kingdom come on earth as it is in heaven."

The new faith must withstand the hurricanes of scepticism, revolution, race riots, international wars and religious enmities. The quickening power of the Bahá'í spirit has already accomplished the awakening of a new assurance in every one with whom it contacts. It produces severance from selfish motives; it supplies a complete attraction to spiritual attributes. It accepts the plan of God for man's practical and spiritual welfare as both workable and liveable. It acknowledges the voice within but translates that voice into conscientiousness action for the betterment of all humanity. It sees the vision of the heavenly kingdom established on earth as it should be today. It is the motive power of a new and radiant century.

"As ye have faith," proclaims 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "so shall your powers and blessings be. This is the standard—this is the standard—this is the standard."

What is faith?

Answered by 'Abdu'l-Bahá

What is real faith? Faith outwardly means to believe the Message a Manifestation brings to the world and accept the fulfilment in Him of that which the Prophets have announced. But in reality faith embodies three degrees: To confess with the tongue; to believe in the heart; to give evidence in our actions. These three things are essential in true Faith. The important requirement is the love of God in the heart. For instance we say a lamp gives light. In reality the oil which burns produces the illumination, but the lamp and the chimney are necessary before the light can express itself. The love of God is the light. The tongue is the chimney or the medium by which that love finds expression. It also protects the Light. Likewise the members of the body reflect the inner Light by their actions. So the tongue confesses in speech and the parts of the body confess in their actions the Love of God within the soul of a true believer. Thus it was that Peter confessed Christ by his tongue and by his actions. When the tongue and actions reflect the Love of God, the real qualities of man are revealed. Christ said, "You will know them by their fruits" that is, by their deeds. If a believer shows forth divine qualities, we know the true Faith is in his heart. If we do not find evidence of these qualities; if he is selfish or wicked, he has not the true kind of Faith. Many claim to possess the true Faith, but it is rare, and when it exists it cannot be destroyed.

Faith is not so much what we believe as what we carry out. Man must prove whatsoever he speaketh by deeds and actions. If he claims faith he must live and do according to the Teachings.

Although a person of good deeds is acceptable ... the practice of good deeds.¹

Faith is the magnet which draws the confirmation of the Merciful One.

"Jesus was a Manifestation of God. Everything of Him pertained to God. To know Him was to know God. To love Him was to love God. To obey Him was to obey God. He was the Source of all Divine qualities. In this Mirror the Light of the Sun of Reality was reflected to the world. Through this Mirror the Energy of God was transmitted to the world. The whole disk of the Sun of Reality was reflected in Him."

The divine perfections of Jesus Christ from the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Christ's birthday is a glorious day. ... It is necessary that these anniversary celebrations be observed, else man in his negligence would forget all about his Creator; but we should seek to penetrate the dark veils of custom and imitation of ancestors, perchance we may discover the reality of the meaning. The advent of Christ on this earth was a blessed day, for it was the day on which the Sun of Reality dawned; the day on which all beings were revived. In the world's calendar, it was the beginning of a Heavenly Spring. Today the mention of Christ is on a thousand tongues, but when He was on earth, He was not thought much of, notwithstanding they were awaiting His coming with great impatience. They thought that they would be His intimate friends. When He came they knew Him not; they persecuted Him and finally killed Him.

(Unity Triumphant, p. 111.)

Christ appeared in Palestine and was held in contempt because He was from Nazareth. Only twelve believed in Him; one deserted Him. There were other believers but they were not strong. They were troubled with doubts and afterward fell away. ...

Christ said that nothing could ascend into heaven except that which came down from heaven. He also said: "I came from heaven and will return to heaven"—and "The Son of Man is in heaven.” He said this while still upon the earth and notwithstanding the fact that he had been born from Mary. There is no doubt Christ came from heaven and always was in heaven, but when he spoke he did not mean the literal sky. What then is meant by heaven? Science proves that there is no heaven or sky, but all is limitless space and one universe. In this limitless space the heavenly spheres revolve and have their orbits. But the “heaven” of Christ is that invisible world which is beyond the sight and comprehension of mere man. It is the spiritual condition. Therefore the “heaven” of Christ is the will of God. The Sun of that heaven will never set. In it the moon and stars are always shining. It is the limitless Kingdom of God. It is sanctified from all place. Christ is always there.

(Ten Days in the Light of Acca, p. 26.) [XV:9:257]

Those who looked at the material body of Christ and saw Him enduring all the hardships and trials, marvelled that He was the Messiah because He was in this lowly condition. As they were considering His physical being, they failed to see the Light shining within it. But those who looked to the spiritual and the real existence of the spirit in Christ, they firmly believed in him. We must not look at the lantern, but at the light the candle inside the Lantern.

(Bahá'í Scriptures, No. 959.)

The world must come to know the Word in Christ. How He was mocked, scorned and laughed at, yet His mission was to uplift the very world which refused Him. Realization of this will bring tears to the eyes of those who deny Him; cause them to grow silent and thoughtful. Christ is always Christ.

(Ten Days in the Light of Acca, p. 13.)

You see a Bible in almost every house that you enter. See what Christ has accomplished. Witness what one soul who was crucified has accomplished.

When He was living upon the earth He was alone, ridiculed and rejected by His own people. Almost everybody cursed and ridiculed Him. His own relatives left Him; even His disciples almost abandoned Him; they placed upon His head a crown of thorns and paraded Him over the streets, and finally they crucified Him. He was alone! alone! but the traces of His work and the signs of His message have filled the world. Man must be just. After these statements no one can deny the greatness of Christ. ...

Consider the essential teachings of His Holiness, Jesus Christ, you will see they are lights. Nobody can question them. They are the very source of life. They are the cause of happiness for the human race, but subsequently imitations appeared, which imitations becloud the Sun of Reality. That has nothing to do with the reality of Christ.

(Wisdom Talks of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, p. 15.)

To bring spirits within the bonds of serenity is a most arduous undertaking. This is not the work of everybody. It necessitates a divine and holy potency, the potency of Inspiration, the power of the Holy Spirit. For example, His Holiness Christ was capable of leading spirits into that abode of serenity. He was capable of guiding hearts into that haven of rest. From the day of His Manifestation to the present time, He has been resuscitating hearts and quickening spirits. He has exercised that vivifying influence in the realm of hearts and spirits, therefore His resuscitation is everlasting.

(Bahá'í Scriptures, No. 697)

Likewise with the superlative power and the efficacious Word of God He (Christ) gathered together most of the nations of the Past and the West. This was accomplished at a time when those nations were in the utmost of contention and strife. He ushered all of them into the overshadowing tent of the oneness of humanity. He so educated them that they united and agreed ... and the heavenly civilization was the result. Now, this efficacy of the Word, and this heavenly power, which are extraordinary prove conclusively the validity of His Holiness Christ. Consider how this heavenly sovereignty is yet permanent and lasting. Verily, this [XV:9:258] is conclusive proof and manifest evidence.

The spiritual foundation of education

As taught by 'Abdu'l-Bahá

When we cast a glance at all creational beings, we find that the three forms of life are in need of an education. For example, in studying the mineral and the vegetable kingdoms, we find that the gardener has a function there in educating the trees. A tree under the training of a gardener daily progresses and grows. It presents an extraordinary growth. If it be wild and fruitless, by the process of grafting it will become fruitful. If it be small it can be made a big tree, and it can be a beautiful and fresh and verdant tree. But a tree which is bereft of the training of the gardener daily retrogresses and becomes absolutely deprived of its fruitage. It will become a tree of the jungle. Its fruit shall be exceedingly bad. It may become entirely bereft of fruitage. Likewise, when we observe the animal kingdom—the animals which have come under training in their world, daily progress and advance. Nay, rather, they will become beautiful as animals. They may even develop in their intelligence. For example, take the Arabian horse. How intelligent it has become! How well educated and trained it has become! How polite even this horse has become! This is no other than the result of education. But as to the human world, it is a self-evident fact that it is more in need of an education than the other existing beings. Consider the inhabitants of Africa and the inhabitants of America; what a vast difference is observable! How the people have become civilized here; and there they are still in the utmost state of savagery. What is the cause of that savagery and the reason for this civilization? It is an evident thing that education is responsible therefore. Education has given the inhabitants of America this civilization, but lack of education has rendered the Africans still savage. Consider how effective, therefore, is education in the human kingdom. It renders the ignorant wise; the man who is a tyrant a merciful one; the blind seeing; the deaf attentive. The imbecile even intelligent. How vast is this difference! How colossal is the difference between the man who has been educated and the man who has not been educated. This is the effect when the teacher is only an ordinary material one, like all other human teachers. ...

The Prophets of God also state that education is most effective, that it does give man sublimity; it does confer on man civilization; it does improve the morals of society; but they further state that in creation there is some difference. For example, take ten given children of the same age, of the same progeny, in the same school, one curriculum, one teaching, the same food, the same water, the same environment or air, in all respects having interest in common and equal; but we find out ere long that two of these appear exceedingly intelligent; some are in the medium, and some at the bottom of the school. One may become a professor emeritus; one will not even prove an apt scholar, whereas the education has been the same—one teacher—the same school—the same lessons. From all standpoints, there has been an equality, but some advance extraordinarily, some [XV:10:287] occupy the middle school, some only the lowest degrees; hence, it becomes evident that in existence, in the very existence of man, mankind is not equal. In capacity they differ; in their intellectual capability they differ. They are different, but every member of the human race is capable of becoming educated. They must be educated.

No matter how much the shell is polished, it can never become the radiant pearl. The black stone will not become the world illumining gem. The colocynth and the thorny cactus can never by training and development become the blessed tree. That is to say, training doth not train the human substance, but it produceth a marvellous effect. By this effective power all that is registered, in latency, of virtues and capacities in the human reality will be revealed. It is for this reason that, in this new cycle, education and training are recorded in the Book of God as obligatory and not voluntary.

(Bahá'í Scripture, No. 935.)

All the children must be educated, so that there will not remain one single individual without an education. In cases of inability on the part of the parents, through sickness, death, etc., the state must educate the child. In addition to this widespread education, each child must be taught a profession or trade, so that each individual member of the body politic will be enabled to earn his own living and at the same time serve the community. Work done in the spirit of service is worship. From this universal system of education misunderstandings will be expelled from amongst the children of men.

(Bahá'í Scriptures, No. 574.)

_____ [XV:10:288]

Children must receive an excellent education, because they are the young twigs of the tree of humanity and during the years of their growth they imbibe what they hear and see. They [XV:10:289] must have a share of God's love, then they will become spiritualized.

(Sun of Truth, Oct. 1924, p. 123.)

The people of the world are like unto school children, and the Dawning Places of Light and Centres of Divine Revelation are wonderful, glorious, incomparable Teachers in the school of reality.

They instruct these children with heavenly teachings and nourish them in the bosom of divine assistance, to enable them to progress in all the degrees of life, to become the objects of God's grace and centres of merciful Bounty, combining all human perfections. Through their holy admonitions humanity develops in every way outwardly and inwardly, consciously and unconsciously, physically and spiritually, until this perishable world becomes like a mirror reflecting the heavenly world.

(Lessons in Religion, p. 62.)

If graduates of scientific institutions achieve a deed, it is prompted by interested motives, such as attainment to fame and renown or some other material and personal interest. However, the beloved of God have no desire or intention save that of the good pleasure of the Lord, the Divine Will—that only do they seek. The love of God is the agency that encourages them achieving philanthropic deeds, directs them to acquire good morals, forces them to good acts, confirms them in withstanding insurmountable difficulties, and makes them prefer the welfare of others to their own. However, in Europe just as sagacious men are graduated from the universities, likewise vicious and malicious men were forthcoming there from. The dynamite or bomb, torpedo and other instruments of torture are all results of such education.

However, the Kingdom of God is absolutely good. It quenches all this fire; it effaces these guns and cannons; it transforms swords into olive boughs; it changes wars and battles into love and accord. ...

The inhabitants of Europe and America have progressed in material Sciences and the Arts of the Kingdom, they have not, yet, established a noteworthy edifice, consequently they are in need of instruction.

Morality is the basis of the happiness of the world of humanity. Merciful attributes are the best adornments for men. Science holds the next position to morality. Science is conducive to the happiness of the world of humanity next in degree to morality. If a nation be well qualified with education and yet dispossessed of good morals, it will not attain happiness. If that same nation be dispossessed of education, but possessed of moral training, it will be capable of accomplishing philanthropic deeds. When morality and science go hand in hand, then will it be light upon light.

(Heavenly Feast, pp. 21–25.) [XV:10: 290]

If one entering the Kingdom of God possesses learning and science it is well, but the essential thing, or the thing of greatest importance, is to enter into the Kingdom of God and to be characterized by the divine attributes, and to have the intention of doing good to the world, and to be perfectly kind to each member of the human family, and serve in promoting Universal Peace. Science and learning are good, but they are the branches, not the root.

It is new year—that is to say, the rounding of the cycle of the year. A year is the expression of a cycle (of the sun). But now is the beginning of a cycle of Reality, a New Cycle, a New Age, a New Century, a New Time, and a New Year. Therefore, it is very blessed.

The rising of the sun at the equinox is the symbol of life, and likewise it is the symbol of the Divine Manifestations of God, for the rising of the Sun of Truth in the Heaven of Divine Bounty established the signal of Life for the world. The human reality begins to live, our thoughts are transformed and our intelligence is quickened. The Sun of Truth bestows eternal life just as the solar sun is the cause of terrestrial life.

This period of time is the Promised Age ... Soon the whole world, as in springtime, will change its garb ... The New Year hath appeared and the spiritual springtime is at hand.

The shining ladder of the words of God

Howard C. Ives

Content not thyself with the repose of a single day and lose not the everlasting rest. Exchange not the immortal Garden of eternal joy for the earthly furnace of mortality. Ascend from the dungeon to the beautiful plains of Life, and arise from the cage of the world to the alluring Garden of the Placeless.

Bahá'u'lláh

In the Name of God, the Victor of the Most Victorious, proclaim: God will assist all those who arise to serve Him. No one is able to deprive Him of His Majesty, His Dominion, His Sovereignty. For in the Heavens and in the earth, and in all the Realms of God, etc., is the Victorious, and the Conqueror.

The Báb

The greatest bestowal in the world of existence is a tranquil heart, and it is impossible for man to obtain a tranquil heart save that the good pleasure of the Lord. That is, man may so adorn the temple of his being with lofty attributes and philanthropic deeds as to be pleasing at the Threshold of the Almighty. This is the only Path and there is no other Path. My point is this: Let all your thoughts, your ideals, your aims and purposes revolve day and night around one common object that is to live in accord with the good pleasure of the Lord. Then all the doors of felicity will be opened before your faces, you will become successful in all your undertakings, and you will be confirmed in all your accomplishments. The basic principle is the good pleasure of the Lord: and the good pleasure of God is obtained thru a tranquil heart, and the tranquillity of the heart is only gained by living in accord with the Divine Teachings and Exhortations. When a person attains to this station he is contented and peaceful. Then he will become prosperous in all affairs and enter into paradise. This station is joy succeeded by joy, confidence after confidence and Paradise after Paradise. Having reached to this exalted station man lives in Paradise while upon this earth, is in Paradise when he leaves this world. His heart is in Paradise, his spirit is in Paradise and he is encircled by Paradise.

If thou goest away with this unchanging condition of invariability of inner state, thou shalt see the doors of confirmation open before thy face, thy life will be a crown of heavenly roses and thou shalt find thyself in the highest state of triumph. Strive day and night to attain to this exalted station.

The afflictions which come to humanity sometimes tend to centre the consciousness upon the limitations. This is a veritable prison. Release comes by making of the will a door thru which the confirmations of the spirit come. The confirmations of the spirit are all those powers and gifts with which some are born and which men sometimes call genius, but for which others have to strive with infinite pains. They come to that man or woman who accepts his life with radiant acquiescence.

The poet historian, Nabíl

Soheil Afnan¹

It is only to a few that the work the poet historian Nabíl and the story of his eventful life are familiar, yet his unique services to the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh have put the whole Bahá'í world under a deep debt of gratitude and given him a peculiar claim on our interest.

Nabíl, whose original name was Yár Muḥammad, was born in the district of Zarand on the 18th of Šafar, AH 1247 (i.e. 30 July CE 1831). His forefathers had been nomadic Arabs occupying the north-eastern part of Persia and one of his great grandfathers enjoyed the leadership of the whole tribe. Of a family of six children he was the second son, and his early childhood was spent with an uncle, as his father was an invalid and confined to his room. At the age of nine he was sent to a small school where he learned to read the Qur'án, and his pious father wept for joy to see his son so interested in that work. He had, however, to be content with the mere reading of it, for if he dared to ask his teacher about the meaning of a word or phrase he was told that it was beyond his powers to comprehend such things!

When the boy had grown a little older, the father and uncle thought it best to find him some work; but in order to satisfy his desire for study they decided to send him to school during the autumn and winter seasons, while in spring and summer he should go to the country as a shepherd. It was about this time, at the age of twelve as he tells us, that he began to write verse, and he was greatly encouraged when he read one of his poems to the chief of a neighbouring village and won the great man's cordial approval! As with many more famous men before him, the verdant highlands of Persia and the bright colours that shine in its clear atmosphere seem to have instilled in him the Persians imperishable love of poetry; and the experiences of his shepherd life may well have filled his mind with a sense of awe in the presence of God's mighty handiwork.

It was when visiting a small town in which one of his uncles lived that he heard one day in a little mosque two men by his side mentioning the name of the Báb and the claim that He had put forth. The conversation arrested his attention and led him to enquiry and investigation. His search was difficult at first owing to the caution and secrecy which was the only protection of the early followers of the Báb against the enemies who surrounded them on every side and persecuted them remorselessly; but, nothing daunted, the boy went from one follower to another and travelled from town to town until he found what he sought. It did not take him long to enlist himself among those chosen few, most of whom fell victims to their savage enemies and gave their lives as martyrs in the path of their Beloved.

Years passed by, however, before he was taken to Ṭihrán to see Bahá'u'lláh who at that time had opened his home to the followers of the Báb and was the main source of inspiration to the persecuted enthusiasts of the Bábí faith. There for the first time he met both Bahá'u'lláh, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá who was at that time a child of six. Many were the happy recollections of those days which our poet historian used to recall.

Many years afterwards, in Baghdád, he again had the joy of meeting Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but this time was very different from the previous one. In the interval he had suffered four months' imprisonment in his own native place, had travelled extensively throughout Persia and had stayed for a considerable time in Kázimayn patiently awaiting the appear- [XVI:2:430] ance of Him whom the Báb had foretold. He tells us the story of how one day in his own little room in Kázimayn he was seized with a deep feeling of despair, and thought in his heart that after the ghastly martyrdom of the Báb it was hardly fitting for him to remain any longer in the world. Shutting himself in his room for three days he spent the time in reading and rereading to himself a Tablet which Bahá'u'lláh had revealed to him, and composed a few lines of poetry addressed to God, in which he declared that his heart was consumed with longing to meet Him and having no other present to bring he had resolved to cast his own head at the feet of his Beloved. Having written this verse he started reading the prayer of Bahá'u'lláh for the last time, intending thereafter to cut his throat. Hardly had he finished the prayer when the door which had been locked and which many during these three days had tried in vain to open was flung wide with one vigorous push and one of his most intimate friends stepped into the room. Finding Nabíl in a desperate state of mind he at once took him to his home and took good care of him. A few days afterwards, however, our hero felt a strange feeling of greatness in himself and started to write in the style and form of tablets and called the people around him to come and follow his leadership. But some of his friends treated him very wisely and at last induced him to go to Baghdád to meet Bahá'u'lláh there. He at once started on the journey and on reaching Baghdád went straight to the home of Bahá'u'lláh. There he met Him for the second time, but this time to fall at His feet and accept Him as his long sought lord and master.

For many years thereafter Nabíl lived in Baghdád and met Bahá'u'lláh very often, but again he returned to Persia to teach the new faith to his countrymen. Later his travels carried him as far as Egypt where in Alexandria he was cast into prison by the Persian Consul. One day, seemingly by the merest accident, he learned that the ship in which Bahá'u'lláh was being banished to 'Akká was even then in the port of the City. He repaired to the roof of his prison and with eager eyes but heavy heart watched the boat sail on its way.

Soon afterwards he was released and permitted to proceed to Anatolia. From that place he left for Cyprus, from Cyprus to Beirut and thence to 'Akká. He was forbidden to remain there, however, lest the enemies of Bahá'u'lláh should cause a disturbance, and without having seen his Beloved he left for Jerusalem. He soon returned to 'Akká, but, being prevented from entering the town, went and stood opposite the fortress in which Bahá'u'lláh was imprisoned. Bahá'u'lláh appeared at a window and beckoned to him, and for the space of about half an hour, he tells us, from his distant station outside the third moat, he gazed with tear dimmed eyes on his beloved Master.

It was in 'Akká, for the most part, that Nabíl spent the rest of his life, and by the wish of Bahá'u'lláh he undertook the writing of an extensive historical narrative of the Bahá'í Cause.

A few words on Nabíl's works may not be out of place. He was a very prolific writer and his poetry might fill many volumes, but not all of it was of a very high grade. A few of his lyrics are extremely touching and beautiful, while some of his longer poems on the history of the Cause have no great literary merit. His main contribution to the Bahá'í literature, however, from which the following gems have been taken, is an extensive work dealing with the whole period from the days prior to the appearance of the Báb until the last days of Bahá'u'lláh. It can hardly be called a history, as the lack of any systematic arrangement or classification of his materials would not justify such a name, but undoubtedly it is a valuable mine of historical materials, and as such is probably unsurpassed by any other work on the same subject and dealing with the same period. The fact that among his principal authorities [XVI:2:431] were some of the closest associates of Bahá'u'lláh, notably Mírzá Músá, gives to his book a unique value and establishes it as an invaluable work of reference to the student of Bahá'í history.

A few gems from Bahá'u'lláh which Nabíl recorded from memory follow:

The time is past when with the two words of admittance (i.e. "There is no God but God and Muḥammad is His prophet") a man should be considered a believer in the Divine Unity and be counted as one of the faithful. The time has come when Bahá'u'lláh, seated on the Throne of Glory, addresses all the world, saying:

Know this, O thou who meekest thy Be loved,
Whose heart doth yearn His Presence to attain,
That till in thee His Attributes appear,
In exile and astray thou must remain.

Bahá'u'lláh gave utterance to this all sufficing, blessed Word:

Had the people of Islám but observed two words of the Lord of Omniscience, all would have attained to the Supreme Guidance and have reached the court of acceptance and the joy of reunion, and would not have been afflicted by all these spiritual diseases and selfish designs. Then would they not have martyred the Solace of the eyes of the prophets (i.e. the Báb) nor arisen against that Promised One. But in the day of his Manifestation they made the temple of that luminous Orb the target of their bullets. "O our Lord, judge thou be between us and our people with righteous ness, and verily Thou art the best of judges!"

And those two blessed words are these: O ye who are believers, fear God and be of the sincere, and be not of those who have hardened their hearts against the remembrance of God.

And further in the same connection the Lord of mankind says that if a person be quick and keen in his powers of perception and discernment the moment a godly person enters his house he will perceive that the air becomes fragrant and the taste of his food and drink becomes delicious, pleasant and exhilarating while on the contrary if an ungodly person enters, the air becomes oppressive and the victuals lose their flavour. "We seek refuge in God from the evil of the ungodly."

Again he says: Beware that ye hold not fellowship with the wicked, and again: Treasure the friendship of the righteous, but withdraw both hand and heart from association with the ungodly.

When Bahá'u'lláh opened the door of gladness and joyful tidings before the face of the people of the world, He uttered this Most Great Word:

To gather jewels have I come to this world. If one speck of a jewel lie hid in a stone and that stone be beyond the seven seas, until I have found and secured that jewel, my hand shall not stay from its search.

In like manner He says: For the bringing forth of jewels from the mine of humanity, the True One, may His Majesty be glorified! hath in every age sent a faithful Messenger. Today the command of God and His decree is that the multitude of paths and diversity of ways should not be made a cause and a source of enmity and hatred. These plain and firm Paths have all been manifested from one Source and have issued from one place of origin, and these differences were in accordance with the requirements of diverse times and ages. O people of unity! Gird up the loins of effort, haply the world maybe freed from religious rancour and hate!

Prayer of Nabíl: "O my God! Amid my want and poverty I tell of Thy hidden treasures. Withhold not Thy Grace, and aid me to bring forth deeds that shall be worthy of Thy Day!"

XVI:2, May 1925 [XVI:2:434]

Truth is the oneness of the kingdom of humanity

Truth is love among the children of men. Truth is the proclamation of Justice. Truth is Divine guidance. Truth is the illumination of the realm of man. All the Prophets of God have been Heralds of Truth. All have been united and agreed on this principle. Every Prophet predicted the coming of a successor and every successor acknowledged the Truth of the predecessor. Moses prophesied the coming of Christ. Christ acknowledged Moses. His Highness, Christ, foretold the appearance of Muḥammad and Muḥammad accepted the Christ and Moses. When all these Divine Prophets were united with each other why should we disagree? We are the followers of those holy souls. In the same manner that the Prophets loved each other, we should follow their example, for we are all the servants of God and the bounties of the Almighty are encircling every one.

'Abdu'l-Bahá

Kunjangun the village of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Inez Cook¹

In the heart of the jungle some forty or fifty miles from Rangoon, lies a little Burmese village—Kunjangun.² Of so little importance is it to natives and Europeans alike that no one seems to have heard of it, and yet one feels confident to say that this small corner of Burma holds so dynamic a force that be fore long it must make itself felt at a great distance.

This dynamo of spirit is created by eight hundred Bahá'ís living and working as a unit—a thing thrilling to the heart and imagination. Picture this, if you can, in a country so steeped in the religious superstitions of the past, and whose people in this quarter still remain so primitive that it would appear almost futile to even carry the great Bahá'í Message of this age to them. To see this is to behold a miracle—for has not 'Abdu'l-Bahá called it His village?

Seventeen years ago the first seed was planted by Jináb Siyyid Muşţafá Rúmí, that selfless servant of 'Abdu'l-Bahá who has seen this wonderful work grow through submitting himself entirely to the Master and reflecting His love to these people.

It is worthwhile to repeat the story as it was heard, of how the first step was taken, for it shows that if the desire be strong enough to serve the Cause—in no matter how small a degree—we can make no estimate of its ultimate goal.

One day in the streets of Rangoon a man from the jungle was seen running breathlessly along, looking utterly desperate and at the point of exhaustion. A Bahá'í happened to be passing at this moment and was attentive at once to this poor man's condition. Asking if he might help, and to hear something of the cause of his distress, he was told that the man was in search of a legal adviser and had come in a great hurry to the city—only to find himself at an utter loss.

The jungle man had been accused of a criminal offence by his sister-in-law, in a passion of jealousy, and shortly afterward convicted by the magistrate, who had received a bribe of two hundred rupees [XVI:3:470] from the sister-in-law. The Bahá'í said that he would lead the man to one who would advise him (Siyyid Muşţafá) and help in any way possible.

On hearing the story Siyyid Muşţafá said that he knew this magistrate and they would return together at once to the jungle. By chance on the riverboat they met the magistrate, who was indebted to Siyyid Muşţafá for past favours, and when asked why he had convicted this man he said: "But the courts are at your disposal, do with them as you will." Siyyid Muşţafá assured him that only justice was desired and that he himself would plead this man's case at another trial. This was done and the accused one freed.

After that several families of Kunjangun came to the city at various times, and were always entertained by Siyyid Muşţafá. For two years he was at this service, never during this time mentioning the Cause. Finally they asked why he took so much trouble for them, saying that they had never met anyone like this before. Then he told them that he was a Bahá'í, and they asked to be taught, so that they might become as he was.

There were ten to be taught at first—and these ten instructed others, and so on. Siyyid Muşţafá visited them regularly and helped with all their affairs. A school was started, then a Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, and later ground was given them for community cultivation—the proceeds to be used for the Cause. There are sixty-five acres in all and last year the rice sold for this netted almost one hundred pounds sterling.

We had a great desire to see this Bahá'í village and decided to make the trip, in spite of all the discouragement we received from the English residents of Rangoon. They told us of all the hardships of the trip, which must be made in one day, and assured us that we probably would not return from the jungle alive and they knew nothing of the Bahá'ís and thought we were a lot of quite mad Americans bent on sightseeing.

Siyyid Muşţafá sent a man to Kunjangun a day ahead of us bearing food, cooking utensils, etc., as these friends are unprepared for visitors or to do our sort of cooking.

We were up before daybreak and on the river by sunrise. The life of the East begins early, so already the little ferry was crowded with natives taking the river journey. They made a picturesque group squatting amongst their gaily coloured robes that rival the sunrise in crimson and blues.

In our tiny, first class compartment there were already two men, a Burmese and an American missionary who had been in the East twenty-one years. Siyyid Muşţafá lost no time in giving them the Bahá'í Message, and we wondered how he had contained himself for two years when getting to know and understand the people of Kunjangun!

Mr Jones, the missionary, was to meet a co-worker at our stop, Twante,¹ and then proceed to another village by the same boat. But we think 'Abdu'l-Bahá had this trip in hand, and other things had been planned for this day.

When we landed, the second missionary (Mr Spear) rushed on board and told Mr Jones that plans had changed and they were both to go to Kunjangun. We had met Mr Spear in one of the shops a few days before and when he saw us in this out-of-the-way place his amazement was ridiculous. "What," he said, "are you American ladies doing in this jungle place—it is too curious!"

We asked them to follow in their car and have luncheon with us and see our eight hundred Bahá'ís—a still more unexpected sight.

We were met in a Ford car by two of the friends and driven to the village twenty-six miles away. What a marvellous sight to see all our Bahá'í sisters and brothers awaiting us, dressed in holiday attire of most colourful materials. Lined up on both sides of the road as we approached, their joyous welcome of "Alláh-u-Abhá" rang forth. Such shining faced and eager curiosity combined would be difficult to picture.

There were four in our party, and before [XVI:3:471] this the only Western Bahá'í they had ever seen was Mrs Schopflocher. Everyone seemed anxious to be of some service to us, the only one for the moment being to reach for our wraps and parasols. They led us to the schoolhouse (of course, this was a holiday for the one hundred and fourteen children who attend) and grouped themselves about us on the floor—the men and old Bahá'ís taking precedence in front and the women and children in the rear. Then they sang Bahá'í hymns to welcome us—taught them in Persian by Siyyid Muşţafá. The rafters sang with the pure joy afloat; and where the chorus was caught up by all the men one could almost see the volume of sound floating through the open doors, on through the sun-baked air to the nearby houses—just as one sees heat vibrations. Or was it just the tumult of my heart, and the mist in my eyes, that made the air seem vibrant?

Mr Jones and his friend arrived in time for luncheon and seemed astonished to find things just as we had pictured them. They could not believe until they saw it themselves that this work had been accomplished right in their territory—where years of effort had brought them so little reward by comparison. They appeared to be as interested in taking snap-shots of the group as we did, but for what purpose they did not say. However, they left with promises to come again and give talks to our friends, which will be most useful, as the Bahá'ís are diligently studying the Bible.

After luncheon we were shown the village proper—which boasts a court, jail and hospital. Most astonishing of all in this progressive community, they have now a jitney service of Ford cars between Kunjangun and Twante, twenty-six miles distant. One cannot imagine what this must mean to the villagers, who have had heretofore bullock carts as their only means of transportation.

Then we made our farewells and left, with regret, for the long trip home. It had been made possible to remain this long only by the generous loan of a private steam launch by one of the Bahá'ís of Rangoon, as the last ferry left Twante long before our arrival there.

Mingled with our joy of this day was an undercurrent of sadness which came as we talked to Siyyid Muṣṭafá on the homeward trip. To quote his words as nearly as possible will give the best idea: “I am an old man now and who will carry on my work? Any day I may be called and who will educate these beautiful children? It breaks my heart to come and see them and to be able to do so little—we need teachers and money to help them now. When you leave don't forget my people of Kunjangun.”

And who, having seen Kunjangun, could forget it!

XVI:3, June 1925 [XVI:3:473]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Through the bounty and favour of God think nothing difficult or impossible. God is so bountiful that He brings fire out from the stone; inflammable matter jets out from the interior of the earth; out of the black dust of the soil He produces beautiful flowers; from the bottom of the ocean He brings pearls and corals. When the Light of His favour is shed upon us the darkness is fled.

XVI:4, July 1925 [XVI:4:487]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

The word of God is the storehouse of all good, all power and all wisdom. The illiterate fishermen and savage Arabs through it were enabled to solve such problems as were puzzles to eminent sages from the beginning of time. It awakens within us that brilliant intuition which makes us independent of all tuition, and endows us with all embracing power of spiritual understanding. Many a soul after fruitless struggles in the ark of philosophy was drowned in the sea of conflicting theories of cause and effect, while those on board the craft of simplicity reached the shore of the Universal Cause, aided by favourable winds blowing from the point of divine knowledge. When man is associated with that transcendent power emanating from the Word of God, the tree of his being becomes so well rooted in the soil of assurance that it laughs at the hurricanes of scepticism violently attempting its destruction. For this association of the part with the Whole endows him with the Whole, and this union of the particular with the Universal makes him all in all.

XVI:4, July 1925 [XVI:4:496]

Conquest of prejudice

Jináb-i-Fáḍil

The idea of world unity was the greatest desire of all the prophets and spiritual world teachers. Whether they came from Palestine, or manifested in India, or China, or Arabia, or Persia, or elsewhere, their great purpose was to establish peace and unity and harmony among the people of the world. They dreamed and prophesied about it often in their writings and sacred books. Jesus Christ always taught love and unity and peace. But, unfortunately, after all those great prophets, those great teachers and educators, and all those different sacred books, when we look at the present situation of the world and read the minds and hearts of the children of men, we find the world much the same as it was thousands of years ago, still groping for the most part in darkness and unhappiness.

The material and industrial civilization grows very much and has reached almost to the age of its maturity, and miraculous discoveries and inventions are appearing day by day. The nations of the world have become close together almost as neighbours, and thus this globe becomes like a small home for the children of men. Yet at the same time, when we consider real civilization, which is to give a happy life to the people of the world, we realize that this has not yet been achieved.

In ancient times there were wars and fighting between Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Persians and Romans, each killing the other and destroying the property of the country. But in this age there are many different new nations doing the same thing, only the names of the nations have changed, and the weapons and instruments of destruction have become more powerful.

In this age there are many groups of people among the different nations whose hearts are full of hope and the desire for peace and unity. They are going to their churches and temples, and asking God sincerely to bring harmony and peace among the people. But they are not able to establish their idea in the world. There was, and is, something practically wrong in the world, and it is, as I believe, a wrong education.

The people of the world in different nations are preparing themselves for the next war, for another great conflict. They are training the children and giving them the idea of loving their own nation and worshipping it as they worship God, teaching them to love their own race as they are supposed to love God, and making them love their own ancestral beliefs and hate other thoughts of the world. Prejudice, misunderstanding and limitations are passing from the minds of parents to the minds of their own children.

Peace cannot be established until we establish it in the hearts of the people. That is the real peace and unity referred to. I have not any confidence in a superficial or political peace which may be established through different governments or leaders of the world. I believe peace must be established through the people themselves. And peace must be established in the hearts of our children.

Unfortunately, the education of the world is opposed to this purpose, and especially since the war, when conditions are worse than before. Since the great war all the nations of the world, even the small nations, have tried to make themselves strong and make the next generation have a strong feeling for their own race and nation, for they believe this is their only protection. This has been the root of fighting and separation in past ages and it is still ruling the world too powerfully. This cannot be changed except through a new kind of training and education for our children.

In my own experience I have tried to change the minds of those who have [XVI:4:497] grown up with this limited education and have tried to give them a universal vision and understanding of humanity, but unfortunately I was not able to change their minds and was not fully successful, for this limited kind of education has become established like an impassable mountain which cannot be moved or changed. However, in the pure minds of children it is easy to establish a new kind of education, and this is the only way for the future peace and unity of the world.

We read in the Old Testament that God said he created man in his own image. What is the image of God? Universal love and mercifulness. But you cannot find it among the grownup people of the world. When a little baby is born into the void he is created in the image of God. If someone should ask the little baby, "What is your nationality?" If he were able to answer he would say: "I do not know anything about nationality. I came from the invisible world and I consider just one nation, that is the world of existence. I must wait for my father and my mother and my teachers to make me belong to a limited nation." If someone should ask him, "What is your race?" He would say: "I know only the human race. I do not know more. I must wait for my parents and my teachers to make me a member of some special group." Also, if someone should ask him about his religion, or what tradition he follows, he would say; "I know nothing about different traditions, and my religion is purity of heart and simplicity. I must wait for my parents and my teachers to tell me what creeds and traditions they will make me believe."

Every little baby is created in the image of God, but the parents and teachers of the world are changing that image, and that universality, purity and simplicity of heart, and are giving the child a wrong and limited education.

The races—creationally, intellectually and spiritually—are all the same and equal. There is not any difference in the creation of God at all. All have the same power and ability to develop. The children of all the nations have not any innate prejudice or hatred of one another in the name of any race, nation or religion. What, then, has caused difference and separation? Wrong education.

We have in the literature of the East many stories of the life of the prophets, especially Jesus Christ, which are not found in your Christian Bible. In one of these it is said that once one of the apostles of Christ saw him running from one place to another without being pursued, and the apostle asked him, "Why are you running?" Jesus said, "I am running away from foolish people." The apostle said, "My Lord, you are the son of God, you have the power of the Holy Spirit, you gave life to the dead and cured all kinds of sickness; why are you running from foolish people?" Jesus answered, "Yes, it is true that I did all those things, but I could not cure foolishness."

This foolishness is the separation of humanity and fighting in the name of different races, nations and religions. In reality there are not any different nations at all. This globe is one little home, and these different frontiers are not geographical and God made, but were made by man in the dark ages. People are fighting in the name of different nations, and this is superstition and imagination, for there are not different races. There is one human race living in different parts of this globe, each situated under its natural environment. There are not different religions at all. There are different creeds and interpretations of the human mind. The essential teachings of all those religions are the same and equal. All of them originated for the spiritual development of man and for creating love among mankind, not hatred and separation. So when there is not any difference in the nation or race or religion, why are the people separated in the name of different groups and fighting one another? This is foolishness, and Jesus Christ said he could not cure it. It is living even until [XVI:4:498] this time. Only through a new and true education for our children can we establish peace and world unity.

If we should have this universal education among all the nations of the world in different schools and universities, to make our children realize that the world is one home and humanity is one race, and all the religions are one, and all the manifestations of God were divine educators and inspired by one God, and make them love all the nations as their nation, all the races as their own race, all the religions as their own ancestral religion, this will lay down the foundation of peace for the future. If we should establish this education in the world in this century, in the next century there would not be any more war, and the world of humanity would live in unity of spirit and real peace.

A large group of people who received the spiritual awakening through the manifestation of the glory of God during the middle of the past century, and having the realization of the foundations of world unity for the future, have tried to establish this education in the world, especially in the Orient. In these new schools of universal education they have gathered the children of various religions, races and nationalities, and new text books are in use containing beautiful and prophetic words of peace and love and harmony from the teachings of Jesus Christ, Isaiah, Moses and other Jewish prophets, Zoroaster, Confucius, Buddha and other Indian prophets, and other great spiritual teachers and educators from the various countries of the world. Thus, when these children are graduated from such schools, having a universal vision about the world of humanity and the unity of all the religions, and being familiar with the sacred literature of all races, if someone should ask them, "What is your race?" they will answer, "My race is the human race", and if someone should ask them, "What is your nationality?" they will say, "I am a world citizen and if someone should ask them, "What is your religion?" they will say, "My religion is all the religions—that is, to love God and all humanity."

The idea is that the material civilization and the spiritual civilization must grow hand in hand. The material and industrial civilization, without the universal spiritual civilization, is the cause of war and will make the world of humanity dark as a hell, and will cause the greatest war in the future which will divide the world of humanity into two pieces. The material civilization, without the spiritual civilization, is like a dead body, which may be very beautiful, but it has no spirit. This spiritual civilization is the life of the world.

Now this is the foundation of future peace and world unity. We have to establish it ourselves, not wait for someone or some group to come from here or there to establish it for us. If we want to establish real peace, if we want to establish a true unity of the world, we have to take part in this activity, and through this the dream of all the past prophets will come true, and the prophecies of all the great manifestations will be fulfilled, and the time will come when the wolf and the lamb will dwell together, when different nations will live together as in different rooms of one home, and different races and different religions will be united and cooperate like different members of one family and different organs of one body, and the world will be a real paradise, peaceful and happy.

There must be amongst the believers of God the greatest amount of love. The friends of God must be willing to sacrifice their lives for each other; their love must attain such heights idealism and self-abnegation. If such a state becomes realized, then this Cause has given its results; but if it does not attain to this summit of renunciation, then the Cause has not produced any fruit. The fruit of this Tree is Love.

The aim of the appearance of all the Prophets the Manifestations of the holy, divine verities, the revelations of the Holy Scriptures has been for the creation of love in the hearts of men.

His Holiness, Bahá'u'lláh, underwent all vicissitudes and trials in order that hearts might be cemented together. You must love each other very much.

The believers of God must become distinguished from all the rest of the world through their deeds. One of these deeds is love. By observing them, men must be astonished and wonder at this love existing amongst the believers of God, exclaiming rapturously, "What attraction! What affection! How they are united together! How they have become the expression one spirit and the emanation of one heart!"

Unity—a divine bounty

From the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

The human organism may be taken as an example of the bad politic. As long as the members and parts of the human organism are at peace, co-ordinate and co-operate together peacefully and harmoniously, we have as the result a perfection of life in its fullest form; where they differ we have the reverse. ... As long as there is an amicable understanding and unity of action and co-ordination among these elements which go to form this phenomenal being, there we have peace.

(Wisdom Talks, p. 21.)

He who expresses an opinion must not voice his opinion as if that opinion is correct or right, but he must give it as a contribution to the consensus of opinion, for the light of reality becomes apparent when there is a coincidence of two opinions. ... With the greatest or the utmost serenity, sobriety, soberness of temperament, with the utmost state of tranquillity, perfect composure and absolute calm and composure, should man weigh his opinions. But before expressing his own opinion he must weigh the opinion previously expressed. When he sees that the opinion previously expressed is better, he must immediately accept it. He must not be wilful in having an opinion of his own. This we call the en- [XVI:5:511] deavour at arrival at unity or truth. ... The members must be in the greatest spirit of fellowship toward one another, so that good results may be forthcoming.

How to make life successful

From the Writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Man becomes like a stone unless he continually supplicates to God. The heart of man is like a mirror which is covered with dust and to cleanse it one must continually pray to God that it may become clean. The act of supplication is the polish which erases all worldly de sires. ... Therefore, prayer is a key by which the doors of the kingdom are opened. There are many subjects which are difficult for man to solve. But during prayer and supplication they are unveiled and there is nothing that man cannot find out.

The two natures in man

From the writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Then what is the particular function of man? It is that man should rescue himself, save himself, from the defects of nature, and become qualified with the ideal virtues.

Is it behoving for us to sacrifice these ideal virtues and these possibilities of advancement? God has endowed us with a power whereby we can even overcome the laws of nature. Ours is the power to wrest the sword from nature's hand and then use that sword against nature itself. Is it meet that we should be captives of nature still? That is, shall we allow no difference to exist between us and the ferocious animal, but continue exercising a ferocity like unto it?

The Chinese people are most simple hearted and truth seeking. In China one can teach many souls and train and educate such divine personages, each one of whom may become the bright candle of the world of humanity: Truly I say they are free from any deceit and hypocrisies and are prompted with ideal motives.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's message to the American people

Envy and rancour arise between nations, but because I find the American nation so capable of achievement, and the American government the fairest of the western governments, its systems superior to others, my wish and hope is that the banner of peace may be raised first on this continent, and that the standard of the Most Great Peace may here be unfurled.

May the nation of America and its government unite in their efforts in order that this light may dawn from this point and spread to all regions, for this is one of the greatest bestowal of God. In order that America may avail herself of this opportunity, I request that you strive and supplicate with heart and soul, devoting all your energies to this end, and that the banner of international peace in reality may be unfurled here, and that American democracy may be the cause of the cessation of warfare in all other countries ... I supplicate the Kingdom of God and ask that you may be instrumental in bringing about the "Great Peace" in this country, in this nation and government, and through them spread it to the world.

(Wisdom Talks, p. 13.)

I was most pleased with the results of my trip to America. I found a wonderful spirit of peace hovering over that vast continent. The people are inspired with the thought of peace and are working for its final realization. I hope that they will be the first nation to unfurl the standard of peace. I will ever pray for their success. Today this is the most great service to the world of humanity.

The kingdom of God

Compiled from the utterances of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

The Divine Kingdom is like a beautiful garden, but if the people who enter into that garden be blind, they cannot realize anything of the beauty of the flowers; and if they should be deaf, they cannot hear the melodies of the nightingale of that garden; and if they have caught cold, they cannot smell the fragrance of the flowers. What is the reason? It is because the deaf and the blind have not the capacity and ability to feel these things. It is as if they had not entered into that garden. And so it is with the divine Kingdom of God. Its stores are open: those who have capacity can get the benefit, and if they have not capacity they will get no benefit at all.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

The honour and exaltation of man must be something more than material riches; material comforts are only a branch, but the root of the exaltation of man is the good attributes and virtues which are the adornments of his reality. These are the divine appearances, the heavenly bounties, the sublime emotions, the love and knowledge of God; universal wisdom, intellectual perception, scientific discoveries, justice, equity, truthfulness, benevolence, natural courage, and innate fortitude; the respect for rights and the keeping of agreements and covenants; rectitude in all circumstances; serving the truth under all conditions; the sacrifice of one’s life for the good of all people; kindness and esteem for all nations; obedience to the teachings of God; service in the Divine Kingdom; the guidance of the people, and the education of the nations and races. This is the prosperity of the human world! This is the exaltation of man in the world! This is eternal life and heavenly honour!

These virtues do not appear from the reality of man except through the power of God and the divine teachings, for they need supernatural power for their manifestation. It may be that in the world of nature a trace of these perfections may appear; but they are not established and lasting; they are like the rays of the sun upon the walls.

As the compassionate God has placed such a wonderful crown upon the head of man, man should strive that its brilliant jewels may become visible in the world.

God’s perfect laws

Excerpts from the writings of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

The Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh contains all the great laws and principles of social government. The basis of God's perfect laws is love for humanity and help for human needs. If all people followed this Revelation, the masses would be immeasurably uplifted and the Cause of God glorified. This development of humanity will be gradual, not sudden. It will surely come to pass; it is impossible to swim against the current of Niagara. Teaching the Truth is like building bridges by which humanity may cross over the current which threatens.

(Ten Days in the Light of Acca, p. 13.)

The economic question will have great importance in Europe and America. This question is impossible of solution except through the Religion of God. Day by day it is settled, then it comes up again. It cannot be settled save by the Religion of God. ... Nothing save the Religion of God will solve it. Nothing save the Religion of God. This will include both; the capitalists and labourers will be freed.

The solution begins with the village, and when the village is reconstructed, then the cities will be also. ...

... All will be in the utmost welfare and comfort.

Notwithstanding this, it does not mean that all are equal. It cannot be so. For this reason, the prominent ones, the rich and the poor, will all be at ease. The people of the world are like an army. It has a general, officers and privates. It cannot be possible for all to be privates or all to be officers. Each of these ranks is necessary. But all of them from the leaders to the lowest should know their duty. ... This is the aim, there must be both those who direct and those who carry out the plans.

(George Orr Latimer, The Light of the World, pp. 49-50.)

... In America I said to the Socialists: 'These plans which you have will lead to no results. Suppose you take the property of the rich, [XVI:11:698] what will you do after one year? All of you will be in need and will die from starvation. But it cannot be so for neither you nor the rich will be at rest.' This question of strikes can only be solved through the Religion of God.

(George Orr Latimer, The Light of the World, p. 51.)

... In the world of nature there is separation, there is the struggle for existence. These are the natural tendencies. This is irresistible.

That which saves man from the world of nature is the Power of God. It is faith. It is the Fear of God and it will make man an angel; it transforms him. From all these conditions it frees him. It acts opposite to that of nature. It breaks the sovereignty of nature and without this (power) it is not possible.

(George Orr Latimer, The Light of the World, p. 115.)

It will not be possible in the future for men to amass great fortunes by the labour of others. The rich will willingly divide. They will come to this gradually, naturally, by their own volition. It will never be accomplished by war and bloodshed. The ruling power or government cannot treat the rich unjustly. To force them to divide their wealth would be unjust. In the future, proportionately about three-quarters of the profits will go to the workmen and one quarter to the owner. This condition will prevail in about one century. It will certainly come to pass.

(Ten Days in the Light of Acre, p. 5.)

The doctrine of "human solidarity" is well developed in the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh. Human solidarity is greater than equality. Equality is obtained, more or less, through force or legislation, but human solidarity is realized through the exercise of free will. The virtue of manmade manifest through voluntary philanthropy based upon the idea of human solidarity is as follows: Rich men give to the poor—that is, they assist the poor, but by their own desire. It is not well that the poor should coerce the rich to contribute to them. Such coercion would be followed by disintegration and the organization of the affairs of society would be disturbed.

The idea of human solidarity, based upon mutual help and understanding, would lead to peace and comfort of the world of humanity, would be the cause of the illumination of the world of humanity, and the means of prosperity and glory of the world.

The parliament of man

The following is part of an address delivered by Jináb-i-Fáḍil, Persian Bahá’í teacher, during his visit to this country. The notes have been contributed by Dr Edna Morgan McKinney.—Editor

The Parliament of Man, or the International Legislative Congress, is one of the fundamental principles of His Holiness, Bahá’u’lláh. Bahá’u’lláh over fifty years ago in numerous epistles and many tablets emphasized the organization, the establishment of the Parliament of Man for the safeguarding of the nations. He called all the kings, emperors and presidents of the world to this high station of universal fellowship and asked them to bring together a Parliament of Man which would vouch safe the rights of humanity. This heavenly gardener of the world of humanity planted this seed over fifty years ago in the hearts of the people. The seed pushed forth its head from the dark chamber of the soil and little by little it grew and developed until today it has grown up into a great tree. Its twigs and branches are extending into the hearts of many thousands of people in all parts of the world. The spiritually minded people, the forward looking men and women, realize, that although we have achieved great results in the past fifty years, the result of the future will be far greater; nay, rather, in a short time we will be able to herald in the dawn of Universal Peace.

That great gathering of international peace, the Parliament of Man, which even from a physical stand point will be the most perfect, the most artistic, the most comprehensive expression of universal ideals on the face of the earth, will be established in a spot of the earth which geographically and spiritually will be most favourable to the interrelations and intercommunications of all the races of the world. That assemblage will be composed of the wisest, the most far sighted, and the most perfect and sagacious statesmen and great leaders of the world. It will become an asylum and court of last appeal for all the children of men. It will be the objective centre towards which the eyes of all the people of the world will be turned. In other words, it will be the brain, not only the physical brain, but the international and spiritual brain, of the world of humanity, which will exist for the betterment of the world of man. The representatives of all the nations, whether great powers or small powers, will gather together in that great assemblage to discuss ways and means for bringing about the international solutions of all problems and they will constitute in fact the intelligence of the wisest men of all the countries. Laws will be legislated in the international tribunal which will vouchsafe the happiness and prosperity of the world of man. Those laws and those principles which will create better understanding between the people will issue [XVI:11:708] forth from the spring. The brightest intellects and the most luminous thoughts which will upraise and create a world of good for humanity will be emanated from that Parliament. Just as the electric energy runs through the various wires to light the house, thus laws will be spread all over the world.

The world of humanity is like the individual body of man. The individual body of man is composed of many members and organs, every limb and organ has a function, and these functions work together orderly for the life of man. A man desires to accomplish certain things. He first of all will begin to organize in a way a parliament, a legislative parliament in his own mind and the functions of the brain begin to consult about the work that the man wants to do. In this consultation assembly in the brain the members sit together and begin to talk whether this work should be done or not, and this discussion takes place in the cerebrum, the seat of thought, and these ideals begin gathering their forces in the cerebrum and cerebellum, and they begin to discuss ways and means and to see if it is advisable to carry the thing out or not. The evil or good powers, such as the power of love, of hate; the power of absolutism, of co-operation; the power of light, of ignorance; gather their forces in the brain and they begin to debate, and, in the long run, one of these two elements will gain the victory over the other. The president of that consultative assembly in the brain is the faculty of reason. When this imaginative faculty is assisted by the power of the Holy Spirit, the result of consultation will be wonderful and conducive to much good. The final result will be in accordance with happiness and prosperity and welfare of the man himself. No sooner does the president of this consultative assembly put his seal of approval on this decision than all the other agencies of the organization in the body start to put it into action, these agencies being the executive department of that legislative assembly in the brain.

Now let us carry this simile a little further and apply it to social organization. It has likewise a consultative assembly, and that will be the international court of arbitration which will be composed of the brightest and most sagacious members of all humanity. That international Parliament of Man will be similar unto the brain and the mind. Just as the mind is the ruler in the temple of man, that larger mind will be a ruler in the temple of humanity, and you must then know that when these great minds come together, and they think in no other way than for the welfare of humanity, the laws and statutes issued from that great universal brain will be obeyed by all the members of the system without hesitation. The representative members of the Parliament of Man having effaced themselves entirely, they will be under the direct guidance of the Holy Spirit and all that they will consider and all their deliberations and laws will be inspired by that great power, for they will think of nothing else but to upraise and spiritualize humanity. That is why His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh in many of his writings says that when the Parliament of Man is established and all these spiritual and wise representatives have come together, they will be under the direct guidance of the Holy Spirit and all their laws will be in accord with the happiness of human kind.

Unquestionably there are certain conditions for the members of the Parliament of Man. The first condition [XVI:11:709] for the acceptance of the members is that they must be entirely free from religious prejudices. Second they must be entirely free from national bias and patriotic prejudices. In fact, they must be free and quit of all kinds of prejudices. They must extricate themselves from all the passions and desires of the material world which brings man into the snares of struggle for existence. They must be turned at all times toward the immortal kingdom of the world of truth. For if they are not free from all these prejudices and if they are not turning their attention at all times toward the Kingdom of God, and if they are not wholly devoted to the well-being of humanity, then they will not be able to reflect the truth and legislate just laws for all the children of men.

The more civilization becomes complicated the greater will be the number of human wants and the greater will be the contiguity of the different parts of the world and the neighbourliness of the world of mankind. Even today the world has reached to such a stage that the five continents of the world are like five neighbours.

The establishment of the Parliament of Man is an indisputable need and wise statesmen recognize the necessity of such an international assembly in order to equalize the rights and establish justice amongst mankind. We feel assured that one of the great nations of the earth which is civilized and illumined will put forth an effort and call the nations to the formation of such a Parliament of Man. This nation will invite the kings and presidents and rulers of all the other countries and they will come together and discuss dispassionately their economic and other problems and that nation will win forever a great name for all posterity.

About fifty years ago Bahá'u'lláh wrote as follows concerning the establishment of the Parliament Man:

“The kings of the earth (may God assist them) must arise and must hold fast to this cause that is, universal peace which will be the greatest means for the happiness and protection of the world. It is hoped that they may arise to do that which will be conducive to the happiness of the people. They must organize a great assembly where the kings or their ministers or counsellors present themselves and issue forth the command of conciliation and confederation and they must turn their thoughts from armament to disarmament, and if in the future one of the kings from amongst the kings may arise in rebellion, all the kings and all the rulers arise to quell that rebellion. Under such a condition there would be no need of large armies and armaments and the means of warfare, except that there should be enough for the protection of the internal affairs of the state. Should they attain to this great good the inhabitants of the countries will be living in the cradle of peace and happiness, and will be engaged in their own affairs and the lamentations and moaning of the majority of mankind will come to an end. It is more praiseworthy and it is much better if in that great assembly the kings and rulers themselves may be present. In the estimation of God that king which will arise from amongst the kings and rulers to issue forth this command, he will be the envy of all of them.”

Dr J. E. Esslemont

The following brief biographical sketch of the life of one of our most distinguished Bahá'í teachers and authors, is contributed by the Bahá'í National Spiritual Assembly of England. Attached to and made part of it is the appreciative expression of Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause.—Editor

John Ebenezer Esslemont, who passed away at Haifa 22 November 1925, was born on 19 May 1874, the youngest son of John E. Esslemont of Fairford, Cults, Aberdeenshire.

He received his preliminary education at Ferryhill public school and continued his studies at the Robert Gordon College and ultimately at Aberdeen University, where he graduated with honours in April 1898, obtaining not only the medical degrees of Bachelor of Medicine and of Surgery, but also a Philip Research Scholarship at the University. He spent the second half of 1899 at Berne and Strasburg, at both of which places he wrote papers on his research work, which were published and considered valuable.

Returning to Scotland in December 1899, Esslemont took up the position of assistant to Professor Cash at Aberdeen University, which position he held until 1901, when he went to Australia, remaining there two years. During this residence in Australia, he married on 19 December 1902.

Early in his life Esslemont's health proved a cause of trouble and anxiety, and in 1903 he was obliged to leave Australia, returning to Aberdeenshire, where he spent the summer, but found it necessary in the winter of that year to proceed to South Africa, the climate of which country it was hoped would prove beneficial to his pulmonary ailment. He remained in South Africa for five years, returning to his native country in 1908, when he obtained the post of resident medical officer at the Home Sanatorium, Southbourne, Bournemouth which he continued to hold until 1923, when, owing to the death of the proprietor, the Sanatorium was closed and Esslemont found himself without medical occupation.

In 1924 he received a warm invitation from Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, asking him to spend the winter at Haifa, and early in November he left London, proceeding direct to Port Said. Writing from Malta, the only port of call, on 15 November, Esslemont spoke of a delightful voyage and of feeling much improved in health. He spent a day or two in Port Said, where he was most warmly received by the friends, and arrived at Haifa on 21 November. Here he at once devoted himself to the work of assisting Shoghi Effendi in his multifarious correspondence, which work he continued in spite of ill health until the end.

Such is a brief account of the material side of Esslemont's life; it remains now to say something of the spiritual side, which continues and will continue for evermore.

Whilst at Bournemouth in 1912 Esslemont, in association with several other doctors, took up the question of State medical service and in 1914 he read a paper on this subject before the British Medical Association at its meeting at Bournemouth, which by the attention it aroused helped greatly the deliberations of the Advisory Committee on Public Health. The wife of one of Esslemont's associates in this work, who had met 'Abdu'l-Bahá in London in 1911, first mentioned the Bahá'í Cause to Esslemont in December 1914, and lent him some pamphlets. He had been searching for Truth in many directions, but without finding that which could satisfy his innate religious feeling; on hearing, however, the Bahá'í message he was at once impressed by its beauty and thoroughness; so much so that without delay he procured all books in English which dealt with the subject. Most truly applicable to Esslemont are the words of the Beloved Master: "Blessed is he that the Word of God had reached him and had found his soul 'awake'."

His progress in the study of the Sacred Books was therefore rapid, for already in 1915 he was writing to the lady above-mentioned recommending what books she should read; and in February 1916, little more than a twelve-month after he himself first received the Glad Tidings, he wrote at length to a Bahá'í friend in Manchester in terms which show how thoroughly he had accepted the Bahá'í teachings and how profoundly he had already studied them. Thus he writes:

"We can each become like our friend if we make the great surrender of self and selfishness and become willing channels for the Divine Spirit. There is no limit to what the human spirit can achieve in the strength of Divine Inspiration. The germ of the Divine Nature is in every man; only most of us are not manifesting it. Instead, we are smothering it. It is like a plant, which needs sun and rain for its growth, the Sun and Rain of the Divine Love and Bounty. We have the power either to open our hearts to that Love and Bounty or to reject them. Only by turning our attention and interest away from the world and turning them to God can we grow in spirit. Such turning means attending to the reality and inner significance of things instead of to the outward appearance. It means that our interest in and love for everything in all God's universe should vastly increase, but that we should regard all outward appearances but as the garments of the inner realities, as dawning places for the Glory of God. Oh! may people all over the world soon turn to God, as revealed in Bahá'u'lláh, with humble and contrite hearts, begging for His forgiveness and blessing and imploring His mercy and bounty! Then shall His Kingdom come in men's hearts and the whole world become one home and all mankind one family."

This extract from one of Esslemont's early letters shows so clearly the spirit which illumined all his words and actions, that its insertion here will be forgiven by those who read his stirring admonition and appeal. That he himself did in very truth turn to God as revealed by Bahá'u'lláh, and that having so turned, he never deviated by one hair's breadth from the path of love and righteousness is a fact known to those who had the privilege of meeting him and listening to his glowing talks as well as to those who are acquainted with him only through his writings inspired as they are with that same loving spirit which was so apparent to those who knew him personally.

Esslemont's work as a personal teacher, apart from his letters, began in Bournemouth, where a group of adherents to the Cause gathered under his auspices, resulting in the formation of a Spiritual Assembly of [XVI:11:716] which he was the first chairman, a position he continued to occupy until he left England in 1924. In this connection it may be mentioned that he was also the representative of the Bournemouth group on the National Spiritual Assembly of England, of which body he became Vice President, and which benefited much by his counsel and advice.

Not satisfied with studying the Bahá'í writings for himself alone, which led him to learn Persian so as to read them in the original language, Esslemont set about writing for the instruction of others. The first nine chapters of his justly celebrated book, Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era, which were written during the [First] World War, were submitted to the Beloved Master when peace led to the reopening of communications with Haifa, with the result that Esslemont received an invitation from 'Abdu'l-Bahá to visit Haifa, which he did in the winter of 1919–20. During this visit the Beloved Master discussed the book with the author, making suggestions for its improvement, and indeed read through and revised some three and a half chapters, which had been translated into Persian for the purpose.

The third chapter relating to Bahá'u'lláh was first published as a separate pamphlet, and it was proposed to issue a new edition on the occasion of the Conference on some living religions within the British Empire which was held in London in the autumn of 1924; on consideration, however, it appeared that a more general pamphlet would be both more appropriate and more useful, and thus "Bahá'u'lláh and His Message" came to be written by Esslemont, who also wrote the small leaflet, "What is the Bahá'í Movement?"

It was not only by his printed works that Esslemont became known to the Bahá'í world, for he was an indefatigable and voluminous correspondent not only in English, but also in Esperanto, of which universal language he was a complete master. Amongst his last labours during his stay at Haifa in 1925 was the revision of the Esperanto translation of the above mentioned leaflet which had been prepared for the meeting of the Universal Esperanto Congress at Geneva in August of that year. Another work on which he was also engaged towards the close of his earthly career was the translation into German of his large book.

These evidences of Esslemont's labours in the service of the Cause remain open to all, but of the loving services which he so gladly and selflessly rendered to all with whom he came into personal contact, only they can give full account from the inmost recesses of their hearts; but surely all whom he helped will forever bear in mind the inestimable benefits conferred upon them by his words, and more, perhaps, by his living example [XVI:11:717] of what a true Bahá'í should be, for he was nigh unsurpassed in selflessness, in utter devotion and obedience to the Bahá'í teachings, in love and trustfulness to all his fellows.

No better appreciation of Dr Esslemont and of his services to the Bahá'í Cause can be given than that contained in the following letter which the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause wrote after the passing of him who loved the Cause so well and served it so faithfully:

The existence of God

Excerpts from the Writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

We believe in a Universal Essence or Reality which is purified or exalted above all mention, and which cannot possibly be conceived of by the mind of man. But we can prove Its existence by Its signs which we see in the surrounding creation. ... We prove the existence of the Universal Essence by qualities that are perfect. ...

We ask: Is it possible that perfection can exist in the branch of a tree and not exist in the root of the tree? Is it possible that perfection shall exist in a drop of the sea and not exist in the sea itself? Is it possible that perfection will not exist in man himself, but will exist in a hair of his head, which is only a part of him? Is it possible that man, who is a part of the whole, may have qualities of perfection which cannot be attributed to the Essence or Reality? Or, is it possible for man to be a point of perfection and that real Essence be deprived of perfection? A child could not imagine such a foolish thing. ...

We say that the Essence, or Real- [XVI:12:729] ity, is purified from all words, all description and all praise; that the Essence would have first to be understood and then judged. But man cannot understand the Essence.

(Daily Lessons Received at Acca, p. 30.)

The beings in this existent world are created in different conditions. There is the mineral condition or degree, the vegetable condition or degree, the animal condition or degree, and the human degree. Every higher degree comprehends or includes the lower, but the lower degree does not comprehend the higher. For example, man comprehends the kingdoms below him, but the mineral does not comprehend the three higher kingdoms. Whatever progress the mineral kingdom may make, it can never reach a condition of knowing the power of growth, and in the same way whatever progress the vegetable kingdom may make, it can never imagine the condition of the animal kingdom, and the animal cannot imagine the human reality. Though all of them are creations, the difference in degree prevents the lower from comprehending the higher.

As this is so, how can man, the phenomenal being, understand God? How can the creation understand the Creator? How can the art imagine the artist? Man cannot understand the Reality of Divinity, or know whether he has consciousness or not. The consciousness of God is not the consciousness which we know of. ... Man's consciousness is a quality of phenomenal beings, but the consciousness of God is the quality of an Eternal Reality. Therefore we cannot compare one with the other. The consciousness of God is sanctified and purified from the consciousness of man.

The import of religion

Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl

The following interesting and valuable treatment of the necessity of religion in the life of the individual and the reuse, is from the pen of one of the greatest of Arabian scholars of the last generation, now deceased. He travelled and lectured in this country about twenty years ago. The structure of thought on the part of Arabian scholars—in fact, all the scholarship of the Near-East which goes back to Arabian learning—is distinctly different from our own western structure, yet is just as logical; and, penetrating these quaint differences that appear in, the dialectic of Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, we will be interested in the deep thoughts of our oriental

The real import of religion is not known to the majority of men. Even the necessity of religion for the preservation of human society is a point of disagreement among philosophers. In other words, some the men of learning believe that religion is the only foundation upon which the preservation of human society can be secured; while, on the other hand, many among them persist in the contrary opinion. Some think religion the best of divine bounties and consider it as essential for the protection of humanity as the mind is for the body. They assert that just as it is not possible for the human body to accomplish beneficial and universal achievements without the faculty of mind, so it is impossible for the affairs of mankind to be correctly governed without a religion; nay, rather, they say mankind cannot continue in the world without it.

Others consider religion an institutor most detrimental to humanity; account it diametrically opposed to civilization and destructive to human society. To them religion is represented by ecclesiasticism. They persist that religion is that whereby the masses have been prevented from studying useful sciences and arts, and nations have been taught to entertain hostility and enmity toward each other, causing repeatedly destructive warfare. Those who hold this view are so strongly opposed to religion that, in many instances, they even dislike the word and shun its mentioning.

When a discerning person reflects upon the conflicting opinions of learned men concerning the usefulness or uselessness of religion, he will readily understand that the only reason for this difference is the fact that the true meaning of religion and its source is not known among men. Some may ask: how can the meaning of religion be unknown to the leading philosophers and men of learning; and how can it be that men of science are unable to understand the import of religion, ignoring its source and foundation while at the same time they are able to perfect great inventions and make useful discoveries by which humanity is greatly profited and put under obligation to them?

In order to throw light upon this difficulty let us consider the following point: Let one among you submit the following question to any ten or twenty men of learning: "What is religion, its source and foundation, and what is the reason of disagreement among men of learning in accepting or rejecting religion?"

To this question each will render a different answer. Thus you will realize that these ten or twenty learned men do not agree upon the same statement. If one investigate historians of religion and theological [XVI:12:745] writings compiled by philosophers and scholars during the nineteenth century, he will clearly discover their contradictory opinions concerning the origin of religion and its meaning. Did Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury, who lived in the seventeenth century in England (and who is represented by the English generally as the leader and standard bearer of irreligion) and Isaac Newton, the standard bearer of religion, both of whom were great philosophers and inventors—understand the meaning of religion in the same way and agree in their views concerning the truth? Likewise other learned men, such as John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of Shaftsbury, John Foland, an Irishman, Julius Caesar Vanini, an Italian, Cosmo Ruggeri, a Florentine (and profligate)—all of whom were considered great philosophers—were deniers and antagonists of religion. There were also numerous other men of learning, who entertained different views concerning religion; and some entirely opposed it. To review the names and lives of these men would necessitate large volumes. We omit them for the sake of brevity.

Among religious adherents, the Catholics practice the worshipping of images and pictures of His Holiness Christ, and homage to the relics of saints. On the contrary, Protestants account such worship as idolatry and polytheism. These two communities have mutually contradictory opinions regarding religion; yet both are founded in refined and civilized nations far advanced in scientific knowledge and enlightenment. Is not their difference of view in such important matters a mighty evidence of the fact that the source and meaning of divine religion are points of disagreement among them? Such is also the case among other nations and religious communities as the Muslims, Brahmans, and the followers of Confucius. All these differ over details of religion.

We should comprehend the meaning of religion, and recognize the proofs and arguments concerning its source and foundation. It is asserted by men of learning that among animals, man alone is created with natural adaptation to civilization and social life. All other animal species are minus this tendency to an organized society; whereas, the life of man depends upon the congregation of individuals and co-operation in different arts, occupations, etc. Without a special community, it is impossible for man to properly conduct the affairs of life.

Mankind alone has been endowed with rational faculties, spiritual perception, comprehension of general ideals, and the gift of invention. Owing to this fact, man has the power of subduing and controlling the animals; whereas, the animals are not endowed with the faculty of influencing man.

This is what is meant by the verse revealed in the Holy Scriptures, "God has created man after our own image." Thus we know that, from the beginning, God has chosen the human form, which is the most excellent among created things, to be His manifestation and has distinguished the temple of man from animals by making him the dwelling place of His Holy Spirit.

Now that it is understood that man is in need of society and co-operation, not only to assist his progress toward perfection, civilization and enlightenment but also to assure the continuity of his race and progeny; therefore, it is apparent he should institute laws to accomplish this co-operation and mutual aid, and protect human society from dispersion and disintegration, which is contrary to the [XVI:12:746] natural divine principles embodied in the creation of man.

Thus we say that mankind is in need of two kinds of power for the preservation of society.

1. A power regulating laws which may guarantee order and discipline in the affairs of each individual.
2. A penetrative power necessarily imminent in these laws, to influence individual obedience and training in such regulations.

For should there be no laws, the high would oppress the low, the strong would be unjust to the weak, lives and properties would be sacrificed to pillage and destruction, blood would be shed, virtue and honour defamed, tranquillity and peace—which constitute the basis of civilization and refinement and are the protective spirit of human society—would be removed and annulled; and finally society, which assures the perpetuity of mankind, would be overthrown and disintegrated.

You have no doubt heard or read in histories the records concerning large races of former times, and as no laws were instituted among them, were accustomed to live as wild animals in forests and mountain caves; their manner and disposition similar to those of beasts of prey. Large numbers of such tribes of men were thus reduced to extinction, such as the "primitive Arabians or lost tribes", whose names and the manner of whose brutal life are still recorded in the pages of authoritative historical works. But owing to regulated laws, the descendants and posterity of these same savage tribes have in the present age far advanced in civilization, and are noted for learning and enlightenment. Even in the present day, various great nations, tribes and peoples, exist in different parts of the world who have not been lifted above a state of barbarity, and still live like animals. Some of them are so steeped in savagery that they practice cannibalism, and resemble beasts of prey more than men. In fact, most of the animal species, even reptiles, abstain from feeding upon their own kind.

A slight reflection upon the above mentioned points will clearly show that the cause of this decline is absence of laws for the preservation of society. If laws were enacted and enforced among these uncivilized nations and barbarous tribes, they would after a time advance in knowledge, learning, enlightenment, civilization and refinement; attain to prosperity and affluence, and produce philosophers and men of learning who would secure honour and respect for their race and posterity. But those among them who continued in their actual state of barbarism would gradually decline, finally be extinguished, and their names effaced from the records of the world. If their names should survive, they would serve only to render them the subjects of admonition and warning.

The first thing God did for the order and preservation of the world was to create religions, which are the only means of civilizing the world and preserving order. Religion is the only means of elevating the people. If a man be a great savant, but an atheist, we recognize his talent and call him great. Yet we are not sure of his integrity; but if he is a religious man in the true sense, he will be honest and upright, and we have then [have] full trust in him. By religion is meant the knowledge of God, because God first created us to know Him, that He is powerful and mighty in all things, that He encompasseth all things; therefore He made the laws and ordinances which are important for us to know.

The Divine Revelators

Excerpts from the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

That reality which is the Essence of God cannot be conceived of by any understanding, therefore God has created a Manifestor, and in Him is reflected that Sanctified Reality.

The Manifestations are points or sources of assistance for all people, and they are the Educators of man. They are like mirrors, and the Reality the Essence is like the sun.

A Prophet brings a spiritual civilization and after that is established material progress follows.

Difficulties in the path of prophethood

From the writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Do the Manifestations differ in degree? These supreme holy souls are God-like in their attributes. The garments in which they appear are different, but the attributes are the same. In their real intrinsic power they show forth the Perfection of God. The Reality of God in them never varies; only the garment in which the Primal Reality is clothed is different according to the time and place of their Appearance and Declaration to the world. One day it is the garment of Abraham, then Moses, then Jesus, then Bahá'u'lláh. Knowledge of this Oneness is true enlightenment. Some see the garment only and worship the personality; some see the Reality and worship "in spirit and in truth". Some of the Hebrews admired the embroidered beauty of the garment of Abraham, but were blind to the Real Light which shone upon the darkness of the world through him. Moses was denied; Jesus was denied, crucified; all have been denied and persecuted for this reason. Men see the garment and are blind to the Reality; worship the personality and do not know the Truth, the Light Itself. Some worship the Tree of Life, but do not eat of the blessed fruit of the Tree. Therefore differ- [XVII:2:40] ences and disagreements arise in religious belief. ... Find the Light itself and there will be no difference of opinion or belief as to the personality or degrees of the Manifestations of God.

(Ten Days in the Light of Acca, p. 31.)

The word of God is revealed according to the degree of spiritual sight, no matter who the messenger may be. ... People do not receive the Manifestation of God because they are veiled by their imaginations. Imagination is one of our greatest powers and a most difficult one to rule. Imagination is the father of superstition. ... Through imagination men receive a distorted view of a former Manifestation and are prevented from recognizing and accepting the Truth and Reality of the present one. They are veiled from the Light and Glory of God by imagination. These veils prevent the true Light from entering the soul. Therefore men follow the false light of their imaginations and cling to error instead of truth. Thus the Egyptians were veiled from the Light of God in Moses. The Jews were veiled from the Glory of Jesus simply because they did not know Moses rightly and so were blinded to the one he promised would come after him. Today Jews, Muslims and Christians, not seeing the former Manifestation with true vision, are veiled from the Glory of God in Bahá'u'lláh.

(Ten Days in the Light of Acca, pp. 28–30.)

One of the greatest veils is literal interpretation of the prophecies. ... Again, many refuse the Manifestation in His Day because they do not want to walk the hard road of devotion and servitude, but prefer the easy road of hereditary belief.

Misconception of the Word of God and its meanings is another great veil which imagination throws over the soul and by which the Light is lost. Also people inherit their belief from parents and ancestors and follow it blindly, too negligent to know and see for themselves. Negligence and apathy are heavy “veils of glory”.

The Day Star

Soheil Afnán

For any appreciation, much less a proper understanding of the remarkable life of the Báb, the real significance of his mission, the purport of his extensive Writings and the far reaching influence of his teachings, nothing is more necessary than a survey, however brief, of the social and spiritual conditions of Persia in the middle of the last century.

The central government in Ṭihrán, enjoying a somewhat nominal sway over the various Persian provinces, was an absolute monarchy and corrupt to the very extreme. By an act of favouritism and graft a man would gain the most important office in the land only to be hurled down again and replaced by one who gave a higher bid. The economic conditions were equally precarious; the country lived under a feudal system similar to the Middle Ages in Europe. Society was governed by a low standard of morality. Religion, which has throughout the history of the East, much more than in the West, been the most important factor of civilization, and which has ever inspired the imaginative mind of the Easterner with everything that was pure and sublime, had for the most part lost its spirit and degenerated into a matter of forms and social rites. It still held sway over the illiterate and ignorant masses, which comprised the extreme majority of the people, and in the hands of the self-seeking and corrupt clergy proved a force by which they could challenge even the mightiest power in the land. The true religion of Islám no more existed, but had been overlaid with an admixture of extraneous doctrines, and the clergy amongst themselves had been divided into various schools of thought bearing hardly any resemblance to the tenets of the mother faith. In the words of an eminent European writer, “Islam survives as the badge of a conservative institution for the protection of the vested interests of the ruling classes, as a war cry for enlisting in their service the passions of popular superstitions and also as a customary common denominator of heterogeneous schools of thought that accept its inherited forms and ceremonies, just as many Europeans continue to conform to the traditional practices of a Christian church long after they have rejected its dogmas, or ceased to be influenced by its spirit. The result has been, on the one hand, a lapse into mere sensualism, and, on the other, a tendency towards extreme asceticism.”

It was at this time that the Báb appeared. Not only to combat and condemn irreligion and indifferentism, not only to cast aside the veil that hid the corruption of government and church, but to open up a new vista of spiritual life and to prepare the people for the appearance of a “great Person still behind the veil of glory”. He had come, he said, to wipe out fanaticism, to pull down the ponderous edifice of dogmas and rituals that the church had raised only to cover up the ignorance and illiteracy which had killed that spirit of thought and art that was once the pride of the world. It was the dawn of a New Day and with it must come hope and vigour. He exhorted the people to cleanse their hearts and minds of age long superstitions, prepare themselves for the coming of the day. The doings and machinations of the clergy, their explana- [XVII:2:43] tions of the verses of the Qur’án were wrong and corrupt, and in brief all these things must vanish before the piercing, burning light of the new Sun of Truth dawning upon the world.

Nothing is more remarkable, nothing more surprising than that this youth of twenty-five, even in the short period of his ministrations, gathered around him vast multitudes, filled them with zeal and enthusiasm, and out of the abundance of his heart sent them to preach the new gospel. And the ghastly deaths that each of his disciples was sure to meet dampened not the fire of their spirit, but rallied to his standards increasing numbers every day. Nor were his recruits mere underlings and malcontents. The leaders of thought, the most eminent of the clergy, governors, soldiers from the army and also the common man on the street, sat humbly at his feet and drank deep from the ever flowing fountain of spiritual knowledge and truth that flowed from the tongue and pen of the Youth of Shíráz. The King of Persia, hearing of this young divine, dispatched an eminent high priest to investigate the matter. But the old erudite theologian was so enraptured by the young prophet that he fell at his feet and asked to be accepted as a humble adherent. He did not return to the King, but went out to preach the new Faith and ultimately suffered martyrdom with joy. A distinguished man, old in years and experience, hearing one day of the Báb and his teachings, casually in his business store, did not take even time to let his family know, but travelled at once over hills and dales for hundreds of miles just to meet the Prophet his soul had foretold. Mothers watched their husbands and children executed and cut to pieces even with scissors, rulers chose the scaffold to their seats of might, and one man with burning wicks in his flesh sat up and asked the curious mob to make way for his royal “cortege”.

That the Báb’s Writings in the six eventful years of his life, most of which were spent in prison, comprise easily over twenty volumes, is to many very surprising. And his works extend over a wide range of religious subjects from simple prayers to religious treatises and commentaries. In the Bayán, which was his great book and which his martyrdom left unfinished, are to be found the main tenets and principles of the new faith. It was there that he explained the symbolic meaning of heaven and purgatory to which the ignorant Muslims clung rigidly, and the religious cycles which have given a new significance to human history. Most of his Writings were written for the people in Persia, and as he said he had come to destroy the old bonds of superstition and to prepare the people for the one whom he called “He whom God shall make manifest”.

Before this growing tide that swept Persia from one end to another, the government and the clergy stood not with alarm but agony. Every conceivable measure, the most barbarous butchery the world has ever seen, helped only to fan the more the growing fire of the early adherents of the faith. The Báb was sent from one town to another and in every case most of the officials turned Bábís. He was sent to prison and the jailers fell at his feet; Christians, were chosen to escort him and they joined his faith. In the northernmost castle of Persia they confined him and the old Kurd in charge of the prison believed in him.

In the public meetings where the clergy tried to refute his ideas and prove the futility of his claim, he came out victorious; and the insults and bastinadoes he suffered belittled him not to the hundreds that every [XVII:2:44] day lay down their lives for his sake.

Finally the last and only measure that the clergy could conceive of combating and killing the growing faith was to execute the young Prophet of Shíráz. This they carried out in Tabríz when they shot him, together with one of his earnest disciples. In a miraculous manner the first volley shot by a battalion of soldiers left him totally unhurt and the soldiers found him in a little room in the barracks writing a line of poetry on the wall. It was to a second volley by another battalion—the first battalion refused to shoot again—that he finally succumbed.

The Báb was dead, but not Bab-ism. The divine spirit he had infused into the hearts and minds of his zealous and earnest adherents was not only destined to leave a profound and deep felt influence upon the life and thought of the people of Persia, but to pass beyond the frontiers of its mother country and to inspire the people of many lands with that deep understanding of God and religion which lies at the bottom of all sound progress. It was left for Bahá'u'lláh, whose appearance the Báb had foretold, to carry the standard he had so valiantly raised from one country to another, and to sound the call of unity and brotherhood throughout all the nations of the world.

'Abdu'l-Bahá

How wonderful it will be when the teachers are faithful, attracted and assured, educated and refined Bahá'ís, well grounded in the science of pedagogy and familiar with child psychology; thus they may train the children with the fragrances of God. In the scheme of human life the teacher and his system of teaching plays the most important role, carrying with it the heaviest responsibilities and most subtle influence.

The Mashriqu'l-Adhkár (Bahá'í temple) of 'Ishqábád, Russia

Charles Mason Remey

The following article describing the first Bahá'í religious edifice that has been constructed is written by an architect who has travelled much among the Bahá'ís of Persia and the Orient. He has himself given much attention to religious architecture, and has made a series of designs for Bahá'í Temples based on the religious architecture of Persia, India and Arabia. The architectural features of this Temple necessarily appeal to him.—Editor

'Ishqábád,¹ one of the chief cities of Russian Turkistán, is just north of the Elburz mountains, which separate the desert plain of western Turkistán on the north from Persia on the south. The city lies on a plain a short distance from the mountains, which here are rugged and rocky. The town is quite modern in aspect, being laid off with gardens and broad streets meeting at right angles. Rows of trees along the sidewalks remind one of a western city, while the low buildings, the walled gardens, and the waterways which flank the streets and are fed with the water of streams from the nearby mountains, are strikingly oriental in character.

This city was but a huddle of mud huts when Bahá'u'lláh first directed some of his followers to settle there during the days of the most severe Bahá'í persecutions in Persia.

There in 'Ishqábád these friends found a refuge of peace and tranquillity where the Russian government protected them and allowed them the free exercise of their faith. Thus this city became in reality as well as in name the "City of Love".

The Bahá'ís of 'Ishqábád form a strong element in the life of the place and are highly thought of and protected by the government. The Bahá'í Cause was first brought to the public notice in 'Ishqábád by a martyrdom some thirty five or forty years ago. It was the case of a learned man of some prominence, who met his death through receiving many wounds at the hands of two assassins. These two individuals had been instigated by five Moslems, who took this measure to try to stop the spread of the Cause in that city. The Russian authorities took the matter in hand and condemned to death all of the seven men. The Bahá'ís then petitioned the Governor to spare their lives. Since he did not have authority to do this, a petition to the same effect was sent to the Czar, who granted it; and thus the prisoners were sent in chains to the mines of Siberia. Here is but another instance of the growth of the Cause through persecution, for from that time on the government not only allowed the Bahá'ís to carry on their worship, but it protected them and showed them special favours.

During all of the governmental changes in Russia the Bahá'ís have continued in safety there, since it is understood that they are obedient servants of the government and harbour no sedition against the law of the land.

At about the close of the last century some of the friends in the Orient arose, fired with spiritual fervour, to build the first Bahá'í religious edifice to be erected in the history of the Cause, known as the Mashriqu'l-Adh-kár. [XVII:2:62] Following the guidance of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, 'Ishqábád was the place chosen for the site, and Áqá Siyyid Taqí Afnán, one of the most tried and venerable of the friends of the Cause, was appointed to direct this vast undertaking.

'Abdu'l-Bahá himself established the style and the general lines upon which the temple was built—namely, that it should be built upon the plan of a regular nine sided polygon surrounded by loggias and in the midst of a garden at the intersection of nine avenues, with its principal entrance facing the direction of the Holy Land—the composition of the building being similar to that of some of the great temples of Persia and India.

The services of an engineer and architect were secured, the Bahá'ís throughout the Orient arose with fervour to give of their means toward the building, and within a very few years the imposing structure was completed.

The Mashriqu'l-Adh-kár is situated in the heart of the city. Its high dome stands out above the trees and house tops, being visible for miles to travellers as they approach the town. It is in the centre of a garden bounded by four streets. In the four corners of this enclosure are four buildings. One is the Bahá'í school; one is the traveller's house, where pilgrims and wayfarers are lodged; one is for the keepers; and the fourth is to be used as a hospital. Nine radial avenues approach the temple from the several parts of the grounds, one of which, the chief approach to the building, leads from the main gateway of the grounds to the principal portal of the temple.

In plan the building is composed of three sections; namely, the central rotunda, the aisle or ambulatory, which surrounds it, and the loggia, which surrounds the entire building. It is built on the plan of a regular polygon of nine sides. One side is occupied by the monumental main entrance, flanked by minarets—a high arched portico extending two stories in height, recalling in arrangement the architecture of the world famous Taj Mahal at Agra in India, the delight of world travellers, many of whom pronounce it to be the most beautiful temple in the world. This, the principal doorway, opens toward the direction of the Holy Land. The entire building is surrounded by two series of loggias—one upper and one lower—which open out upon the garden, giving a very beautiful architectural effect, in harmony with the luxuriant semi tropical vegetation which fills the garden.

The interior is elaborately decorated in plaster relief work. The writer is under the impression that eventually it is the intention to treat the interior in colours and gold, but when he visited 'Ishqábád in 1901 it was still in the simple white stucco. The exterior is also done in stucco, which in that climate resists quite well the action of the elements. The walls, which are of brick, are massively built, while the floors and dome are of concrete and iron. The whole structure impresses one by its mass and strength.

The rearing of this temple in the East has been a great source of inspiration to the Bahá'í people the world around. Who can estimate the effect that is produced by this building? It is the cause of great strength and unity among the Bahá'ís of the world, being the House of Unity open to all peoples. It is a haven of rest to many a soul and a beacon to guide those who seek the Kingdom of God.

'Abdu'l-Bahá

Man may live a few days in this world, sleeps, eats, drinks and then passes away, is confined into a subterranean dungeon and goes to the lowest of the low, leaving no trace and no name behind him. But if, on the other hand, he turns during the days of his life to the divine kingdom, acquires human perfections and the excellent attributes of the world of humanity, his life will be a fruitful one, he will pertain to the kingdom and will become heavenly and illumined.

Her Majesty, Queen Marie

Martha L. Root

The following article, highly interesting in itself, comes to us most significantly just at the time when a remarkable statement of Queen Marie appeared in a syndicated form in the newspapers of America in which she described her impressions on reading Dr Esslemont's book, Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era. It is a wholehearted commendation of the Bahá'í teaching. Queen Marie has been for years noted as a personage deeply imbued with idealistic and humanitarian motives. It was our privilege in 1909 before her accession to the throne, to visit her summer home in Sinaia, Rumania, at a time when it was unoccupied by her. We were deeply impressed with the spiritual atmosphere of her living apartment furnished largely with her own handiwork, the carving of the furniture, the paintings, the beautiful altar, all made by herself and all indicative of a deeply spiritual nature. Her books, her thoughts, as one gleaned in a hasty passage of her home, were such as to indicate the kind and spiritual ruler that she has become.—Editor

Having written to her Majesty, Queen Marie of Rumania, sending with the little note the book, "Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era", an invitation came from the Royal Palace that she would see the writer the next morning at twelve o'clock. It was a precious letter, for the Queen was not receiving any one because she was in personal sorrow in those days of 15 January to 1 February 1926, when the writer was in Bucharest.

The palace was not the one in the centre of the city which is used more for state functions, but another great palace farther out, a distance of one half hour by carriage. No need to ask, next morning, if this is the right direction: the hundreds of car passengers, diplomats, military officers, horseback riders, tradesmen and drivers of ox carts formed two great colourful, interesting processions, one going each way. It looked as if all roads in the Balkan lands must be leading to this Rumanian King and Queen's Palace, much the same as the mighty Danube River after touching many lands chooses Rumania in which to seek the sea.

In the distance one sees the splendidly wooded grounds of the palace. They are like a winter fairyland, enchanting with light snow and icicles half revealing, half concealing their forest greens. Soon one reaches the great gates where officers in fine uniforms stand at attention, and others are stationed down the winding road leading to the porte-cochère.¹ One and all when they see the letter, bow, then motion the coachman forward. So everything went easily, just like a shadow moving round and losing itself in the noonday sun. The palace was one of those art creations so satisfying to the eye in colour, form and proportion. As one approaches, one sees that it is not going to be necessary to ring a bell to enter a Queen's home. Men in stately livery assist one, their eyes are kindly, and instantly one feels that a regal atmosphere is also an inner something indescribably extraordinary as well as gorgeous externally. The butler with almost Gladstonian manners shows the way up a wide circular stairway to a drawing room. He informs a Lady in Waiting who comes at once. She is a young woman very pleasing, [XVII:3:85] and she has her knitting, a scarf, in one hand. She smiles and greets me and says that Her Majesty, the Queen, will receive me. Passing down the wide halls hung with art treasures we enter an immense music room where flowers, tapestries, cloisonnés seem vibrant with beauty and perfectly blended.

However, one gives them hardly a glance, for one feels the presence and sees in the distance a most beautiful woman emerging through the portieres. The Lady in Waiting whispers so low that it is like a breath, "Her Majesty", and then disappears, softly closing the doors behind me.

Queen Marie of Rumania comes quickly forward, smiling her welcome. How beautiful she is! She looks like a flower herself, in her blue silk morning dress with gold low shoes and hose. One can understand how all love and adore their Queen, for she possesses beauty and charm of mind and manners, while from her grave blue eyes flashes the light of a great spirit; she knows, she understands, she loves! The meeting that morning, was very simple, very great, the visitor felt the Queen's friendliness.

Sitting down together by the table, Her Majesty expressed thanks for the book, Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era, and said that she was reading it with deep interest. She remarked how people's lives differ: some can be like apostles and travel over the whole world to spread divine Teachings, others perhaps have the task of King or Queen whose responsibility is to bring a country and its people to the highest development possible. She showed how a King and Queen are the supreme court of justice when all else has failed; when justice has not been found anywhere else, theirs is an ear that can still listen, a hand that can still give, a heart that can still pardon.

Her Majesty proved how awake a Queen must be, always watchful, always ready. She must never avow herself tired, never admit that she is at the end of her tether. There must never be any hour of the day or night when the one in need cannot come to her.

Later the conversation turned to religion. Her Majesty expressed herself that every good part in every religion should be respected, that it is not the form but the spirit which is to be considered. She said: "I myself am a Protestant; my husband is Catholic and the children are orthodox. We have always had perfect understanding, each has respected the other's religion. No one ever tried to make me anything except a Protestant, and the people have always found me broad toward other religions. I have never been able to understand this spirit of intolerance and I am astonished at the degree of love that is wasted. If people would only turn to good all their knowledge, their heart, their intelligence!"

Then Her Majesty emphasized how the ills of the world would be so much less, if only people would never put them into words. "For instance," she said, "young people go out full of confidence, skirting a danger perhaps not bad to them, and which perhaps would not lead to bad if the people around them did not fan this thought. No one wishes to be bad. The reason I am so much in sympathy with your Bahá'í Teachings is because it is the good influence which the young should find instead of the bad. The bad is so much more frequently emphasized, that the good often goes under. Sometimes I am accused of not speaking loud enough in indignation against the evils, but life is so full of pitfalls and temptations! I assure you that anyone can come to me and confess his wrong and I will try to help him out of it. All work, all ambition, all thought should be constructive instead of destroying." [XVII:3:86]

Her Majesty, in speaking of her own life, said that no matter how hard hit she was, she always took it as something necessary to her own final completely unselfish self. One saw her big universal outlook, her courage in dark hours, for at the moment when the writer saw her, she had just been going through a great personal grief.

Several questions were asked by Her Majesty concerning the Bahá'í Movement for world peace. She was interested in all the Principles and in the teachings for the inner progress of the soul.

Seeing the writer's Esperanto pin she asked about the progress of Esperanto in the different lands. It was explained that the five pointed star stands for the light to the five continents. The white background is the colour of peace; the green is the Esperanto colour of hope and the word, "Esperanto" means "one who hopes". The little star was presented to Her Majesty and she is wearing it. She was delighted to hear that a new clubhouse has just been presented to the Esperantists of Bucharest by Mr Henry Fisher, one of the great promoters of Esperanto in Europe. She also said: "Esperanto has my greatest sympathy, and although I am so busy I do hope I shall have time to study Esperanto." She was greatly interested in all plans for the Eighteenth Universal Esperanto Congress which is to be held in Edinburgh, Scotland the first week in August. Her Majesty, before her marriage was the Princess of Edinburgh.

Speaking of the Universal Educational Congress which was held in San Francisco in 1923, and in Edinburgh, Scotland in 1925, Her Majesty said she hopes that this Congress will convene, sometime, in Bucharest and that she will herself, come to the sessions.

Her Majesty, Queen Marie of Rumania is an author and some of her works have been translated into Esperanto. She has great capacity and works very hard to promote many universal movements for the better understanding of the nations and the welfare of humanity. The week the writer was there she gave her patronage and much help to the formation and first brilliant meeting of "The Society of the Friends of the United States in Rumania". The object of this society is to perpetuate the existing friendship between the people of Rumania and the United States through a study of the English language, American history, literature, art, science; to facilitate exchanges of scholars of both countries; to invite and receive officially American visitors desiring to know Rumania better. The speakers were Professor Leon Feraru of Columbia University, New York, who is the Chairman of the Literary Committee of "The Society of Friends of Rumania in New York"; American Ambassador to Rumania, Mr W. S. Culbertson and Princess Cantacuzene, Vice President of the International Council of Women. Professor Feraru said there were six hundred thousand Rumanians in America; Mr Nicholas Lupu, Leader of the Peasant Party, another speaker said, "America is not bound by a treaty with Rumania, but she is bound by her ideal of justice, stronger than any treaty, and according to her ideal she cannot do us any injustice."

The world admires Her Majesty, Queen Marie because she is so daring and so enthusiastic in all that she undertakes. She interests herself in all international movements based upon broad and universal principles of right and justice. When the writer said good bye to this great-hearted, wise, beautiful Queen and gave her Bahá'u'lláh's, Seven Val- [XVII:3:87] leys, a wonderful little book which shows how the spirit can progress through seven stages to perfect freedom, she went away. She too, carried a gift from Her Majesty—a lovely new ideal of queen-womanhood. It had been a most happy hour. Riding back through the winter beauty, she remembered a curious saying of the Rumanian peasants, "Perhaps the time of afterwards has come!" IT HAS COME! Though one can hardly vision it with earth bent eyes, those thousand years of peace foretold in the Bibles of the world are to begin in this century!

XVII:3, June 1926 [XVII:3:97]

'Abdu'l-Bahá

O thou lover of reality! His Highness, the Merciful, has manifested love and harmony to the world of humanity, so that all of the individuals may find a complete connection with each other and the lights of the Oneness of God may appear in the human world. For this He sent the Holy Manifestations; revealed the heavenly books; established the divine religions so that these holy souls, these revealed books, and these divine religions may become the cause of unity, agreement harmony and love in the world of humanity. ... As this age is a luminous age and this century the century of knowledge, new teachings are necessary, a new effulgence is essential and a new life is needed. The souls cannot accept the ancient ideas, a new thought and new teachings are necessary that shall be the spirit of this age and the light of this century.

XVII:4, July 1926 [XVII:4:104]

The one divine light

Compiled from the utterances of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

Whatever there is in the world of contingency is a symbol of the spiritual world; whatever there is on the earth is a symbol of heavenly things. For example: In the spiritual world there is the light of guidance, in the outer world there is the lamp, its symbol. In the divine world there is love, symbolized in the material world by magnetism. So there are four seasons in the perishable outer world—spring, which brings the vegetables, refreshes the animals, and promises fruits; summer, which charges the trees with fruits; then follows the autumn, after which comes the winter when the trees are bare and empty. Such is the condition of the spiritual world which has its four seasons—spring, summer, autumn and winter.

When Jesus Christ appeared, it was the last days of the winter time when the people, who are the trees of the divine garden, were deprived of their fruits; that is, of their divine characteristics and divine moralities. As nature needs a springtime to revive the trees, so the spiritual nature needs a springtime to fill the garden with flowers and fruits. It was through the manifestation of Jesus Christ that this spiritual springtime began. Summer followed with its fruits and later autumn came. Winter followed and the trees were naked; that is, the people were without their divine qualities. So again, it became necessary that a new springtime should come. ...

Christ himself said that whatever happened in the cycle of Moses would occur again in his time. Therefore these occurrences were repeated. We cannot say that what happened in the time of Christ was remarkable since the same had happened before. We cannot say that it is extraordinary that the present springtime follows that of last year. We cannot say this year that these blossoms are useless because the same ones appeared last spring. The last spring gave out its benefits, and summer, autumn, and winter followed. If a new spring did not come to the world everything would die. In every springtime there will be repeated what has happened in previous spring times.

Bahá'u'lláh is the same Light in a new Lamp. To see, we must look at the Light and not at the Lamp. This is spiritual sight. The sun is one orb but it has different rising points on the horizon. One point, was Jesus, one Moses, one Bahá'u'lláh, and so on. Therefore be a lover of the 'Sun' and worship it, no matter at what point it may arise. If you worship the dawning place you will fail to see the Sun when it arises in another point of the horizon. Many stand at the old point and worship while they are losing the Light of the Sun in this Manifestation. True lovers of the Sun worship the Sun itself and not the point of its rising. They see and know the Light.

'Abdu'l-Bahá

As this is the radiant century, it is my hope that the Sun Truth may illumine all humanity. May the eyes be opened and the ears become attentive; may souls become resuscitated and consort together in the utmost harmony as recipients of the same light. Perchance God will remove this strife and warfare of thousands of years. May this bloodshed pass away, this tyranny and oppression cease, this warfare be ended. May the light of love shine forth and illumine hearts and may human lives be cemented and connected until all of us may find agreement and tranquillity beneath the same tabernacle, and with the standard of the "Most Greats Peace" above us move steadily onward.

The schools should be free from all religious and racial prejudices, for these often prevent good results from being obtained. All schools and colleges should have these three foundations:

First: They should be sincere in the service of training the souls. They should discover the mysteries of nature and extend the circle of art, commerce, etc., so that ignorance and the lack of knowledge will pass away and the lights of science and knowledge shine forth from the horizon of the soul and heart. In all schools and universities, a general rule for training should be made.

Second: Training in morality is necessary, so that the pupil's good conduct may remain unchanged and so that they may progress in a most befitting manner, become possessed of lofty ideas, lovers of the world of humanity, and so that they will hold fast to the spiritual perfections and to that which does not displease God.

Third: Service to the world of humanity should be obligatory. Every student should know, with perfect certainty, that he is the brother of the people of all religions and nations and that he should be without religious, racial, national, patriotic or political bias, so that he may find the thoughts of universal peace and the love of humankind firmly established in his heart. He should know himself as a servant of human society of all the countries in the world. He should see God as the Heavenly Father and all the servants as his children, counting all of the nations, parties, and sects as one family. The mothers in the homes, the teachers in the schools, the professors in the universities, and the leaders in the lofty gatherings, must cause these thoughts to be penetrative and effective, as the spirit circulating in the veins and nerves of the children and pupils, so that the world of humanity may be delivered from the calamities of fanaticism, war, battle, hate and obstinacy, and so that the nether world may become the paradise of heaven.

The first thing to be considered in every art before studying it, is to know what benefit comes from that art, and what fruit and result can be obtained. If a universal profit accrues to the majority of mankind from useful sciences, surely a man should exert himself to study them with his whole soul. If the sole result of his study is to consist in useless reasoning, following after the imaginations of others, and becoming a centre of quarrel and dispute out of which no one can derive any advantage—what is the sense of it, why should a man spend his life in empty discussion and argument?

Originally mankind was one family united and compact; later the members of this happy family were divided and subdivided through ignorance and prejudice. Now the time has come again for their final unification. Universal peace will bring about this long-wished-for consummation.

Universal peace

Excerpts from the Writings of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

How is universal peace to be established? By the education of the public with the sentiments of peace. Today the full realization of universal peace is the panacea of every disease. ... This military and naval expenditure is a great disease. ... The remedy of this disease is through universal peace. This will insure public safety. Today that which is the cause of dispersion is war. If the nations enter into a faithful agreement to [XVII:8:240] leave off all warlike preparation at once, they shall secure for themselves and their posterity eternal welfare. They shall become freed from every difficulty and international confusion. This end must be obtained through the development of the intellects and the inculcation of peaceful ideals in all the institutions of modern civilization.

(Compilation, Peace and War, p. 180.)

Man in this world is the edifice of God. He is not a human edifice. If you destroy an edifice built by man, the owner of the house will feel grief indeed and will feel wrath against you. How much more when man is destroying an edifice founded by God.

Undoubtedly he deserves the wrath of God. God has created man noble. God has created man a dominant factor in creation. He has specialized man with particular bestowals. He has conferred upon him mind; He has given him perception; He has given him the faculty of memory, the faculty of discrimination; He has endowed him with keen perceptions, the five senses. With all His good gifts to man which were to make him the manifestations of virtues, which were to make him as a radiant candle, which were to make him a source of life, which were to make him an agent of constructiveness, shall we now destroy this great edifice of God? Shall we destroy to its very foundation this great body social or politic? ... There is no baser state than that of the ferocious type. There is no greater degradation for man than this. There is no worse debasement than the battlefield. It is the cause of the wrath of God. It is the cause of the destruction of the foundations of man.

XVII:8, November 1926 [XVII:8:251]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

God has given to man the wonderful gift of scientific knowledge by which he has discovered that none can escape this law except man himself; he alone can control, can, by his knowledge and power, rise above this law. ... It is clear that man alone is able to control the laws of nature.

Look at God’s great gift of power to man, by which he is able to do so much for the advancement of civilization! Then reflect on the terrible misuse of this divine gift. Instead of using it to promote love, concord and friendship between nations, behold how destruction receives its weapons, hatred and wholesale slaughter of mankind employs the inventions of science; instruments for committing injustice are manufactured, swords instead of ploughshares are forged. O, the pity of it all!

He should use his power for good, to bring the fruits of civilization into the possible possession of all men, to encourage harmony and kindness, to produce concord amongst men; for this reason God gave this divine gift.

The wisdom in tests

From the Writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

It is my hope that during the time of tests thou mayest remain in the utmost firmness and steadfastness, so that like unto a lamp thou mayest be protected within the glass, and be not extinguished by the blowing of winds. ... Be thou resolute and steadfast. When the tree is firmly rooted it will bear fruit, therefore it is not permitted to be agitated by any test. Be thou not disheartened! Be thou not discouraged! The trials of God are many, but if man remains firm and steadfast the test itself is a stepping stone for the progress of humanity.

'Abdu'l-Bahá

There are two influences tending toward prosperity and progress which emanate from the forefront of advancement of the world of humanity. They remind the negligent and awaken them that sleep, give sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, power of utterance to the mutes and life to the dead.

One is the influence of civilization, that development of the world of nature that concerns the material life of man. It promotes physical advancement and cultivates the social virtues. The laws and deductions of science, so indispensable to progress, are the product of lofty thoughts of sound minds, the accumulated results of the efforts of ancient and modern scholars. The most effective power for the promotion and dissemination of this influence is just government.

The other is the divine influence, the holy and spiritual revelations which insure eternal glory, everlasting happiness, the illumination of the world, the appearance of merciful phenomena in the world of humanity and perpetual life. The fundamental basis thereof is the teachings and the precepts of the Prophets, the dictates and attraction of the conscience which belong to the realm of morality. Like unto the lamp they illuminate and brighten the depths and recesses of human realities. The effective power of this is the Word of God!

Immortality

From the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

In the revealed Writings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá there are to be found almost limitless teachings on the subject of "Life after death". We have attempted to select only a few for the purpose of this compilation.—Editor

Know with true certainty that man was not created for the life of this world as it is mortal and there is no certainty therein. Is it possible that this great creation and glorious being should terminate in mortality? Is it meet that the result of God's great creation which is unlimited—that is, man—should live in this world a certain number of days with many difficulties, troubles, without repose and rest, and then die and end in mortality? No; verily, by truth, this is not meet! Nay, rather, this glorious being and grand creation was made for the eternal life, spiritual happiness, revelations of the heart, divine inspiration, heavenly perfections and virtues of the kingdom.

(Tablet to the Bahá'ís in Ithaca, N.Y.) [XVIII:5:135]

But regarding the progress of the spirit in the world of the Kingdom after its ascension, it is wholly beyond space and time, and developments after leaving this body are spiritual and not terrestrial. It is like unto the progress of the child from the world of the foetus to the world of maturity and intelligence, from the world of ignorance to the world of knowledge, from the station of imperfection to the pinnacle of perfection. As divine perfections are infinite, therefore the progress of the spirit is limitless.

In the scheme of human life the teacher and his system of teaching plays the most important role, carrying with it the heaviest responsibilities and most subtle influences. A teacher is like unto a gardener. Just as a gardener sows the seeds and watches carefully over their sprouting, looks after their growth and progression, so also a teacher must watch over the education of the children and inculcate in their young lives the highest ideals of truth and justice. ...

By every means at their disposal they must inculcate into their growing bodies, souls, minds and spirits, the principles of sincerity, love, trustfulness, obedience, true democracy, and kindness toward all races; thus hereafter the world of civilization may flow in one mighty current and the children of the next generation may make secure the foundations of human solidarity and goodwill.

XVIII:7, October 1927 [XVIII:7:217]

'Abdu'l-Bahá

The advancement of civilization, material perfections and human virtues will bear no fruit or result unless joined to the spiritual perfections, merciful qualities and sound morals, and the happiness of the human world which is the original goal will not be attained. For although through the advancement of civilization and the adornment and refinement of the material world happiness is realized, and the sight of hopes fulfilled in perfect beauty wins the heart, yet concomitantly, great dangers, severe ordeals and awful catastrophes are involved.

Now when ye behold the order and regularity of countries, cities and villages, the attractive adornment, the delicacy of the blessings, the suitability of implements, the ease of transportation and travelling, the extension of knowledge of the facts of the world of nature, the great inventions and gigantic undertakings and the fine and artistic discoveries, ye shall say that civilization is the cause of happiness and the development of the human world.

Yet again when ye glance over the inventions of infernal instruments of destruction, the creation of forces of ruin, the discovery of fiery means which cut at the root of life, it becomes plainly evident that civilization is twin with savagery and a concomitant thereof unless material civilization be aided by divine guidance, merciful appearance, heavenly thoughts, and becomes joined to the spiritual states, the perfections of the Kingdom of God and the divine bounties. ... Therefore this civilization and material development must be led by the great guidance; the mundane world must be made the place for the appearance of the bounties of the kingdom; material advancement must be made twin with merciful revelation. Thus may the human world appear as the representative of the heavenly assembly on the plane of existence, and the exposition of divine evidence may reveal itself in the greatest sweetness and loveliness. Thus may eternal happiness and glory find realization.

Know ye verily that the happiness of the world of humanity is dependent upon the unity and solidarity of mankind, and that material and spiritual progress both rest upon universal friendliness and love among human individuals.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

The glory and the exaltation of the station of Christ is as clear as the sun at midday from the books and tablets of His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh. The object of the Bahá’í Cause is identical with the object of the Bible and the Gospel. The Bahá’ís must be informed as to the contents of the Old and New Testaments.

Concerning the faith of the Bahá’ís as to the station of His Holiness Christ, they believe He is the Word of God.

There are prepared souls in every religion. Today God is working in all the churches instructing many souls in celestial brotherhood. These souls are related by invisible and spiritual ties and are being ripened by the Holy Spirit.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s table

Shahnáz Waite

This is the first of a series of articles or compilations giving interesting experiences of those who came into personal contact with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá during His lifetime either in the Holy Land or during His visit to the West. We will welcome any contributions to this section which we purpose to continue from time to time.—Editor

At no time in the history of human events has such a table existed as existed in the prison home of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in the penal colony city of ‘Akká, Syria, during a period extending from about 1896 to 1909 when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, having been set free in 1908, moved with His family to Haifa, ending this chapter in the history of the Bahá’í Cause. The comparatively few who were privileged to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in this prison, and sit at this table as His guests, coming from all parts of the globe, and drawn by the magnet of the “Fire of the Love of God” will never forget it. The realization of the spiritual significance of this experience, its unparalleled uniqueness; its tragic and dramatic setting, and the effect upon the hearts of those so honoured as to “break bread” together under such sacred circumstances, grows clearer, and more wonderful as the years pass. Many of the band of pilgrims who were called to this spiritual banquet have joined the “choir invisible” and are with the Master behind the veils in higher realms today; and yearly the band grows less. Future generations will have knowledge of this—the Master’s table—only through long transmitted narration.

It was at this table that all of the so-called “Table Talks of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá” were given, and later were brought back to America by the different pilgrims and shared with friends. Many of these “Table Talks” have been published.

It was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s custom to have the meals served in courses. At the beginning, before the first course was served, and then at the end of each following course, while the dishes were quietly removed, He would speak to the friends along spiritual lines only, giving forth the great Teaching of Bahá’u’lláh in a simplified form, expounding the Word of God from the sacred Scriptures of the different religions, and at the same time feeding the material body of man. As each course was served, all would eat, then at its removal 'Abdu'l-Bahá would take up the thread of His discourse just where He had left off, with perfect continuity, so the material and spiritual meal progressed side by side.

The penetration of His Word was most marked. He would tenderly express some beautiful thoughts, like the following, for instance, and magically they would be understood both by "mind and heart", and could never be forgotten:

"There is a kind of food which needs neither knife nor fork and of which every one may partake with perfect ease and benefit. It is the food spiritual. This food brings life and stimulation instead of indolence and apathy. It brings peace and content to the one who partakes of it; the more food the more joy and peace. For the Spirit is always eager to furnish sustenance to the soul.

"God be praised. At this table we are joined in Spiritual relationship. We are all of one family because we are under the Shadow of Bahá'u'lláh. Look at the earth. Of itself it is worthless, yet it can reflect the light and heat of the sun. Clouds gather, the rains descend and [XVIII:9:284] the earth becomes fruitful. In the same way the Spirit of God gives life to the soul of man and the Breeze of God awakens the soul from its sleep. Peter was only a catcher of fishes yet his attainment was very great. Amanias the High Priest was much greater in the eyes of the world yet he was deprived while Peter received the bounty of God.

"That which is most delicious in the world of existence is love. Love is the best condiment. ... For instance, the food on this table is nothing, indeed very simple; yet because it is prompted by love it is delicious.

"The Lord's Supper of Christ was indeed a very common thing; but because there was excessive love among the individual members who convened there, that table surpassed the royal tables, and it was established as the Lord's Supper. Even now at this time it is known as such. This was due to the love which existed between Jesus Christ and the disciples."

It is hard to bring to the Western mind, so filled with the material things of life, and with the "pomp and circumstance" of the social and ritualistic customs, an adequate description of this remarkable table, for the environment that surrounded it was one unknown in this "land of the free". Picture if you will one whose rank was that of the oldest son of a Prince of Persia, who had known vast wealth and every luxury His country afforded, imprisoned forty years because of His faith in the Message of Universal Brotherhood and Unity given forth by His Father, Bahá'u'lláh, the Revealer of the Bahá'í Revelation and His promulgation of these Divine Ideals. Stripped of all wealth, all of the simplest comforts of life, a prisoner amid the scum of the Orient, the felons of Syria, yet creating about Him an atmosphere of absolute spirituality, purity, beauty and refinement. A prison home with its stark, bare whitewashed walls and meagre furniture, without the walls of its gardens the rabble of 'Akká, the poor diseased and degenerate, yet within its doors one found heaven; found a luminous "White Spot" in the midst of darkness and despair.

'Abdu'l-Bahá has said: "The spiritual life is symbolized by simplicity and contemplation, combined with usefulness and well directed activity"; and this was the rule whereby all of the inmates of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's home governed their lives.

The now world famous dining room, in the centre of which stood the Master's table, faced the blue Mediterranean Sea, and overlooked the ancient double seawall of 'Akká. There were one or two paintings, by Bahá'í artists, unframed and framed, which hung upon the wall; an old-fashioned clock which ticked drowsily; some modern cane seated chairs, the gift of some of the friends who had visited there; and the Master's table with its immaculate appointments. There were always fragrant flowers upon it, and the simple Persian food was ever served with a [XVIII:9:285] spirit of utmost love, which added much to its delicious flavours. The perfume of white jasmine and of attar of roses filled the air. In one corner near the door of entrance stood a basin of water, in which 'Abdu'l-Bahá, according to an Oriental custom, always washed His hands after eating.

Horace Holley in his Modern Social Religion has so beautifully described this the Master's table in these words: "To 'Abdu'l-Bahá, as a Teacher and friend, came men and women from every race, religion and nation, to sit at His table, like favoured guests, questioning Him about the social, spiritual or moral program each had most at heart; and after a stay lasting from a few hours to many months, returning home, inspired, renewed, and enlightened. The world surely never possessed such a guest-house as this.

"Within its doors the rigid castes of India melted away, the racial prejudice of Jew, Christian and Muslim became less than a memory; and every convention save the essential law of warm hearts and aspiring minds broke down, banned and forbidden by the unifying sympathy of the Master's house. It was like King Arthur and the Round Table, but an Arthur who knighted women as well as men, and sent them away not with the sword but with the Word."

It was indeed the supper of Divine Love, of Unity and spiritual communion. Here Buddhists, Pársís, Zoroastrians, Muslims, Christians, Jews, and all other faiths met and in perfect love and unity, at that blessed table, "broke bread together", in the Kingdom of Divine Love. No greater symbol of unity could be given in the Orient than this breaking of bread together, for it stands as a symbol of recognition and union. This in itself has been one of the great miracles performed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá—what greater one could we ask? To take these hostile races and religions, that outside of the walls of that prison home were at war with each other, their hearts filled with hatred and oppression—and through the Power of the Love of God, which flowed through Him to merge them all into one. This is the miracle of miracles, and the one upon which the salvation of the world depends. Without this unity and love it needs must perish.

During one evening meal, at the Master's table, as the writer sat next to Him listening to His words of infinite wisdom, she looked at a glass filled with water in front of her place, and the thought involuntarily flashed through her mind, with a great yearning, "Oh! if only 'Abdu'l-Bahá would take my heart and empty it of every preconceived idea and earthly desire, just as one would take this glass and empty it, and then refill it with divine Love and understanding." It was just a flash of consciousness, yet 'Abdu'l-Bahá seemed to read it. He was in the midst of His discourse; He stopped abruptly (but no one seemed to notice it) and addressed His attendant who served the friends. He said but a few words in Persian to him, then continued His conversation. No one's attention was interrupted by [XVIII:9:286] the circumstance; all were listening eagerly to His every word said to them. The attendant came quietly up behind the writer, reached over and removed her glass from the table and taking it over to the corner of the room, emptied its contents of water into the water basin, then returned the empty glass to its former place. Still no one noticed what had happened. 'Abdu'l-Bahá continued to speak, the while reaching over and taking the water bottle on the table in His hand, and in the most casual manner, still talking on the subject of His discourse, refilled her empty glass, then set the water-bottle back in its place. No one save the writer and 'Abdu'l-Bahá knew what had transpired. Her heart was filled with unspeakable joy. This proved conclusively that the innermost thoughts and the innermost desires of the hearts of all present were an open book to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and that His love encompassed all.

To have sat at the Master's table, and to have heard Him say: "You are gathered together at this table, so may you be gathered together in the Kingdom, and as you are with Me today, so shall you be throughout all the worlds of God", is to know what the Reality of the Lord's Supper truly is and to have received God's Benediction.

XVIII:11, February 1928 [XVIII:11:350]

'Abdu'l-Bahá

Consider the influence of the Word of God, that although people of totally different temperament, religion, culture and ideas, live in the Pilgrim House [used for the guests of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family] never do we hear even a faint whisper of ill-feeling against each other; they are welded together by the Alchemy of Truth. If you take ten bars of iron and tie them together no matter how closely, they will not become one. But when a metallurgist comes on the scene, he takes the ten bars, melts them in the furnace and casts them in one mould. Only through this fiery process will their atoms commingle with each other, become united and inseparable.

This is the work that Bahá'u'lláh has done and is doing. He has not tied together the iron bars—the religions of the world—with the rope of indulgent tolerance or ordinary amenities of human existence which are liable to break at any time, but with the fire of the Love of God He has melted them first, and then casting them in one mould of spiritual brotherhood, He has rendered the most marvellous services to the world of humanity. Bahá'u'lláh is this Divine Metallurgist, and those who have deep insight and look around the world witness daily the workings of the principle of fusion.¹

Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana

Martha L. Root

Miss Root's first audience with Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania was on 30 January 1926, in Cotroceni Palace, in Bucharest. This magazine had an article in June, describing that remarkable and significant visit—Editor

Coming from Geneva and the League of Nations, with stops at Trieste and Belgrade, the writer arrived in Bucharest on 5 October 1927. It was not this eager, colourful "Paris of the Balkans"—so fascinating to tourists, so different from any other city—that had drawn her. Calea Victoria, Bucharest's fashionable thoroughfare, that is always so thronged one wonders how the many motor cars and bevies of horse-drawn carriages ever "arrive" through such a narrow, picturesque moving picture of aristocratic Rumanian life, was just as interesting as before. She liked riding through it all again, coming up from the train to her small hotel.

However, her real visit to Bucharest, aside from her lectures on Bahá'u'lláh's Principles and her newspaper articles, was to bring the love and the sympathy of Bahá'ís all over the world to Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania. The Queen at that time was in the period of great mourning for her husband, His Majesty King Ferdinand, who had passed on 20 July.

All the royal family was spending the month of October in Sinaia at the Queen's palace, Peleshor, which is just beside the greater palace, Pelesh. The two are one estate, but Peleshor is especially the home of the Queen, where she has her books and does much of her writing in summer.

Word came through Madame Simons Lahovary, Lady in Waiting, that Her Majesty would receive the visitor on 9 October. This was purely a favour, because at this time the Queen was not seeing anyone. The writer went to Sinaia, four hours distant, by one of the fast express trains, the afternoon of 8 October. There was a pouring cold rain, but through the storm one could catch glimpses of what magnificent forests, what glorious scenery, have these [XVIII:12:367] “Transylvanian Alps”, these Carpathian Mountains, whose heart is Sinaia.

Next morning the air was fresh and bracing and the sun was shining lovingly over this Sinaia, one of the most beautiful little summer resorts of fashion. The villas grace the mountain slopes as jewels in a tiara of autumnal glory. The Bahá'í decided to walk to the palace Peleshor to enjoy the thrill of passing through those enchanting roadways leading gracefully up and up, and to see at close range the splendid little seventeenth century church and monastery, shining like a pearl of purest white in this diadem of mountain splendour. Deep in her heart, too, was the longing to go on foot and humbly to the first Queen of the whole world who had publicly written of Bahá'u'lláh's great Principles for this universal cycle. Her Majesty Queen Marie's grandmother, Queen Victoria, of Great Britain, had said openly of Bahá'u'lláh's Teachings: “If these are from God, they will stand!” and she had preserved His Tablet (letter) to her for later generations to see and read. In the centuries ahead when Bahá'u'lláh's Teachings are lived and fully understood, the name of Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania will stand as the first Queen who wrote and explained the power of these universal principles to bring the permanent peace.

Walking in that paradise of natural beauty, the writer ascended the roadway slopes and passed through that white court, where the Rumanian church stood in its ivory loveliness and the famous old monastery stood loyally beside it. It is the church of the Royal Family, where unnumbered prayers have been offered for Rumania, this country with its dramatic history, more tragic, more swift than the masterpieces of the poets. It is the church where His Majesty the little King Mihai goes to service and where his seventh birthday, 25 October, would soon be celebrated in a very great way. Perhaps to this very spot Jesus Christ's trustworthy Disciple, Andrew, had come, for Rumanian tradition says that Andrew, from that faithful Band of Eleven, came to Rumania to bring the Glad-tidings of the Christ. How well he had done it! For this Sunday morning, after TWO THOUSAND YEARS, all Sinaia, all Rumania, had already gathered very early to sing praises to Christ!

The roadway from the church led up directly into the great park, picturesque with broad, sweeping landscapes and century old trees which showed their generations of care. The writer walked on past the magnificent immense Palace Pelesh, where King Ferdinand, with his Queen wife's arms about him lifting him higher, had courageously passed from this home into the House of Many Mansions promised by His Lord, for King Ferdinand was a devout and true Catholic. How well the writer remembered seeing him two years before, that morning in Cotroceni Palace in Bucharest, where she was waiting a moment in a small drawing-room just before she was taken into the great music room to be presented to Her Majesty the Queen! The King was about to pass through this small drawing-room with some friends, but seeing the American he took them through another salon. He had appeared so tall, so noble, so serious!

Coming to the architecturally smaller Palace Peleshor, built by the late King Carol for King Ferdinand and Queen Marie and their children, the pedestrian found it situated in a perfect setting of terraced gar- [XVIII:12:368] dens. If the royalty of the world have more beautiful environment for country palaces than this in Rumania, the writer has never seen them.

Palace Peleshor is large—it isn't small, only it seems so, because it stands near the great Palace Pelesh. (The Palace Pelesh takes its name from the little mountain stream called Pelesh which passes through the place.)

What a feeling of silent, unutterable sympathy one has coming to this palace where Her Majesty Queen Marie and Her Royal Highness Ileana, where His Majesty the little King Mihai and Her Royal Highness Princess Helen, His Royal Highness Prince Nicolas, Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth, of Greece, were staying for a few weeks, and each was deeply missing the loved one who had gone from among them!

Ladies in Waiting stood in the great hall to receive the visitor. They were the same fine women who had greeted her two years before in Cotroceni Palace, but now they were dressed all in black. One explained that Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana was still at the church, but had left word she would receive the guest when she returned a little later. The other Lady in Waiting took the writer up the broad, circular open stairway to the Queen's drawing-room on the next floor.

Her Majesty Queen Marie stood in the centre of this luxurious salon where the sunshine yellow, soft colours blended into a harmony of pastels. How beautiful she was. All in black draperies, with bands of white about her head and binding the wrists! Only a great artist could have designed such a mourning costume as she wore that day, but the Queen is an artist in everything she wears, and does, and says. But it is the radiance in her eyes and the tender smile one loved most and will remember longest. Her welcome was solemn, sacred, cordial. When she heard the deep greetings from the friends she replied with a wonderful message to the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, Shoghi Effendi, and to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's sister, who is called The Greatest Holy Leaf, and to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's wife, The Holy Mother. She added: "Tell them, also, I hope some time to go to Jerusalem and 'Akká and Haifa. I should like to pray at both graves and to meet the Family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá." [XVIII:12:369]

She sends this message to the Bahá'ís of the United States: "I am so happy to be able to thank, through the Bahá'í magazine, The Star of the West, all those Bahá'í friends in America who sent me the lovely bouquets in all the cities through which I passed. How it touched my heart! Wherever I came, those nosegays always on my table, nothing personal, never saying who had brought them, never able to thank anyone, just sent with the love of the Bahá'ís of those cities, went straight to my heart! No one ever understood how much those bouquets meant to me!

"I am so happy to think I have been able in any way to further a Cause which, I am sure, is destined to bring happiness, if not to the world, to all those who really have understanding of what is the real meaning of God."

Her Majesty Queen Marie, in her daily article during a year for an American syndicate, touched on all subjects, and the four articles which she wrote about Bahá'u'lláh's Teachings show the love the Queen feels for this Message that will bring so much happiness to the world. She could do in one hour what some people might work for ten years to accomplish. Yet she said: "I carry it on humbly. I have been a groper¹ and life has taught me many things. It is logical that this Message of Bahá'u'lláh should come to me. Ever since I received these books they have been my dearest spiritual reading next to the Bible. I am sure they will bring the same blessing to all those to whom they come."

She spoke about teaching the Cause and said that if one wishes to give another truth, he should do it humbly. People who teach should not make one feel he is lower down than they are. She admired so much the spirit of selflessness found in the Teachings. She, herself, certainly is evanescent in her service, this Queen who possesses one of the keenest intellects, who is deeply intuitive, who is outspoken in her manner, penetrating in her testimony and always courageous in her stand. She said: "With bowed head I recognize that I, too, am but a channel and I rejoice in the knowledge."

The writer told her Majesty how these open letters had been translated into scores of languages and ten million people in one continent alone had read them. She explained, too, what a balm they had been to those suffering persecutions for the Cause. This gracious Queen replied: "I am very thankful; I take it as a sign that God accepted my humble tribute."

Her Majesty Queen Marie, continuing, said that one must begin this Movement with the younger generation. She thought that the best book to give out to people explanatory of the Teachings is Dr J. E. Esslemont's book, Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era. When the writer asked her about the Balkans and how to promote all these principles of universal education, universal auxiliary language, the new solution of the economic problem by which every child in every country may have education and the welfare of the peasants be improved, she replied: "The Balkan lands, being nearer the East, are always on the defensive; it is because they have been ill-treated coerced and more betrayed by other countries. They become suspicious of anything that brings a new message, fearing it may be underhand, that there may be some ill motive back of it all. One can make a good beginning by showing them and all the rest of [XVIII:12:370] the world how comprehensive these Teachings are, how they hurt no one's feelings. The booklets and books should be well translated and well printed in these different languages."

The Queen has read nearly every book that has been published on these Teachings. She studies them and knows their truth. Several of these books were beside her. Her Majesty Queen Marie received with very great pleasure, that morning, the sacred gift which the writer had brought and presented from the dear Bahá'ís of faraway Mashhad, chief town of that Province in Persia. It was an illumined sheet, on which was inscribed a Prayer of Bahá'u'lláh. It was adorned and blessed in the centre with a lock of Bahá'u'lláh's own shining hair. She loved it and will have a frame specially designed for it, and in the oval she will place a small photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, she so deeply appreciated this treasure. It is indeed a glorious gift, for no one else in Europe has a similar remembrance from Bahá'u'lláh. Speaking, too, of the illumined work, the polished gold of the letters, the Queen said: "It is in the most perfect taste of all the Orient! I know how rare and beautiful it is!"

Then Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana came into the drawing room, accompanied by her brother, His Royal Highness Prince Nicolas. They had just come up from the Rumanian Church a little after ten o'clock. (Services are early in Rumania.) The Princess is very young, very beautiful; she is serious, she is sweet. One saw at a glance that she is much interested in spiritual realities. She invited the writer to come up to her room on the third floor for a little talk. The room of this Rumanian was charming and full of sunshine. There were, perhaps, more than one hundred pink roses in the different gold bowls and in crystal vases; they gave an exquisite charm and fragrance to the apartment. On the walls were pictures from the life of Christ, a portrait of Jeanne d'Arc and two artistic companion pieces of maidens dancing on the greensward. Beside the long couch close to the three great and very high windows stood a little, low table for books, with shelves underneath for more books. Princess Ileana, like her mother, is a great reader. On this little table was a tiny photograph of 'Abdu'l-Bahá which she had received the day before. Here, also, was a brass bowl of the delicate pink fragrant roses. With her religious [XVIII:12:371] and other books she had nearly all the works of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá which are published in English. A very beautiful picture of Christ hung above her couch. In an open bay window alcove, also flooded with sunshine, was her writing desk. It was well arranged and one could see that it is a place where much work is done. She said to her visitor: "I do not see how you ever get so much writing and other work done! I am obliged to get up very early, morning to get my correspondence finished."

Then a little heart to heart talk followed. This young Princess is enthusiastic and keenly eager to help the thousands of girls in her country. She does wonderful work in the Young Women's Christian Association, the Girl Guides and in the Rumanian Church, and she will translate two little booklets about Bahá'u'lláh's peace principles into the Rumanian language.

She is devoted to the work of the Rumanian Church and to the Rumanian people; she tries to work with them and for them. She spoke of having given Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era to one friend at Court and she added: "He said he read it and loved it!"

Her brother, His Royal Highness Prince Nicolas, came in two or three times during the conversation. He is pleasant and delightful, and so devoted to his mother and sister; he helps them in everything which interests them. So the morning was spent, and when the writer was leaving this dear Princess said: "I will come down with you, perhaps you may not know your way." Just then His Royal Highness Prince Nicolas came from his study, which was near. He swung into step with a grace and ease that showed he must have been doing it like that all his life, and, smiling and courteous, became with his sister.

This little outer visit to Palace Peleshor in Sinaia had an inner significance. The real audience with Her Majesty Queen Marie and her young daughter, Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana, was that souls met that day and spoke together of the realities of this life and of eternity. The Queen said to her children that morning, as the conversation turned to life after death: "Papa knows; he sees that all we are trying to do is constructive." Just how constructive for Rumania, for all the Balkans and all the rest of the world the study of these Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh for world understanding really is, the future will soon show. These Royal radiant souls are planting seeds of spiritual world co-operation which, throughout eternity, will bear harvests.

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

Dr Dīyá' Baghdádí

Chapter I

*This story of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit in America is based on material and notes corrected by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself and which He had turned over to Dr Baghdádí at the time He was leaving this country. The twofold purpose of this series, which will continue for several months, is, in the words of the author, 'First to bring back to the memory of the believers the time of the incomparable days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to them and to remind them of His words, His instructions and His admonitions; and, secondly, to give a picture of His visit so that later believers who did not have the blessing of seeing Him, may benefit by reading a brief history.'—*Editor.

'Abdu'l-Bahá, the revered world leader of the Bahá'í Movement, arrived in New York from England on the White Star liner, Cedric, 11 April 1912. It was His first visit to the United States, and, aside from His short stay in Egypt and a visit to France and England in 1911, his first travel away from forty years enforced sojourn in the prison city of 'Akká in Palestine (the Holy Land), where He and His Father, Bahá'u'lláh, the Founder of the Bahá'í religion, were exiled by the Turkish Government. He seemed, however, to fully understand and appreciate the modern scientific and industrial civilization of America. His utterances then and later throughout His travels in America gave praise to the energy, the initiative and the achievement of the American people. The skyline of New York particularly interested 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and He called the big skyscrapers "the minarets of the Western world's commerce and industry."

On the pier to meet Him were, besides many of the Bahá'ís, a great number of people, among them the representatives of the press who had eagerly awaited His arrival. "I am here," 'Abdu'l-Bahá told an Evening World reporter, "to unify the religions of the world, to talk in the interest of universal peace. I have no creed to preach. I have no doctrine to propound. My word is the word of love Do not worship the Lantern—worship the Light."

Another reporter asked what Bahá'í meant. "It means," answered 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "to love all the world, to love humanity, to serve it, to work for universal peace and universal brotherhood."

Accompanied by His interpreters and secretaries, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to the Hotel Ansonia. In the afternoon He visited the home of Mr and Mrs Edward B. Kinney, where Catholics, Protestants, Jews and Muslims had gathered to meet Him, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá made no distinction in religions, creeds or races.

Though He was about sixty years of age, forty years in the "Most Great Prison" at 'Akká had made Him appear older. He was of medium height, but had the appearance [XIX:2:53] of a tall man because of His erect form. His long silvery hair flowed over His shoulders. His beard and moustache were thin but full. His forehead was broad, full and high. His nose was aquiline. His eyes light blue and penetrating. He wore a voluminous outer coat (called an 'aba) made of grey wool and which reached almost to the floor, and His turban was white. In a word, His garments were the same as those worn by all the Prophets of the East.

"Having heard of the numerous organizations for peace and arbitration, and because of My great interest in these subjects, I have come here," said 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "to advocate the unity and solidarity of humanity. That is the essence of My teachings. All nations and all religions must be united. By that unity perfect peace would reign among men. Strife and animosity are due to misunderstandings. If these misunderstandings be removed then unity can be accomplished.

"All the Prophets of God were Manifestations of Truth and Reality. But because imitations have crept into religions, divisions and misunderstanding have resulted. These imitations cannot be found in the reality of religion. Human beings should refer to the original foundations, and then six thousand years of strife and warfare will vanish. My purpose is to bring about the oneness of humanity and to secure accord and fellowship among all mankind, so that all may dwell together finally as one family. They were so originally."

On 12 April 1912, not less than one thousand Bahá'ís and inquirers eagerly frequented the homes of Mr and Mrs Howard MacNutt and Miss Phillips, where they had the privilege of meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A number of clergymen called on Him the following day and heard these words from His lips:

"Materialism and spirituality have always kept pace together. Now materialism has gone ahead, the divine foundation is forgotten and is being left behind. Among the causes of this failure is that religious leaders have presented religion as if it were opposed to science and reason, and have promoted imitations. [XIX:2:54] Therefore you must bring about a conformity of religion and science.

"The appearance of the Manifestations of God is like the appearance of the spring season. Undoubtedly the spring season does not last permanently and eternally. Now we are hopeful that the divine springtime may again become the cause of refreshing the garden of the world of existence."

That afternoon the Bahá'ís had the pleasure of meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the home of Mr and Mrs Alexander Morten.

On His way home, after glancing at New York's high buildings and its crowded streets,

'Abdu'l-Bahá remarked to His party, "America has a wonderful future. But these extremely high buildings and the great crowds are depressing to my heart and are not good for the health of the people."

Dr Percy Stickney Grant was not the first minister to invite 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak in his church, but his was the first invitation that 'Abdu'l-Bahá accepted. There was little room left in that church when the eleven o'clock service on 14 April began. "It is our privilege this morning," said Dr Grant, "to hear one who has come out of the East, a new and great herald of good will; one bearing a message of love to all mankind. 'Abdu'l-Bahá is a Master of the things of the Spirit. He comes from that part of the world where men meditate; where contemplation was born. He teaches the fundamental unity of all religions—a truth in which this congregation believes profoundly and we welcome here one who may help the material fervour of the Occident to gain a new peace by the infiltration of the harmony of the Orient."

'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke in Persian, an interpreter translating a phrase at a time. "Our material civilization," 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "has progressed greatly with the perfection of the crafts and the forward steps of material science, but our spiritual civilization, that which is based on divine morals, has declined and become degraded. We should strive to make our material civilization the purest possible medium, the most unclouded glass, through which the light of our spiritual civilization must shine."

"One of the things that supports a spiritual civilization is Peace," He said, "and the most pressing need of politics is universal peace." But the oneness of humanity human solidarity—which has been the message of all the Prophets, will be achieved only through spiritual power, for neither racial distinctions nor patriotism can further it. The oneness of humanity will come with the supremacy of spiritual civilization, and not while, as now, we are submerged in a sea of materialism. "The cause (the Bahá'í Cause) is progressing in the Orient," He concluded, "and the heavenly civilization is daily making itself more manifest."

These things 'Abdu'l-Bahá said in the few moments that He spoke before He returned to His seat beside the altar.

At the taking of the collection [XIX:2:55] 'Abdu'l-Bahá made a generous contribution.

During the prayer He stood with forearms extended, the palms of His hands turned upward, not downward, and as He finished He passed these over His eyes and face. A sense of indescribable joy and exhilaration seemed to be with many in the congregation, and not a few lingered afterward to see Him.

In the afternoon, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at a union meeting of Advanced Thought Centres, at the Carnegie Lyceum. His address here, and that of the morning at the Church of the Ascension, both with a wealth of parable, are published in full in the addresses of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in America, under the title, The Promulgation of Universal Peace.

The evening of 14 April and a part of the 15th, were given to visitors and friends who came to see Him.

A remarkable coincidence happened on 15 April. Lo and behold! Mr Hudson Maxim and Mr W. H. Short appeared at the same time at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's door. Mr Maxim was one of the greatest inventors of arms and explosives, and Mr Short was Secretary of the New York Peace Society. The interview in substance was as follows: Mr Maxim stated that he himself was, like 'Abdu'l-Bahá, a promoter of universal peace only from a different angle; that he was devoting his life to the invention of the most dreadful instruments of war and most costly so that it would never pay the nations to fight.

'Abdu'l-Bahá explained that the result of modern discoveries and inventions was more destructive than ever before. He gave as an example the history of ancient wars between Persia and the Romans who fought for a period of twenty years, but only six thousand lives were lost in action. But now, with our scientific methods of fighting, many thousands of lives can be destroyed in one day. Finally 'Abdu'l-Bahá advised Mr Maxim to invent a gun of love that it might give and prolong life, so that his name would be written with a pen of gold on the pages of history and throughout the ages the people would be able to say, how wonderful it is—the greatest inventor of war instruments has invented the gun of life and peace! This thrilling interview is published in the Star of the West, III:7, p. 4.

On the afternoon of that day the Bahá'ís met 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the home of Mr and Mrs Mountfort Mills.

On 16 April, He visited the home of Mr and Mrs A. P. Dodge, where a number of friends were invited to meet Him.

On 17 April, an Inter-Racial Amity meeting was held at the home of Mr and Mrs Edward B. Kinney. Here, addressing the white and coloured friends, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: "Always the East has been the dawning-point of light and the rising-place of effulgences. But the blessings of the coloured and white people under the creative effect and influence of the outpouring of the Sun of Reality resemble the gathering of roses of variegated colours. This difference of colour adds charm and beauty, and is conducive to the wealth of their splendour."

The dinner served to the friends that evening was prepared and cooked by 'Abdu'l-Bahá's own hands.

On 18 April, two public meetings were held at the home of Mr and Mrs Marshall L. Emery; and in the evening 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Bowery Mission, where more than four hundred of the poor received His spiritual comfort and material gifts. [XIX:2:56]

Every act of 'Abdu'l-Bahá had a spiritual connotation; therefore it is of great interest to note his open-handed way of dispensing charity to these poor men who were down and out, most of them. He carried with Him to the Bowery Mission the amount of two hundred dollars specially ordered from the bank in twenty-five-cent pieces. Every one of the four hundred men received not only a dinner but one or more of these quarters directly from the hand of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. That their hearts were touched is expressing it most inadequately. Many of them wept tears of emotion. Thus did 'Abdu'l-Bahá demonstrate the need of combining material and spiritual blessings and that the Bahá'í Movement stands for the perfect manifestation of both these important phases of civilization.

19 April was the day of bidding farewell to the friends, and on the following day He left for Washington, D.C.

In His contact with Western civilization, how universal 'Abdu'l-Bahá showed Himself! This Servant of God from the Orient, landing from the prison city of 'Akká into the heart of the Occident, emerged unprepared on the streets of New York, the greatest city of Western civilization, and found Himself perfectly at home! The civilization of the Occident seen here in its most striking modernistic form did not amaze or repel Him. As He walked the streets of the Metropolis with His majestic mien, He seemed as perfectly at home here as in the setting of the Orient whence He had come. Nor did He seem to the people of New York—even the blasé reporters—the object of peculiarity. Their attitude toward Him was one of great respect and appreciation. In fact from His first landing upon the docks, His way was marked only with admiration and reverence.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

“The Prophets of God, one and all, Christ Himself, as well as the Blessed Beauty (Bahá’u’lláh), have all appeared and raised the call with the one purpose of transforming the world of man into the Kingdom of God. Their common aim was to turn the earthly into heavenly, darkness into light, things that are satanic into things Divine. They strove to establish the reign of harmony and love amongst the children of men, to unfold to their eyes the fundamental unity of all mankind, to demolish the foundations of differences in the world, and to confer upon it the imperishable blessings of eternal life.”

An experience with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Anise Rideout

It was my great privilege to be in New York during the last days spent by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in America. There was a question which I greatly longed to ask, but fearing the reply would be that I must talk to people, everywhere, I hesitated.

Finally, on the last day, almost the last moment of my stay, it came to me that it was cowardly to hesitate. On that day, as I came into His Presence, He immediately said, ‘Are there any questions?’ At once I asked the question, ‘Which is the best way to give the Bahá’í Message?’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Face became very serious, His Voice loud as He answered in these words:

‘The first thing to do is to acquire a thirst for Spirituality, then Live the Life! Live the Life! Live the Life! The way to acquire this thirst is to meditate upon the future life. Study the Holy Words, read your Bible, read the Holy Books, especially study the Holy Utterances of Bahá’u’lláh; Prayer and Meditation, take much time for these two. Then will you know this Great Thirst, and then only can you begin to Live the Life!’

‘To live the Life you must be the very kindest woman, you must be the most pure, you must be absolutely truthful, and live a perfectly moral life.

‘Visit your neighbours when they are sick or in trouble, offer your services to them, try to show them that you are longing to serve them.

‘Feed the poor, divide what you have. Be contented to remain where God has placed you; be faithful in your care of those to whom He has trusted you, never waver in this—show by your life you have something different, so that all will see and will say, ‘What has this person that I have not?’

‘Show the world that in spite of the utmost suffering, poverty, sickness, you have something which gives you comfort, strength and peace—that you are happy—serene—satisfied with all that is in your life.

‘Then they, too, will want what you possess—and will need no further teaching—after you tell them what it is.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá in America

Dr Díyá’ Baghdádí

Chapter II, Washington, D.C.

This story of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit in America is based on material and notes corrected by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Himself and which He had turned over to Dr Baghdádí at the time He was leaving this country. The twofold purpose of this series, which will continue for several months, is, in the words of the author, 'First to bring back to the memory of the believers the time of the incomparable days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to them and to remind them of His words, His instructions and His admonitions; and, secondly, to give a picture of His visit so that later believers who did not have the blessing of seeing Him, may benefit by reading a brief history.'—Editor.

'Abdu'l-Bahá reached the city of Washington on 20 April 1912, accompanied only by an interpreter. He went to the home of Mr and Mrs Arthur Jeffrey Parsons. In the evening He addressed the second annual conference of the Persian American Educational Society. The meeting was held in the Lecture Hall of the Public Library, and every seat and all available standing room was occupied by an audience eager to hear Him.

When He entered the hall, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was greeted by the audience all Bahá'ís and their friends and guests rising. 'It is an evident fact,' said He in His address, 'that for Persia there is no better government to use as a model than that of America. Persia offers virgin soil for American commerce. In Persia all the mineral resources, and indeed all of the material resources, are latent in the soil and in the people. Perfect amity should be established between Persia and America, whether it be in material bonds or in spiritual bonds.'

After He had spoken, and when He was seated on the platform, hundreds pressed around Him, seeking to grasp His hand.

In an interview after His address, someone announced the sad news of the sinking of the Titanic. 'Abdu'l-Bahá declared that the disaster to the White Star liner Titanic, much as He deplored it, was only an outward expression of the too rapid development of the age. Progress is too fast. Both Americans and Europeans seem to be possessed of the mania for speed. He said: 'It is true in this country in particular growth in all directions has progressed too rapidly. Moderation should be practiced in all things. Be temperate, even in the size of the ships you build and in their speed; in your railroads and the schedules you expect your trains to maintain. It was a pitiful waste of life that came because of the effort to save a few hours in time—rushing a great vessel at top speed when it was known there was danger from icebergs.'

On the following day, 21 April 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Universalist Church. The text of His address in part is as follows:

"Whatever the minister has said (in his introductory remarks) is an evidence of high morals and service to the world of humanity, truly commendable and worthy of praise, for it is opposed to natural prejudices which for six thousand years have made unstable the world of humanity. How many wars were fought, how much discord has occurred, how much hatred has appeared amongst mankind. But inasmuch as this age is the age of the revelation of reality, praise be to God! the thoughts are being directed toward reality and the souls are ready for the oneness of the world of humanity. The ocean of truth is surging and the mirage of imitations is day by day passing [XIX:3:88] away. The foundation of the existing religions is one foundation, and that foundation is reality and the cause of unity and love of humanity and the means of the progress of mankind. But after every one of the Divine Manifestations, that light of reality became obscured. The darkness of superstitions and imitations crept in. Darkness befell the world of humanity. Day by day bitterness increased to such a degree that nations became antagonistic, and to such an extent that were it not for political hindrances they would have crushed and annihilated each other.

"Now it is not enough! We must investigate reality. We must put away these superstitions. Praise be to God! We all are the servants of one God. We are all under the shade of His bounty. We are recipients of His bestowals. God is kind to all, why should we be unkind? God is at peace with all, why should we be at war? At most some are ignorant; they must be trained. Some are sick and ailing; they must be healed. The sick must not be despised. The child must not be insulted. Efforts must be made to secure a remedy and healing.

“All the prophets have come to educate and develop the immature souls into maturity; to establish unity and love amongst mankind, not bitterness and hatred, for God has wished all good for His servants, not evil. He who wishes evil for His servants is against God and is not following the example of God, nay rather, he is following the example of Satan. For the attribute of God is mercy, and the attribute of Satan is hate. He who is kind to the servants is following the example of God, and he who is unkind to the servants is against God. For God is absolute mercy, perfect love; and Satan is absolute hate and utter bitterness.

“Therefore know that in every meeting where there is love, that meeting is the meeting of the Merciful One; and wherever there is hatred, that is satanic suggestion. The Divine Prophets appeared that the souls may become manifestations of the Merciful One, and to establish love and affection in the hearts.

“Man has two aspects or natures—merciful or divine and an animal aspect. The merciful aspect is peace, happiness, love and faithfulness. But the animal aspect is strife, discord, war and battle. If the animal aspect dominates in man, he becomes lower than an animal. If the divine aspect dominates, he becomes an angel of the Lord. The teachings of the Prophets were for this: that the animal aspect may be conquered, so that the souls that are captives of nature may be saved and the heavenly aspect may dominate. That divine aspect consists of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. It consists of the ‘second [XIX:3:89] Birth’. He who possesses that aspect is a well-wisher of all; he is kind to all the creatures; he has no bitterness toward any creed, and he shuns no religion.

“For the foundation of the divine religions is one. If we investigate that foundation, we become united; but if we follow imitations, we disagree because imitations are different. The foundation of the divine religions is conducive to unity and fellowship. His Holiness Christ said, ‘I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now. Howbeit, when he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he shall guide you into all truth.’ This is the century when that Spirit of God has spoken and revealed all the truth; He has explained the validity of the religion of Christ, and delivered the people from, superstitions. So that the basis of ignorance and bitterness may vanish, and the foundation of love may be established. We must strive with soul and heart that this bitterness and hatred may disappear and this discord and strife may entirely pass away.”

On 22 April 1912, a reception was held in honour of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at the home of Mr and Mrs Arthur Jeffrey Parsons to which the Bahá’ís and their friends were invited. ‘Consider what the confirmations of Bahá’u’lláh have done,’ said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, ‘for they brought us to the home of one who with such love has prepared a feast in my name. How the power and influence of Bahá’u’lláh has linked the East and the West, the divine outpouring is available and the merciful favours are complete.’

On 23 April 1912, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke at Howard University, and from there He went to the home of Mírzá ‘Alí Qulí Khán for luncheon. Here He said: ‘Thanks must be offered to Bahá’u’lláh because it is His confirmations that stir the souls. It is the blessings of the Abhá Beauty that change the hearts. It is the re-enforcement of the Kingdom of Abhá that makes the mosquito an eagle, the ant a Solomon, the degraded the centre of honour.’

In the evening He spoke at the Metropolitan African Methodist Episcopal Church, and that was a real Inter-racial Amity Meeting.

On 24 April 1912, it was the privilege of the Bahá’í children of Washington to have ‘Abdu’l-

Bahá at their meeting. He gave them the most helpful message, sweetened their little mouths with candy and blessed them with these words: 'Praise be to God! These children are like a bouquet of roses in their utmost beauty, delicacy and sweetness.'

In the evening, 'Abdu'l-Bahá addressed the white and coloured believers and their friends at the home of Mrs Dyer, a member of the coloured race, and after the meeting He remarked, 'Before entering the meeting I did not feel as if I would like to speak. But as soon as I saw the unity and attraction of the coloured and white believers, I became interested and anxious and with perfect sincere love I spoke. I have compared the harmony of the different colours to that of a pearl and ruby necklace.'

Later, while riding in a carriage on His way to the home of Mr Alexander Graham Bell, the famous telephone inventor, 'Abdu'l-Bahá very sweetly and softly chanted in Persian, 'O Bahá'u'lláh what hast Thou done? O Bahá'u'lláh may my life be a sacrifice to Thee. Through what sufferings and hardships Thou hast passed Thy days. What calamities Thou didst endure. But in the end, what a formidable foundation Thou hast laid. What an evident banner Thou hast raised.'

When Mr Bell finished telling his own story namely, it was his love for his wife, who was totally deaf, [XIX:3:90] that inspired him to invent an instrument that might help her hearing and while striving in that line, the instrument developed into the telephone—'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'Most of the great inventions were discovered in this way (by accident). The search for Alchemy was the cause of the appearance of thousands of useful remedies, and by travelling from Europe to India in a straight line, the American Continent was discovered, etc.'

On 25 April 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke to the Theosophical Society, and then He sent a message to the Esperantists. Later, in a humorous mood, He said to Mrs Parsons, 'It is very difficult to have one like me as a guest. Every guest and traveller has a limited number of friends with whom he makes special dates for visits, but you are forced all day long to be the entertainer of all.'

In the evening, addressing a large number of statesmen and Government officials at a banquet held in His honour at the home of Dîyá' Páshá, the Ambassador of Turkey, said, 'Tonight is a blessed night, worthy of rejoicing and thanksgiving for several reasons. First, thanks be to God, we are in a country that is most prosperous and free. Second, at a home which is related to the sublime Turkish Empire. Third, we are the guests of His Excellency, the Ambassador, who is in the realm of morals shining like the sun. Fourth, this meeting portrays the unity and harmony of the East and the West in a real figure, for His Excellency, the Ambassador of Turkey, is from the people of the East, his honoured son is here, and his revered wife is an American. Likewise, the representative of Persia (Mírzá 'Alí Qulí Khán) is from the nobles of the East and his revered wife is also an American. This is an evidence that the East and the West can be united and harmonized. Undoubtedly the utmost desire of the people of power and affluence, the possessors of broad ideas and sound minds, is love amongst human beings; [XIX:3:91] their highest hope is for unity and harmony amongst mankind. In ages past this truth was not clear, but since this is the age of light and the century of science and progress of the world of humanity—through divine help and favour—this matter has attracted universal attention. The members of the human family are in reality one; all are from one family, of one country and of one globe. This is the age of the oneness of mankind and the passing away of superstitions of past centuries. Every thoughtful person feels that this is the century of oneness and unity, and the imaginary prejudices are vanishing. Therefore, we are hopeful that the misunderstandings amongst the nations may disappear, so that all may know that the first foundation of the Merciful One is the oneness of the world of humanity and the original aim of the Divine Manifestations is the training of mankind. The divine religions are not the cause of discord, nor are they the means of hatred and animosity. For the foundation of all religions is reality, and reality is one and cannot be multiplied. These differences are caused by imitations. For imitations differ; therefore, they become the cause of differences and quarrels. This darkness of imitations has beclouded the Sun of Reality. Now, thanks be to God, day by day, this darkness is vanishing; this separation shall soon disappear altogether; the Sun of Reality shall rise and shine; the banner of the oneness of the world of humanity and the tent of universal peace shall rise, and the world shall become a different world.

'I am thankful and grateful for the kindness of His Excellency the Ambassador, because he was the cause of gathering and uniting different people in this meeting. Undoubtedly such meetings are worthy of thanks and praise.'

At the close of this meeting former President, Mr Theodore Roosevelt, called and had a wonderful visit with 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

On the following morning, 26 April 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at All Souls Church, and in the evening He addressed a Woman's Suffragist meeting. 'One of the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh,' He declared, 'is equal rights for men and women. When Bahá'u'lláh uttered this principle, the people were stunned.'

On 27 April 1912, Mrs Arthur Jeffrey Parsons wished to offer a sum of money; but with infinite gentleness 'Abdu'l-Bahá advised her to 'distribute the money amongst the poor.'

At the luncheon hour, a most wonderful reception was held in honour of 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the home of Mrs Parsons, to which some three hundred statesmen, Senators, and scholars, including a judge of the Supreme Court, were invited. It was a peerless reception. When dinner and refreshments had been served and after every one in the audience had received 'Abdu'l-Bahá's answers to all important questions, there came a few moments of silence and quietness. All the distinguished visitors seemed to be in a state of deep meditation, and the sign of their appreciation was clearly manifest by their extreme admiration for and highest reverence toward 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the 'Master' and the 'Great Teacher', as they called Him. Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá broke the silence by saying to the judge of the Supreme Court, 'Just as there is unity amongst the United States, in like manner it is possible to have unity amongst the nations of the world.'

To a doctor He said, 'I am hopeful that you will raise the banner of universal peace.'

To a master mechanic and engineer He said, 'Just as at one school you are teaching engineering to different students, I hope that you may enlighten different people at the divine [XIX:3:92] school by the truth of the foundation of divine religions.'

To Admiral Peary, discoverer of the North Pole, He said, 'I hope that you may discover the unknown of the world of the Kingdom.'

To the Archbishop he said, 'My hope is that these harmful imitations may be put away and you may promote the foundation of the teachings of Christ and banish the ceremonies which are opposed to science and contrary to the Truth.'

To the Ambassador of Switzerland He spoke of the importance of 'Divine Civilization'.

To a Senator He said, 'Just as you are striving for the welfare of America, you must also be the well-wisher of all the countries and nations of the world.'

Finally, turning to the Judge, 'Abdu'l-Bahá asked what the verdict was. 'It is all right,' the Judge said, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá smiled.

28 April 1912, was farewell day, and before leaving the city of Washington, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke first to Mrs Parsons, then to all the friends who gathered around Him. He said: 'It is springtime and we have had good meetings at your home. I shall never forget. I shall always ask divine confirmations for you, that in every way you may be confirmed both in material and spiritual things. The physical world has an outer and an inner plane, for all existing things like a chain are linked together until the spiritual is attained, and finally become abstract realities. We are hopeful these spiritual links may day by day become stronger and this heart communication, which is termed as inspiration, may become permanent. When this connection is established, then physical separation will have no effect, and this station is holy and sanctified above words.'

To the friends he said, 'I hope that our meetings shall give everlasting results. The oneness of the world of humanity and universal peace are the greatest blessings.'

While crossing the Potomac River, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'Whenever I see such views, I become saddened as I recall how much Bahá'u'lláh loved the beautiful green fields, of which a cruel imprisonment deprived Him for so many years.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

Dr Dīyá' Baghdádí

Chapter III—Chicago, D.C.

This story of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit in America is based on material and notes corrected by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself and which He had turned over to Dr Baghdádí at the time He was leaving this country. The twofold purpose of this series, which will continue for several months, is, in the words of the author, 'First to bring back to the memory of the believers the time of the incomparable days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to them and to remind them of His words, His instructions and His admonitions; and, secondly, to give a picture of His visit so that later believers who did not have the blessing of seeing Him, may benefit by reading a brief history.'—Editor.

His arrival in Chicago, 29 April 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to the Plaza Hotel, where the rejoicing Bahá'ís and their friends had followed Him from the railroad station. 'You have a beautiful city,' He said. 'The divine call was first raised in this city. I am hopeful that in Chicago the Cause of God may obtain the highest efficacy. Just as this city is lighted with electric light, I hope that it may become lighted with the Light of the Kingdom.'

'Many meetings, both large and small, were held in Washington. Night and day I had no rest. Unity was established between the white and coloured people. Many became believers. Those who were not believers have become very near. Nevertheless, I like Chicago very much, for the call of Bahá'u'lláh was first raised in this city. I am hopeful that you may become confirmed in great services and that you may be in the utmost fellowship and love with each other.'

One of the believers asked for protection from tests and trials. 'The most severe tests were in Persia,' said 'Abdu'l-Bahá. 'When property was confiscated, the friends were made martyrs, and not for a single moment was there any safety of life.'

Turning to the friends, said, 'I was longing exceedingly for your meeting. Were it not for this longing, the favour of Bahá'u'lláh would not have been with us. When I boarded the boat at Alexandria (Egypt) I was not feeling well.'

Looking from the window of His apartment in the Plaza Hotel, with Lincoln Park, Clark Street and North Avenue in full view, He said, 'These buildings have beautiful views. The park, the streets and city lights can be seen.'

On 30 April 1912, the Bahá'ís of Chicago and newspaper reporters came to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Later, He spoke at Hull House, founded by Miss Jane Addams. It was a real Inter-racial Amity meeting, for the large audience was composed of white and coloured people. After the meeting, 'Abdu'l-Bahá noticed many children and unemployed labourers crowding and pushing each other to gain a glimpse of Him. He stood in their midst, and into each hand He dropped a quarter or half dollar.

In the evening, at a public meeting arranged by the Bahá'ís of Chicago at the Masonic Temple, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of the significance of temples and the importance of the Bahá'í Temple—the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár.

On 1 May 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá dedicated the Bahá'í Temple grounds in the beautiful village of Wilmette, near Chicago. With an attractive trowel made of solid gold, handed to him by Miss Irene Holmes, 'Abdu'l-Bahá dug the earth to lay the corner stone. He then called on a few of the friends to dig more earth on behalf of different nations and countries, that they also might share in the blessed occasion [XIX:4:112] and be of those who were remembered. Dr Ardishír Írání, formerly of India, but now residing in Washington, D.C., took the trowel in his hand and dug some of the earth on behalf of the Zoroastrian believers. Áqá Siyyid Asadu'lláh represented the Muslim Bahá'ís. This writer represented the Arabian Bahá'ís. Qudsiyyih Ashraf represented the Oriental Bahá'í women. The corner stone finally was laid by 'Abdu'l-Bahá's own hands.

There is a little history connected with this most favoured stone. It is this: When the Temple grounds were bought, Ḥusayn Mazlún, an old Persian Bahá'í, was living in Chicago. He was a hard working man and could not speak or write a single word in English. But he felt that it was his duty to contribute something that might help the Temple. He had nothing but a pure heart and a sincere purpose, and these qualities inspired him to procure a stone with the hope that perhaps someday it might be included with others that would become a part of the foundation or walls of the Temple. So, with the help of Mrs Nettie Tobin, of Chicago, a solid white stone was obtained, and Ḥusayn Mazlún carried it on his shoulders and back, to the Temple grounds. But neither Ḥusayn Mazlún, nor any one else, could have even dreamed that the stone was destined to be the corner stone of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár, the first Bahá'í Temple in America, and that it would be laid by the hands of 'Abdu'l-Bahá with His eternal blessings upon it, and in the presence of an impressive gathering from the four corners of the earth. Such is the fruit of a sincere action and such is the reward for the pure in heart.

2 May 1912, the Bahá'ís of Chicago and vicinity came to the Plaza Hotel very early in the morning, and this is what 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to them: 'The reason for travelling such a long distance and enduring hardships is for the ignition of light in the Occident, for in the Occidental countries there is great capacity. The inhabitants are not so much captives of imitations and superstitions. The high ideals can be rapidly spread. Today the greatest ideal is service to the world of humanity and universal peace.'

In the afternoon, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Federation of Women's Clubs, at Hotel La Salle, and also attended a reception held in His honour at the same hotel by the Bahá'í women of Chicago.

Later, one of the friends asked a question in regard to human capacity. 'People have different capacities,' said 'Abdu'l-Bahá. 'In some persons capacity is obtained entirely from natural powers. This expression and appearance of natural capacity is dependent upon education and is subordinate to man's own efforts; that is to say, natural capacity without human education and efforts cannot appear perfectly and its perfection depends upon efforts and training. The highest expression of man's capacity is, however, obtained through the training of the Divine Teacher of the world of humanity.'

Another friend asked about association with the wicked or evil doers. 'These are of two kinds,' explained 'Abdu'l-Bahá, 'one kind where the harm returns to the evil doer himself, and he is not an assailant. Undoubtedly such an evil doer must be awakened and trained with wisdom. He is sick; he must be cured. But the other kind, whose menace reaches others, and when association with such a person becomes the cause of immorality—in this case association with such a person is not permissible, except for those who are able to stop, train and win him, and as much as possible strive to improve his morals and uplift his character; otherwise, appeal should be made to the [XIX:4:113] Centres of Justice to protect human society from the menacing deeds of such persons. In the Tablets of Bahá'u'lláh, too, association with all the people of different religions and the recognition of the oneness of mankind is enjoined; but also association with the wicked is prohibited, and it is shown how it is necessary to be careful of the deniers and negative people.'

On 3 May 1912, the Hindus of Chicago, most of them university students, were welcomed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá at the Plaza Hotel. Dr J. F. C. King accompanied the boys and became a Bahá'í. As a dentist, Dr King is very successful and he is still residing in Chicago.

One of the friends asked about the time when the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár would be built. 'I am not going to discuss the matter of the Mashriqu'l-Adhkár (the Bahá'í Temple),' 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied. 'It concerns the (National) Spiritual Assembly. If I have to say anything about it, it must be built immediately.'

On 4 May 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Plymouth Congregational Church; and from there He went to the home of the minister, Dr Ford, where a luncheon was prepared for Him. In the afternoon He spoke to the Theosophical Society at North-western University Hall.

To an inquirer about the future of the Orient, 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'It cannot progress except through an ideal power and the Divine Cause. Every Divine Manifestation was sent to a people and country that outwardly never had any chance for safety and prosperity. But because they came under the protection of the Divine Cause, they even surpassed all civilized countries. Today, every nation and country that raises the banner of the oneness of the world of humanity, and comes under the protection of this Divine Power, in the end it shall become the leading power of the world.'

To another inquirer who wished to know the difference between the Bahá'í religion and other religions, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said: 'From a fundamental standpoint, the foundation of all religions is one, and all are built on Truth. That is why there is no difference among the Founders of religions and Divine religions as regards the spiritual side of Their message and the spiritual laws which They teach. But the accessories of religion; that is to say, the laws that deal with transactions and small matters—this branch of religion—the outer laws—being dependent upon the exigencies of time and place, must be changed or readjusted in every age.'

To another who inquired about the existence of evil and unhappy things, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'In the world of existence and creation, there is no evil. Nay, rather, evil is the absence of good, even as darkness is the absence of light. Change and transformation is an essential requirement of the world of creation, for if change and transformation does not exist, then there can be no composition and growth. And because change, transformation and disintegration are necessary, the opposites have to exist, but in reality there are no opposites. Just as in the sphere of the sun there is no darkness, nor does it have an East or West, yet night, day, light and darkness are of the requirements of this world.'

Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá arose and went to the cemetery. He prayed at the grave of David True, the only son of Mrs Corinne True, who just a few moments before passing away, opened his eyes, and seeing 'Abdu'l-Bahá at his bedside, he whispered, 'O 'Abdu'l-Bahá! I love you! I love you!'

From there 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to All Souls' Church, where He spoke; [XIX:4:114] and later lunched at the home of Dr Milburn, the minister.

5 May 1912, was the day of farewell. Early in the morning all the Bahá'í children of Chicago and their parents filled the large parlour of the Plaza Hotel. None but those who have seen 'Abdu'l-Bahá and witnessed His great love for children and the great love of the children for Him, could ever describe the purity and fragrance of the atmosphere of His meeting with the children, for whenever and wherever there were children, 'Abdu'l-Bahá would go to them and they would come to Him. Yea, even nursing babies knew Him by His peerless personality and also by His unique and resonant voice, calling them, 'O my baby! My good baby! My sweet baby!' For one of His countless divine qualities was the quality of incomparable generosity and philanthropy. He was always prepared to meet and please His visitors, be they high or low, children or poor. And aside from being the treasure of knowledge and wisdom and the ocean of all things of the spirit, 'Abdu'l-Bahá always kept Himself well supplied with material things to bestow upon those who went to Him. Flowers, candy, money, clothing, protection, comfort, etc., but these were for distribution among the friends and the needy and everybody else but Himself.

After welcoming the children and giving them flowers and candy, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke to them as follows: 'According to what His Holiness Christ has said, you are the children of the Kingdom, and according to what His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has said, you are the candles of the world of humanity, for your hearts are in the utmost purity and your souls are in the utmost sanctity. You are not entangled with this world; and like unto a mirror, your hearts are [XIX:4:115] clean and polished. Your fathers and mothers must educate you with greatest tenderness, and teach you the highest morals and ideals. So that in the utmost perfection you may be imbued with the virtues of the world of humanity. May you progress in all degrees, study sciences and arts, become the manifestations of eternal blessings and the means of great advancements.'

Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá addressed the parents and all the Bahá'ís of Chicago. 'I am going away, but you must arise to serve the Word of God. Your hearts must be pure and your intentions sincere in order that you may become recipients of the divine bestowals. Consider that although the sun shines equally upon all things, yet in the clear mirror its reflection is most brilliant, but not so in the black stone. This great effulgence and heat have been produced by the crystal clearness of the glass. If there were no clearness and purity these effects would not be witnessed. Should rain fall upon salty, stony earth, it will never have effect; but when it falls upon good pure soil, green and verdant growth follows and fruits are produced.'

'This is the day when pure hearts have a portion of the everlasting bounties, and sanctified souls are being illumined by the eternal manifestations. Praise be to God! you are believers in God, assured by the Word of God and turning to the Kingdom of God. You have heard the Divine call. Your hearts are moved by the breezes of the paradise of Abhá. You have good intentions, your purpose is the good pleasure of God. You desire to serve in the Kingdom of the Merciful One. Therefore, arise in the utmost power. Be in perfect unity. Never become angry with one another. Let your eyes be directed toward the kingdom of truth and not toward the world of the creatures. Love the creatures for the sake of God and not for themselves. You will never become angry when you love them for the sake of God. Humanity is not perfect. There are imperfections in every human being and you will always become unhappy if you look toward the people themselves. But if you look toward God you will love them and be kind to them, for the world of God is the world of perfection and mercy. Therefore do not look at the shortcomings of anybody; see with the sight of forgiveness. The imperfect eye beholds imperfections. The eyes that cover faults look toward the Creator of souls. He created them, trains and provides for them, endows them with capacity and life, sight and hearing; therefore they are the signs of His grandeur. You must love and be kind to everybody, care for the poor, protect the weak, heal the sick, teach and educate the ignorant.'

'It is my hope that the unity and harmony of the friends in Chicago may be the cause of the unity of the friends throughout America and that all people may become recipients of their love' and kindness. May they be an example for mankind. Then the confirmations of the Kingdom of Abhá and the bestowals of the Sun of Reality will be all encircling.'

Before leaving Chicago for Cleveland, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke in All Souls' Church, Lincoln Centre. And that was another real Inter-racial Amity Meeting.

Among the noted persons who became Bahá'ís through 'Abdu'l-Bahá at that time were Mr and Mrs Albert R. Vail and Dr and Mrs William F. Slater.

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

Dr Dīyá' Baghdádí

Chapter IV

*This story of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit in America is based on material and notes corrected by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself and which He had turned over to Dr Baghdádí at the time He was leaving this country. The twofold purpose of this series, which will continue for several months, is, in the words of the author, 'First to bring back to the memory of the believers the time of the incomparable days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to them and to remind them of His words, His instructions and His admonitions; and, secondly, to give a picture of His visit so that later believers who did not have the blessing of seeing Him, may benefit by reading a brief history.'—*Editor.¹

Cleveland, Ohio.—6 May 1912, at the Euclid Hotel, in this city, as well as in every place, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was welcomed by the Bahá'ís and their friends and the ever present newspaper reporters. When a reporter asked for a message, 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'My message is the oneness of mankind and universal peace. To conform religious questions with true science. Equal rights for all, and the removal of religious, national and political prejudices. To explain the reality of divine religions and to do away with imitations and sectarian superstitions. The training of women to such a degree that they will have equal rights with men. Readjustment of economic conditions and standards of living, so that, while a prince may be seated on the throne of honour, the poor also may possess a house and a mat. The establishment of spiritual civilization, the improvement of morals, and the unity of the foundation of divine religions, for if the people of the world investigate the reality of religions they become united, because reality is one. On account of imitations, they have remained disunited and in disagreement, for imitations differ.'

Later, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to the home of Dr C. M. Swingle, where He spoke to the Bahá'ís and their friends. In the evening He addressed the public at the Euclid Hotel.

Pittsburgh, Pa.—7 May 1912. The dear friends in this city engaged an apartment on the seventh floor of the Schenley Hotel and were exceedingly happy about it, because it looked like that of the Plaza Hotel in Chicago. Then during their private interviews, the friends, one by one asked the same question: 'Master! how do you like these rooms?' His reply to all was also the same, 'Khaylí khúb! Khaylí khúb!'—meaning 'Very good! Very good!' When all had left His presence happy and pleased, He turned His smiling face toward this servant and exclaimed, 'The friends here are anxious to know if I like these rooms! They do not know what we had to go through in the past. Imagine the conditions and surroundings when we were exiled by the Turkish Government and were imprisoned in the barracks of 'Akká; Bahá'u'lláh occupied one room; His family and several other families were forced to occupy one room. Aside from the severe illness that was raging, and the death of many among us prisoners—adults and children—on account of unsanitary [XIX:5:141] surroundings and starvation, I noticed that my own presence in that crowded room was another source of torture to all of them. This was due to the fact that parents and children were suppressing and restraining themselves by trying to be quiet and polite in my presence. So, in order to give them freedom, I accepted the morgue of the barracks, because that was the only room available, and I lived in it for about two years. Now the kind friends here wish to know if I like these magnificent rooms!

In the evening ‘Abdu’l-Bahá addressed a public meeting at the hotel. He explained some of the Bahá’í principles, and declared that ‘the Orient must acquire material civilization from the Occident and the Occident must acquire divine civilization from the Orient.’

Later, at a meeting composed of doctors and educators, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá answered all questions, and in addition He explained how to heal the sick. ‘If they (the doctors) learn about the foci—that is, the points of entrance of disease germs—and take the balance or equilibrium of the body elements as the base of treatment, and when an element is diminished or lacking, a diet that can supply the diminished element is given, then there will be no need for drugs and other difficult methods of treatment.’

Though this scientific statement of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá sounds very brief, the intelligent and progressive physician knows that it contains the secret of medicine and the foundation upon which the right course of physical healing must be based in the future.

When the doctors present had no more questions for discussion, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that He had one question to ask them. ‘Why is it that the animals heal themselves, but man in sickness remains puzzled or helpless?’ For a moment the doctors looked at each other inquiringly, but not one opened his lips. Finally, after consultation, perhaps, they said, ‘We would rather hear the answer from the lips of His Holiness ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.’ This was His answer: ‘Because man’s thoughts are not limited to one direction; therefore, he is more heedless. On the other hand, however, through concentration and deep thinking, his knowledge is more than all other creatures.’

On 8 May 1912, while preparing to leave Pittsburgh for Washington, D.C., we, the servants, begged ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to have a special compartment, or at least a berth, on the train, that He might rest better. But He absolutely refused. ‘I do certain things and have certain expenses,’ said He emphatically, ‘only to help others and to serve the Cause of God; otherwise, from the beginning of my life, I never liked distinction.’

Washington, D.C.—8 May 1912. This was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s second visit to the city of Washington, and on His arrival He occupied an apartment at 1340 Harvard Street. Later He visited the home of Mr and Mrs A. J. Parsons.

On the following day—9 May 1912—the fire of opposition was ablaze in the hearts of a few fanatical clergymen on account of the great public interest in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit to their city. They spoke bitterly against Him and the Bahá’í Cause; but all their efforts were in vain. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s comment on the matter was this: ‘I deal with people very gently that they may not turn away and raise the least objection. Yet these ministers of Washington have accused us of atheism. The opposition of the leaders of religious sects is an evidence of the power [XIX:5:142] and greatness of the Bahá’í Cause, for nobody would pay any attention to an unimportant cause.’

On the following day—10 May 1912—‘Abdu’l-Bahá spoke at a Woman’s Meeting, and later visited a settlement house, a welfare organization for young children in which Mrs Alice Barney and others were interested. From there He went to the home of Mrs Barney for dinner. Mrs Barney’s son in law and daughter, M. and Mme. Hippolyte Dreyfus-Barney, of Paris, France, were also present.

New York City.—11 May 1912. This was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s second visit to the city of New York. The Bahá’ís of that city and vicinity filled His apartment at 227 Riverside Drive. ‘Marhabá! Marhabá!’ This is the first greeting that almost all the friends and visitors heard from ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s lips—meaning, ‘Welcome! Welcome!’ After welcoming those who came to see Him, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá addressed the group in these words: ‘We went to Chicago and Washington. It was very pleasant, for the American people are polite, eager to learn, and anxious to advance. When man sees a tree growing and thriving, he must be hopeful, for undoubtedly it will blossom and bear fruit. People have asked questions and when they heard the answers, they did not argue. As we met the learned men and discussed great questions with them, they expressed their satisfaction. All those who asked important questions, on hearing the answers, showed that they were pleased. Some of the learned men in other countries are not like that, because they always like to argue. We met good ministers at Chicago and were invited by several of them to speak in their churches. We delivered comprehensive addresses and were invited by one of them, Rev. Dr Milburn to his home. There was not a single soul who did not express satisfaction and approval.

‘Yesterday, too, we spoke to a distinguished group in Washington, D.C.—some of the judges and one of the personal friends of former President Roosevelt. When the subject of the cause or means for uniting the different religions, and for good will among the nations, was brought up, this friend (of Mr Roosevelt) said, ‘Christ was the source of discord!’ Afterward, as I explained to him the unity and good will of nations under the power of His Holiness Christ, he smiled and accepted, and all others who were present were also pleased. Finally, I asked, ‘Have you any more questions or objections?’ He replied, ‘No! Not at all!’ I asked, ‘Did you accept these explanations?’ He replied, ‘All right.’

Montclair, N.J.—12 May 1912. ‘While still tired from travelling,’ exclaimed ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, ‘again we must leave today for Montclair to speak at Unity Church.’

First He went to the home of Mr and Mrs Easel and from there to the Unity Church. Here He spoke upon the subject of ‘Divine Unity’—the Oneness of God’. When He brought the Church Book to be blessed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s pen. His wish was granted, and this was what ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote in Persian: ‘O God! Thou pure Lord! Thanks be unto Thee, that the mountains and deserts were traversed and the great Atlantic was crossed until we reached this continent and in this country, we have mentioned Thy name and fame with our tongue. Even in this church, like unto Elijah, we have proclaimed Thy Kingdom. O God! Make the people of this [XIX:5:143] church to be attracted to Thy beauty, and in Thy shelter, protect and bless them.’—E. E. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás¹

New York City.—On the evening of 12 May 1912, at Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, West 104th Street, New York, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá delivered a remarkable address at the meeting of the International Peace Forum from which the following is quoted:²

‘When we review history, we find that from the beginning of the world until the present time, strife and warfare have prevailed among mankind. It was either a war among religions, or battles among races, or strife and warfare among kingdoms, or between two continents. And all of these have arisen from human ignorance and have emanated from misunderstanding and lack of education. And the greatest warfare and battles were among religions.

‘It is an indisputable fact that the divine Prophets came to establish unity and harmony among mankind. They were Divine Shepherds, not wolves. The shepherd gathers and protects the sheep; He does not disperse them. Every Divine Shepherd assembled a flock of sheep who were formerly scattered. Among the Shepherds was His Holiness Moses, Who gathered the sheep of the scattered tribes of Israel, united them and took them to the Holy Land. He gathered them after their dispersion, harmonized them with each other, and became the cause of their progress. Therefore, their degradation was transformed into glory, their poverty into wealth, and their vices were changed into virtues to such a degree that the Solomonic Sovereignty was established and the fame of their glory reached the East and the West. Thus it becomes evident that Moses was a real Shepherd because He gathered the scattered sheep of Israel and united them.

‘When His Holiness Christ appeared, He too became the cause of unity. He gathered the scattered sheep of Israel with the scattered sheep of the Greeks, Romans, Chaldeans, Assyrians, and Egyptians. These people were in the utmost strife and warfare with each other. They used to shed the blood of each other and like ferocious animals even devoured each other. But His Holiness Christ gathered, united, and harmonized these people, and destroyed the foundation of strife and warfare. It is evident, therefore, that the divine religions were the cause of fellowship and love. The religion of God is not the cause of strife and warfare. If religion becomes the cause of discord, its non-existence is better than its existence, for religion must be the cause of life; if it becomes the cause of death, it is better to be without religion. For religious teachings are like medicine, if medicine becomes the cause of sickness, unquestionably the non-existence of the medicine is better than its existence.

‘Likewise at a time when the Arabian tribes were in the utmost enmity and strife, shedding the blood of each other, confiscating property, making families and children captives, waging continuous warfare in the Arabian Peninsula, when no soul was at ease and no tribes had any rest—at such a time His Holiness Muḥammad appeared. He united the scattered tribes. He caused them to agree and harmonize with each other. Strife and warfare were banished. The Arabs progressed to such a degree that the kingdom of Andalusia and the great dominion of the Caliphs was established.

‘From this we can understand that the foundation of divine religion is one and that it is for peace, [XIX:5:144] not for war; it is love, truth, unity, and fellowship. But wars emanated from imitations which later had crept in. The origin of religion is one and that is Reality. ... In imitations, differences are found; because imitations differ, therefore they become the cause of discord. If, however, all the religions of the world would forsake imitation and follow the original foundation of religion, all would agree. They would have no more strife and warfare, for religion is reality and reality is one; it does not accept multiplicity. ...’

‘In Persia, the utmost bitterness and hatred existed among the different sects and religions. Likewise, in other Asiatic countries. Religions were hostile toward each other. The sects used to shed the blood of each other. The races and tribes were at war, fighting and battling constantly. They believed that the highest honour was in slaying their own kind. It was considered a glory for one religion to attack and conquer another religion in battle. It was at such a time that His Holiness Bahá’u’lláh appeared in Persia. ... He laid the foundation of universal peace, raised the call of the oneness of the world of humanity, spread the principles of peace and reforms in the East. He wrote to all the kings of the Orient about this important matter, encouraged all and announced to all that the glory of the world of humanity lies in the establishment of peace and righteousness. This took place sixty years ago. Because He promulgated the principles of peace, the Oriental kings arose against Him, for they imagined that these principles were contrary to their personal benefits and self-interest. They inflicted upon Him all kinds of punishments. They beat Him severely and imprisoned Him. They banished Him to remote lands and finally held Him prisoner at a fortress 'Akká) and persecuted His friends. On account of this matter—that is, the abandonment of superstitions, imaginations, and for the oneness of mankind—they shed the blood of twenty thousand men. What homes they wrecked! What souls they attacked and murdered! But the friends of Bahá'u'lláh never wavered, and even until now, with heart and soul are making the greatest effort, endeavouring in the promotion of peace and agreement and in this great cause they are standing in action. ... My hope is this, that the first ray of peace may start from America and reach other regions. The American people are more capable than others to do this, for they are not like others. ... Capacities exist in all countries and the cry for universal peace is rising, for the people are distressed. Every year the governments are adding more to the expenditure of the armies. Therefore, the people are tired. Just now in Europe the earth is loaded with explosives and deadly instruments. Ere long, these weapons of hell shall wreck the edifice of mankind! ...

'Now, just as America is famous throughout the world for her material prosperity and is well known and noted for her efforts in the promotion of industries, may she also endeavour to spread universal peace, so that she may be confirmed and this great matter may spread to other regions. I pray on your behalf that you may be confirmed and assisted.'

Tea with a Queen and a Princess

Martha L. Root

Miss Martha Root, coming up from Greece to Yugoslavia, arrived in Belgrade, the capital, on January eighteenth. She knew that Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania and Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana of Bucharest were in Belgrade. She had written them she was going to Yugoslavia and the Princess had sent a note saying that they, too, would be in Belgrade early in January. They were at the Royal Palace, guests of Their Majesties King Alexander I and Queen Marie Mignon. The Yugoslavian Queen is the daughter of Queen Marie.—Editor.

Going out into the principal thoroughfare of Belgrade, Kralya Milan on Thursday morning, January nineteenth, one saw at a glance that it was a fete and the throngs were wild with joy. 'Why are all the people so happy?' the writer inquired, and a man who knew German replied in that language: 'A little Prince is born at the Palace!' So the little Prince had come! the second son to the King and Queen of Yugoslavia! This American visitor was so happy she said: 'I, too, am Serbian today, for I'm just as delighted as you are! Only I wish my education were Serbian, then I could read all these newspapers which have the Queen Marie Mignon's pictures on the front pages!'

This was Thursday and Saturday came a little missive from the Royal Palace: 'Mama and I would be so glad to have you take tea with us at half past four,' and was signed, 'Ileana'. Then this is what happened; the writer who arrived at the gates of the Royal Palace five minutes before the hour was met by stern guards standing straight and unbending in their red and blue Serbian uniforms, and why not! They had two little Princes to take care of now! Then secret service men appeared quite unheralded and they escorted the caller to an office of the Superintendent situated to the right and still outside the grounds. There three stalwart officials in full uniform and several decorations carefully examined this little note signed 'Ileana' and written on the Royal stationery with the wide black border of mourning. One of the men then quickly took the visitor through what seemed to be a private gateway into the Royal Gardens, and with his hand he motioned back, the writer does not know whom or what, for she was looking straight ahead to the palace. Passing by several soldiers of the Guard, who bowed profoundly, she was taken through the Royal Palace entrance hall, then through a reception room up into another reception apartment where the rugs, the furnishings, everything was in splendid Serbian art designs, for this palace is new and its decorations are very interesting. A pleasant attendant with kindly eyes and dressed in the picturesque Montenegrin costume with its wide, red, softly twisted girdle, helped her off with her wraps, and another attendant in conventional black took her up in an elevator.

Rare for her, she was in panic because all this formality had made her a little late and to be late to meet a Queen and a Princess! Upstairs suddenly she halted at the door of the lift, before coming out. Downstairs she had taken off the white kid glove from her left hand to arrange a nosegay, a moment more and she would have forgotten to put it on before entering the Royal drawing rooms! Still, she remembered in time and slipped it on while the attendant in the stately black cloths had to smile and she did, too! Hurrying from the elevator to the apartments of her Royal Hosts an inner poise came, a glad ecstatic happiness, for she was going to meet them again!

A cordial, low voice called as she [XIX:6:171] came through a little reception room into the drawing room where Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania and Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana arose to greet her.

How dear they were! The Queen was perfectly beautiful in her black gown with its myriad draperies and the soft cream whiteness of the bands about her head and the wide cream cuffs on the smart sleeves. Long strands of pearls heightened the pleasing effect. She was very happy, one could see in her smiling eyes how delighted she was that her daughter, Marie Mignon, and the new little babe so fresh from God had come safely, this little Princeling for whom everyone had been anxiously waiting for nine days! Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana was smiling and looked very girlish in her frock of black wool.

It was a wonderful tea party in that great drawing room all in soft grey furnishings with a few American Beauty-red roses in vases here and there. Later during the hour Her Majesty Queen Marie spoke of the passing of her dear friend Loie Fuller. The guest asked if she might quote the words and send them to 'The Bahá'í Magazine, Star of the West'. The Queen said: 'Yes, you may, but do not call it an interview with me, it is only a talk with you.' One could see how this great Queen, granddaughter of the Czar Alexander II of Russia and granddaughter of Queen Victoria of Great Britain had truly loved and deeply appreciated the friendship of Miss Loie Fuller, sometimes spoken of only as 'the dancer'. 'It was the essence of soul in our friendship,' said Her Majesty, 'it had nothing to do with our situation in life, the fact that I was a Queen and she was a dancer. She was a creator of marvellous colour effects. She had one of the biggest minds of our century, and Loie Fuller was one of the most selfless women who ever existed. We knew each other for twenty-five years, through our fundamental love for humanity. She worked for me to help me be a strength to the [XIX:6:172] world. Why can't we see the essence in each human being and not just the outside circumstances?

'Well, since the death of Loie Fuller she is colossally recognized as the goddess of light and as the creator of marvellous dances which were a great contribution to art. Not only that, but she is honoured for her great work toward peace.'

'Inwardly I am free, I am not like those who have not the courage to see! Sometimes I write, and as I thought of the people who are not nice to me—(you see I have written it here) I would infinitely rather be nice to them while they are not nice to me, because if I'm not, I shall always be ashamed of myself for not being nice, yet I shall always be able to forgive them!'

The conversation later again turned to incidents in Loie Fuller's life. The Queen related how Miss Fuller was always interested in getting museums started, thinking it helped bring better understanding among countries. Then a little incident came up about gifts and treasures and Her Majesty said: 'That was just like Loie, she always gave away everything, she kept nothing for herself! I once gave her a golden locket which had been a gift to me from one of the Emperors of Russia. In it was a little ivory miniature of me which she loved best. It was perfect and all hid in this little case of gold. To make her accept it, I said: 'you wear it Loie, and then you can leave it to one of your museums!' It was stolen from her the next day, and she told me it was just a sign that she should not possess anything just for herself alone!

The writer asked Her Majesty if Miss Fuller had known about Bahá'u'lláh's principles for peace, the Bahá'í Movement? She said she did not know, but that Loie Fuller was very internationally minded in religion. 'I didn't have any opportunities in the United States to talk with her about these spiritual matters.'

Then the Queen spoke about the real meaning of God and true religion and her Majesty made this wonderful statement:

'The ultimate dream which we shall realize is that the Bahá'í channel of thought has such strength, it will serve little by little to become a light to all those searching for the real expression of Truth.'

Then Her Majesty Queen Marie was called to the room of her daughter, Her Majesty Queen Marie Mignon. She said good bye very tenderly and asked the writer to give her greetings to all the dear friends.

Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana did not need to go upstairs to her sister. She said: 'I am free until my little nephew comes, then I shall be busy.' She told the writer about her Girl Guide work in Rumania. Her own words were: 'In Rumania the Girl Guide work is the one thing best for all grades of society. Perhaps you know, it was started by the Americans. Our girls always speak of the American secretaries with great love.'

The Princess said there are two thousand Girl Guides in Bucharest alone, and there is a centre in Jassy. She added: 'And very soon we hope to organize the work in Constanza, our port. Yes, and we have large canteens for working girls and a big canteen for workmen where about one thousand men can eat a whole meal for less than a sixpence!'

Just then her darling little nephew, Crown Prince Peter, four years old, came in with his toy cups and saucers to have a tea party, too. He is a charming little boy, very slender, very alert. The Princess asked him to tell the writer whom he has upstairs to play with, thinking he would announce his new little brother whom he already loves devotedly. Instead [XIX:6:173] he quickly said: 'Oh upstairs I play with my grandmother, with my Mama and with you!' and he smiled his happiness. Then he at once knelt down on the rug by the table and became very busy arranging his cups and saucers and preparing his own party.

So the Girl Guide conversation was continued: the writer liked what Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana said about the spiritual work with the girls. She said: 'The spiritual work with the girls is going beautifully, it is the most advanced part I can speak of. I also wish to have a physical department, but our work is not developed enough for that yet. We have some colonies (summer camps) in the mountains now, and we hope to start one by the sea if we can get the money to do it.' She explained how the girls can go for a month's holiday to these camps. She spoke especially of the Young Women's Christian Association and of the Children's Red Cross, for she is an indefatigable worker in both. She said 'I think all these are very excellent to get at everybody generally, it is good for racial amity. But individually no activities compare with the more organized work of the Girl Guides. In the Girl Guide organization, one works directly with the girl—her heart, soul and brain.'

The Princess also spoke with deep insight and love of the Young Women's Christian Association. She says it is under the patronage from the Rumanian Orthodox Church, and that both Orthodox and Protestants can be members. She explained: 'The YWCA girls often come and sing in our Church (The Rumanian Orthodox Church). I find that girls of all sorts come into the Young Women's Christian Association. They come with great interest though often protesting, and sometimes just a little bit sneeringly, but they soon change their attitude, because of our simple cheerful way. Sooner or later they become very good members.'

'I love my work very much indeed, and it has often helped me when I found things difficult both inwardly and outwardly.'

This inspiring and very young Princess is the great ideal of the girls of Rumania. It is certainly fine that she studies, thinks and works so hard to help the girls of her country. And though she only came to Belgrade, Yugoslavia, for a visit of three weeks, she brought with her a great number of good books—books on religion, universal peace and service—and she loaned them to her young friends of the Yugoslavian Court. (She does not know it but the writer later saw the rare and splendid fruits and the happiness which the visit of Her Majesty Queen Marie and Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana brought to Yugoslavia).

Now suddenly the little Crown Prince has finished his play. He has gathered and put into the box all the toy cups and saucers. He stands up close beside the Princess and says: 'O Auntie, why does it take you so long to eat?' and Her Royal Highness replies to him: 'Because, Peterkins, we are almost as bad as you are sometimes, we talk instead of eat!' So very soon we three walked through the great hall where the Crown Prince Peter's little automobiles were waiting for him, but he passed them by, he wished to go upstairs to his little brother. Her Royal Highness held his left hand in hers, she took the writer's hand in her right and in a good bye that will never be forgotten, she pledged her service, saying: 'I am only too pleased to do as much of the work as I can!' Thus came to a close this truly royal tea party!

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

Dr Dīyá' Baghdádí

Chapter V

*This story of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit in America is based on material and notes corrected by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself and which He had turned over to Dr Baghdádí at the time He was leaving this country. The twofold purpose of this series, which will continue for several months, is, in the words of the author, 'First to bring back to the memory of the believers the time of the incomparable days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to them and to remind them of His words, His instructions and His admonitions; and, secondly, to give a picture of His visit so that later believers who did not have the blessing of seeing Him, may benefit by reading a brief history.'—*Editor.¹

13 May 1912, at Hotel Astor, New York. Reception by New York Peace Society. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke upon the subject of 'Universal Peace' and after the reception, He said to His interpreters, 'No matter how much I say I am the Servant of God, 'Abdu'l-Bahá the servant of Bahá) still they call my name Prophet. It will be nice if something is done so that they will stop using these names and titles.'

Speaking to a group of Hindus and Japanese who came to see Him in the evening, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'In the ancient times India was very prosperous. From the continent of Asia civilization spread to Egypt and Syria, and from Syria to Greece, and from there to Arabia and Spain, and from Spain it spread to different European countries. Nevertheless, the world of humanity has not yet reached the stage of maturity. Whenever this material civilization becomes the twin of divine civilization, Universal Peace is established, and the souls attain to the station of the angels, then it will be the time of the maturity of the world.'

On 14 May 1912, the International Peace Society held its Conference at Lake Mohonk, N.Y., and was invited to address the members. Here He remained three days. After delivering His address, He said to the interpreters, 'Once I wrote to the friends in Persia in regard to peace congresses and conferences, that if the members of the conferences for peace do not succeed in practicing what they say, they may be compared to those who hold a meeting to discuss and form firm [XIX:6:181] resolutions about the sinfulness and harmfulness of liquors. But after leaving the meeting, they occupy themselves in selling liquors, and just as before they become engaged in their business. Now we must not only think and talk peace but we must develop the power to practice peace, so that like unto the spirit in the body of the world, peace may permeate the whole world.'

The members and speakers who attended this conference were from all parts of the world, most of them did well in presenting their papers. But one of the speakers was very much excited, he kept pounding and hammering the table with his fists, kicking the chair with his feet, shouting and screaming at the top of his voice. Later, 'Abdu'l-Bahá remarked, 'There are times when a speaker should raise his voice in order to emphasize his point. There are times when he should speak low, and at times he should smile. Gestures must harmonize with the character of words.'

On the following day, 15 May 1912 'Abdu'l-Bahá went out to take a walk and a crowd of young men and girls followed Him. On reaching a large tree, the blossoms of which were in full bloom, he stopped and faced the crowd with His wonderful smile. It was a real spring afternoon. The sky was clear and the sun flooding the green hills with its warm rays. Everything was quiet except for the melodies of song birds and the gentle breeze that whispered to the leaves. Then suddenly the silence was broken by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who undoubtedly knew the youthful crowd was anxious to hear Him tell an amusing story. He did tell them a peculiarly significant story, which fixed clearly in their minds the importance of deeds. And then He said, 'It is very easy to come here, camp near this beautiful lake, on these charming hills, far away from everybody and deliver speeches on Universal Peace. These ideals should be spread and put in action over there, (Europe) not here in the world's most peaceful corner.'

On the following evening, 16 May 1912, about nine o'clock, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'We have to leave this place tomorrow and I wish I had one of my Persian rugs here, that I might give it as a present to our host, Mr Smiley, President of the International Peace Society.' Those who were in His company told Him that it would be impossible for anyone to go to New York and return in one night, as all have to leave about ten o'clock in the morning. Then He looked at this servant and asked, 'Well, what do you say?' I said, 'I am not afraid to try anything for you, my Lord.' He handed me His key and said, 'Take this and go to my room and bring a rug. May God bless you.'

From Lake Mohonk I hired a carriage to take me to the railroad station. To my disappointment, I learned on arriving there that there was no passenger train at that hour for New York, but a freight train was just leaving. I jumped the tracks and made a wild dash as fast as I could run. Finally I caught the rear end of that speeding train and succeeded in climbing up without mishap. Then while I was trying to catch my breath, the conductor came and protested my action and ordered me to get off at the next station. I showed him my professional card and told him that I was going on a very urgent mission. 'O you are a doctor! That is all right.' Fortunately, the kind conductor did not ask what the nature of the urgent call was.

About two o'clock in the morning I reached 'Abdu'l-Bahá's apartment and had to awaken Mrs Grace Ober and her sister, Miss Ella Roberts, to let me in. They were very kind and asked me to have something to eat and to rest a while, but I thanked them and told them that I was in a great hurry. Then I selected one of the [XIX:6:182] most precious rugs from 'Abdu'l-Bahá's room and hastened to the railroad station. I took the first early morning train. It was about nine o'clock when I landed at Lake Mohonk station. From the station it would take one hour to reach Lake Mohonk by carriage, and I had to be there at ten o'clock. I looked around and there was no vehicle of any kind in sight. But finally, the mail carrier appeared with his little wagon and got off at once to receive the mail. I got on the little wagon and awaited his return. When he came and saw me, well! was I nervous? It was certainly one of the embarrassing moments of my life. However, I explained my position to him, namely, that I was in the service of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, whom we regarded as our spiritual king, and I showed him the rug that had to be delivered right away to Mr Smiley, President of the International Peace Society. Then as a last resort, I suggested that in case it was against the law to let me go with him, he could at least let me relieve him that morning because I knew how to drive a horse, and if it was necessary, he might consult with the Post Office or the police.

O what a relief came when he said, 'It's alright I guess, I am going up there anyway.'

We arrived at our destiny just at the time when 'Abdu'l-Bahá was shaking hands with Mr Smiley and preparing to leave. He took the rug with a smile and presented it to Mr Smiley to keep as a souvenir.

'Why this is just what I have been seeking for many years!' Mr Smiley exclaimed. 'You see we had a Persian rug just like this one, but it was burned in a fire and ever since my wife has been broken hearted over it. This will surely make her very happy.' Afterward the Secretary of the International Peace Society, who was the last one to leave, came and said to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, 'We all appreciate your blessed visit and we believe what you said is the truth. But we are sorry we cannot include religion in our organization. Our members are composed of all kinds of religions and sects the Protestant, Catholic, Jew, etc.; naturally everyone prefers his own belief and will protest if any religion besides his own is favoured.' To this 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, Your members may be compared to beams of different metals and you are trying to unite them as you would tie these fingers together with a string.' Here 'Abdu'l-Bahá brought His own five fingers close together to illustrate His point. 'See, no matter how you tie them, still they shall remain separate. But the only way to make these metals into one alloy, is to put them into a crucible and apply intense heat to melt them all. For our melting pot, we use the fire of the love of God.'

On 17 May 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá returned to New York. During the following days spent there He used to take a walk in the park along Riverside Drive. Often He went alone, and knowing that the friends would like to accompany Him, He said, 'I sleep on the grass. I come out of fatigue. My mind rests. But when I am not alone, surely I talk, and rest of body and mind cannot be gained.'

On the following day He spoke at the Church of Divine Fraternity and Dr John Herman Randall became interested and attracted to the Bahá'í Cause.

On 19 May 1912 the continuous stream of anxious visitors who called to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá at His apartment in the Hudson Building aroused the objection of the owner and therefore, 'Abdu'l-Bahá moved to the home of Mr and Mrs Edward B. Kinney. Among his visitors that day was a group of Jewish Rabbis. In the evening 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at Brotherhood Church, Bergen and Fairview Aves., Jersey City, N.J. His subject was 'The Brotherhood of Mankind.' [XIX:6:183]

On 20 May 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at a Woman's Suffrage meeting in the Metropolitan Temple. On His way, referring to the car of Mr Mountfort Mills, He said, 'Know the value of this automobile. In the future they will say, 'this was the car of the servants of the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh).'

21 May 1912 was children's day. All the Bahá'í children of New York and some of their little friends had a lively visit with 'Abdu'l-Bahá before He left for Boston.

22 May 1912. 'Abdu'l-Bahá stopped at the Charles Hotel. In the evening He addressed the Unitarian Conference.

On 23 May 1912, He visited the Syrian and Greek Relief Society. While all were eating lunch, He said to the president of the society: 'How fortunate you are to be engaged in service to the poor. My greatest privilege is to be counted as one of the poor.' Then He gave her ten gold pounds (about $50) as His contribution to the poor. From there He left for Worcester, Mass. and on His way, glancing at the beautiful country with its green fields, He said, 'I wish that Bahá'u'lláh had come to these regions. So fond was He of such scenery that often while travelling, wherever the country was more beautiful and more verdant, He would ask His company to make a stop. Once while passing by the shore of a lake, the green country, the purity of the water and the beauty of the weather were so lovely in the eyes of Bahá'u'lláh that He asked that the caravan be stopped and all remained there for several hours.'

At Worcester, Mass. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the University and met a number of students who were from Japan, China and Turkey. On leaving He said to the President, 'I am very pleased with you and your university. Indeed you are serving the world of humanity and you are self-sacrificing to mankind. Above all I wish for you the best there is in the Kingdom. My hope is that you may be the cause of spreading sciences and arts, and I pray on your behalf that God may make you an everlasting banner, and cause the divine love to reflect from your heart. From you and the teachers and the students, I beheld much love and affection. This meeting I shall never forget, and always I shall remember your services.'

This day, 23 May, was a day of rejoicing and happiness, for it was the anniversary Feast of the Declaration of the Báb (and also the blessed birthday of 'Abdu'l-Bahá). That evening in Boston a wonderful feast was prepared by Mrs Alice Breed and she had baked a large cake and decorated it with sixty eight candles, and the first candle was blown out by Himself.

On the following day, 24 May 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá addressed the Free Religious Association or Unitarian Congress.

25 May, the Bahá'ís and their friends were invited to meet at the home of Mrs Edith Inglis, and in the evening He addressed the public at Huntington Chambers; and later a group of ministers called to see Him.

On 26 May, 'Abdu'l-Bahá visited the Syrians of Boston, and indeed it was a royal reception. Commenting on this meeting, He said, 'What a good meeting that was. How the confirmations of Bahá'u'lláh change the souls.'

Returning to New York, He stopped at the home of Mr and Mrs Edward B. Kinney During the day He spoke at Mount Morris Baptist Church, Fifth Ave, and 126th St.

On 28 May, from early morning until late at night friends and inquirers in groups called to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá. [XIX:6:184]

On 29 May, He addressed the Theosophical Lodge at Broadway and 79th St. One of the friends inquired about 'Abdu'l-Bahá's health. He replied, 'My health and happiness depend upon the progress of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh. This happiness is a lasting happiness and this life is an eternal life.'

On 30 May 1912, He spoke at the University of New York.

31 May 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to the country home of Mr and Mrs Wm. H. Hoar at Fanwood, N.J. where a meeting was held. Mr Hoar pleaded to have Him stay there for a while, but He excused Himself, saying, 'We have no time for pleasure and fresh air. We must be occupied in service to the threshold of God.' Later He spoke at the Town Hall in Fanwood and then returned to New York.

On 1 June 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave the following message to a Socialist who had called to see Him. 'Tell the Socialists, sharing in property and lands of this mortal world is conducive to strife and warfare. But the sharing and heritage of the Kingdom is conducive to unity and goodwill. Instead of striving for worldly sharing, if you strive for the things of the Kingdom, you will gain strength and eternal happiness. For the divine Kingdom is spacious and will give you whatever you desire, and there will be no more strife and warfare. Is this not better and nobler?'

On 2 June 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Church of the Ascension, Fifth Ave, and 10th St. New York. After leaving the church He said, 'At first, on arriving at the church, I did not feel inclined to speak, but when I stood before that great audience, where the atmosphere of the church was filled with the Holy Spirit, I received a wonderful feeling of vigour and happiness.'

On 3 June 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was the guest of Senator Gifford Pinchot at Milford, Pa., where a large number of America's greatest statesmen and government officials were waiting to welcome Him. Here, also, 'Abdu'l-Bahá predicted the coming of the World War. When addressing His honoured audience. He said, 'A world war among the powers is inevitable! But it will not be in America. This war will be in Europe. You have taken a corner for yourselves. You do not interfere with anybody, neither are you contemplating taking the European countries, nor is there anybody covetous enough to invade your lands. You are at ease. The Atlantic ocean is a natural mighty fortress. Europe and other countries will be forced to follow your methods. Great changes will take place in all Europe. The centralization of great governments will end in the independence of internal states or provinces.'

On 4 June 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá returned to New York and stopped at the home of Mrs Champney, which like the home of Mr and Mrs Edward B. Kinney, became the centre of attraction. One of the many friends present asked about the material civilization in America. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'This material civilization is like a glass or bulb, very transparent and pure. But divine civilization is like a lighted lamp. When these two are combined, the utmost perfection will be obtained. The light of the Oneness of the world of humanity, equal rights and divine morals shall spread from this country to other countries and shall illumine the world.'

Another person asked, 'Is it possible for the busy man of the world to become spiritual?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'The more the souls advance in material things and the more they act with moderation, the more they can acquire capacity for spirituality. The more sound the body becomes, the more will be [XIX:6:185] the reflection and manifestation of the spirit. Yes, the things which are contrary to spirituality are those that oppose true science and a sound mind.'

On 5 June 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá entertained the Bahá'í children at the Unity Club. On the following day, 6 June, He visited the homes of Mrs Newton and Mrs Ives, where wonderful meetings were held. Addressing the friends, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said:

'In the world of existence there is no issue greater than meetings that are held just for the love of God. Consider, people from the East, people from the West how in the utmost fellowship we are gathered in one place. It was impossible in the past to have such fellowship and unity. It is the power of Bahá'u'lláh that has united the hearts and brought the souls under the power of One Word. The members of a family even can never be gathered together with such a degree of love and be associated in such joy and happiness. It is through the divine power and the influence of the Word of God that we are assembled with such cheer and gladness turning to the Abhá (Most Glorious) Kingdom and like unto young trees of the rose garden, swaying by the breezes of favour and bounty. This day is the day that can never be forgotten, because we are under the shadow of Bahá'u'lláh; our hearts are rejoicing with His glad-tidings; our nostrils are perfumed by the fragrances of the Kingdom of Abhá; our hearts delighted with the divine call and our spirits revived by the merciful outpourings. Surely such a day will never be forgotten.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá

God is like the calm and limitless sea. His Bounty is overflowing and imitable. The Love of God, the Beauty of God is everywhere and exists for man if he will but rise to spiritual heights, open his spiritual vision and behold it. All souls have capacity for enkindling the Spirit, and as we may all be assisted by Its Divine Power, we must will to receive it.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

Dr Díyá' Baghdádí

Chapter VI¹

This story of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit in America is based on material and notes corrected by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself and which He had turned over to Dr Baghdádí at the time He was leaving this country. The twofold purpose of this series, which will continue for several months, is, in the words of the author, 'First to bring back to the memory of the believers the time of the incomparable days of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to them and to remind them of His words, His instructions and His admonitions; and, secondly, to give a picture of His visit so that later believers who did not have the blessing of seeing Him, may benefit by reading a brief history.'— Editor.

'Abdu'l-Bahá at Philadelphia

8 June 1912. A very unfortunate event happened² through the malicious act of one who was supposed to be a friend, causing not only trouble to 'Abdu'l-Bahá but increasing greatly the strain of His daily work. The writer has witnessed on many such distressing occasions how 'Abdu'l-Bahá would never say even a word to the offending person, for He was the essence of mercy, the source of compassion and the ocean of forgiveness. He always covered the faults in His masterly way, and often would shower more kindness upon those who wronged Him. However, before retiring that night, He said, 'The purpose of the appearance of the Greatest Manifestation of Bahá'u'lláh; the endurance of calamities and disasters; the martyrdom of the holy souls and the ordeals of the sanctified temples, were for the purification of souls and the spirituality of the friends.'

9 June 1912. In the morning, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke at the Unitarian Church 15th St., and Girard Ave, and in the evening at the Baptist Temple.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's return to New York

10 June 1912. On this day a remarkable Tablet was revealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá for M. Hippolyte Dreyfus-Barney of Paris, France. In it He referred to His visit in Philadelphia and of the confirmations of the Kingdom of Abhá which were all encompassing.

Speaking of the days in Baghdád, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'The Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) after leaving the 'Abode of Peace' (the city of [XIX:7:219] Baghdád) and also Adrianople, did not speak at public meetings. The style of His talks and His blessed utterances were wonderful, peerless and incomparable. But for the sake of reverence, I do not choose to speak in that same style.'

11 June 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was not feeling well, and that was a sure sign there was inharmony somewhere among the friends. For He always declared that His health was in the hands of the friends. In their unity He received health, and in the lack of it He would be ill. So on that morning He said, 'Bahá'u'lláh has closed the doors of dissensions. He referred affairs to the Supreme House of Justice, and whatever its decision may be, all must obey. He even said that should two divisions be formed amongst the Bahá'ís and each one establish its House of Justice and oppose each other, both of them would be false. And before the establishment of the House of Justice, He appointed and confirmed the Centre of the Covenant and said whatever he does is right. With the blessed pen, He wrote His Covenant.'

In the afternoon, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to the home of Mr Topakyan, the Persian Consul General. Then He returned home where the friends were eagerly awaiting Him. When someone inquired about the significance of dreams and the power of spirits, He replied, 'It is certain that there is a great connection between the human spirit and the realities of existing beings or things. Thus sometimes whatever one sees in a dream, the same takes place on awakening. Nay rather while one is awake and when the heart is free from troubles, certain things make an impression that later will materialize in a physical form. Therefore there is a spiritual relation between the human memory or mind and physical forms. And the spirit possesses the power of discover or unfoldment. When this power is known, these questions become easily understood. Nevertheless, here is an interesting thing, while the materialists are denying the spiritual power, they themselves are occupied in discovering the layers or strata of the earth (geology) and are submerged in the spiritual power and claim to know the happenings of the future.'

Another friend asked, 'In the Tablets it is stated that we must be severed and detached. In another place it is stated that we must learn a trade or profession. Do not these two statements contradict each other?' 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'In the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, it is incumbent upon every soul to acquire a trade and an occupation. For example, I know how to weave or make a mat, and you know some other trade. This, in itself is an act of worship, provided that it is conducted on the basis of utmost honesty and faithfulness. And this is the cause of prosperity. Yet, in spite of being so occupied,—if the heart is not chained and tied to this world, and is not troubled by current events, neither hindered by wealth from rendering service to mankind, nor grieved because of poverty,—then this is human perfection. Otherwise in a state of poverty, to manifest generosity and in a state of weakness to claim justice—this can easily be said, but it is not a proof of man's attainments and alertness.'

Someone asked, 'How can we recognize the person with selfish and insincere aims?' 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'I have spoken on this subject before. Christ said, 'By their deeds (fruits) ye shall know them.' Those who are related to me, shall be known by their deeds.'

12 June 1912. On that day friends and visitors took 'Abdu'l-Bahá's headquarters by storm, all eager for private interviews. For this reason, He said, 'Whosoever has not yet had a private interview, or if anyone has [XIX:7:220] very important business, let them come in, but the rest we shall meet at the general meeting. For it is impossible to meet all, one at a time.'

Later at the general meeting, He spoke on the subject of true refinement and declared that, 'One of the special laws of Bahá'u'lláh is the one prohibiting cursing and defamation, and that all should seek forgiveness for their enemies. Though the nations and people are physically related together in the world of spirit and heart they hold aloof from each other. But those who have spiritual relationship, and unity of conscience, are always ready to sacrifice their lives for one another, even though they have no physical relationship.'

'In the traditions of the Shí'íhs (the second largest Muslim sect) concerning the coming of the Promised One, it is stated that 'Knowledge consists of twenty-seven letters. All the Divine Manifestations who came, from the first to the last, have revealed only two letters.' Aside from the true meaning (of this tradition) the victory and power of the Cause of God, the appearance of wonderful signs, the explanation of divine questions, the unfoldment of the secrets of the holy books, and the all encompassing knowledge of this Most Great Manifestation in the world of the Cause, are a hundred times more than that. Also, outwardly speaking, the wise people of this age have acknowledged that the sciences, arts, industries and wonders of this century are equal to more than those of the past fifty centuries, nay rather, even greater than that.'

13 June 1912. Speaking of the bitter days of persecution, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'Notwithstanding all these persecutions and ordeals, the Cause of God was victorious and irresistible, even though the Committee of Investigation and its members every hour inflicted grave injustice and brought forth false accusations at the city of 'Akká. After joining and conspiring with the deniers and enemies at 'Akká to crush and destroy us, and while they were still on their way to Constantinople, the wrath of God overtook them. The whole matter was changed. All the oppressors became degraded. Some of the members of the committee were put to death and some had to run away. Finally one of them went to Egypt and begged food of the believers to save himself from starvation.'

The reader may know perhaps that in 1907 the enemies of 'Abdu'l-Bahá aroused the fear of 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd, the Sultán of Turkey, and turned him against 'Abdu'l-Bahá. So he sent a committee to investigate some serious charges, namely, that was going to make Himself a king, and other false accusations. While at 'Akká, the committee met 'Abdu'l-Bahá; and then returned to Constantinople with the intention of asking the death sentence from the Sultán for 'Abdu'l-Bahá. But before the committee reached Constantinople, one day the Sultán was talking with the chief of the Muslims at the door of the Mosque, when a bomb that was evidently intended for him, exploded and he had a very narrow escape from death. He fainted. About three hundred lives were lost by the explosion. Then soon afterward, the Young Turks came into power; Sultán 'Abdu'l-Ḥamíd was deposed and cast into prison, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá was not only freed from danger by the Young Turk Party, but also from the Turkish prison.

Speaking upon the subject of discord among the friends, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'Bahá'u'lláh declared that whenever the people of Bahá have discord, even though on behalf of Bahá'u'lláh Himself, both sides are to be rejected.'

After taking a short nap, He returned and said, 'I was tired. I slept a little. I dreamed that I was talking [XIX:7:221] to you, and it was so clear I was awakened by my voice. One of the words of that dream was the word, 'distinction' [imtiyáz]. Therefore, it is befitting that we speak on the subject of distinction.' (And this talk is published in full in The Promulgation of Universal Peace, p. 189ff.)

14 June 1912, the sad news of the death of Áqá Siyyid Taqí Manshádí, one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's old secretaries, was received. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'The Station of Áqá Siyyid Taqí Manshádí will become known in the future.'

Speaking of Bahá'u'lláh, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'Notwithstanding that the Blessed Beauty (Bahá'u'lláh) was in prison, His blessed tent was pitched on Mount Carmel with the utmost dignity. From a purely outward point, His power and might was in such a great degree that the governor of 'Akká tried for five years to see Him and visit the holy threshold, but he refused and never paid any attention to him.'

Speaking of His own public addresses, in churches, etc.; 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'They are according to the capacities of the souls and the exigency of the time.' Then He declaimed a verse from Persian poetry, to illustrate this point 'Though the father may sing to the baby 'Tee-tee' in his own mind, he may be drawing an architectural plan.' We gather from this bit of illustrated verse how infinitely beyond the powers of audiences to grasp are the images and cosmic visions of the Prophet.

XIX:8, November 1928 [XIX:8:239]

'Abdu'l-Bahá

'Consider how great and unexampled have been the diversity of race, the antagonisms of faiths and the conflict of opinions in Persia. In this day, however, the fragrance of holiness has produced so complete a fusion of the divers elements in that land that its varied peoples, its opposing sects and hostile races have become even as one soul. Reflect how great is their (Bahá'ís) love one for the other, how firm their union, how unified their interests, how close their association and intercourse. Christian, Jew, Zoroastrian and Muslim, having all banished every trace of estrangement and difference from their midst, have all gathered together in perfect harmony and understanding, with all affection, happiness and freedom.

'Ponder in thine heart what the Power of the Most Great Name (Bahá'u'lláh) hath wrought!'

'Abdu'l-Bahá at Brooklyn, N.Y.

15 June 1912. 'Abdu'l-Bahá addressed the Fourth Unitarian Church, at Beverly Road, Flatbush, Brooklyn, N.Y. At noon, He lunched at the home of Mr and Mrs Howard MacNutt. In the evening, He addressed the Central Congregational Church at Hancock Street. In His inspiring addresses He proved the validity of Christ and Muḥammad. The attention of the reader is called to this great fact, namely, that in all the history of America, no one has ever tried to prove the validity of Christ in Jewish Synagogues, and the validity of Muḥammad in Christian churches. But this 'Abdu'l-Bahá did with pure logic and irrefutable evidence.

Later at a general meeting He said among other things, 'No matter how much the world of materialism progresses, still it is in need of the teachings of the Holy Spirit.' He urged the believers to teach and told them just how to teach the Bahá'í Message saying, 'You must teach the Cause of God in the utmost humility. Just as I am humble in the presence of all, even the children, so you must be likewise.'

17 June 1912. Consenting to the repeated requests of the friends, 'Abdu'l-Bahá went to the home of Mr and Mrs Howard MacNutt to have a moving picture taken. The series of those pictures were as follows: 1. His arrival and alighting from an automobile and how He was welcomed by the friends. 2. His walks and talks to His secretaries and interpreters, 'Consider the power of the Ancient Beauty, and the influence of the Greatest Name—(Bahá'u'lláh)—How He has established such a unity and fellowship between us and the American people! If the powers of the world were brought together, it would not be possible to have the hearts so attracted to each other, and we here are assembled with such love at such a reception and love one another with heart and soul! Behold what the power of Bahá'u'lláh has done and how He made the people of the East and the West, the lovers of each other! Were it not for His power, it would have been impossible to arrange this meeting. Praise be to God! We are all united and agreed in heart and soul.' 3. His walks alone, chanting in Persian, 'His wonders are resplendent His power is perfect. His favours are bestowed. His mercy is abundant.' 4. His sitting with white and coloured children, giving His blessings to them while the Persian friends are standing in His service. 5. His bidding farewell to the friends and uttering the following words: 'Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The sun of Truth has arisen! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The New Jerusalem has descended from heaven! Glad-tidings, Glad-tidings! The divine glad-tidings are revealed! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The secrets of the Holy Books are unfolded! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The Great Day has become evident! Glad-tid- [XIX:8:254] ings, glad-tidings! The banner of the oneness of the world of humanity has been raised! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The tent of Universal Peace is set up! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The divine lamp is lighted! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The merciful breeze is wafting! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The promises and prophecies of the Prophets are fulfilled and evident! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The Glory of Carmel has become reflected on the horizons! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! The East and West are embracing each other! Glad-tidings, glad-tidings! Asia and America, like unto two lovers, are holding the hands of each other!'

18 June 1912. The Brilliant Proof, the manuscript of a book written by Mírzá Abu'l-Faḍl, the most noted Bahá'í writer and historian, was received and highly approved by 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who asked me to give it to Mr Albert R. Windust of Chicago as a present and with the request that it be published. When someone suggested to Him a visit to the beautiful country for recreation, He refused, saying, 'We love the meetings of the faithful ones, not beautiful sight-seeing trips. But first we must be faithful to God, then to His servants. Even if we have in the past seen beautiful places and delightful sceneries, it was either for business and meeting people, or while travelling.'

Then He wrote a wonderful tribute in honour of Áqá Riḍáy-i-Qannád, a true and a pioneer servant of the Bahá'í cause, who died at 'Akká. 'Faithfulness,' as defined in this tribute, 'means that I should be a wanderer in this mountain and desert! True faithfulness is when I become lost, stripped from names and unconsidered; in the field of sacrifice to be a target for the arrow of unfaithfulness! In short, I have but one request to make of the friends of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, and that is to bow their heads at the Holy Threshold (the Holy Shrines) and ask for 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the cup of martyrdom, so that in servitude to the Threshold of Bahá, He may sweeten His mouth with a drop from the ocean of faithfulness!'

On the following day, at the request of Miss Juliet Thompson, a noted Bahá'í artist, 'Abdu'l-Bahá consented to have His portrait painted by her. Later Mrs Smith of Philadelphia called and asked for a name, and for advice concerning her health. 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave her a Persian name, 'Tábandih', meaning 'brilliant'.¹ And his advice concerning health was, 'You must always be happy and associate with happy and cheerful people and characterize yourself with the characteristics of the Merciful One. For happiness has a connection with health preservation; and from sorrow, diseases are born. The source of permanent happiness is spirituality and merciful conduct which is not followed by sorrow. But physical happiness is subjected to a thousand kinds of changes and transformations. Have you heard the story about the Emperor who while looking into a mirror used to be sad and distressed and would wail, 'Oh! What a splendid and youthful body I once had; now how helpless it is! What a beautiful face I had, how homely it has become! What a graceful form I had, how out of shape it has become!' One by one, he used to recount all the good features of his physical equipment when he was young and then, making comparisons, he would show forth his sadness. This is the end of physical happiness!

A question concerning calamities and cataclysms was asked. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied: 'The links of the chain of existing things are connected by a universal law and divine order, and all created things are linked together. It is impossible for any of the links to break except by its relation to that universal law and order. Whatever happens is from the essential requirements and is based on great wisdom. For it is a divine decree that grass should grow and then wither; every green and verdant plantation eventually to dry up; every united body to become dispersed; and every composition to be followed by decomposition. All these are from the requirements of that universal law and the collective links that are interpreted as divine decree or fate.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá at Monclair, N.J.

20 June 1912. Here 'Abdu'l-Bahá rented a house for a few days and on the first evening there, He went out for a walk, accompanied by Mírzá 'Alí Qulí Khán and this servant. Oh! What lessons of wisdom, justice and severance did He teach us that night! Indeed we learned from Him in one hour more than we could have learned in many years from any school or teacher. The following is one of the incidents of His life when He was a very young boy in Baghdád which He related to us that night, and which, indeed, is a clear evidence of His innate and keen wisdom, His justice and fairness, His severance and detachment from material things. 'Mírzá Hádí-i-Javáhirí, a very wealthy Persian Bahá'í died in Baghdád leaving a son, three daughters and a great fortune. The son, Mírzá Músá was also a Bahá'í, but the daughters were fanatical Muslims. A fierce fight started among these heirs because they mistrusted each other and could not come to a decision as to how to divide equally among themselves their father's immense fortune. Finally Mírzá Músá went to Bahá'u'lláh for help and assistance. Bahá'u'lláh said, 'This is not my work, go to my Greatest Branch ('Abdu'l-Bahá)—will help you.' Though I was but twelve years old, I at once summoned a reliable real estate man and asked him to divide their estate into four equal parts. I also summoned a furniture dealer and asked him to divide the furniture into four equal parts. Then I summoned an expert jeweller who divided their jewellery into four equal parts. This plan pleased all the heirs. It took only from morning until noon for the three experts to finish their work of dividing everything into four equal parts, and then everybody was happy.

After a day or so, Mírzá Músá came to me and told me confidentially that he had in his possession all his father's money in gold and nobody else knew anything about it. He wanted me to have all that money for my services. I asked him to show me where the money was. He took me to his room and produced a satchel full of gold. I locked the satchel, sealed it with wax and ordered him to call his sisters in. When they came, I explained to them that it was unnecessary to call an expert to divide the money, that it could easily be divided by themselves. Seeing the satchel sealed with wax, all of them were satisfied and each one received one fourth of the money. Though at that time I did not have any money, and I had to get along in the cold without an overcoat because I could not afford to buy one, and my old turban needed to be changed, I did not wish to take any of their money.'

Streams of big tears gushed forth from my eyes and in my heart I said 'No wonder you are called Master.' Yea the citizens of Baghdád and the inhabitants of 'Iráq always called Him 'Master', because He was the first one to settle their problems and adjust their affairs.

22 June 1912. Concerning inter- [XIX:8:256] ference in politics and meddling in government affairs, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'The people of Bahá are forbidden from interfering or meddling in political affairs and in every country, they must obey the government and the law and order of the land.'

23 June 1912. Concerning material progress in Europe, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'The material progress of Europe shall reach a stagnant mark, that is, it will one day reach to the limit, and everything that reaches a natural limit and then stagnates, surely must then decline. We are hopeful that spiritual progress may reach and protect them from this fate. On the other hand all those movements which are in a stage of birth and growth, face a sure progress. In those days when we were leaving Tíhrán for Baghdád, there was nothing in appearances to show the strength that was in the Cause, but because the Cause of God was then like a young tree, full of the power of growth and development, it was in reality even then destined to encircle the East and the West; whereas the great and apparent absolute power of Náṣiri'd Dín Sháh was destined to reach its decline and fade and vanish.'

That afternoon, seeing every seat in the house occupied and scarcely any standing room, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'We do not look at the place of meeting, nay, rather we look at the radiant faces and hearts of the friends.'

When someone inquired about His health, 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'Physical health is of no importance. The importance is in the spiritual health which has a lasting effect and ecstasy. The more you think of the body, the worse it becomes. Therefore, it is better not to pay so much attention to it. Today I drank a glass of milk. I feel much more comfortable. Why should man go to so much trouble and hardship for eating?'

25 June 1912. After lunching at the home of Mr and Mrs Edsel, 'Abdu'l-Bahá started for New York.

'Abdu'l-Bahá's return to New York

Mrs Florence Krug stated that her husband, Dr Krug, was having a change of heart, and that he not only had ceased his opposition, but he was helping and encouraging her to serve the Bahá'í Cause. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'When the Muslims were beating Chief Mu'abadán (a Persian fire worshipper)¹ with the whip for drinking wine, (this was the old Muslim way of punishing the violators of their prohibition law) he cried, 'O Arabian Muḥammad! What hast thou done! What an influence Thou hast manifested!' Now it must be said, 'O Bahá'u'lláh! What hast Thou done! What power is this that has transformed such people into captives of love and united the east and the west!''

In the afternoon, 'Abdu'l-Bahá paid a short visit to Mrs Gary at her home; and from there, passing through the military park, He went to the home of Mr and Mrs Hooper Harris, where a meeting and dinner were arranged for Him.

27 June 1912. While sitting with a group of friends in the park, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'What revolutions have taken place (in the East) and what waves have risen from them until they brought us here, and yet, what other waves are to rise! ...

'My beginning and end is the Holy Threshold (the shrine of Bahá'u'lláh). Whatever we have is from that Threshold and to it we shall return. Were it not for His help and bounty, these souls (the believers) would not be sitting here at your left and right. Where is Persia and where is America!'

Consider! Has anyone singly and alone accomplished without the aid of his contemporaries any great thing in life? United members of an organism or assembly will be in power and able to accomplish great deeds. Human beings singly and alone cannot fully achieve a great good thing; in fact man cannot live solitary.

Therefore, life must be lived in unison in society; and when socially united, fully united, they can do everything.

When one family is well united, great results are obtained. If this circle of unity be widened so as to include and control the interests of an entire village to the extent that all the members of its population are fully united and in perfect accord; the results will be accordingly. Now widen the circle again! Let a city be united and the results will be still greater. Widen the circle yet more and have the people of a country united; then, indeed, important results shall be forthcoming. And if a continent is fully united and will unite all the other continents, then is the time when the greatest result shall obtain.

XIX:9, December 1928 [XIX:9:288]

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Every movement in the world of humanity bringing on its back unity and accord is good; and every matter which creates discord and inharmony is evil. This century is a radiant century. Its discoveries are many. Its inventions are great. Its undertakings are multitudinous. On account of these great accomplishments, this century is superior to all other centuries. But the greatest undertaking is the unification of language, because it is more beneficial and productive of more pleasure than any other undertaking of this age. The unity of language brings about great fellowship between hearts. The union of language is the cause of the attainment of accord. It brings about the entire sweeping away of misunderstanding between the people; it establishes accord between all the children of men. It gives broader conceptions and greater vision to human minds, and today the greatest undertaking in the world of humanity is to understand and make yourself understood. Every individual member of the body politic, on account of the widespread of an auxiliary international language, will be enabled to put himself in touch with the current events and ethical and scientific discoveries of the age. An auxiliary universal language will give us the key—or the master key—to the understanding of the secrets of the past ages. Through an international language every nation in the future will be enabled to pursue its scientific discoveries very easily and without any difficulty.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá in America

Dr Dīyá’ Baghdádí
Chapter VIII

From the account of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s daily activities and words while in America, furnished us by Dr Dīyá’ Baghdádí, we have here taken some of the most significant passages, for the most part never before published. Noteworthy in this number is a teaching on the Immortality of the Soul.—Editor.

Immortality—A large and very important meeting was held at the home of Mrs Agnes S. Parsons, in Dublin, N.H., on 7 August 1912, to which all Bahá’ís and members of the summer colony, many statesmen and their families were invited. He who is eager to learn the truth about the immortality of the soul and is interested in the future life, let him study carefully and meditate thoughtfully on the following address that was given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá at that meeting:

‘1. First, we must prove that there is no death for the world of [XIX:10:307] existence, or existing bodies, because death means separation of the elements of a compound—the body.

For example, all these contingent beings or created things which we can see are composed of elements; that is, simple, single elements were composed or combined together, formed infinite forms and, from every composition, a certain creature or object was created. Thus from the composition of certain elements, this flower was created. As to the term, death, it means the decomposition or separation of the simple, single elements and atoms, not their destruction, for these elements are everlasting, indestructible and can never be lost. Then we say this flower is dead or destroyed, we mean that its composition has been followed by decomposition—only the order of its composition has been upset—but its original elements are eternal. In the same way, man was created from simple, single elements. Therefore, his death means separation of these elements, but they are everlasting and can never be lost. Thus the term life means composition, and, death means decomposition, or separation and transformation of the elements from one form into another. Just as the transformation of the vegetable kingdom into the animal kingdom means death of the vegetable, in like manner, the transformation of man from the physical world and the separation of the elements (of his body) means the death of man. Then know, that there is no death in the world of existence, at most, there is transformation from one condition to another. But the human spirit is not a composition or combination of elements that must be followed by decomposition. If it were a composition, then we might say it would die, but because it is not a composition, therefore, it does not decompose or die. This is also evident even in the simple elements and their parts (atoms, ions and electrons) where there is neither composition, nor decomposition. And there is no question about that.

'2. While the body changes from one condition to another, there is no change or transformation for the soul. For example, the youthful form of the human body will become old, but the soul, remains the same; the body becomes weak, but the soul does not become weak; the body becomes defective or paralyzed, but for the soul, there is no change. How often a member may be amputated from a body, but the soul remains the same, and never changes. Therefore, while the body undergoes changes, the soul does not change. And because the soul does not change, it is immortal. For the pivot or the main thing in mortality is change and transformation.

'3. In the world of dreams, the human body lays helpless; its powers lacking; the eyes do not see; the ears do not hear, and the body does not move. But the soul sees, hears, travels and solves problems. Therefore, it becomes evident, that by the death of the body, the soul does not die; in the passing away of the body, the soul does not perish; when the body sleeps, the soul does not sleep, nay, rather, it comprehends and discovers things; it flies and travels.

'4. The body may be here, but the soul can be present in the east or west. While in the west, it manages the affairs of the east, and, in the east, it discovers the things of the west. It organizes and runs the vital affairs of nations. While the body is in one place, the soul travels in different countries and continents. In Spain, yet, it discovers America. Thus, the power and influence, which belong to the soul, are lacking in the body. The body does not see, but the soul sees and explores. Therefore, its [XIX:10:308] life does not depend upon the body.

'5. There can be no effect without a cause. It is impossible for the cause (for example, the sun) to perish, and its rays and light continue to exist; the fire to be extinguished, and its heat still be felt; the light to be blown out, and the lamp continue to shine; the mind to be gone, and the intellectual faculties remain. In brief: there is no effect without a cause, and as long as the effect exists, or inasmuch as the effect exists, the cause must also exist. Thus, though His Holiness Christ appeared nineteen hundred and twelve years ago, His work has lasted until this very day; His kingdom is evident; His influence is wonderful. Is it possible for that Spirit of God (Christ) to be of the mortal and such great work of His should stay immortal? Then it is evident that He, that Source of eternal light and everlasting outpourings (Christ) is the cause of the existing signs of His work.

'6. Every created thing has a definite form or shape at a time. It may be a triangle, or square or pentagon (a figure of 5 sides and 5 angles). It is impossible for an object to take on different forms at one time. For example, this rug is an oblong square. Is it possible for it to become circular? It is impossible unless its shape is changed into a round form. Thus while it is impossible for any of the created bodies to appear in different forms at a time, the human soul possesses all forms and shapes at a time. The soul then does not need to be changed and transformed from form to form and cast out one shape to take on another shape and figure. And because the soul is independent of change and form, therefore, it is not matter and is immortal.

'7. When man looks at creation, he finds two things—the tangible and the intangible. The tangible things are such as the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms. Whatever can be perceived by the senses, namely, that which is visible to the eye, heard by the ear, detected by the nose, felt by the touch or hand, and tasted by the mouth, all these are subject to change. But the intangible cannot be perceived by the physical senses. Like the mind and knowledge or science, these, are intangible realities (realities that must be reasoned out) and are not subject to change and transformation. The eyes do not see them, and the ears hear them not. It is impossible for knowledge, which is an intangible reality to be transformed into ignorance. In like manner, the soul belongs to the intangible realities, therefore, it neither changes nor perishes. However, he who has insight, spiritual, and merciful, will find that the human soul was never and will never be of the perishable. He perceives that all things have been always with him and are under his shadows. He finds himself eternal, everlasting, ever living, immortal and submerged in the lights of the Exalted Lord. For he has spiritual perception and susceptible conscience and is not limited by the rules of mind and human senses. But he who is lacking in insight and a pure conscience, always finds himself desperate, and of the dead. Whenever he thinks of death, he becomes alarmed and believes himself to be of the perishable. But the blessed souls are not like that. They know that they are immortal, full of light, and will never die like unto the disciples of His Holiness Christ. That is why at the time of martyrdom and death, the Bahá'ís are in the utmost happiness, because they know that there is no death or annihilation; at most, it is this: that the body vanishes but the soul is eternal and immortal in the divine realm.' [XIX:10:309]

A lady asked, 'Why is it that all the Divine Manifestations have always appeared in the form of man and not woman?' 'Abdu'l-Bahá explained that the greatest work of women is to be the mother of the Divine Manifestation. Then He laughed heartily, and said, 'Though women are equal to men as far as capacity and faculties are concerned, yet, no doubt men are stronger. Even among the animals, such as pigeons, sparrows, peacocks, etc., a distinction (between male and female) is evident.'

On His return to His apartment in New York on 16 July, 'Abdu'l-Bahá was met by a number of friends and inquirers. A lady physician asked an interesting question, 'Why should we have so many disasters and catastrophes in the world?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá, 'There are two kinds of disasters. (1) Those that are caused by immoral deeds and vice, such as, untruthfulness, hypocrisy, dishonesty, injustice, etc. Undoubtedly, bad deeds have evil results. (2) Those that happen because of the essential requirements of the world of creation; the universal divine law, and the universal relations that are inevitable such as the law of change and transformation, death and life. Thus, it is impossible for a tree not to dry up, and life not to end in death.'

The Syrians of Boston invited ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to their club on 24 July 1912, and anxious to know if the Arabic language would in time be the international language. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: ‘No!’ ‘Then, how about the Esperanto language?’ someone asked. ‘A few weeks ago,’ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá replied, ‘I sent a letter from New York to one of the Esperanto leaders. I wrote that if they hold a conference for representatives from different races and rulers of different countries to consult about this language and promote it then it will become universal.’

Question: ‘Does not the Essence of Divinity—God Himself—appear in the flesh?’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: ‘The Essence of Divinity—God—is sanctified above ascent, descent, and appearance. The lights of His qualities are manifest or reflected in the mirrors of the hearts of His Holy Manifestations.’

Question: ‘What is the meaning of ‘Everything is in everything’?’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: ‘It means the transference or transformation of created bodies into infinite forms of creation. Every indivisible electron is transformed into all the forms of creatures and everything travels or moves in everything.’

On 30 July 1912, Mírzá ‘Alí Akbar Nakhjavání, who came to this country in those days and served faithfully as one of the Persian party in the service of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, said, ‘How powerful and effective your words are!’ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá: ‘This is not my power, nay, rather, it is the power of My Father. This work, is His work.’ Then turning to the friends assembled, He continued: ‘Confirmation is something different than capacity, knowledge and mind. How many unimportant souls have discovered important matters. How many souls have endured hardships for years to explore the North Pole, yet, Admiral Peary reached it. But the real point must be explored. Because he was confirmed, Columbus, with just a trifle of trouble, discovered America. The disciples of His Holiness Christ, though outwardly considered degraded, have accomplished that which Napoleon could not accomplish. They transformed the very nature of the world. From this it becomes evident that affairs are carried out through confirmation.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá on 31 July 1912, visited the Henderson Summer School about twenty–five miles from Dublin, N.H. ‘Twenty years ago,’ said Dr Henderson, ‘not a single summer school could be found anywhere, but now, there are hundreds of them in this country.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá: ‘Every praiseworthy thing spreads rapidly. But the children must first be taught about religion, that they may become faithful and honest.’

‘Abdu’l-Bahá in America

Dr Dīyá’ Baghdádí

Chapter IX

From the account of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s daily activities and words while in America, furnished us by Dr Dīyá’ Baghdádí, we have here taken some of the most significant passages, for the most part never before published. Noteworthy in this number is a teaching on the solution of the economic problem.—Editor.

He who is interested in the economic problem and its future solution, let him study the following from a Tablet (or letter) written by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to Mrs A. S. Parsons, of Washington, D.C.

'The solution of the economic problem should begin with the farmer and then all other classes. For the number of farmers compared with other classes is more than double. Therefore, it is only proper to begin with the farmer who is the first real worker in society.

'A group of efficient people or a committee should be elected and the whole village be under its management. Also, a general Storehouse should be established, and a secretary appointed. At the time of harvest, a certain percentage of all crops must be given to the general storehouse, under the supervision of the committee. This storehouse should have seven revenues or incomes: (1) Income taxes. (2) Taxes on animals. (3) Property or anything left without an heir. (4) Lost and found, that is, things found and unclaimed. (5) One third of all treasures or things dug out and excavated from the earth, must go to this Storehouse. (6) One third of all the mines must go to the Storehouse. (7) Voluntary contributions.

'In short, the Storehouse should also have seven expenses, as follows: (1) An appropriation to pay the expenses of the Storehouse itself, and for public health. (2) To pay one tenth of the storehouse income as government taxes. (3) For government taxes on animals. (4) A home for the orphans. (5) A home for the aged. (6) Schools. [XIX:11:347] (7) For the support of the poor.

'As to the first, the income tax must be collected in the following manner, for example: When all the income of a person amounts to $500 and his necessary expenses amount to $500, he should be exempt from paying taxes. Another person whose expenses amount to $500, but his income is $1,000, should pay one tenth of his income for taxes, because he has more than he needs for his living and can afford to pay one tenth of his income without trouble. Another person whose expenses are $1,000 and his income, $5,000, should give one and a half tenths of his income, because he has more than he needs. Another person whose necessary expenses are $1,000, and his income is $10,000, should give two tenths because he also has more than what he needs. Another person whose expenses are $4,000 or $5,000 and his income is $100,000, should give one fourth. Another person, whose income is $200, and his actual needs, just to exist on, amount to $500, who does his best in his work, but has had poor luck with his crops, such a person should receive help from the storehouse, that he may not starve, but have a decent living.'

'In every village the necessary means of support for all the orphans must be appropriated from the storehouse. Also for the aged, the helpless, the unemployed, education, public health—for all these, appropriations must be made from the storehouse.'

'In case there is a surplus (in a storehouse) it should be turned over to the National Treasury for national expenditures.'

'By adopting such a system, every individual in society would live in the utmost comfort and happiness. The different degrees would remain secure and undisturbed. Because the difference in degrees are of the essential requirement for society. Society is like unto an army. For an army, a marshal is needed, a General is needed, a Commander is needed, a Captain is needed, and a private soldier is needed. It is impossible to have them all of one rank. The preservation of different ranks or degrees is necessary. But every private soldier must live in the utmost ease and comfort. Likewise, for every city, a judge is needed, a merchant is needed, the wealthy is needed, a tradesman is needed, a farmer is needed, etc. No doubt, these different ranks must be preserved, or else, the general law and order will be upset.'

Question: 'Will the ancient glory of the East ever returns?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'The East will be better. How many great souls came to the world; how many of the wealthy; what kings sat on the thrones of honour and glory; what charming people were the models in the world's pleasure circle! What was their end? All their glory, life, pleasure and vigour, have perished. But the song of the beauty of Joseph is still conquering the world, and the glory of the disciples is still enduring, and their hard labour is the cause of eternal life.'

Question: 'What is your opinion about the New Messiah of the Theosophists?' [XIX:11:348]

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'The Theosophists are educating a child in European schools, that he may become the Promised One (Messiah) of all nations. What thoughtlessness this is! God must choose the Promised One, not the creatures. A lamp lighted by the creatures, will be extinguished; but the Lamp of God is ever shining. He who is educated by the creatures, will always be dependent upon the creatures. How can he bestow everlasting wealth? It is just as if a person wishes to make a sun out of a lamp, oil and wick.'

On 18 July 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá hinted that soon He expected to leave the city of New York, and from that moment, many of the believers wept as they felt the sting of His separation. Later, referring to the great spiritual souls who would appear among the believers, He said, 'My health and the heaps of work are my obstacles, otherwise it could be possible to inspire certain extraordinary souls from amongst the friends, and not until such souls are developed can the original aim be achieved. At present, some have acquired zeal and capacity. But those who would be chosen, are other persons. Mullá Ḥasan and 'Abdu'l-Bahá were sent by the Mujtahid (Persian High Priest) to Bahá'u'lláh in Mázindarán. As they saw Bahá'u'lláh, their souls became so inspired and vivified, that night and day, they did not have any rest for one moment, after suffering bitter persecution and ordeals, Mullá 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave his life in the field of sacrifice, and ascended to the Abhá Kingdom. Likewise, Shaykh Hindí, who was sightless, after meeting Bahá'u'lláh in Mázindarán, spent the whole night singing until morning. Such souls in the Cause of God must be of the elect. Such souls are qualified to be in the field of service and self-sacrifice.'

On 20 August 1912, Mr F. Mortensen of Chicago, formerly of Minneapolis and Montana arrived at Green Acre. Not having money to buy his railroad ticket, Mr. Mortensen chose to ride on the bumpers, between the wheels under the cars of the train, flirting with death, from Minneapolis to Green Acre. He mingled with the friends, and not a soul knew anything about him. But 'Abdu'l-Bahá picked him out at once and with utmost kindness, He said to him, 'You are my guest here.' He kept him a few days and gave him money to go home happily. The outside world will never know how generous 'Abdu'l-Bahá was. Suffice it to say that every day of His life, whether in poverty stricken Palestine, or in turbulent Syria and Egypt: in European countries or in rich America,—'Abdu'l-Bahá was ever-ready to give a helping hand to anyone who went to Him for help. For one of His titles was, 'the Father and Friend of the Poor'. Just imagine! Now comes a poor pilgrim who has to return to Persia or some other country, who has no money. Then there is the sick and the helpless. There comes the student seeking money for education. Here is a friend out of work, and there is another under a heavy debt. In short: He was the helper of all; and in order to do that, how many days would He deprive Himself [XIX:11:349] from even the necessary food and comfort, that other sufferers be relieved. Yes, He would even give away his garments to men who needed clothing. Moreover, God only knows, how many innocent prisoners were made free by Him. How many sons were returned to their lonely mothers after they were drafted for duty in Turkish battles. How many stolen properties were recovered and given back to their owners. How many have lived a happy life, and how many are still enjoying the blessings of His inexhaustible bounty. And all this was only a part of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's work in this world.

Speaking of man's heedlessness, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, 'As long as the Divine Manifestations are among the creatures, the people do not appreciate them. They curse and insult them. But after their departure, they worship them, and many of the people, like these who are now camping outside of Green Acre, would live a solitary life. Even they persecuted Columbus and some of the ancient doctors and philosophers, as Socrates; but later, they began to glory in their praise.'

A minister from Portsmouth: 'The fanatics are persecuting me because I write and preach on your teachings.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'In every affair, firmness brings forth good results.'

A lady: 'I am unhappy today. I am not contented with myself.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'This is the sign of progress. He who is contented with himself is a manifestation of Satan, and, he who is not contented with himself, is a manifestation of the Merciful One. He who worships himself (selfish) can never progress, but he who finds faults in himself will try to perfect himself and will progress. If a person has one thousand good qualities, he must pay no attention to them, nay, rather he must try to find his own faults. For example: If a person owns a building, properly decorated and strongly built, but if there is a crack in one of its walls or ceiling, undoubtedly he must forget everything else and start to repair the crack. Moreover, absolute perfection is not possible for man. Therefore, no matter how much he progresses, still he remains imperfect and there is a higher degree of perfection than his. And whenever he looks at that higher degree, he cannot be contented with himself. That was why when someone called His Holiness Christ, 'Good Master!' He replied, 'There is only One Good, that is God.' The lady, 'I always speak on unity and the brotherhood of man. I am very happy to see you in this country and hear these wonderful teachings. I am going west to spread this message.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'We must strive that hatred and opposition may pass away, and the souls may become free from the chains of superstitions. You must serve in this path and be the cause of unity of mankind.'

On 23 August 1912, on his way to Malden, 'Abdu'l-Bahá stopped at the home of Miss Farmer to say good bye. Many of the friends were present and it was a sad, sad hour. The most eloquent tongue [XIX:11:350] and the pen of the world's best writer can never and will never be able to describe how happy the true believer was on meeting and, how sad he became on leaving Him. That is why whenever the hour of separation was at hand, you could see the eyes streaming with tears. 'We have finished our work here,' said He. 'We have planted a seed. Souls have become very much attracted and uplifted. Everyday I used to see presents, such as flowers, fruit, honey and candy, sent here by unknown friends. This was an evidence of their sincerity and wholehearted faith.'

An explanation

We wish to mention here in regard to the 'unfortunate event' referred to in the article 'Abdu'l-Bahá in America' by Dr Dīyá' Baghdádí, which appeared in the October 1928 Star of the West, as occurring in Philadelphia, that this event was in no way connected with 'Abdu'l-Bahá's association and contact with the people of Philadelphia, but occurred in His own entourage. His visit to Philadelphia was most happy in every respect as regards His reception and experience in that city.

The dates given for the visit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá to Philadelphia in the October Star of the West were in error owing to an incompatibility in the translation of the Oriental calendar in which the Diary of Mírzá Maḥmúd, who wrote the official account of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit to America, was recorded. Upon investigation we find that the dates throughout this article as given in the Western calendar, are one day off, and should have been as follows:

‘Abdu’l-Bahá arrived in Philadelphia on the afternoon of Saturday, 8 June 1912. He spoke in two prominent churches, the Baptist Temple and the Spring Garden Unitarian Church on Sunday, 9 June, and He spoke at the home of the Revell’s on Monday, 10 June and left for New York in the afternoon of 10 June 1912.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá was so pleased with the friends and the people, enjoyed the hospitality of the Revell family at their home and everything was so lovely that He Himself testified in writing in the following Tablet to M. Hippolyte Dreyfus-Barney of Paris, France, 10 June 1912, how wonderful were the Abhá confirmations while He was in Philadelphia:

‘O thou kind friend! Due to an invitation extended by two ministers and the plea of the friends of God, I went to Philadelphia for a few days. Two splendid meetings were held at two churches and according to my incapacity I spoke. But the confirmations of the Kingdom of Abhá were all encompassing and evident like unto the sun. Though we are poor, yet He is the Possessor of Wealth. In short, the blessed verse (of Bahá’u’lláh) ‘And we shall make victorious whosoever arises to serve My Cause with the armies of the Supreme Concurrence and a contingent of near angels,’ has become clear and manifest. ...’

(For details of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit to Philadelphia, we would refer the readers to the Star of the West of 24 June 1914, and also 13 July 1914).

XIX:12, March 1929 [XIX:12:357]

The spring season

‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in many of His Writings, draws a wonderful analogy between the material season of spring and the spiritual springtime. We have gathered only a few of these important teachings for the compilation which follows.—Editor. [XIX:12:358]

When spring comes there is a divine wisdom in its appearance. God has a special object in renewing the earth with its bounty. For the dead earth is again made to blossom so that the life of plants and flowers may continue and be reproduced. The trees put forth their leaves and are able to bear all kinds of delicious fruits. All the birds and animals, everything with soul-life is rejoiced and rejuvenated in the coming of spring. If this does not come to pass, it is not spring; it may be autumn. But it is possible that spring may come and yet a tree rooted in bad ground will be deprived of its vivifying powers. Or a fruitless tree may not bear, although the warm sun and vernal shower are descending upon it.

So likewise an evil soul may derive no benefit, produce no fruit from the coming of a Manifestation of God. The divine springtime which brings forth spiritual flowers in other souls fails to beautify the soul that is evil. In general, however, just as everything is vivified, refreshed and renewed by the bounty of the literal spring, so every soul receives some degree of illumination and growth from the Manifestation when He comes. He is the Divine Spring which comes after the long winter of death and inaction. The wisdom of God is seen in His coming. He adorns the soul of man with new life, divine attributes and higher spiritual qualities. By this the soul is enlightened, illumined. That which is dark, gloomy and forbidding becomes light, hopeful and productive of new growth. So in the Divine Springtime the blind receive sight, the deaf are made to hear, the dumb speak, the timid become courageous and the heedless awaken to new realizations. In short they have become the image of that which God planned them to be and which the heavenly books promised shall be the true station of man. This is the power, purpose and virtue of the Heavenly Spring.

The time has arrived for the world of humanity to hoist the standard of the oneness of the human world, so that solidarity and unity may bind together all the nations of the world, so that dogmatic formulas and superstitions may end, so that the essential reality underlying all the religions founded by the Prophets may be revealed.

That Reality is one.

It is the love of God, the progress of the world, the oneness of humanity.

That Reality is the bond which can unite all the human race.

That Reality is the attainment of the benefits of the most great peace, the discarding of warfare.

That Reality is progressiveness, the undertaking of the colossal tasks in life, the oneness of public opinion.

Therefore strive, O ye people! and put forth your efforts that this Reality may overcome the lesser forces in life, that this King of Reality may alone rule all humanity.

Thus may the world of mankind be reformed. Thus may a new springtime be ushered in and a fresh spirit may resuscitate mankind.

The individuals of humanity, like refreshed plants, will put forth leaves and blossoms and fruit, so that the face of the earth will become the long promised and delectable paradise, so that the great bestowal, the supreme virtues of man will glisten over the face of the earth. Then shall the world of existence have attained maturity.

This is my message.

'Abdu'l-Bahá in America

Dr Dīyá' Baghdádí
Chapter X

From the account of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's daily activities and words while in America, furnished us by Dr Dīyá' Baghdádí, we have here taken but a few quotations, for the most part those never before published. The Addresses of 'Abdu'l-Bahá in America were published in early volumes of this magazine and later collected and published in book form in two volumes under the title, 'The Promulgation of Universal Peace'.—Editor.

Question: 'You have made it clear to us that the soul is immortal, but what will become of the soul of the wicked and the unbeliever in the next world?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'All realities and souls or spirits are immortal. Even the soul of the unbeliever and the spiritually defective are immortal. But when these are compared with holy souls and sanctified spirits, they are not worth mentioning. It is just like this wood, which has an existence, but in comparison to the existence of man, it is as if non-existent.'

Question: 'Is it right to take revenge in the case of a criminal, and, how can crimes be controlled?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'People have no right to take revenge. But the government must protect the lives, property and honour of the people. The more material education is increased, the greater will be the temptations for committing crimes. But spiritual education is an inspiration for benevolent deeds and human perfections. We are hopeful that crimes may pass away, and day by day the spiritual perfections increase.' [XIX:12:379]

Question: 'What relation has nature to God? Is God in all things, or is He an independent power and nature is His creation?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'Some of the philosophers believe that God is an Infinite Reality. That a spark from that Infinite Reality exists in every human being. That God is the possessor of the greatest power. That all contingent beings—all created things—manifest or express Him according to their capacities. Thus the Supreme Being, the Creator, is transfigured into infinite forms. This is the theory of Plato. But we explain that the Supreme Being, who is knowable to the mind, comprehended and understood by us, is He who dominates and animates all things. That all things are like the elements, and, He is like the spirit, which animates and dominates them. Even like the human body which is composed of elements, is animated and dominated by the soul. Also, compared with the human body, all matter as a whole, is animated and dominated by a Power—the Supreme Being. But the Real Supreme Being is not He who is knowable, who can be comprehended by the limited, finite human mind; nay, rather, He is Himself, the One who exists, animates and dominates by Himself, and by Whom all things are created. All things are the product of His work and He rules all things.

'We call Him the Supreme Being because we need a term to express ourselves, not that He can be comprehended by us. Our aim is to explain about how things find their existence. All things find their existence in two ways. One, by manifestation, the other, by emanation. For example this flower has appeared on this tree. This is called realization by manifestation. The other, is like these rays which emanate from the sun. This is called realization by emanation. In like MANNER, ALL CREATED THINGS HAVE EMANATED FROM THAT REAL SUPREME BEING—GOD—AND THEREFORE, NATURE AND ALL CREATION ARE FROM HIM AND NOT HE FROM THEM.'

Question: 'Did God create evil in the world?'

'Abdu'l-Bahá: 'In the world of existence there is no evil. Evil is nothingness and whatever is in existence is good. Ignorance is evil, and that is the absence of knowledge. Evil has no material or outward existence. Thus, evil is the absence of good; poverty is the absence of wealth; injustice is the absence of justice; imperfection is the absence of perfection. These opposites are referred to absence or nothingness, not to existence.'

'Abdu'l-Bahá made a unique differentiation between the different types of the rich and the poor when He said:

'The patient poor are better than the thankful rich. But the thankful poor are better than the patient poor. And the best of all is the rich-giver who is free from temptations or tests, who becomes the cause of the happiness of mankind. Though through thanksgiving blessings are increased, yet the most perfect thanksgiving is through giving, and the station of giving is the highest of all stations. Just as it is said in the Qur'án, 'Ye shall never receive blessings until ye give of that which ye love.' [XIX:12:380] A king at the time of his death wished he was of the poor class. 'I wish I was poor!' he exclaimed. 'In the first place, I would not have ruled with injustice, and, in the second place, at the last moment, I would not be in such a state of remorse and regret!' A poor man who heard him say this exclaimed, 'Thank God that at the time of death, the kings wish to be poor, but we, the poor, at the time of death never desire to say we wish we were kings!'

Green Acre: 'Abdu'l-Bahá visited Miss Sarah Farmer, the founder of this Bahá'í Centre. He called on her not because she was an idealist and a sincere lover of mankind, but because she was an invalid. For one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's ethical laws was to visit the sick and cheer the invalid. He would even call on his bitter enemies whenever they were ill and help them in the time of need.

'Abdu'l-Bahá said: 'Green Acre must be made the centre for the investigation of reality, not that everybody should come and use it as a place of propaganda for his own ideas and benefits. The Shining Reality which is the Spirit of the world today is One and not many.'

On 25 August 1912, Bahá'ís from Boston and Green Acre came to see Him and in the afternoon, He addressed the New Thought Society in Boston. On the following day, when a group of old faithful believers came to see Him, he said, 'This meeting is an evidence of faithfulness that we have not forgotten each other. In the world of existence, there is no greater quality than faithfulness. Love cannot be disturbed by the passing of time. Consider how faithful were those souls in Persia, who while under the sword, remembered Bahá'u'lláh, and neither calamities, nor sufferings could prevent them from remaining loyal, and on the altar of sacrifice, they cried from their hearts and souls, 'Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá!' (O Thou Glory of God!) This is the quality of faithfulness!'

Montreal: While riding through the City with Mr Sutherland Maxwell, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, glancing at a school:

'Because of the fact that in these schools only material things and natural philosophy are being taught, therefore, no genius students of great mental power can be found. Whenever divine and natural philosophy are studied together, then there will be wonderful souls and greater progress can be achieved. This was the cause of progress in (ancient) Greek schools. They used to teach both divine and natural or material philosophy.'

Passing by a Unitarian Church, he remarked, 'Tomorrow we will raise the divine call in this place.' On approaching the Church of Notre Dame, he stopped to see it for a few minutes. 'Behold what the eleven Disciples have done: What a self-sacrifice did they display! This I say unto you, that you should walk in their footsteps. When man becomes severed (from worldly things) he will transform a world. The disciples of Christ held a meeting up on the mountain and made agreements with each other to endure any sort of calamity; to regard every ordeal as a blessing and every difficulty as an ease; the [XIX:12:381] married man was to free his wife; the bachelor to remain single, sacrificing comfort and life. That was the way it happened. As they descended from the mountain, every one of them hastened in a certain direction, never to return! This is how they left behind them such achievements as a souvenir. After His Holiness Christ, the disciples indeed, became earnestly selfless, not selfless in words.'

To 'Abdu'l-Bahá, thrift and economy had but one place, where He surely practiced them that one place was no other than Himself. For example. On leaving the Windsor Hotel, in Montreal, He wanted to board a street car. 'A taxi cab will be more comfortable for you,' someone suggested. 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied, 'That is nothing. In this way one dollar difference is saved.' But when He reached the Maxwell home, lo and behold! the first thing He did was to see the butler, the nurse, and the maid, and give to each one a five dollar gold piece!

On 3 September 1912, one of the first callers was the President of the Montreal University. To him 'Abdu'l-Bahá explained the Bahá'í Principles and in conclusion He added, 'These are the aims of the people of Bahá'u'lláh. Do you not wish to do the same work? You also should strive that the real oneness of the world of humanity may be realized; that mankind may be free from prejudices and relieved from wars and conflicts. It is for this that we are striving. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has opened a wide door for all. For example, at a time when people of different religions, countries, races, and nationalities, believing each other to be infidels, cursed and outcast, He addressed the inhabitants of the world, saying, 'O people! of the world! Ye all are the leaves of one tree and the fruits of one branch’.

Speaking of children, said: ‘Children are the adornment of the house. A house without a child is like a house without light.’ Turning His face to Mr Maxwell and to all the gathered friends, He continued: ‘You must adhere to whatever is the cause of happiness of the world of humanity. Show affection to the orphans. Feed the hungry. Clothe the needy. Give a helping hand to the unfortunate. Then you will be favoured at the Divine Court.’

On 7 September 1912, addressing the public in the parlour of the hotel in Montreal, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said: “Just as in the physical world there are four seasons, in the world of religion there is also a divine spring season and spiritual springtime. When the divine outpourings cease, the trees of existence lose their freshness, and lack of life prevails on the farms, then it is like winter. The souls become depressed and low; the country of the hearts becomes choked with weeds and thorns; not a rose and not a flower; no beauty, no charm, and no pleasure. Therefore, the divine springtime starts again. This is the divine law and the requirement of the creative world; this is the cause of the continuous appearance of the Holy Manifestations and the renewal of religious laws and ordinances.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá¹

The most blessed condition is the condition of prayer and supplication. Prayer is conversation with God. The greatest attainment or the sweetest state is none other than conversation with God. It creates spirituality, creates mindfulness and celestial feelings, begets new attractions of the Kingdom and engenders the susceptibilities of the higher intelligence.

Prayer and supplication are so effective that they inspire one’s heart for the whole day with high ideals and supreme sanctity and calmness. One’s heart must be sensitive to the music of prayer. He must feel the effect of prayer.

Man becomes like a stone unless he continually supplicates to God. The heart of man is like a mirror which is covered with dust, and to cleanse it one must continually pray to God that it may become clean. The act of supplication is the polish which erases all worldly desires. ... Prayer is a key by which the doors of the kingdom are opened. There are many subjects which are difficult for man to solve. But during prayer and supplication they are unveiled.

The uniting power

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Praise be to God that the Divine Cause in this Bahá’í dispensation is one of absolute love and of pure spirituality. It is not of this kingdom the earth, for it is not war and distress, nor the oppression of one people by another. Its army is the love of God; its victory is the ecstasy of the knowledge of God; its battle is that of Truth—the exposition of the Word; its warfare is against selfishness; its patience is its reserve; its entire meekness is its conquering power; and its love for all is a glory forevermore. In a word it is a spirit and it is love.

It is for us to consider how we may educate men that the darkness of ignorance and heedlessness may disappear and that the radiance of the Kingdom may encompass the world; that the nations of men may be delivered from selfish ambition and strife, and be revived by the fragrance of God; that animosity and hatred may be dispersed and wholly disappear. While the attracting power of the love of God so completely unites the hearts of men that all hearts beat as a single heart; that the arteries of all mankind may pulsate with the love of God; that contention and war may utterly pass away, while peace and reconciliation lift their standard in the midst of the earth.

Bahá'u'lláh made the utmost effort to educate (His people) and incite them to morality, the acquisition of the sciences and arts of all countries, kindly dealing with all the nations of the earth, desire for the welfare of all peoples, sociability, concord, obedience, courtesy, instruction of their children, production of what is needful for the human race, and inauguration of true happiness for mankind.

The existent world needs a uniting power to connect nations. There are various uniting powers in the world. ... All these uniting powers are ineffective and perishable. The only uniting power which can connect all hearts and last forever is faith in God and love for Him. This is the only enduring power, the one that never perishes.

It is God's Will that the differences between nations should disappear. Those who help the cause of unity, are doing God's work. Unity is the Divine Bounty for this brilliant century.

The Holy Land today

Ruth Ellis Moffett

A visit to the Holy Land, where every stone, every corner and every path speaks with historic memories and palpitates with stories of the Old Testament Prophets, and the life of Jesus the Christ, requires deep preliminary study and careful preparation. One needs especially a spiritual preparation to penetrate the profound mysticism which surrounds and illuminates the countryside of Galilee, Samaria and the hills of Judea, and then they might be able to picture just a little of the lives of those simple but great characters of the past as they lived and suffered and prayed.

The history of the Holy Land loses itself in the dim mists of the ages. There is an ancient legend that 'Akká was the home of Adam. Here legend and history weave a fairy like pattern of the past.

Picture for yourself a narrow strip of rough, rocky, mountainous land between two great reservoirs of pure air—the Mediterranean Sea and the Great Desert. The atmosphere has a singular purity and translucent quality, so that the colours must be mixed on the palette of the imagination with the most mellow and delicate tints.

Next sketch rapidly, many rocky, barren, mountain ranges, several large sandy plains, a few small valleys capable of being cultivated. Paint in vivid colours a heterogeneous mass of all kinds of people, with [XX:5:150] differing customs, costumes, standards of living, and grades of development. These, all unamalgamated and warring with each other until England reaches out a rescuing hand, restraining and bringing a semblance of order out of chaos.

We find in this little strip of land, no longer than from Albany to New York City, the Bridge of Sighs of history. It is the bridge between the north and the south, the connecting link between the east and west. It is the footstool of kings, the keynote of empires, the battlefield whose soil is stained with the blood of wars innumerable, and it is the home of outlaws, the shrine of martyrs, saints and Prophets by the score.

In Palestine there are Christians, Moslems, Jews, Samaritans, Germans, Indians, Russians, Persians, Armenians and Syrians—all hating and mutually suspicious of each other.

In 721 BCE Israel's glory departed and these people had no part in the affairs of Palestine for over 2,000 years. Palestine was successively ruled by Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Greece, Syria, Rome and last by the Turks for 700 years. These changes have had a very disastrous effect upon the political, economic and religious life of the country.

But already, in the short time since England has taken Palestine as a mandate, there is marked improvement in sanitation, good roads, substantial buildings with red tiled roofs, the absence of beggars and lepers and general signs of progress in all phases of life.

It seems the weakest spot in the progressive programme which England has been carrying out so far, is in the field of education. This is for several reasons, first, financial, for not enough money has been available; second, because the Jews are taking care of their own people by establishing an excellent school system. The Christians are also doing fairly well with their own, leaving the difficult problem, however, of the big mass of Moslem people for England to care for; in the third place, seven-eighths of the Moslems are totally illiterate and resent being educated. So there is, a great need for sympathetic teachers.

The Jewish University, founded by Einstein is most interesting and is already becoming the University of Universities taking up advanced work where other Universities discontinue. There are modern laboratories in biology and colloidal chemistry, theology, history, literature, law and philosophy of the Jew. They have England to thank again for this great educational opportunity.

The English soldier boys are doing their bit, with great courtesy and tact. Bruce Barton says that if the Jews attempt to set up a government of their own, there will be a great revolt which will wipe out the Jews entirely. This illustrates how strong the feeling is against the Jews. The hope of harmony and peace and cooperation, however, lies with the children, as they become educated and enlightened.

It is plain to anyone that the problems of the Holy Land are today, complicated and of a most delicate character.

There are inconsiderable groups of every religion in the world, each [XX:5:151] with some kind of a centre in the Holy Land. The same ill feeling and lack of understanding constantly seen between the racial groups exists between the various religious camps.

There are shrines of many of these religious groups, ancient and modern, all over this fascinating land. One little known but most interesting is the Shrine of the Samaritans, at Nablus. The Samaritans are a dwindling remnant of Babylonian colonists. In the 7th century BCE, the Assyrian conquerors had planted them to replace the Israelite population of Samaria, who were deported fifty years before, to countries east of the Euphrates. On the return of the Jews from exile in 536 BCE, the Samaritans were not allowed to take part in the building of the Temple at Jerusalem, so they built one of their own on Mt. Gerizim and thereby stereotyped the race and worship so sharply that there is no association with the Jews, even to this day.

All the various religions of the world seem to be divided between those that are most conservative and those that are progressive in their ideals. This is very apparent among the Jews and we are surprised to learn that it is becoming more evident today among the Muslims.

The President of the Constantinople Woman's College told me of the reformation of Turkey which seems to be a harbinger of conditions evolving in the Muslim world. She said that in Turkey, Islám is dead. A wind revives it for a time, but its revival does not last long. There is nothing they have yet found to take its place. They are through with dogmas. They are willing to accept new ideas and are trying to take the best of the old and the new for the good of the people.

But it is rather disconcerting the way they look up to the people of the United States with trust and a belief that all Americans are honest. They are now religiously tolerant, but are rabid against proselytizing. They quickly close the schools of those who teach religion of any kind. She said "If we Americans are welcomed to their country and shown every courtesy and hospitality and they demand that we teach no religion, we should keep faith with them until the doors shall open wider."

"Everything that was before 1923" she said, "does not exist today. The young Turks are trying to put the best foot forward, and are grateful to the United States for all we are doing to help her save her self-respect. But we must be more patient and sympathetic and co-operative. We must get a new set of religious principles over to the Turkish young women." It seems to be the tendency of the young Muslim in the Holy Land today to rebuild the best from old Turkey, and add the new from the western world. Of all the natural shrines in Palestine today none are more enduring, symbolic and free from the man-wrought web of superstitions than are the beautiful Sea of Galilee and majestic, old, Mt. Carmel. The Sea nestles in calm, mirror-like blueness, 700 feet below the level of the sea. It is surrounded by softly curving hills and bordered with a strip of golden sand. It is thirteen [XX:5:152] miles from north to south, and six miles from east to west. This beautiful spot where Jesus the Christ told the story of the good Samaritan, and then said, "Ye shall be my witnesses, both in Jerusalem and Judea and in Samaria and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." And where He said to the fishermen, "Come, follow me, and I will make you fishers of men", is surely one of the most truly impressive natural shrines of Christianity: This is doubly so because of the more recent presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who also taught the people beside the tideless sea.

When bathed in sunshine and inhaling the freedom of the pure open spaces, and with face turned heavenward, one instinctively replies, "Yes, Lord, I will follow Thee too."

To appreciate Mt. Carmel, the Mountain of God, we must turn back the pages of history for a moment. During the Greco Roman days before Christ this famous mountain was covered with groves and terraces and many towns nestled at its feet. The Old Testament Prophets lived and taught upon it's sloping sides. Jesus Christ and His disciples often escaped from the crowds and from persecution in its friendly caves.

In the 7th century CE, Khusraw Parvíz, the Persian Conqueror came, followed by the host of Khalífih 'Umar.¹ The four centuries of Muslim rule (637 to 1098) were most destructive. The Christian Crusades (1098 to 1187) added to the devastation. Each destroying the monuments of the one preceding. The Saracen invasion in the 13th century drove both the Crusaders and the Carmelites away.

In 1631 Father Prosper again established the Carmelite Order on Mt. Carmel, over the cave of Elijah. In 1761 the Turks again became victorious, destroying the monastery and many of the villages of the Druses. In 1799 Napoleon entered upon the scene. For three months, ¹ He was an Arab, hence Khalífa 'Umar.

March, April and May, he made unsuccessful siege on 'Akká. Finally being forced to abandon it, saying that if he could take that speck of dust, he could change the map of the world.

The next scene is of the wounded soldiers of the French being cared for on Mt. Carmel.

The scene changes. The Turks became enraged again, destroying everything on the historic old mountain. In 1827 Monk John the Baptist rebuilt the monastery, naming it Our Lady of Mt. Carmel. In 1914 at the beginning of the world war, the Turks tried again to destroy it.

From the earliest founding of this old monastery, the Carmelite monks have preserved a legend that the Christ would again appear upon the Mountain of God. They have a special room in which they expect Him to appear. They keep candles burning in this room, and a monk is in constant attendance. It is reported that in 1887 or '88, Bahá'u'lláh, the Manifestation of the Christ Spirit for this day, did appear in that monastery and signed His Name to the guest register. But the Carmelites were asleep and have not yet awakened.

It is recorded Bahá'u'lláh, the Promised One, sat beneath the clump of cedars on the mountain side, [XX:5:153] praying perhaps for the peace and quickening of the world.

Near it stands the simple, impressive Shrine of the Báb, the Herald of the Bahá'í Revelation to mankind, and the Shrine of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the servant of God.

Truly this is the Mountain of God—a bit of heaven brought to earth.

As one stands on the Path of Contemplation at sunset, overlooking the sea and the valley filled with history and legends shrouded in the mysteries of the past, the brain becomes deeply impressed with the pure brilliance of colour, the delicacy of tint and the purity of air and the vista of inexpressible peace which prevails.

The soul responds spontaneously to the words, "Blessed are the peace-makers for they shall be called the children of God." Here in the soft, mellow, gold tinted after-glow, all the mystic past, all the inharmonious creeds, all the discordant races, seem to merge into one. There were no creeds, no divergent races, no varying Holy Places—all were Holy, all were one, and God stood revealed in the midst.

The Holy Land today is like a mighty river, gathering many brooks and streams into the unity of its on flowing current in its progress toward the sea, and we see in vision the prophecy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, "All must become united and agreed: All are drops of one river, the waters of one sea, the breezes of one garden, the streams flowing from one fountain, the birds soaring from one apex, the hyacinths adorning one park intoxicated with one wine, and their hearts ravished by one melody."

And so we will close with this thought of the Holy Land today, singing in our hearts—"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for Them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. It shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice even with joy and singing; the glory of Lebanon shall be given unto it, the excellency of Carmel and Sharon. They shall see the glory of the Lord and the excellency of our God." (Isaiah 35:1-2)

Communication with the other world

Compiled from the teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

... [XX:6:175]

Question: Are there 'earth-bound' souls who try to have and do have an influence over people, sometimes taking entire possession of their wills? 'Abdu'l-Bahá answered: "There are no earthbound souls. When the souls that are not good die they go entirely away from this earth and so cannot influence anyone. They are spiritually dead. Their thoughts can have influence only while they are alive on the earth. Caiaphas had great influence during his life, but as soon as he died his influence ceased. It was of this kind that Christ said, 'Let the dead bury their dead.' But the good souls are given eternal life and sometimes God permits their thoughts to reach the earth to help the people."

(Daily Lessons Received at Acca, p. 41.)

Regarding the materialization of spirits through mediums: A person finding himself in a state of trance, or unconsciousness, is like one who sleeps; whatever he feels and sees he imagines to be matter and of material things, but in reality they are wholly immaterial. ...

There is a wonderful power and strength which belongs to the human spirit, but it must receive confirmation from the Holy Spirit. The rest of which you hear is superstition. But if it is aided by the Bounty of the Holy Spirit, it will show great power, it will discover realities, and it will be informed of the mysteries. Direct all the attention to the Holy Spirit, and call the attention of every soul to it. [XX:6:176] Then will you see wonderful signs. Outside of the Bounty of the Holy Spirit all that thou hearest concerning mesmerism or trumpet communications from the dead are sheer imagination.

Rivalry between the different races of mankind was first caused by the struggle for existence among the wild animals. This struggle is no longer necessary, nay rather, interdependence and co-operation are seen to produce the highest welfare in nations. The struggle that now continues is caused by prejudice and bigotry. Today nothing but the power of the Divine Word, which embraces the reality of all things, can draw together the minds, hearts and spirits of the world under the shadow of the heavenly tree of unity.

Self interest is at the bottom of every war. Greed, commerce, exploitation, the pushing further of the boundaries of the kingdom, colonization, the preservation of the treaty rights, the safeguarding of the lives and interests of the citizens, are a few of the pretexts of going into war. And it has been proven by experience that the results of war are ruinous, both to the conquerors and the conquered. ... But in this luminous century the greatest bestowal of the world of humanity is universal peace which must be founded so that the realm of creation may obtain composure. ... Like unto a spirit, this ideal must run and circulate through the veins and arteries of the body of the world.

Those kings and rulers whose fame for just government and greatness filled the world did not occupy themselves alone with their personal ambition and the acquirement of riches, but accounted the public weal and the increase of the inhabitants of their countries and the general treasury as their greatest care. Their glory was not bought with gold or silver, but was purchased by the soundness of the principles and the nobility of their aspirations. Such are those rulers who are benevolent and wise, whose dignity and real happiness lie in the well-being of the public ...

If the oneness of the human world were effected all the differences which separate mankind would be eradicated. All strife and warfare would cease and the world of humanity would find repose. Universal peace would be promoted and the east and west would be conjoined in a strong bond. All men would be sheltered beneath one tabernacle. All nativities would become one. All races and religions be unified. The people of the world would live together in peace and their well-being would be assured.

What is faith?

Faith outwardly means to believe in the Message a Manifestation brings to the world and accept the fulfilment in Him of that which the Prophets have announced. But in reality faith embodies three degrees: to confess with the tongue; to believe in the heart; to show forth in our actions. These three things are essential to true faith ...

The greater the faith of man the more illumined his life. Faith is a miracle; it has a wonder working power. Its spiritual influence refines the character, suffers man to become humble and meek; places in his heart the fear of God; prompts him to devote his time to humanitarian deeds; spiritualizes his nature; exalts his ideals and enkindles his lamp. The greater the faith of man the more numerous will be his philanthropic actions. Faith is like unto the trees, deeds are like unto the fruits. Faith is like unto the lamp, deeds are like unto the light. ... Faith is not so much what we believe as what we carry out.

There are three kinds of faith. First that which is from tradition and birth. For example: a child is born of Muslim parents; he is a Muslim. This faith is weak, traditional faith. Second, that which comes from knowledge and is the faith of understanding. This is good. But there is a better the faith of practice. This is the real faith.

Faith is not so much what we believe as what we carry out. Faith is the magnet which draws the confirmation of the Merciful One. We know and see the Light, we go close to it, are warmed by it, and reflect its rays on others. This is real faith, and thus we receive power to become the eternal sons of God.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

All healing is spiritual healing in reality, no matter whether medicine or affirmation or supplication are used. Any method which establishes the confidence of the heart, is approved—only that when it is done without the medium of drugs or food, no money should be accepted for it.

Asked which is the true attitude of prayer—affirmation or supplication—‘Abdu’l-Bahá emphatically replied: “Supplication because at the door of God’s bounty all are humble suppliants and needy.

“Those who say they are healing through the Power of God, should accept no pay, for they are the dispensers of God’s bounty, channels of His grace. They should be like the disciples of Christ, who, after the crucifixion, assembled together for the purpose of discussing matters pertaining to their mission. They regarded the Life of Jesus and His teachings. ‘Freely ye have received, now freely ye must give.’”

A great prince speaks of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Martha L. Root

The following interview with a Muslim notable of Egypt has great human interest in revealing intimately not only the personality of a distinguished Oriental, but even more especially in showing the breadth of thought of a modern Muslim. In the Islamic world, as well as in Christendom, intelligent and cultured people are much broader in their religious attitudes than a generation ago.

It was in Cairo, Egypt, on 14 November 1929, that one of the greatest Princes of this wonderful land of the Pharaohs and the Khedives,¹ His Royal Highness Prince Muḥammad ‘Alí Páshá, so charming, so cultured, so far seeing a philosopher, spoke to the writer about his meeting with His secretary had called at my hotel three days before, and the invitation had been given for Thursday afternoon at three o’clock. Motoring out through the colourful Cairo thoroughfares toward Mania Palace, the home of the Prince, the writer realized that nowhere in Egypt is the aggressive modernism of the nineteenth century more in evidence than in Cairo. It is just this combination of the old and the new that gives the city its enchantment. Some of the streets with their mosques and bazaars and coffee houses were medieval just like those in the Arabian Nights, others so spacious with squares and parks and hotels, opera houses, theatres and shops, that one feels London could boast no better. But suddenly the chauffeur crosses a fine bridge called Prince Mohamed Ali bridge, and turns the car to the driveway beside the sinuous silvery Nile. Everywhere are to be seen villas and splendid mansions, silhouetted against tall, stately sensitive palms, and the driver halts the motor car before the most imposing of all the palaces.

The pleasant, fine secretary received me, took me into a richly carpeted and tapestried entrance salon where I wrote my name in the Guest Book. “Surely this Prince must be a great sportsman,” I thought, “for these walls are covered with pictures of races and racers.” Then we stepped out again into the porte-cochère and walked into an Egyptian garden, the most beautiful tropic paradise I have ever looked upon! Only a great artist could have created such a poem of palms; such a symphony of colours! And in the very centre of the immense grounds was a great Banyan tree—the raison d’être for all the other magnificent trees—and the palace and the remarkable little mosque all in Moorish architecture and the tower of classic beauty and finally the gates wondrously carved all in black ebony. “Oh, I must have been mistaken!” my mind said, “His Royal Highness the Prince, could not have been a sportsman, he is surely a famous architect, artist and genius!”

One may read all one’s life about the charm of Egypt, and see the show places which millions of tourists have visited, but walking in this garden of palms, perfect palms representative of every species in every land, one wonders if heaven [XX:10:302] is more lovely, and if in the Kingdom Beyond there are trees like this Banyan tree which is a living tent without poles and cords, extending its welcome shade to all who come under it.

I was glad that no Pharaoh’s daughter or no Cleopatra of the Ptolemies came walking down those palace steps in the distance, instead it was infinitely more interesting to see His Royal Highness Prince Muḥammad ‘Alí Páshá, brother of the former Khedive of Egypt and nephew of His Majesty the present King Fu’ád, this gracious host who had met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, come around one of the curving roadways of the garden to meet me. He came quickly, swinging his cane, a handsome man with most sincere, frank, humanity trusting eyes. His very soul salutes one through his penetrating brown eyes. He was dressed in a modish suit of grey; he wore the distinguished red fez, and on his little finger was a wrought gold ring set with a large and very unusual emerald.

His delightful Highness the Prince shook hands with me and invited me to sit down in one of the comfortable rustic chairs at a little table under the Banyan tree. You will sit with us, O reader, for you too, are in this enchanted garden to hear what a Prince, who is a savant and a philosopher, has to say about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Only the Prince called him, 'Abbás Bábá' which in Arabic means 'Abbás Father or Father 'Abbás.

"Yes, I knew 'Abbás Bábá," commenced the Prince, "He was a great friend of my brother, 'Abbás Hilmí II, the late Khedive. Also, Osman Murtaḏá¹ the Grand Master of Ceremonies of my brother had a great friendship with 'Abbás Bábá. I met your loved Teacher first early in 1912 on my way to Paris. Then when I was in New York in 1912, 'Abdu'l-Bahá' was living in a house near Central Park, a home which his friends, (or do you call them his followers?), had prepared for him. I was living in the Belmont Hotel in Fifth Avenue, and 'Abbás Bábá was kind enough to come and visit me there. I deeply appreciated this kind visit."

Then His Royal Highness the Prince explained how proud he was to see a great Oriental moulding the spiritual thought of America. My host continued: "Although we are sorry to see Orientals so backward in sciences, still we must not forget that some great generals, great leaders of thought and all religions have been born in the Orient. 'Abbás Bábá has proved to Europeans and to the entire West that great generals of the Spirit are still born in the East! As I love the Orient and am an Oriental, I was very proud of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's high station and prestige in the United States. Yours is a country of such stupendous wonder, such marked inventions, such marvellous strides in progress, and you saw the greatness of 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

This earnest Prince spoke with such sincerity, his words were: "I loved 'Abbás Bábá and admired Him, and I felt He loved me and was a good friend to me."

"After this visit in New York," the Prince recounted, "I met 'Abbás Bábá again in Paris. He told me of His great conference in Oxford University, He told me too, of His friends in Germany. Later on, we travelled together on the same ship [XX:10:303] coming back to Egypt. For four days we were always together. I was very sad when I heard of His passing, for I considered Him the most important man in our century. A man like 'Abbás Bábá cannot be replaced, that is my opinion. He had such a great spirit, such a powerful brain and such a grasp of realities!"

Here the conversation changed, for just in this moment a lovely young svelte Egyptian boy dressed in cream robes all embroidered in red silk and with a red cap on his head, came bearing a golden tray with cups of mocha coffee. It was real mocha too, direct from the planter to the Prince, and its delicious flavour I can best describe to you as "cup selections only!" Over the coffee cups the writer asked His Royal Highness the Prince; "Are you a sportsman? I saw all those racing pictures. Or are you an artist? Is it you who have created this garden which is so beautiful that I shall carry it away with me in my memory as a dream garden of palms where Muḥammad and Christ and Bahá'u'lláh would choose to walk and talk together? Or could you be the architect who designed this rare little mosque and tower and palace? Or Your Royal Highness, are you a musician?"

He laughed and replied: "Well, I've always been a keen sportsman. Yes, I paint, I love nature, I am a musician and an artist, so I didn't need any architect for this place." The Prince said that the garden was his creation and that he had gathered the palms from all parts of the world. He elevated the whole grounds two metres from the Nile sands, twenty years ago, and had the trees planted, except the huge Banyan tree in the centre which is one hundred years old.

"I bought the property solely for the big tree," the Prince Muḥammad 'Alí Páshá said, "this tree so fascinated me, it was the tree that made me choose this place for my home. This Banyan tree was planted for my grand ancestor a century ago, planted by a Dutchman."

The Royal host said that many American statesmen had visited him and admired his garden, but that Colonel House when his guest paid him the compliment to say that it was the prettiest garden he had ever seen. Speaking of Americans, the Prince said: "We used to have a charming American Minister here, Dr Morton Howell. Dr Howell was a straight forward, good American. One day sitting out here under this Banyan tree, he said to me: 'Prince I thought Honolulu was a paradise, but since I have seen your garden, I know that not only in Honolulu but here in Cairo is a little spot that is just the same—it too, is paradise!'"

The Banyan tree and all the palms, this afternoon that I was at Manial Palace,¹ were so clean-looking, every leaf and every trunk shone as if they had been given a "tub bath" every morning (but of course only the hose or the heavens could give them that!) and the shining green grass rippled in the sunshine as if it had just sprung up from a shower spray. It was the grouping of the grand palms, too, which was so elusive, yet so satisfying. One does not see everything at once in this garden, it has many vistas. Mrs Butts' flowering vines from India rose in sprays here and there like crimson rambler roses; purple Bougainvilleas massed the [XX:10:304] entrance wall, while little meadows of red geraniums threw forth their vivid beauty, and all the wide garden paths were covered with a most attractive red sand which was very pleasing.

After our coffee, sitting under this wonderful Banyan tree, the conversation turned to life and philosophy. The Prince said: "I am in good relations with all people. Since I was six years old I have travelled over the world, and I have learned that some things cannot be changed, they must run their course, so one must be a little philosophical and accept what comes."

His Royal Highness asked about my visit to Egypt and what I wished most to do. He also spoke of my coming visit to Haifa, and then he alluded again to the Bahá'í Movement saying: "You all have accomplished a great task in the United States. It was very interesting to see the large number of Bahá'ís in America and to read of the splendid progress of the work."

He later spoke about Burma, and said it would be very good if these Bahá'í Teachings were promoted there—I quote his words: "Though I respect all religions, I think if 'Abbás Bábá's talks and counsels could be spoken of in Burma it would be very good. There are such numbers of people there who would be uplifted and educated; certainly religion is a very good thing. My situation is this: being a good Muslim and with my position in the Muslim world, it would not be correct for me to be Bahá'í, but always I have been a good friend of 'Abbás Bábá. I remember in talking with Him, how very fascinating He always was! Dressed all in white and with those two very bright eyes gazing into mine, I used to say to Him sometimes in fun, 'O 'Abbás Bábá, do not look too much into my eyes!' He was such a strong character, such a profound man, and He never did anything to hurt my feelings, He always showed me how much the Bahá'í Teachings are near to the Muslim religion."

The dear Prince continued: "In your Bahá'í ideas, all the Prophets are good, all men are brothers, all live together in love and admit that all the Prophets are from God. The Bahá'í Cause is a very conciliatory religion because it brings all people together."

He said that much in the Bahá'í Teachings would appeal to the United States because there they are working so hard for peace and to do away with fighting. He added that many people in America would like the Bahá'í instructions which are not to abuse with drinking, namely, not to use intoxicating liquors that cloud and take away the mind. 'Abdu'l-Bahá often spoke and showed how much the renouncing of tobacco, wine and opium gives health, strength and intellectual enjoyment, penetration of judgement and physical vigour. "All the principles of Bahá'u'lláh," said this Prince, "would be appreciated by Americans."

The writer told him that President Herbert Hoover is a Quaker, and he was very interested to hear about Quakerism and its progress.

His Royal Highness Prince Muḥammad ‘Alí Páshá said, among other things: “Life is very difficult today. There are so many millions of people, so many ways of looking at things, how can all peoples be [XX:10:305] made broad minded and just? In a family of ten members, to get all to be good is a task, how then can nations accomplish it? I am very sorry that all religions in these days, seem to be backward. Only people who feel they need help turn to religion now. So many of those who have money for all their pleasures, do not think about God or religion. Only today I was reading one of our Prophet’s Words, ‘You will see in the mosques, some day, only the people who need something from God.’ Religion has not been looked upon lately, as proper and necessary to educate the family. This isn’t that religion is bad, but it is because some of the followers of religion are intriguers.”

For example, he stated that in Mexico, it wasn’t that the Roman Catholic religion was not good, but the government did not wish the priests to have the ruling of the country. The Prince’s words were: “If the church people would only be wise enough not to interfere in governmental matters, but would confine their attention to teaching the ignorant and doing good to everybody, no government would ever fight them.”

These are just a few of the thoughts of this great Prince of Egypt Muḥammad ‘Alí Páshá, who so graciously received me this afternoon. Each time that he spoke of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, his eyes and the tones of his voice, as well as his words spoke the eloquence of his love for ‘Abbás Bábá, ‘Abbás Father.

No matter by what name this Prince calls himself spiritually, his life is a rare garden of good deeds to all humanity. He may truly be said to be a Buddhist, a Jew, a Christian, a Muslim and a Bahá’í! I am sure that he was happy to know that through the visit of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the United States and Europe, many thousands of Christians began to study the good in all religions and learned to know and to love the inner essence of the Teachings of Muḥammad.¹

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Through the bounty and favour of God think nothing difficult or impossible. God is so bountiful that He brings fire out from the stone; inflammable matter jets out from the interior of the earth; out of the black dust of the soil He produces beautiful flowers; from the bottom of the ocean He brings pearls and corals. When the Light of His favour is shed upon us the darkness is fled.

The point is this, that in the path of Truth every difficulty is made plain and every trial is a matchless bounty ... The Bahá’í Movement bestows upon man a new spirit, a new light, and a new motion. It enlarges the sphere of thought. It illumines the horizon of the intellect. It expands the arena of comprehension.

¹ Readers may care to know that the day before I left Cairo, speaking with Mr A. Muḥktár, the Secretary to His Royal Highness the Prince, I asked him: ‘Mr Muḥktár, please tell me what you, as a true Muslim think about Jesus Christ.’ He replied: ‘We Muslims believe that the Christian religion is sent by the Powerful God through His beloved Prophet the Christ. We have great respect and belief in Jesus Christ. At the same time we are told in the Qur’án that Christians have exaggerated the belief and respect concerning Christ and taken Him as a God or the Son of the God which we never admitted. As a result, we believe in the Christian religion and in Christ as a Prophet, but the Christians deny our religion as a religion from God and they deny the Mission of Muḥammad as the Prophet sent from God. They cannot say that we deny the Christ, nor that we do not respect the Teachings of Christ and believe in Him as a sacred Prophet.’

Egypt, the present great stronghold of Islám has more than once given new orientation to religion and world culture. She stood high in her glory long ago when Europe was entirely unenlightened. May she go forward now to a new, still higher spiritual civilization and progress in this universal epoch just dawning! May His Royal Highness Prince Muḥammad ‘Alí Páshá plant a universal spiritual tree in the Nile garden of Egypt that may be for the Healing of all peoples who visit and revisit this fine land! He is called to a high station and he was deeply loved by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá!

Be thou solute and steadfast. When the tree is firmly rooted it will bear fruit, therefore it is not permitted to be agitated by any test. Be thou not disheartened! Be thou not discouraged! The trials of God are many, but if man remains firm and steadfast the test itself is a stepping stone for the progress of humanity.

A visit to Queen Marie of Rumania

Martha L. Root

Her great and beloved Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania, the first Queen in this new universal cycle of civilization to arise promoting the Principles of Bahá'u'lláh for better world understanding, invited the writer for the fourth time into her presence to meet her and her youngest daughter, her charming Royal Highness Princess Ileana. The other audiences had been in Controceni Palace in Bucharest, in Pelisor Palace in Sinaia and in the Royal Palace in Belgrade when Her majesty was visiting there.

But this fourth visit was the most lovely, unique and happiest of them all. It was an invitation to her summer palace "Tenha-Yuva" at Balcic, on the Black Sea.

O reader, take the mental automobile and accompany me, and you will journey into a new landscape; see an extraordinary palace, marvellous architecturally and absolutely beyond compare in colour harmonies. It was designed by the Queen herself and it expresses her ideal of a little home to dwell in where every member of the household can live in perfect poise and joy and can be alone when he or she wishes to be. The palace is built on sheer, sternly rising white cliffs overlooking the Black Sea, a sea so melodious in its surging, so malachite green at the foot of the cliffs, so black in the distance far out where it mirrors the low hanging deep blue clouds.

No one except Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania would have dared attempt to build a palace on that glorious but almost impossible site. I am sure no one except Her Majesty Queen Marie could have persuaded her husband and the Rumanian Ministers to let her try to do such a thing! But they must have been exceedingly proud of this splendid triumph; and proud of their Queen who had the brains, the courage, the architectural genius, the colour fineness to create this most original and fair "pearl" of a palace, "set" in the platinum grey of perpendicular rocks, and nearly circled by the sea. It is the most unusual setting and the most unusual palace in Europe.

The writer was so longing to see Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania that she could hardly notice the exterior life of Balcic, wonderful as it all was. Only subconsciously she noted and was pleased that this tiny little village of Balcic stretching around the rocks like a prelude to the palace setting, had flags flying at every door in honour of their precious Queen.

She sat alone in the motor car halted at the royal entrance gate while her card was being sent on to the palace in the distance.

Suddenly a bugler comes out on the cliffs far above and to the right and began to play a welcome. Yodlers on still higher rocks echoed the sweet sounds. What a hospitable welcome from a Bahá'í Queen to the messenger who is bringing [XX:11:332] the greetings from the Guardian of the Cause Shoghi Effendi and the devoted good wishes of Bahá'ís from every land!

The Commissar of the palace met the guest and showed her to a charming little palace which she thought was the Queen's home, but no, it was the guest palace! There are several little palaces so each one can have his own quarters here at "Tenha-Yuva." There in the guest palace the writer was shown into a room full of autumn colours so warm, so vivid, so fresh and vibrant with beauty! Surely the Queen must have arranged these flowers, they were so exquisite. I felt she had been there and placed them herself and her presence had blessed the apartment.

The other guests came from their rooms and we went down the stone steps, admiring each terrace gay with perfect flowers, not too many but growing just in the right places. A pumpkin vine with its flat, round, yellow fruit rested over the roof of a little rest house. Blue larkspurs were charming along a yellow grey wall and thousands of burnt orange zinnias massed the lower terraces. Passing a great oak tree bending far out over the sea and just back of it a stream of sweet water, we came to the palace which is just at the edge of the sea.

It is wondrously beautiful.

In the long wide entrance hall with its white side walls adorned with tile mosaics in rare blue, the great dark oak table has a collection of very historic old pewter vases, pitchers, and bowls from Turkey. Brilliant red zinnias mixed with gold were the flowers in bowls here, giving just the rich touch of colour that brought out the beauty of the art treasures and furnishings.

Then we go into the dining room where the great windows overlook the sea. Such a dining room! There colour and grace and harmony play together and please every eye. The long dark oak carved table is set with a Chinese blue silk cloth embroidered with silver eagles, and arranged on this are low bowls of glowing gold and orange bronze flowers, rare silver pieces and crystal. The open fireplace has a cheerful warmth to offer and the whole room breathes [XX:11:333] welcome and great comfort with beauty unsurpassed. The walls are white and the furniture black walnut richly carved. Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana was here with some other friends who have come in just ahead of us. She was so friendly, so radiantly well, so beautiful and happy. She was dressed in her naval costume for she had just come in from the sea. She had on a white silk tailored shirt with collar and tie, a blue military coat trimmed with gold braid, a short cloth skirt and grey hose. The sister of Her Majesty, Princess Hohenlohe, who came from her feudal castle, Langenburg, in Würtemberg, Germany, was a guest that day.

As all were conversing, I saw a moving sunshine-yellow silk curtain which was hung at the window back of the circular arch and in that moment down the circular open stairway, pausing in the white arch, came her dear Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania. She was beautiful, a little pale, and very slender. She was dressed in black with touches of white at the throat, and cuffs of white peeped through the wider openings of her graceful black cloak or 'abá'. She wore the wonderful ropes of pearls and each ear was adorned with one large round pearl. Her "Juliet" or rather "Marie" headdress was of white silk. One does not think of naming this Queen's attire as "clothes". They are not something that she just "puts on". They are a tout ensemble creation chosen by a consummate artist to express her moods, her spirit.

People may say she loves clothes, but perhaps she is not dressing just for herself, but for eyes to see perfect art and perfect beauty. She is born a great artist and to her it would be a crime not to express beauty in everything she wears and in everything she arranges in her home. Certainly her gowns and her furnishings—some of which are very expensive and some inexpensive—delight and uplift every passing eye.

But it is the lofty great spirit looking out through the windows of her beautiful eyes that one sees first, and last, and remembers longest. She greeted the Bahá'í visitor graciously and invited her to sit beside her at her left, at table. Her Majesty's sister sat at the right. The conversation, which was general, was in English, French and German. Her Majesty sat at one end of the great table and Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana at the other.

Her Majesty in a little interlude explained to me that "Tenha-Yuva" is a Turkish word and means “a solitary nest”.

“I saw the beautiful tree leaning over the sea,” she said, “and the sweet water stream flowing back of it. The tree and the stream decided me to build here.”

In the distance we saw the little yacht of Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana close to the warship and Her Majesty said: “It is not really a yacht; it is a yawl and it is called Isprava, that means a happy adventure.”

Then the conversation flowed back to other topics. Several kings and presidents were spoken of and each time Her Majesty praised their work for this generation. When the writer spoke of President [XX:11:334] Thomas G. Masaryk of Czechoslovakia, what a savant he is, and how much he is admired and loved in university circles of Europe, Her Majesty responded: “Yes, he is loved everywhere. He is one of the great humanitarians of this century.”

Later in the luncheon conversation one of the men present said jokingly: “Well, Ileana, what Prince have the newspapers engaged you to today?” “Every day my poor Ileana is supposed to marry someone else!” said the Queen. “I shall not let her go away in a hurry, if I can help it.”

The writer told them of a country where the young men said: “If you do meet Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana, tell her we all wish her to marry our King!”

Anyway, whoever wins this sweet and serious girl will find that underneath the fun and gayety is a young woman who is trying her very best to help humanity. She is spiritual and her whole life is based upon religion. That is what impressed me most. She is genuine, very lovable, and she is full of enthusiasm.

After the luncheon was over, Her Majesty Queen Marie of Rumania and Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana invited the writer upstairs to their drawing room for a little talk alone, the others going over to the guest palace. Sitting in this glorious apartment overlooking the singing sea, the real meeting with Her Majesty and Her Royal Highness took place. The Queen asked about Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, and about the sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, whose name is Bábíyyih, but who is known among the friends as the Greatest Holy Leaf. The Queen said she would like so much to meet them; she would like to go to Haifa and 'Akká and pray at the holy tombs of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and visit the great prison where Bahá'u'lláh and His family and followers were imprisoned. Her loved Majesty said: “Ileana and I will go to Egypt and Palestine this winter after the New Year and we shall surely go to Haifa.” Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana told me: “I am always looking forward to going to Haifa; I shall go when I can.”

They asked about the long trip the writer is going to make to the Far East. Knowing that I came [XX:11:335] from Constantinople to bring the greetings of the Guardian and the friends throughout the world and to see her and say goodbye before I leave Europe and that I am returning at once to Constantinople, Her Majesty said: “I hope as soon as you return you will be able to see the Ghází Kamál Páshá. I know he has done such tremendous work for the development of his country, and he is so liberal in his thinking that the Bahá'í Principles would lead him to that part he is still looking for—religion that is not fanaticism. The Bahá'í Cause gives everything, without putting those barriers from which free thinkers with such difficulty have freed themselves. One is not chained by the Bahá'í Teachings. There is a straight road to walk on in admitting all the great Prophets who have gone before.”

Then we spoke of her lovely home in Balcic which she has created. No flowers in Constantinople or in Constanza were so fine as those grown in her cliff gardens (where it is difficult to grow anything). Her home designed by herself might almost be a holy house, for the tower rises up a little like those in the Rumanian churches. “I love this home in Balcic so much," she said, "for in this region there are so many different nationalities united. We can smile on all equally and spread good understanding. Here in Balcic and round about no one has closed doors or windows to the country houses."

Mention was made of the Turks for there are some in that part of Rumania, and Her Majesty added: "I am very fond of the simple Turk. He is hard working, frugal, honest and devoted." Certainly the nationalities get along happily here.

Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana has an atelier here in Balcic and she is modelling a Bulgarian, a Turk, a Rumanian and a Russian. I was interested in this earnest and beautiful Princess who sat on the divan close to her mother.

"Whenever I have a difficult mission which requires amiability and diplomacy," said the Queen, "I send Ileana. I can always count upon her to do it as I would do it myself, and she has youth and strength, which are added assets. My daughter has a brave spirit to do. I can use for her the words in the Bible which I always use for myself: 'Whatsoever thy hand bindeth to do, do it with thy might.'"

Her Royal Highness Princess Ileana had to leave early. She was going out on the gunboat to do some manoeuvring, as she is just learning how to bring a ship to pier. "The naval work is my pastime," she said before she departed, "but my real work is the Young Women's Christian Association and Girl Guides and I am very interested in all progressive social work, and all that will help for the future. I throw my whole soul into anything that will be helpful for the country."

They were so kind to give the photographs, autographed, which form the illustrations of this narrative. An Indian one (which may be published at another time) was taken in the United States, where the Indians called the Queen [XX:11:336] "Morning Star, the woman we have always waited for!"

Her beloved Majesty gave a beautiful picture to be sent to Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, and with it she sent a message of love and faith.

And now, like the ceasing of music, the visit in its outer form comes to an end, but the Queen and the Princess, for whom Bahá'u'lláh and the Hosts of the Supreme Concourse have waited, have arisen to promote these Teachings for the New Day of God. One saw them doing it, right there in the little group of "the solitary nest" and from those white cliffs that day went a message that may reverberate around the world and be acclaimed by the Angels of the Abhá Kingdom!

Dynamics of prayer

Ruth J. Moffett

The archaeologists have discovered that before the dawn of recorded history, even the earliest primitive man has worshipped a super being and has believed in immortality. The Neanderthal Man, which is represented in the newly placed group at the Field Museum, Chicago, existed 50,000 BCE. With the discovery of those skeletons was found indications of primitive worship and belief in immortality. Mr Henry Field, director of the Field Museum, says that a very recent discovery indicates that a great flood occurred at about 4,000 BCE and still earlier time of Noah, referred to in our Bible, was probably only about 3,000 BCE. A recent discovery reveals this interesting inscription: "In the land of Kish (which was the first capital after the first flood) there are legends of earlier races 30,000 years before our inscriptions begin."

From different excavated art pieces and implements, from crude frescoes on the walls of caves, from the skeletons found in various places is clearly indicated that inherent in the very centre of man's being, there always has been an inner urge impelling him to look beyond his sense perception, beyond his consciousness to a Creator, an urge to implore that Creator for help in time of trouble, and guidance in time of danger. Our ancestors worshipped this Creator in the storm, the lightning, the famine, the sun, moon, comets, eclipses—in anything that inspired awe and wonder. Gradually throughout the panorama of cycles, man's conception of this Supreme Being has unfolded as his consciousness has expanded. Although the methods of worship have changed through every conceivable form, yet the keynote of all, throughout this stupendous symphony around which all the melodies, discords and harmonies weave in mystical upliftment—is prayer.

What is prayer? There are many beautiful definitions by the Prophets of God. "Prayer is loving service." "Prayer is the soliloquy of the beholding soul." But the one I like is, "Prayer is the practice of the Presence of God."

A careful analysis reveals that there are nine ways in which man turns his heart to God, or tries to practice the Presence of God. The one with which we are most familiar is:

Supplication. This is a humble, earnest entreaty, with a sense of dependence upon what is greater than ourselves. We remember the words of Paul, "God is an ever present source of help in time of trouble." We have all lifted our consciousness many times by this impelling motive to prayer. And also;

Compunction. This is an uneasiness of mind arising from wrong doing. It is the sting of conscience, or a sense of remorsefulness. This [XXI:2:48] feeling of unworthiness we find in many of the Psalms: "Feed me O Lord with the bread of tears, and give me plenteousness of tears to drink." Psalms 140:5. Compunction also compels us to prayer, as does:

Aspiration. This is the longing, usually unexpressed, for what is above one's present attainment, a somewhat vague longing for what is pure, noble and spiritual. Alger says, "It is not aspiration but ambition that is the mother of misery in man." We all have these vague longings and aspirations within us, which lead us into the prayer life. The next is,

Intercession. This has been described as entreaty in behalf of others. We remember these familiar words of the Prophets of God, "The service of others is perfected by prayer," ('Abdu'l-Bahá) "Let your light so shine before men that they, in seeing your good works will glorify your Father which art in Heaven." "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto me." (Christ) "Withhold not from my servant in whatsoever he may ask of thee, for his face is My face, and thou must reverence Me." (Bahá'u'lláh)

Gratitude. Gratitude is also we know the cause of lifting the heart upward. It is the sense of appreciation for favours or bounties received. Gratefulness wells up in the heart and finds expression in prayer, as for example the words of David, "Oh give thanks unto the Lord for He is good, for His mercies endureth forever." Also the words of Bahá'u'lláh, "Praise be to Thee O God of Names and Creator of Heaven, Praise be to Thee for that by reason of which Thou hast made known to Thy servants, Thy Day, wherein the River of Life hath flowed from the Finger of Thy Generosity, and the Spring of Revelation and Unity hath become manifest through Thy Manifestation to whomsoever is in the earth and heaven. Praise be to Thee, O Desire of the world! Praise be to Thee O Beloved of the hearts of the yearning!"

Meditation. Meditation and prayer are not exactly synonymous. We are told that meditation is the continued thought about those things beyond the physical world. Both meditation and contemplation are necessary as one develops in the practice of the Presence of God. Meditation begins with continued reason, we are told, merging into a state of calm reflection and devotional pondering on statements of thoughts, ideas and principles about

God. This seems to be a high intellectual process, while contemplation might be described as beginning with continued attention, merging into a state of beholding, a looking to God, resulting in spiritual perception. This seems to be a combination of the highest intellectual and emotional processes. Mara Williams in his book Hinduism says, "A true Buddhist never prays, he only meditates on the perfections of Buddha, and the hope of attaining Nirvana."

Oblation. May be described as the act of offering something as a sacrifice in worship. As man's ideas of God have changed, the form of oblation has changed from the offering of burnt offerings of many kinds of animal and human flesh, to the offering of fruits and [XXI:2:49] grains with prayers. Later, sweet smelling incense was used until the more advanced souls have learned to sacrifice the self consciousness to the God Consciousness, and to give the self in hallowed consecration and joyous dedication. As in the words of Bahá'u'lláh. "Draw me unto Thee O My Divine Centre, by the secret springs of my existence, and all my powers and senses shall follow Thy potent magnetism."

Adoration. Adoration has quite a different heart motive. It is the act of rendering divine homage, of rendering veneration and reverence to the Divine Being. It is a joyful, spontaneous uplift of deep feelings of love, admiration, awe and devotion. We the servants of God have much to learn of the way to turn our hearts to God in adoration and to learn the real meaning of the words of Bahá'u'lláh as expressed in the daily prayer, "O God Thou hast created us to know and to adore Thee."

Communion is the combination of several of the foregoing urges. It is the interchange or inter communion of spirit, or the spirit's conversation with God. There is the longing on the part of the soul to receive wisdom, guidance, light and the opening of the soul, not to receive the answer to this or that minor question, but to receive illumination, the Christos or the Logos. "As the heart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God." (Psalm 42:1) "My love is in thee. Seek, and thou wilt find Me near. I have placed within thee, a spirit from Me, that thou mightiest be My lover." "Love Me that I may love thee; if thou lovest Me not, My love can in no wise reach thee." (Bahá'u'lláh)

We can learn a valuable lesson from the little girl who, when she was asked why it took her so long to pray, said, "You see, I always like to wait to hear what God has to say back to me."

These nine urges to prayer supplication compunction, aspiration, intercession, gratitude, meditation, adoration, oblation and communion are all necessary for the practice of the Presence of God. Some religious groups emphasize and practice one or two to the exclusion of the others. Each urge is important and all are essential, though all need not be used at the same time. Anyone without all the other steps is incomplete. The expression of each urge indicates the progress the soul is making on the path of God.

Prayer, may be expressed in four ways, the Thought Prayer, with more or less definite thoughts and ideas; the Heart Prayer, which is a vague, high, emotional aspiration. The Will Prayer, which is expressed in various forms of affirmation. And last the Uttered Prayer which is the expressed thought, idea and aspiration of the one praying. These are best expressed in the words revealed by the great Prophets of God. There is great power in the spoken word, and there is great wisdom in using the words revealed by the great World Teachers, all of whom have revealed prayers for the upliftment of the [XXI:2:50] people. The Bahá'í Revelation contains the most abundant and richest material for prayer life.

While in Haifa, the beloved Guardian of the Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, Shoghi Effendi, gave to the writer, the most concise, complete and effective formula she has ever seen, for the Dynamics of Prayer. After saying to stress the need of more prayer and meditation among the friends, he said to use these five steps if we had a problem of any kind for which we desired a solution, or wished help. (First step) Pray and mediate about it. Use the prayers of the Manifestations as they have the greatest power. Then remain in the silence of contemplation for a few moments.

(Second step) Arrive to a decision and hold this. This decision is usually born during the contemplation. It may seem almost impossible of accomplishment, but if it seems to be an answer to prayer or a way of solving the problem, then immediately take the next step.

(Third step) Have determination to carry the decision through. Many fail here. The decision, budding in to determination is blighted and instead becomes a wish or a vague longing. When determination is born, immediately take the next step.

(Fourth step) Have faith and confidence, that the power will flow through you, the right way will appear, the door will open, the right thought, the right message, the right principle or the right book will be given you. Have confidence, and the right thing will come to your need. Then as you rise from prayer take at once the fifth step.

(Fifth step) Then he said, lastly, Act! Act as though it had all been answered. Then act with tireless, ceaseless energy. And, as you act, you, yourself will become a magnet which will attract more power to your being, until you become an unobstructed channel for the Divine Power to flow through you. Many pray, but do not remain for the last half of the first step. Some who meditate arrive at a decision, but fail to hold it. Few have the determination to carry the decision through, and still fewer have the confidence that the right thing will come to their need. But how many remember to act as though it had all been answered? How true are those words "Greater than the prayer is the spirit in which it is uttered", and greater than the way it is uttered is the spirit in which it is carried out.

Now out of a few simple words by our wise Guardian, a great light has shone. Out of this light has grown an effective method of practicing prayer, out of which has grown a long trail of prayers answered and problems solved, and out of this method of practicing prayer has grown a new life in the most ancient of human acts of worship.

Many have asked to whom shall we pray? All the Manifestations have taught the same answer, to God through that great Cosmic Focal Point that stands between the finite and Infinite absolute station of Unknowableness. That is the way taught by all the Messengers of God. The Manifes- [XXI:2:51] tation is the Way of Prayer.

In conclusion may we add these thoughts. He who is in need will pray. He who hesitates to supplicate God is standing in the station of pride, or has not awakened to his own need, or has not realized the great value of prayer. He is therefore deprived. Therefore let all our business be to know God. The more we know of Him the more we shall desire to know Him, and as knowledge is the measure of love, the deeper and more extensive our knowledge is, the deeper our love is. "The root of all knowledge is the knowledge of God."

The Presence of God is realized within, but is evoked by something from without. When these two streams meet on the fifth step enunciated by Shoghi Effendi, the exterior life becomes an act of worship, and we have learned—the Dynamics of Prayer or the Practice of the Presence of God.

The only pictures of the Báb

Martha L. Root

Those who have seen the beautiful painting of His Holiness the Báb in Haifa and gazed upon that pure Face will be interested to hear from whence came this painting. On the evening of 26 January 1930, just before I was to arise and speak to one hundred and fifty friends in a great drawing room in Tīhrán, I suddenly caught sight of a large photograph which looked like the Báb. I asked my interpreter, Mr Valíyu'lláh Varqá and he said: "No, that is not an authentic photograph of His Holiness the Báb, it may have been drawn from memory of the one in Haifa. But on the way home after the lecture I can tell you about the only paintings there are of His Holiness the Báb."

So coming back to the hotel he told me this thrilling story: "You asked about the painting of the Báb: I begin at the beginning. When the Báb was captured by the Persian Government, he was at last taken to Urúmíyyih near Tabriz. There when He wanted to go to bathe, the Governor of the city sent Him a most spirited horse which no one could manage. He thought that the Báb would try to ride it and be thrown and killed. However, in the presence of the Báb the horse became very quiet and even bent for the Báb to mount it. The people, all non-Bahá'ís, who saw the Báb go and come on this horse shouted that it was a miracle, and He was a holy man. They ran to the bath and collected the water in bottles, considering it blessed water. One of those who saw the people come in crowds and came, too, to observe, was the painter to Muzaffari'd-Dín Sháh (though at that time he was still the Crown Prince). This painter was engaged only to do his work. "This painter, some years later, became a Bahá'í under my father's teaching (my father was 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá). Then the painter told my father about going with the crowd to see the Báb in Urúmíyyih before the time of martyrdom. This painter told father that at that time he conceived the idea of painting the Báb without the latter's knowledge. He prepared paper and pencils for a sketch and went into His holy presence. People were listening to the Báb Who was seated on a rug on the ground. One corner of the 'abá was thrown back. As soon as the artist entered, the Báb drew the 'abá into place, folded His hands one upon the other and looked at the painter as much as to say that He was ready! The painter studied the Báb's Face and then went out and drew. He returned again and again and each time the Báb took His original position, thus the sketch was made.

"The painter showed this sketch to my father, and father asked him to make a coloured painting from this sketch in order that it might be sent as a gift to Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká. This was done, and when Bahá'u'lláh received this painting, He was very happy and said, "This is the Báb!" In those days photography was not known and that sketch had been the only one made of the Báb during His life- [XXI:2:55] time. Bahá'u'lláh called one of the uncles of the Báb, showed him the painting and asked, "Do you know this face?" Instantly the uncle replied, "Yes, it is the Báb!"

"Bahá'u'lláh at once sent one of His 'abás¹ to my father asking him to give it to the painter. My father, at the time he had sent the painting, had asked permission from Bahá'u'lláh to have nine paintings made and sent to nine important cities in Persia to be kept by believers in special places. In answer Bahá'u'lláh had given permission for the painter to make only one more and that was to be given to my father. No more were to be made. This painting of the Báb which my father had been confiscated by the Government with other papers, but when I was in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá He promised me that sometime this will be given back to our family. Siyyid Asadu'lláh found the sketch made by this painter in the home of a Bahá'í family in Persia and he sent it to 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'Akká. Thus the painting of His Holiness the Báb and the one sketch are now preserved in Haifa, the other painting is lost for the present, and aside from these there is no other authentic painting or photograph of the Báb."

Such is the interesting story told to me by Mr Valíyu'lláh Varqá. American friends will remember him for he came to the United States with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1912.

The first feminist martyr [Qurratu'l-'Ayn]

Mírzá Núri'd-Dín-i-Zayn (Zeine) Mr Zayn, the author of this valuable article, is a graduate of the American University of Beirut and is now a teacher of sociology in that splendid institution. He has a remarkable background. His grandfather, Jináb-i-Zayn, left Persia and followed Bahá'u'lláh first to Baghdád and later to 'Akká where he spent the rest of his life as one of His amanuenses, so the family first lived in 'Akká and later in Haifa. We are fortunate to have for the Bahá'í Magazine the accurate material which Mr Zayn has sent us a picturesque and dramatic account of the tragic story of Qurratu'l-'Ayn, the far famed Persian feminist and poetess, the first woman martyr for the freedom of women.

"You can kill me as soon as you like, but you cannot stop the emancipation of women" so said the Persian feminist and poetess Qurratu'l-'Ayn, when she was imprisoned in 1850.

Born from a noble family, her keen and sagacious intelligence and her fervid eloquence very soon filled all those who came in contact with her, with awe and admiration. Awe, because in her controversies with the most learned men, she was ever triumphant. Admiration, because in a time when most of her country women could not read or write, she displayed such marvellous powers of learning and speech.

Her beauty matched her elocution. But it was a grand, a commanding, a majestic beauty. On one occasion, it is so related, when she was delivered up to the government authorities, she was brought before the Sháh, who, on seeing her, said: "I like her looks; leave her and let her be". On another occasion, the festivities and rejoicing of a wedding were going on in the house of one of the Persian nobles. When Qurratu'l-'Ayn came in the ladies of the court and other distinguished guests who were present were so much attracted by the charm of her looks and so greatly impressed by the beauty of her speech that, "forgetting the festivities, they gathered round her, diverted, by listening to her words, from listening to the melodies, and rendered indifferent, by witnessing her marvels, to the contemplation of the pleasant and novel sights which are incident to a wedding".

It means very little to say that Qurratu'l-'Ayn was in advance of her age, unless one says also what that age was. Persia, nay the East in general, was in a deplorable state. Ignorance and superstitions prevailed; intolerance and bigotry waxed high. Education was neglected. The rights of women were slighted. Such were some of the conditions during that age. Filled with a passionate desire to change all that situation she raised her voice against it, discussed and debated with doctors and sages, and addressed the meetings of the most eminent men. At the beginning she used to carry on her discussions and talks from behind a curtain, but later she threw aside her veil, thus adding the power of her looks to the potency of her words. To lay aside the veil and speak in public, at a time when "women were secluded in harems and had to be closely veiled if they appeared [XXI:8:231] in public places" when it was considered impolite for them to speak to men, needed a heroic courage. The very ideas she propounded endangered her life. Yet her courage never failed her and her heart never recoiled from the oppressions and persecutions that she received at the hand of her enemies. By day and night, and accompanied by a few women who had become inspired by her noble ideas, she travelled in Persia from city to city, pleading with men and women everywhere to abandon their prejudices and superstitions and love truth; to put aside hatreds and jealousies and live in harmony and good will with each other. She championed the cause of education of both sexes and fought for the freedom and rights of her kind. Her fame now spread far and wide so that "most people who were scholars or mystics sought to hear her speech and were eager to become acquainted with her powers of speculation and deduction."

Finally, the clergy were alarmed: her vehement and tumultuous ideas confounded them, and her courage and steadfastness in spreading those ideas filled them with apprehension. The people were aroused to molest her, and eventually, she was delivered up to the government authorities. It was then that she pronounced those heroic words with which this account begins. She was imprisoned for two years. Then in August 1852, a disastrous attempt was made on the Sháh's life. Many people were arrested, horribly tortured and condemned to death. And she was one of the innocent victims of that fatal day.

Qurratu'l-'Ayn met a very painful and lingering death. The story of her execution is a very tragic one. She was delivered over to one of the military authorities—a Sardár—who was made responsible for her execution. In Tīhrán “she was placed in the house of the Kalántar, a town official who was made responsible for her custody”.

“Three days” (the Kalántar’s wife related) “our beloved guest stayed in her room chanting prayers—eating little and seldom. On the morning of the third day she said to me: ‘Tonight, they will come for me’. She gave to me a bottle of attar of roses, a ring, and a handkerchief—her only possessions—all she had left of her former riches.”¹

Another account has it that Qurratu'l-'Ayn had put on a snow white robe of pure silk before her execution. When asked by her guardian, early in the evening, why she had changed her dress, “I will be going on a long journey tonight,” she had answered. And so by dint of feminine intuition, she had known the time of her death. As the leaden footed hours of the night were passing one by one and the silence of nature grew deeper, the beginning of that journey was drawing nigh. “Chanting prayers, she waited, waited, prepared and ready for what she knew would come!”¹

And that evening they came.

It was the fifteenth of September 1852. The lights of the city of Tīhrán were going out one by one. People were sleeping. The richly coloured domes and minarets of the [XXI:8:232] capital shone pale in the light of the moon. A sad moonlight was shining through the window of the room where the beautiful Qurratu'l-'Ayn was confined. It was a room in the garden of the Sardár near the gates of the city, to which she had been brought that same evening. The stars were so pale! And the night was so still, so silent, as if the whole creation was watching breathlessly in dreadful expectation of a bitter and heartrending tragedy.

At about midnight, for the first time, the tranquil silence was broken by the sounds of some footsteps. Presently a key turned in the lock, the door opened slowly, and a handsome young Turk entered the room of Qurratu'l-'Ayn. He held a silken handkerchief in his hand. She, sitting on the floor in the middle of the room, was praying. As he moved towards her, she suddenly raised her head, threw at him one of her piercing glances and said in a clear and dignified voice: “Young man, it becomes you not to be my executioner, and to perform such a crime.” Horror stricken by those words, the young Turk refused to touch her, turned back, and ran out of the door “like a madman”. It is said that he dashed into the room where his master, the Sardár, was awaiting him, flung at his feet the fatal handkerchief and the money he had received as a bribe, and said: “I am ready to kill myself and not shoulder the responsibility of this woman’s death.”

A few moments later, another person entered the room of the prisoner. He was a heavy set, coarse, ugly looking man. And he was drunk. He held the same handkerchief in his hand. Qurratu'l-'Ayn had finished her prayers, but she was still sitting on the floor. As his looks fell upon her, his wolfish eyes flashed with ferocity born half of intoxication and half of his own beast like nature. Without a moment’s hesitation, he threw himself upon the unfortunate young woman and accomplished his dark deed—he strangled her with the handkerchief.

There were still signs of life in her when he drew her out of the room. Here he met others who were sent to help him in the accomplishment of the Sardár's fiendish scheme. They dragged her to the rim of a dry well and threw her into it. Immediately the well was filled up with large and heavy stones. It was midnight.

The moon had now sunk behind the snow clad Elburz mountains. The shadows of the domes and the minarets grew deeper and blacker. Darkness enveloped the city of Tīhrán. There was not any light save the pale glimmering of the lonely stars. As the men were returning from the well, something fluttered on a rosebush nearby. Apparently a nightingale disturbed in her sleep. At the same time a loud shrill sound of a cock pierced the appalling silence of the night. Also a wind was growing, "a wind that laid a cold finger upon flesh and spirit." And the leaves that laid without a sound on the trees began to whisper again. It seemed that the creation was beginning to breathe once more; but there was something in that breath that resembled a deep sigh, like the sigh that is drawn by the audience when the curtain falls on the last act of a [XXI:8:233] mournful tragedy. And we can, with a profound certainty, say that the silent stars, that night, looked down upon one of the most ferocious and cruel acts of man.

Thus ended the life of one who "like a lily of the desert growing amongst ruins, gave flowers and perfumes to surrounding moral devastation". Why? Because she believed, she believed in the great new Message of the Báb; and because she, fearlessly, unwaveringly, enthusiastically, delivered that Message to the people of her country. "The Báb said of her: 'Lo! she answered My call, even before I had called her.'" She believed that that Call was the Truth.

The story of her conversion is in itself a testimony to her keen spiritual sense and deep receptiveness to truth. "One never-to-be-forgotten day," writes Lady Blomfield,¹ she (Qurratu'l-'Ayn) was turning some books and papers in the library of a more enlightened cousin, when she found a little leaflet, the first words attracted her attention, she read on and on, she became more and more interested then thrilled and excited!

"Who wrote this?' She cried to her cousin who came in.

"What have you there? What has happened? Why are you so agitated?"

"But you must tell me who wrote this.' She showed the leaflet to him. Then it was his turn to be agitated.

"You have found that, where? Oh, I cannot tell you about it, you should never have seen it! It is a very secret matter! It should have been securely and carefully concealed.

"Now that I have seen it,' and her voice shook with excitement, 'you must tell me about it, my cousin.'

"He still hesitated, but at last, yielding to her enthusiasm, he said: 'It is written by Shaykh Siyyid Kázim—keep it a secret, closely guarded—the risk of a terrible danger would attend its discovery!'

"So this wonderful pamphlet is by Shaykh Kázim-i-Rashtí and Shaykh Aḥmad-i-Aḥsá'í? And this is what they teach their disciples? But it is the Truth, every shining word of it ..."

And once the fire of that Truth kindled her soul, her faith became dynamic. From the moment when she believed the Truth until the hour of her martyrdom, she followed the demand of the venerated Shaykh teacher, Shaykh Kázim-i-Rashtí: ... "then let all the world know". No wonder then if E. G. Browne wrote "Had the Bábí (Bahá'í) religion no other claim to greatness, this were sufficient that it produced a heroine like Qurratu'l-'Ayn".

More than seventy years ago, Qurratu'l-'Ayn, throwing back her veil, told her countrymen: "Why do you sleep? Awake from your beds of negligence. The sun hath arisen from the day spring of pre-existence. Why do you drown yourselves in the sea of materialism? Behold the resplendent light! Listen to the songs of the New Age. A new life is breathed into all existing things. The zephyrs of the divine favour are wafting upon you." [XXI:8:234]

Does not the world need that message today when the moral life of the people everywhere is becoming loose, when ancient customs and cherished beliefs are disintegrating, when the economic forces are threatening disaster, when the threads of political relations are sorely strained and tangled?

Let the politicians in their offices of State, and the leaders of religion in their houses of worship and the teachers of youth in their educational institutions—who are all in a great measure responsible for the establishment of Peace and Order in the world—let them turn their gaze to the Revelation of Bahá'u'lláh and see for themselves if it is not therein that lies "a supreme instrument for the establishment of the Most Great Peace, and the one agency for the unification of the world, and the proclamation of the reign of righteousness and justice upon the earth."¹

Zamenhof: the man

This article, reprinted from "International Language", gives an excellent picture of the man who created Esperanto. The author calls him a genius. It would seem clear, however, that his success was due not only to genius, but to divine guidance, which flowed to him because of his utter sincerity, devotion and self-sacrifice in the spread of the great ideal of an international auxiliary language.

Zamenhof was an indefatigable worker. All his life, except during the days of his last illness, he had to struggle to keep his family, and for an oculist amongst poor people, the struggle was a bitter one. From Esperanto he made no profit, except royalties on the sale of his works, which certainly did not make good the losses caused by the inevitable neglect of his practice. Lack of money made difficult even travelling to the international congresses; the childlike excitement discernible in his letters on his journey to the Sixth Universal Congress in Washington shows how great was the event in his life, and how great were the efforts which it cost. In spite of money worries, ill health, bitter opposition and mockery, he fought on and worked unceasingly, and in none of his work is there any sign of discouragement (except, perhaps, in the poems Ho'mia kor' and Mia penso) or bitterness.

One looks for the motive which enabled him to persist and conquer. As we have seen, it was not love of money. Nor was it ambition or love of power, for when, in 1889, it was proposed that the American Philosophical Society should call an international conference of scientists to elect an auxiliary language, he offered to hand the matter over to them entirely and "to retire from the scene"; and, as we know, at a later date (as soon as it was practicable) he gave up all rights in his invention and all official positions. He wished for none of these. His aim was to give humanity peace and ease from the suffering caused by dissension and war, and he saw that a neutral means of communication would be one of the most important factors in achieving that aim. He was an idealist through and through, and he strove for his ideals [XXII:2:46] with a passionate tenacity which sprang from the simplicity of his character. That simplicity gave him the strength to inspire his followers with his own ideals; to that fact it is due that Esperanto survived the early years. At times he showed even a touch of naivety, as, for instance, when he proposed to collect the names and addresses of ten million people who would promise to learn Esperanto, before asking anyone to begin to study.

But he was shrewd, too. He expected no miracles, and foresaw opposition from the first. In his first textbook he answered in advance almost all the objections which can be raised against an “artificial” language. He realized that to make headway, the new language must be stable, and that to be stable, its basis must remain unchanged until the language is universally accepted. Hence, the principle of the inviolability of the fundamental grammar of Esperanto, which has caused so much controversy. It is safe to say that Esperanto would have gone the way of a hundred ephemeral projects, dying stillborn, if it had not been protected by this “dogma”. When the famous Delegation was convened in 1907 for the purpose of choosing an international language, he pointed out from the first that it lacked the necessary authority, and that its choice, whatever it might be, would be ineffective; and the Delegation was indeed a fiasco.

He had a vein of wise disillusionment, as is shown by the following paragraph which appeared in La Esperantisto in 1891:

We must not forget that the world has always remained absolutely deaf even to the wisest of moral sermons, but remember that it flies to that which appears to have achieved success. For ourselves we may realize that our task is still very difficult and perhaps for a long time to come will demand an iron patience; but to the public we must always show a cheerful face. We must not lie, as the Volapukists did, inventing great and important facts, taken from the air; but also we must not forget that mankind, for whose good we are working, is a sick, obstinate child, who will take no medicine unless we take pains to sweeten it.

We have no record of unkindness or injustice of any kind, but the following letter shows that he could be tart, when occasion justified it:

Your letter is signed: “One of the warmest friends of the language Esperanto!” I do in fact remember that from time to time you send me letters asking after the progress of the affair; but you have never written to say what you yourself are doing for our cause. The “warm friend of our affair” is not he who is always asking questions, but he who works for it and spreads it. Instead of asking me every month what has been done, you should ask yourself, “What have I done for our affair during the past month?”

I quote these texts to show that Zamenhof’s character had its due proportions of salt. We may guess that many letters like the above were required.

With all his simplicity, perhaps because of his simplicity, he showed in his leadership of the Esperanto movement a sagacity and statesmanship which amounted to genius. I need not dilate on the innumerable [XXII:2:47] pitfalls besetting the inventor of an instrument used by all sorts of men, in all parts of the world. It is sufficient to refer the student to the speeches and articles in this book, in which he points out that Esperanto must have a democratic government; that the language must evolve slowly and naturally in use, and not by sudden changes; that it must be tied to no religion or political theory (not even to Zamenhof’s own dearest cause, pacificism and internationalism allied with the noblest sort of patriotism). His sane guidance was the determining factor in the constant and orderly progress of the movement, and his good influence is still felt today.

I have used the word genius. This is the only word which is adequate when we are considering his creative work on Esperanto. When he compiled the language, research work on the elements necessary in an artificial language was hardly begun; he must be considered as the pioneer and greatest master of the subject. Familiarity with the result of his labours does not breed contempt; on the contrary, it is the common experience of those who have studied Esperanto deeply, that their admiration and wonder grow with increasing knowledge.

That is the proof that he worked well; and those who have followed in his steps have never equalled him. The superiority of Esperanto results partly from that ten years' constant testing which it had before appearing in public; but it results too from the fact that its author was a genius.

"Genius" here includes the term "artist". It is curious that nowhere in his articles and letters do we find any mention of selection of words, or arrangement of grammar, from the artistic point of view; he never touches on aesthetics. It is possible that he never presented this side of the question even to himself. But the beauty of sound and association in Esperanto could have been imported only by one very sensitive to beauty; he was undoubtedly a great, unconscious artist—the language itself is proof of this.

Above all we receive an impression of a modest, lovable man; one who was sincere in all things, an enthusiast who never thrust his views on others; a determined worker who never wavered from his aim. His personality calls forth a deep respect, and even from those who never knew him in the flesh, an affection which explains the enthusiasm and sacrifices of those who had the privilege of working with him.

Bahá'í pioneers

Part I

Siyid Mustafa Roumie¹

A short historical survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

The author, one of the leading Bahá'ís of Mandalay, was in his youth an ardent associate and companion of the great Mírzá Jamál Afandí who first brought the Bahá'í Message to the countries of southern Asia. These chronicles are both fascinating themselves in the spiritual adventure they narrate, and also invaluable as a history written by one who was an eye witness.

When through the mighty Will of God, His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, came out of the terrible prison walls in the fortress of 'Akká (where He had been exiled and incarcerated for a number of years by the Turkish government at the instigation of the fanatical Muslim clergy of Persia) and finally settled at Bahjí, at a distance of about a couple of miles from the Great Prison, His numerous devoted followers and many ardent admirers of His teaching and high ideals poured forth from all corners of the world, especially from Persia, to lay their allegiance at His feet and to receive His command to serve the great Cause of the "upliftment of humanity" for which He and His noble adherents had undergone severe sufferings and privations and suffered diverse humiliations, chastisements and persecutions of which there is hardly a parallel in the history of the world.

Among these followers was a venerable figure of rather an advanced age, a great scholar of Arabic, Turkish and Persian, the selfless striking character of whose personality and whose singular courteous manners most eloquently testified to his noble birth and high rank. Sulaymán Khán was his original and official name, and Tunukábání in Mázindarán Persia) was his birthplace. He subsequently came to be known in the Bahá'í world as Jamál Afandí or Jamálu'd-Dín Sháh. As an orthodox believer in the Báb since the early period of His Declaration, he was well aware of the prophecies regarding the Manifestation of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh. Therefore he with peaceful heart pledged his faith in Him. Leaving his dear home in Persia he renounced all his worldly possessions, very cheerfully gave up his official rank and position and presented himself to His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh, offering most humbly and meekly to sacrifice himself at the Holy Threshold of his Lord so that he might attain His supreme pleasure which to him was more precious than all the treasures of the universe put together. Such was the condition of the early sincere devoted believers.

His Holiness revealed a Tablet conferring upon him the distinguished title of “Lámi” (i.e. the brilliant one). The opening words of that holy Tablet which was written by the Supreme Pen were as follows: “O thou the brilliant one! We have conferred upon thee the title of ‘the brilliant one’ so that thou mayest shine forth in the universe in the name of thy Lord the Possessor of the Day of Distinction.” He then received a command to proceed to India with his kins- [XXII:3:77] man, Mírzá Ḥusayn, who was directed to accompany him. These two noble and heroic souls, without the slightest wavering, at once set out from the Holy Land with unflinching determination to serve the Divine Cause, and took the first boat available from Port Said to India.

They landed in Bombay about the year 1872–73. On their arrival here they met Jináb Ḥájí Siyyid Mírzá Afnán and the great sage Jináb Ḥájí Muḥammad Ibráhím, “the muballighín”¹—both of Yazd (Persia). Since they were quite strangers to the country and were not acquainted with the language, customs and manners of the people of India, they decided for the time being to act under the advice and guidance of these two gentlemen of Yazd, who were well known as general merchants and commission agents, and had their business of long standing in Fort Bombay under the celebrated name of Messrs. Majid Sayed Mirza and Mirza Mahmood Company. So Jamál Afandí’s first place of residence in India was “The Hussainieh”.² This was a building dedicated to the celebration of the mourning ceremony of Imám Ḥusayn by its founder a zealous Shí’ih philanthropist from Lucknow, India, called Babri Ali.

During his short stay in Bombay Jamál Afandí did not remain inactive. Despite the language difficulty he managed to deliver the Great Message to many distinguished Persian residents, such as the late Áqá Khán (the then head of the Khoja Ismailieh Community and grandfather of the present well known leader of that Community), and the Persian High Priest of the Shi’ih Isna Asharieh Mosque, Mír Siyyid Muḥammad. The latter accepted the Message and proved to be one of the most confirmed and devout believers. Within a short period Jamál Afandí became a marked figure in the public eye, and the nature of his activities became widely known, which necessitated his friends advising him in the interests of the Cause and their own protection to leave Bombay and go to the interior provinces of India. Accordingly he left Bombay and travelled through many important towns proclaiming the glad-tidings everywhere and resurrecting souls from the dark graves of error and prejudice whenever such opportunity presented itself. Finally he reached Rampur Rohilkhand, which was then under a native chief by the name of Nawab Kalbi Ali Khan, an orthodox Sunní Muslim. Jamál Afandí was the guest of the chief’s uncle Colonel Nawab Asghar Ali Khan. During the stay there the chief one day arranged for a meeting at his palace of the Muslim clergy of his State for a discussion with him about the Bahá’í doctrine of the “non-existence of evil”. Jamál Afandí in the course of his address told the audience that the Bahá’ís do not believe that there exists any positive evil in the creation. According to Bahá’í philosophy all is good. The Creator of all things is but one God. He is good, and therefore His creation is purely good. Evil never exists in His creation. It is a non-existent thing.

At the end of his discourse the High Priest of the State, who was noted for his learning, pointed to the fire on the hubble-bubble which the chief was smoking and question- [XXII:3:78] ed Jamál Afandí. “Is this not a positive evil? It may burn the palace and reduce to ashes all present here in no time.”

Jamál Afandí answered the question with great eloquence. He asked the audience to imagine what would be the consequence if fire were to cease to exist upon earth for a moment. In its absence the very existence of human life would be impossible, as it is a principle element in the creation system believed by the cosmologists, and generally in cold countries people would be simply frozen to death without fire. We ought to be thankful to the Creator for creating such a useful thing for the preservation of our life. How can one justly call it a positive evil! The improper and wrong use of it, as of all things in the world, is undoubtedly an evil.

² Ḥusayniya, Pers. ḥusayniyyih, a congregation hall for Shí’a Muslims.

It is the same with all the natural qualities of man. If they be used and displayed in an unlawful way they become offenders and blameworthy. The gist of the Divine Laws in all religions is to use each and everything in its proper place as ordained by its Author. Then each thing is termed as good and lawful. Only when used in a wrong place is it called unlawful, evil, or sin. The chief object of the Prophets of God was to teach this doctrine to mankind according to their condition and the necessity of that time. Thus have arisen the "Commandments" and "Prohibitions".

He also illustrated the same principle from a pen knife which was shown to him by the Chief. Referring to it he said, "How useful an article is this. But its misuse (for example, if it is used for the purpose of stabbing) is an evil. The creation of metal is not an evil in itself. It is one of the necessities of our life. But when men turn it into a deadly weapon it becomes an evil."

The Chief and the whole Assembly of the learned men accepted his scholarly exposition of the doctrine with great applause; and many became interested in the teachings of the New Philosophy of the New Age.

II

About this time in 1876, there was held an historic gathering in Delhi, the ancient capital of the Mogul Empire in India, on the occasion of the assumption of the title of the "Empress of India" by her Majesty Queen Victoria. Almost all the Rulers of the various Native States with their entourage, high officials of the British Government and many notable persons, Indians as well as non-Indians, came to the gathering. Jamál Afandí was not slow in taking advantage of a unique opportunity. There he came in contact with almost all the celebrities of India and quietly unfolded to them the Great Mystery of the age. He met here Swami Dayanand Saraswati, the founder of the Arya Samaj, and found in him a true and sympathetic friend of the Cause. Finally he proceeded to Deccan Hyderabad—the Nizam's dominion. The Nizam being very young at that time Jamál Afandí was introduced to the Prime Minister, Sir Salar Jang Mukhtarul Mulk, who was a staunch Shí'ih. Through the magnetic personality and eloquence of Jamál Afandí this statesman soon became deeply interested in the Bahá'í Movement and eventually a [XXII:3:79] Tablet from the Supreme Pen was revealed in his favour. (According to the laws of the Kingdom, high officials could not confess openly any religion except their ancestral faith declared on oath, even though they were ruling monarchs.)

His next move was towards Madras, in southern India. While in Hyderabad and Madras he conceived the idea of visiting Burma and unfurling the banner of Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá on the shore of the Irrawaddy, as he received information that King Mindon of Burma was a monarch of exceptionally generous disposition and absolutely unprejudiced mind, and though himself a Buddhist was tolerant to all forms of worship. In those days the steamships running between India and Burma were very few in number, so he had to wait for some time before he could catch a boat to take him to Rangoon. While he was thus waiting, a message from the Chief of Rampur State was received, soliciting his immediate presence there, because the brother of the Chief—Nawáb Muḥammad 'Alí Khán—had displayed a tendency towards atheism and it was the conviction of the Chief that Jamál Afandí was the only person qualified to demonstrate to his brother the absurdity of his belief and bring him round to the true faith of Islám. Jamál Afandí readily accepted the invitation. But before proceeding to Rampur he sent Mírzá Ḥusayn with a servant to Rangoon by a cargo boat, and he also sent along with them all his luggage.

It was in Madras that Siyyid Muṣṭafá the writer of this account, met Jamál Afandí the first time. I was then quite a young man and was just preparing to return to my native country, Karbilá and Baghdád, after having settled my dues in consequence of a heavy loss sustained in the rice business. Jamál Afandí's eloquent address, his silver voice and his flowery language frequently attracted large gatherings around him. This humble servant was one of his ardent admirers. I soon became so devotedly attached to him that I actually approached my father, Siyyid Muḥammad, celebrated as Rúmí, for permission to accompany Jamál Afandí to Rampur. My father, who was a very learned Muslim divine and held in great esteem and reverence by the Muslim public, did not approve of the proposal; and although he did not exactly know that the theme of Jamál Afandí's talk was the Bahá'í Revelation, yet he not only refused permission but even prohibited me from entering his house. I was determined, however, to accompany Jamál Afandí to Rampur and succeeded in doing so.

Bahá'í pioneers

Part II

Siyyid Mustafa Roumie

A short historical survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

In the first instalment of this spiritual autobiography, Mr Roumie told us of the work of the great teacher, Jamál Afandí, Persian apostle of the Bahá'í Cause who had proceeded to India by the command of Bahá'u'lláh. How he spread the Bahá'í teachings there; the author's own meeting when a youth with this great teacher and his keen desire to accompany him on his missionary tour of India. The second instalment follows.

At the time I succeeded in carrying out my desire to accompany Jamál Afandí on his missionary tour through India, he had with him two other Bahá'ís as his constant companions: they were Rafiuddin Khan of Hassanpur, and Haji Ramadhan of Rampur. After leaving Madras, our journey was broken for a couple of days at Gulburga where friends and officials from Hyderabad came to meet him. After a short trip to Bombay we set out for Rampur. On our way to the Kanpur Railway Station Jamál Afandí met the very brother of the Ruler of Rampur State for whose sake he had undertaken this long journey. What happened was that the Rampur Chief, with the object of forming a closer acquaintance between Jamál Afandí and his brother, sent the latter to Kanpur to meet him and travel with him up to Rampur State.

Jamál Afandí on this occasion stayed about a month and a half at Rampur, in the mansion of the Chief's brother, and availed himself of this opportunity to hold several public and private discourses on the ideals and ethical teachings of the Bahá'í religion. Within a few days the Chief's brother and those who were prompting him were silenced, their atheistic doctrines were thrown into the shade, and all their casuistry proved to have no real foundation. In this way Jamál Afandí incurred the displeasure of one Náẓir Aḥmad Ḥasan of Aligarh, a most zealous supporter of atheism, who wielded considerable influence over the Chief's brother and who, by some treacherous means, had cheated him out of more than thirty thousand rupees which resulted in much heated conversation and correspondence between the two. The Chief's brother was indignant at the conduct of this old atheist friend and had imprisoned him. From his prison he wrote to Jamál Afandí asking him to intercede for his release. Jamál Afandí did so and he was duly released, eventually having to leave the State. He swore vengeance against Jamál Afandí, although from him he had received nothing but kindness.

Jamál Afandí and I accompanied by a servant boy, left Rampur for Lucknow via Kashipur State and Moradabad. At Lucknow he met the Rajas of Amethi and Balarampur States, who accorded him a very cordial reception. Meanwhile the Raja of Kashipur also arrived and took him to meet and interview the Governor of United Provinces (India). [XXII:4:113] The Rajas gave us a letter of introduction to the Maharaja of Benares, the sacred city of the Hindus.

Jamál Afandí then proceeded to Benares and for a fortnight remained the guest of the Maharaja at his palace. During this short period he became acquainted with many leading citizens of Benares, Hindus as well as Muslims of all schools of thought. One of his acquaintances was Áqá Muḥammad Taqí Benarasi of Khurasan, at whose house he happened to meet Haji Ahmad Bindani, an influential and wealthy citizen of Rangoon; and several leading Persian Muslims of Calcutta.

At the very first interview the conversation gradually turned on the question of time regarding the appearance of Imám Mahdí, the Qá'im and the Rij'at-i-Ḥusayní according to Shí'ih creed. A learned Shí'ih theologian who happened to be present in the assembly at the time, declared that no time had been specifically mentioned in regard to that, either in the Qur'án or in the sacred traditions of the revered Imáms. Jamál Afandí then cited several passages from the Holy Qur'án and the traditions of Imám Ja'far-i-Şádiq which pointed to the year AH 1260 (corresponding to CE 1844)—as the time when one should look for the coming of the expected Mihdí who would be born like other human beings in accordance with the natural law of procreation. He refused the theory of the sudden and phenomenal appearance of a youth of one thousand years of age from the strange and unknown region of "Jábulqá" and "Jábulsó".

Jamál further maintained that the Imám on his appearance would introduce a New Cause, a New Dispensation, a New Revealed Book, and a New Divine Law for the guidance of mankind. He also quoted numerous passages from the sacred traditions to the effect that the Imám would be subjected to all kinds of persecutions humiliation and opposition, and eventually he and his followers would be martyred by men of his own race. It was an exceedingly interesting discussion which went on for a couple of days, at the conclusion of which the learned divine protested that although there was a good deal of force in Jamál Afandí's argument, were they justified in accepting it since there was no appearance of the Anti-Christ or Sufyání. Jamál Afandí then in his usual friendly manner said, "Let us jointly pray for the divine guidance and endeavour to grasp the true significance and right meaning of the Words of the Holy Book, which according to the saying of Imám Ja'far-i-Şádiq could be comprehended only by his chosen ones and faithful servants whose hearts are pure."

From Benares we proceeded to Calcutta, visiting Patna on the way. We arrived at Patna at dusk and went directly to an Inn where we spent the night. Early next morning, information was received that the police had surrounded the Inn the previous night and had been checking the arrival and departure of the guests. Shortly thereafter some high European officials came directly to Jamál Afandí and informed him that the Chief Commis- [XXII:4:114] sioner desired to see him, and that he should accompany them. So we went with the officials to Danapur where the seat of government was at that time. On arriving at Danapur, we were ordered to wait in a room under police surveillance and remained there for four hours without knowing the cause of this sudden arrest. I suggested however that Náşir Aḥmad Ḥasan, the atheist, who was offended with Jamál Afandí at Rampur, must have had something to do with this little surprise. My surmise proved to be quite correct for very soon a clerk came to Jamál Afandí with one of the letters which he had written to Náşir Aḥmad Ḥasan, and began to question him about it. Finding that the reason of the arrest was some misunderstanding about this letter in the mind of the officials, I asked for permission to produce the letter of Nasir Ahmad Hasan to which that one was a reply. Upon receiving permission I promptly produced the letter in question, a reference to which at once cleared all doubts. We were immediately set free and all our effects were returned to us. Thus the attempt of an atheist to do mischief to the Cause was frustrated.

As this incident took place during the month of Muḥarram (Muslim New Year) the majority of the best citizens, like Nawab Muhammad, Nawab Welayat Ali Khan, and other illustrious persons, sympathetically, gathered together around Jamál Afandí and invited him to their homes, where he had opportunity to deliver the Bahá'í Message freely in those large meetings.

After a week or two we left for Calcutta. On arriving there the party went to live in a house in Kolutollah which had been engaged for us by Nawab Safdar Ali Khan, the paternal uncle of the Rampur Chief. Here, too, within a very short time the magnetic personality of Jamál Afandí and his exceedingly affable manners attracted many leading citizens of Calcutta and its neighbourhood. He soon became a well-known figure in the community, particularly among men of a religious and philosophic turn of mind. Jamál Afandí however, was always eagerly seeking an opportunity to deliver the Great Message of universal love and peace, the message of the wonderful revelation of God's mystery, the message of the advent of the New Age.

At last the opportunity presented itself when he met Ḥájí Mírzá 'Abdu'l-Karím Shírází, a renowned Persian merchant of Calcutta, at whose residence leading Muslims used to meet every day to discuss current topics. This was the time of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877, and so the main subjects discussed were the events of the war as they appeared in the newspaper reports. In the course of these discussions, Jamál Afandí, as often as possible, directed the attention of his audience to various prophecies in the Holy Qur'án and the Tradition of the Prophet, regarding the signs of the appearance of the Promised Redeemer. [XXII:4:115] His marvellous eloquence and his unique method of presenting the subject made a great impression on his audience.

About this time Jináb Ḥájí Mírzá Muḥammad 'Alí Afnán and his assistant Áqá Mírzá 'Abdu'l-Hamid arrived from Hong Kong, China. They were enroute to Persia via Bombay. Jináb-i-Afnán was one of the maternal uncles of His Holiness the Báb. Both these gentlemen had business in China and came to see Ḥájí Mírzá 'Abdu'l-Karím in this connection, and were his guests. They were known to Jamál Afandí, and they recognized each other at the meeting in Ḥájí Mírzá 'Abdu'l-Karím's house. The unusual joy expressed by these friends on their sudden and unexpected meeting, the extraordinary warmth and affection manifested as they inquired about each other's welfare, astonished all who were present at the gathering. The people then began to suspect that Jamál Afandí was a member of the new sect.

On the following day the visitors came to see Jamál Afandí, and after a long conversation about the war and much discussion of various passages of the Holy Tablet of Bahá'u'lláh (Súry-i-Ra'ís the Tablet of the Chief) relating to prophecies concerning Turkey, Jamál Afandí requested me to chant the Tablet for his two honoured guests. As it was the first time that he had heard these supreme utterances—while I was chanting the Tablet he was conscious of a sudden flash of Heavenly Light and was quite overwhelmed with an inexpressible divine illumination. He could not at the time fully realize the cause of the strange emotion that completely overpowered him. After the chanting of the Holy Tablet was over, the revered guests and Jamál Afandí discussed between themselves the fulfilment of Bahá'u'lláh's prophecies, His teachings for the upliftment of mankind, His noble ideals raising the standard of morality, and the majesty of His mission, all of which I listened to attentively as if spellbound. At the termination of the discussion, I confessed the truth of Bahá'u'lláh's claim and decided to dedicate my life to the service of the Divine Cause. The three veterans at once embraced me, and kissed me most affectionately. Jamál Afandí then in his supplication to the Sacred Threshold submitted my name, and a Holy Tablet was revealed in my behalf, the English translation of which is as follows:

“O Mustafa (the chosen one or selected as the best one). The supplication of Jamál, who is soaring in the atmosphere of the love of his Lord, the Opulent and Exalted, was submitted in the Holy Presence, and thy name was mentioned therein. We testify to thy truthfulness and sincerity, that thou mayst read it and be among the thankful ones. Say, ‘O God of the universe, who appeared with the Greatest Name! I beseech Thee by the essence of the existence in the name of those who were not prevented by the hosts from turning towards Thy Face, and those whom the Kings could not prevent from beholding towards Thy Horizon, to write for me with Thy Supreme Pen that which behoveth Thy [XXII:4:116] Generosity. O possessor of the Names and the Creator of heaven! O my Lord! I hereby testify that which Thou hast already testified before the creation of heaven and earth, and I acknowledge that which Thy tongue has already declared before the manifestation of the Kingdoms of Thy Command and Creation. Verily Thou art He, there is no God but Thee. I supplicate Thee that thou mayst draw me in every condition near to Thy Horizon, and destine for me, O my God! that which is good in every world of Thy worlds. Verily, Thou art the Mighty, the Exalted, the High and the Great.”

What is the oneness of humanity?

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

The greatest prize this world holds is the consummation of the Oneness of Humanity. All are the children of God. God is the Creator, the Provider, the Protector of all. He educates all of us, and is compassionate towards men. His grace encompasses all mankind. The sun of God shines upon all mankind. The rain of God falls for all. The gentle breeze of God wafts for all. Humanity at large is sitting around the Divine Table of the Almighty. Why should we engage in strife? Why should we ever engage on the battlefield to kill each other? God is kind, is He not? Why should we be unkind? What is the reason? How are we benefited by being unkind? Today the chief means of dissension amongst the nations is religion, while in reality the religion of God is one. Differences lie in blind imitations which have crept into religion after its foundation.

Religion is Reality, and reality is one. It does not permit of multiplicity. His Holiness Abraham was the Herald of Reality. His Holiness Moses was the Spreader of Reality. His Holiness Jesus was the Founder of Reality. His Holiness Muḥammad was the Spreader and Promulgator of Reality. The Reality of religion is one. Fundamentally there is no difference.

The Reality of religion consists in the love of God, in the faith of God, in the virtue of humanity, and in the means of communication between the hearts of men.

The Reality of religion is the oneness of the whole of humanity.

Bahá’í pioneers

Part III

Siyyid Mustafa Roumie

A short historical survey of the Bahá’í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

The missionary journeys of the author, Mr Roumie, with the great Bahá’í teacher Jamál Afandí throughout India, were successful in a general way. Jamál, a cultured Persian scholar of refined, venerable appearance and eloquent discourse, found no difficulty in attaining access to leading people of various Indian States, including high government officials and rulers themselves. During his stay of two years in India, he visited many important States. Everywhere he received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously. In many cases men of influence became followers of the Bahá'í Faith, and in several places Bahá'í Assemblies were formed. The work thus begun, by Jamál has continued in unbroken succession to the present day when India has reached the point of being second, perhaps, in importance to Persia itself in the number of Bahá'ís.

We left Calcutta May 1878 and reached Rangoon after a trip of seven days, steamers at that time being very slow. Our arrival in Burma was rather unusual. Though we had no acquaintances in this city, the news of our missionary journeys had been widely spread and because the difficulties in regard to our baggage and the police department had been noised abroad, all of the citizens of Rangoon knew of our arrival. At the wharf were many people who had come to meet us, among them a young man, Ḥájí Siyyid Mihdí Shírází of Egypt. We had written to him about our coming, requesting him to procure a suitable place for our residence. This he attended to, and was at the wharf to meet us upon our arrival.

Here we found in this picturesque new country everything different: new faces, new kinds of dress, new language, new manners, new food, new religion, and new forms of worship which were not known in India. There were very few Persians then living in Rangoon, and most of them rich merchants; the other foreign peoples frequenting Rangoon were Chinese and Indians. Our new friend, Ḥájí, assuming us to belong to the wealthy commercial class had secured a large building in the business quarter. Later, because of defects in the roof, we moved to adjoining quarters in Mogul Street. Here people of all nationalities, creeds and castes came daily to see us. Jamál Afandí had the faculty of speaking to each soul in accordance with its own needs. His wisdom as a teacher was extraordinary. His audiences were always attracted and as a rule felt themselves blessed by his eloquent addresses.

The Chief Commissioner gave us a wonderful reception and listened with kind attention to our statements, promised to help us in every way possible, and gave us a letter of [XXII:7:209] introduction to the then chief secretary, Mr J. E. Bridges. The next day we went to interview this gentleman. He received us courteously, was very kind to us, and after due inquiry into our affairs, directed us to see the Deputy Commissioner to whom he gave us a letter of introduction.

As a result of this mission of Jamál Afandí in Rangoon many wonderful souls accepted the Faith enthusiastically, and in a very short time the Cause was widely promulgated. Then occurred a peculiar incident due to the unwise zeal of our Rangoon friend, Ḥájí Shírází. Being a novice in the Cause and untrained in the best way of giving the Bahá'í Message, he took it upon himself, in a moment of great zeal, to go to the Shí'ih Mosque in the midst of the Friday worship; and there making a stand loudly called upon the congregation inviting them to come and see the Bahá'í teacher, Jamál Afandí. "Don't pause or tarry for a moment," he said, "come immediately. The appointed time foretold in the Holy Books has arrived. The prophecies have been fulfilled. The Promised Ones have duly appeared. The glad-tidings of Their Manifestation is widely known in Persia and all over the world. Thousands of people in Persia have accepted this Faith, and have sacrificed lives, family and wealth in this path. Come immediately and hear Jamál Afandí in his wonderful way expound this Movement. You will see with your own eyes the new heaven and the new earth, the new sun and the new moon, the new religion and the new faith ..." etc.

This unwise and ill-timed discourse created the greatest commotion and tumult among the fanatical Shí'ih congregation in the Mosque. Outcries, curses, abuse, scoffings—were raised from every side. A terrible excitement reigned, in the midst of which Ḥájí fortunately escaped and slipped out of the Mosque, otherwise he would undoubtedly have received fatal injuries from the mob and perhaps have been killed then and there.

The Muslims called a meeting to deal with this “infidel”, and a special priest named Áqá Siyyid Javád, a visitor to Rangoon, brought there to officiate especially at the Feast of Muḥarram, rose in the pulpit and openly denounced [XXII:7:210] and abused and cursed our friend Ḥájí, mentioning him by name. He roused the mob to fierce excitement, urging them to unite in force and violence and to eradicate the Bahá’ís from Burma. He urged that our friend Ḥájí be expelled from the Shí’ih Mosque, excommunicated and killed on the spot lest the whole province be won over to this heretic faith.

This provocative sermon impressed only a few of the audience. Fortunately the majority were of too much culture and intelligence to pay any attention to it.

Meanwhile we were all in the dark concerning this event Ḥájí—probably because he was ashamed, having given us no information concerning it. It had been done entirely without consultation with us.

What he did do was to bring a charge of defamation of character against the priest who had delivered the violent sermon against him. This charge, brought before the District Magistrate Court, after full investigation, was decided against the fanatical priest. He was obliged to execute a bond for keeping the peace for six months. Feeling disgraced by this, the priest left Burma by the next boat for Calcutta.

Soon Ḥájí came to us again bringing half a dozen of his relatives and friends to Jamál Afandí to hear the Bahá’í Message. Ḥájí’s father-in-law—a well-known merchant—having died, his wife had inherited the property and rule of the family. Since she did not sympathize with Ḥájí in his Bahá’í Faith, it was necessary for him to leave his kindred and become separated from the family.

The result of Ḥájí’s mistaken zeal in the Mosque did not cause any violent hindrance to the work as was feared, but it was some time before the poisonous effect of the incriminating sermon of the priest had died away. After all, some results did come from Ḥájí’s public announcement of Jamál’s mission as given in the Mosque, for some of the people who heard it were curious to investigate the truth of the matter.

One afternoon a young Persian gentleman of about thirty came up to see us, evidently by his appearance some one of high family. But he was most rude and coarse in his manner to us, and we soon noticed that he was intoxicated. Evidently he had been under the impression that we were people of low class. As soon as he entered into the presence of Jamál Afandí and recognized his culture and station in life, he realized his mistake, became silent and remained only a little while, asking permission as he left to come and see Jamál Afandí the next day.

He came punctually as promised, a perfect gentleman now both in manner and dress. We welcomed him warmly, and as Jamál Afandí discoursed to him with love and wisdom, gradually the young man’s face shone as a result of the effect of the Divine Message with which he seemed to be delighted. He remained seated for a long time in silence, a soul enchanted. Then Jamál told him to come again the next day, for he should take time now to digest what he had heard this day. It was enough of a lesson for the present.

Jamál Afandí learned upon inquiry about him that he was a descendant of the “Kad-khudá” [XXII:7:211] family of Shíráz, Persia, and his name was Áqá Muḥammad Kázim Shírází. He had come to Rangoon to visit his uncle and cousins who had settled here many years before and were clothing merchants.

This youth now came every day to see us and soon was a confirmed Bahá’í. Later he told us how he had come first to see us as a foe, and purposely had made himself intoxicated in order to inflict some fatal injury upon us. But what a miracle, he said, that he had returned the next day and the next and the next, impelled by his attraction to the Cause. This youth received many wonderful Tablets from Bahá'u'lláh.

In Rangoon we had many followers from the Sunnī community and some from the Shí'ih community.¹

In the Sunnī community were Meolvi Abdul Subhan Koreishes,² his five sons, his wife and his wife's sister and mother, as well as other relatives belonging to this family. This composed the largest Bahá'í family in Rangoon. They subsequently received many Tablets from Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

Among the Shi'ite community also there were a large number who received Tablets from Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and from this community a group journeyed in 1899 to Haifa; they were the pilgrims who went with the sacred marble coffin, made in Mandalay for His Holiness the Báb, which was placed in the Tomb of the Báb on Mt. Carmel.

Auguste Forel—man of vision

Stanwood Cobb

I shall never forget my pilgrimage³ in 1922 to "La Fourmiliere"⁴ at Yvorne, Switzerland, home of the great scientist, philosopher and humanitarian, Dr Auguste Forel, recently deceased. He was then in his seventy-fourth year and crippled by paralysis as a result of a previous stroke. His enunciation was poor, it was difficult for him to formulate his thoughts rapidly in words, his hands were crippled and writing was extremely arduous for him. Yet the thing which impressed me most in my day's visit and communion with him was the feeling of a great intellect and a great soul expressing itself through the crippled medium. One could see plainly that the spirit of the man was undiminished, his intellect as powerful as ever. It was only the channel through which that intellect could reach the world that was effected. What an argument for the immortality of the soul His brain had become injured, his mind not at all. His spirit, may we say, had become even greater as a result of his physical disability.

Dr Forel showed me with interest and indefatigable patience his works ranged about on the numerous shelves of his study, innumerable books on a wide range of subjects. He had literary command of two languages, German and French, in each of which some of his publications had appeared. In addition, copies of his works had been translated into almost every language of Europe. All these he showed me with pride.

Besides his own publications, these book shelves which surrounded the room on every side from floor to ceiling, were piled thick with other publications which he used as research material, all divided into sections according to subject matter. Here no housekeeping diligence was allowed to invade. This room was sacred to Dr Forel and his literary work. Everything must be left as he himself left it, so that he might know just where to put his hand on anything that he wished. It was not as orderly as a modern office or library. But it was evidence of the strange paradox that a creative mind which is most orderly in its power to organize intellectual material, may be in the organization of the material environment somewhat cluttered. For the mental and physical energy is given in such cases to the organizing of ideas, and no time or energy is left for tidying up.

With the keenest interest Dr Forel showed my wife and myself five volumes on the life of the ant¹ which has just been published in French. This work has later been translated and published in this country. He turned to the different parts of the book, and gave us a long discourse in elucidation of the text and of the illustrations, telling us how he came to make his discoveries. At the age of twenty-one, he had published a book on the ant, the observations and discoveries of which he never had reason to modify. By colouring with cobalt the food which he fed the ants, and [XXII:7:213] by keeping food from all but one ant at a time, he made the discovery of the strange social stomach of the ant which is anterior to its own individual stomach. Food is first turned into liquid form in this social stomach and from there regurgitated and shared in case of need with other hungry ants, only one-nineteenth being kept to go into the individual stomach.

He showed us an illustration of the valve which leads from the social stomach into the individual stomach. I remember my attempt at that time to picture to myself in how far we must consider the workings of this valve to be automatic, and in how far we may consider this a voluntary ethical effort on the part of the ant.

Dr Forel gave us many interesting incidents of his life. He said that as a boy he was not very fond of studying. He was poor at Latin and mathematics. What he loved best was to linger on his way to and from school to study insect life by the roadside. From the age of six years he observed the snails, the wasps and the ants. At the age of eleven his grandmother, appreciating his fondness for insect life, gave him a rather costly book on the ant, highly prized by him ever since. This book he said, was a great formative influence in his life; for it led him into making the study of this remarkable insect his major life work.

At the age of twenty-one, as stated above, he brought out his first work on the ant, which made him famous. Others too have become world authorities on the ant, but Forel has the honour of having added more variety of ants to the knowledge of science than any other man, and of having formed the largest collection of ants in existence, which later he donated to the Natural History Museum of Geneva.

Dr Forel had a many sided mind. Both his interests and education covered many spheres of human thought and study. He received the Doctorate of Medicine, also of Philosophy, and made distinguished contributions to the science of psychiatry, myrmecology² and philosophy. He published books which became well known on such subjects as hypnotism, alcoholism, psychiatry and the sex life. "The [XXII:7:214] Sexual Question", published late in life, has been widely circulated and has been translated and published in this country.

During his long life of scholarly achievement, Dr Forel published more than four hundred different works. The mere enumeration of these filled a pamphlet of thirty pages which was published by his friends in Vienna in 1908 on the occasion of his sixtieth birthday.

Dr Forel's medical and psychiatric work at the lunatic asylums of Munich and of Zurich (of the latter he became director) turned his attention to the fatal effects of alcoholism. From then on it became one of the chief missions of his life to combat in every way possible this curse. I recall with what fire and indignation he spoke to me of how besotted drunkards get, how filthy they make their homes, and how tragic their inebriation may become for their wives and children. This poison which leads men to foul and evil deeds of which they would otherwise be incapable, seemed to him one of the greatest curses of humanity. He was one of the first in Europe to found a temperance society. When he bought the property at Yvorne he told me that he had the vineyards torn up to make place for vegetable and flower gardens.

“On the first of September 1928,” says the Feuille D’Avis de Lausanne,¹ “thousands upon thousands of the people of Europe wrote their recognition of the master of Yvorne as a compassionate physician, a courageous struggler against alcohol and all forms of vice, as a learned psychiatrist, a seeker who revealed the world of the ants, and a thinker who showed the people prophetic vision and the voice of a life free, peaceful, united and happy. All of which he lived as he recommended.”

Shortly after the world war, which was a tragic blow to his humanitarian belief in the ideals of world peace, he came in contact at Karlsruhe—(where he was visiting his daughter and son-in-law, Mrs and Dr Brauns)—with the teachings of the Bahá’í Cause. The principles enumerated by Bahá’u’lláh for the New World Order, those lofty ideals for world peace and world brotherhood, so deeply impressed Dr Forel that he became himself a Bahá’í.

“I found Bahá’u’lláh had years ago declared the very principles which I had come to believe in, he told me, therefore I wished to be considered a follower of Bahá’u’lláh.”

From that day on “the grand old man” of Switzerland devoted his life largely to the promulgation of these principles of Bahá’u’lláh. “He served Bahá’u’lláh with immense capacity and indefatigable faithfulness up to the day of his passing,” says of him Miss Martha Root, Bahá’í teacher and world traveller, who visited him a few years before his death, “He was truly a glorious and loving apostle of Bahá’u’lláh.”

“Dr Auguste Forel,” she declares, was one of the great Bahá’ís in Europe. Wherever, in lecturing at the leading universities of Europe and the far East, I spoke of Dr Forel, his great achievements and his Bahá’í acceptance, the students listened with keen interest and acclaimed their approval with tremendous applause. And when I [XXII:7:215] visited the chief cities of Switzerland to lecture about Bahá’u’lláh’s universal principles or world peace, every city and every educator in Switzerland had heard of these teachings from their celebrated patriot and scientist, Dr Forel.

“I had the privilege of visiting Dr Forel in 1929,” Miss Root further states, “and I consider him one of the greatest humanitarians I have ever met—one of the most just, most kindly, most intelligent. He was a genius who saw the truth and the power of Bahá’u’lláh’s teachings to usher in a New Era in divine civilization.”

It is of interest in connection with the later life of Dr Forel to know that one of the most important Tablets given by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to the world was addressed to this great scientist. The Tablet dwelt chiefly on the proof of the existence of God and the immortality of the soul, Dr Forel having been, up to the time of becoming a Bahá’í, a positivist; he was an ardent humanitarian devoted to the advancement of humanity but not believing in the existence of God or the soul. This remarkable exposition of on the scientific proofs of the existence of a Divine Creator and of the soul was accepted by Dr Forel. It would be well if this Tablet could be studied in every university in the world, and by every scientist and religionist.

What of the future?

'Abdu'l-Bahá

If the tent of the oneness of the world of humanity is not pitched on this earth and Universal Peace is not established, there will be more wars. For this war has become a cause of hatred. For instance, the Germans will not forget, the Austrians will not forget, the Bulgarians will not forget. If the banner of Universal Peace is not raised, this question of war will be more acute.

On one side there will arise the tumult of the Socialists, from another the storm of Bolshevism, from another the problems of labour, from another the antagonism of nations, from another religious hatred, and from another racial prejudices. It is clear what will happen. All of these are like dynamite. One day they will explode, unless the banner of Universal Peace is raised according to the divine teachings, and the oneness of the world of humanity proclaimed.

According to the divine teachings the banner of Universal Peace must be raised by the Power of the Word of God. The oneness of the world of humanity must be established by the Power of the Holy Spirit. No matter how the politicians strive, it will become worse. The power of man is helpless. ...

This period is like the false dawn. This peace is like the false dawn. We will see what the future brings. This has not taken place yet.

We cannot abolish war by war, for it is like cleansing blood with blood. The divine teachings will accomplish it however.

Bahá'í pioneers

Part IV

Siyyid Mustafa Roumie

A short historical survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

Jamál Afandí, accompanied by the author, Mr Roumie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamál received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously. In many cases men of influence became followers of the Bahá'í Faith, and in several places Bahá'í Assemblies were formed. The work thus begun by Jamál has continued unbroken succession to the present day when India has reached the point of being second, perhaps, in importance to Persia itself in the number of Bahá'ís.

In 1878 they left Calcutta for Rangoon. Here their mission was highly successful, and in a short time the Bahá'í Cause was widely promulgated in spite of some instances of attempted persecution.

After the establishment of the Cause in Rangoon we left for Mandalay early in 1879 with several Persian companions. As there was no railroad communication at that time, we had to go by a slow river steamer which ran once a week from Rangoon to Mandalay, capital of the then independent kingdom of Burma.

There were many obstacles to successful missionary work in Burma. In the first place we did not know the Burmese language. Secondly, we had no arrangements for our entertainment there or for contact with the natives, and had to shift for ourselves until we were fortunate in finding, as later described, a Persian from Calcutta who knew us and who gave us our first opening in the city. Thirdly, under the rule of the despotic Burmese king, teaching of the Cause was extremely dangerous. Promulgation of a new religion was, by Buddhist law, to be punished either by banishment, or execution by torture.

But did not a Tablet from His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh give us the Divine command to proceed to Mandalay and establish the kingdom there? This, then, was our spiritual duty. What difference did it make to the lives of obedient servants if they were killed or spared in the line of duty? They considered nothing to be their own, all belonged to their Lord.

The trip to Mandalay was long and tedious, as the boat did not run at night, and it took us more than ten days to reach our destination. We arrived at Mandalay about an hour before sunset, and had great difficulty in finding lodgings there. At the advice of the chief of customs, who was a Muslim, we took shelter for the night at a Mosque called Joon Pull where we slept as well as we could in an open shed adjoining the Mosque.

Fortunately on the very next morning a Calcutta friend, previously referred to, Hájí 'Abdu'l-Karím upon hearing of our arrival, came to see us bringing with him a Burmese friend named Hájí 'Abdu'l-'Azíz (in Burmese Ko Pooh) a dealer in precious stones. This Burmese gentleman was well known and respected by the Moslem community of Burma. We asked him if he could procure us a house, [XXII:8:251] which he did—a residence in the Moslem quarter not far from the Mosque.

News of our arrival spread through the Moslem community of Mandalay, and men of all classes came now and then to see us asking many religious questions. One gentleman who had already accepted the Cause in Rangoon, Áqá Muḥammad Kázim Shírází, came rejoicing to see us, and became a regular and enthusiastic visitor thereafter.

Also our Calcutta friend Hájí 'Abdu'l-Karím came regularly to question Jamál Afandí upon spiritual problems connected with the Moslem law. He joined us every day to take with us the Persian tea.

As far as possible in our missionary travels, we tried to mingle with all races, creeds and nationalities, but the people brought to us at this time were chiefly Muslims. As it was in this circle that we mingled mostly, we felt it necessary to observe all due Muslim rites. There was for instance the Fast of Ramaḍán and the Feast that follows it; all the obligatory prayers we also attended; but although we were associating constantly in this way with Muslim Burmese, we were unfortunately not able to converse with them in Burmese, and our Calcutta friend Hájí 'Abdu'l-Karím interpreted for us.

Thus our days went on until one evening as we were returning home, all of a sudden, stones were thrown at us from the darkness opposite our house. We were seated at the time in front of the house in conversation with friends who had been waiting to see us. Fortunately no one was hurt, and the landlord came out, shouted loudly, and the stoning ceased. The next morning our friend Hájí 'Abdu'l-Karím came to tell us that the people of the quarter disliked our presence there and it would be best to move somewhere else—they wanted to get rid of us. We thought it best to comply with their desire and engaged a house with a compound at some distance from this one. Here our friends continued to meet with us, occasionally bringing new seekers of truth. These people Jamál Afandí welcomed and entertained in the most kindly way, conversing with them on spiritual subjects, and they would depart strong admirers of [XXII:8:252] him and of the message which he had presented.

This quiet and unobtrusive method of teaching led to some important results. One of our new friends, Abdul Wahid, who, like many other Muslim merchants in Burma, had taken the Burmese name, Ko Thin, carried the news of Jamál Afandí and his spiritual message to his uncle 'Abdu's-Sattár (in Burmese Koo) a very well-known silk merchant, a man of great intelligence and influence in his circle. Abdul Wahid related to his uncle all that he had heard and seen during his visits with Jamál. The old gentleman, 'Abdu's-Sattár, an ardent seeker of truth, told his nephew to invite us both to dinner in his home—an invitation which we accepted with great pleasure.

They came to fetch us with a bullock chariot, then the chief vehicle in Burma, and after our evening prayers, we accompanied them to the home of 'Abdu's-Sattár where we found our host very eagerly awaiting us. We observed that we were the only guests, and after the dinner and the usual exchange of politenesses, 'Abdu's-Sattár began to put all sorts of questions to Jamál relating to Şúfí mysticism. Jamál Afandí with great promptness and brilliancy answered all of his questions and solved all of his spiritual problems to his entire satisfaction. We talked until the early morning hours and it was about two o'clock when we made our apologies and took our departure. Later we heard that our aged host, through the sheer delight and pleasure he had in conversing with Jamál, was unable to sleep that night.

The very next day, to our great surprise, his nephew came with a bullock cart and a chariot to take us with all our belongings to a home which 'Abdu's-Sattár had assigned to us. Upon arrival there we found the old gentleman busily at work, engaged in having constructed for us a meeting house on a vacant piece of land adjoining our home. Soon this meeting house became a centre which attracted a sincerely devotional audience. This was the real beginning of the Divine Cause of Bahá'u'lláh in Mandalay. It is evident that the chief credit for the opportunity to spread the Cause in Burma must be given to 'Abdu's-Sattár and his nephew. They were the first to become believers in Mandalay, noble souls, each of them, and they were the recipients of many Tablets from His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh.

Gradually the number of believers increased from day to day until it reached the number of some two hundred or more. These were busy and happy days. Indeed we worked day and night, and I was also kept busy translating Tablets into the Urdu language, translating verses from the Qur'án and the Traditions regarding the time, place and person of the Divine Manifestation prophesied in these Holy Books. This subject finally extended itself into a book of some three hundred pages, The Standard of Truth or Reality, which I wrote for 'Abdu's-Sattár.

We stayed in Mandalay for eighteen months. When the time came to leave, Abdul Wahid was appointed as our representative. Through him we were able to continue communication with the Mandalay [XXII:8:253] friends. In order to prepare him for this responsibility we had been teaching him daily the divine principles of Bahá'u'lláh.

How grateful we were to God that in a city where there was such danger in spreading the message of Bahá'u'lláh, we had been protected by the friendship and influence of our new Bahá'í brother, 'Abdu's-Sattár. This was our salvation, for although the Persian Shí'ih community publicly denounced Jamál Afandí as a Bahá'í and incited the people to do us injury, yet so great was the influence of 'Abdu's-Sattár that no one was found who dared to come forward and oppose or obstruct the Movement.

Meanwhile our Persian friend, Áqá Muḥammad Kázim Shírází, was working independently within the circle of the Persian Shí'ih community where he was able to guide many souls to the Truth, among them Áqá Siyyid Mihdí Shírází and Áqá Muḥammad Šádiq, both of them partners of his in his Mandalay shop, and others some of whom had become natives of Mandalay.

In the course of time the prejudice of the Persian Shí'ih community became somewhat decreased. Two well-known merchants, Mírzá Muḥammad 'Alí Işfahán and Áqá Muḥammad Ibráhím Shírází, each invited us to dinner in their homes where we found gathered all the notable Persians of Mandalay. Jamál Afandí took advantage of this wonderful opportunity to deliver a most convincing address on the expectation of the Qá'im and the Messiah. The audience received this address in the most respectful silence except for a few polite questions. It seemed these souls had been impressed, but due to their ignorance of Truth and to their intellectual pride they preferred to follow blindly their own dogmatic creeds.

The Priest of the Chinese Muslim Mosque, a learned sage, came to see us bringing with him a written question, a spiritual puzzle, which he wanted made clear. This Jamál Afandí accomplished to his great satisfaction, pointing out how the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh had fulfilled all these prophecies. The Chinese gentleman retired completely satisfied with his answers.

Thus having finished our duties for the present in Mandalay, feeling that much of importance had been accomplished and that the Supreme Cause of Bahá'u'lláh was well founded there, we returned to Rangoon by the same river steamer by which we had arrived.

'Abdu'l-Bahá

Why did Christ come into this world? People think He came in order that they might believe in Him as the Word of God, or the Son of God. "He came," they say, "to redeem us through His blood."

Christ was not seeking after fame. He came that He might educate the world of humanity and illumine the world of reality. He sacrificed His life for the realization of this fact. This is reality. Every fair and just man accepts this. Now is it befitting that we lay aside the refining of character and engage in war, or abandon the second birth and occupy ourselves with enmity? Christ came to release the people from the promptings of the lower nature, to make them angelic. For this thing He accepted all calamities.

Bahá'í pioneers

Part V

Siyyid Mustafa Roumie

A short historical survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

Jamál Afandí, accompanied by the author, Mr Roumie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamál received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously.

In 1878 they left Calcutta for Rangoon. Here their mission was highly successful, and in a short time the Bahá'í Cause was widely promulgated in spite of some instances of attempted persecution.

After establishing the Cause in Rangoon the missionaries went, early in 1879, to Mandalay. Here they met with some persecution. Their teaching had to be quiet and unobtrusive. Fortunately they were befriended by a wealthy merchant of great influence who built them a small hall in which to carry on their work, and put them under his personal protection. Feeling that they had given a good foundation to the Cause in Mandalay, they now return to Rangoon.

Our safe arrival back at Rangoon delighted the hearts of the friends and uplifted their spirits. We found awaiting us there many holy Tablets revealed by His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh for the friends in India and Burma as well as for ourselves.

As we planned to stay for a while in Burma, it was thought best to undertake some kind of business in order that, like the apostle Paul, we might earn our own living and pay our own way as we went about our missionary work. It was finally decided to open a pony market, also have a line of hackney carriages, and a shop for the sale of provender. This business in due time proved quite successful and profitable.

The Cause of Bahá'u'lláh, meanwhile, was gradually progressing; but although we had a goodly number of followers, they were, as a rule, of our own race, and we felt it very necessary that the Cause should reach out among the natives. Otherwise the foundations of the Bahá'í Movement in Burma would not be strong enough to withstand the changes that time brings about among a foreign population who are constantly on the move, going here and there in search of business. The result would be that unless the Cause was spread among the native population, it would gradually die away again.

By this time we counted among our followers only two native families in Rangoon: that of Jináb Áqá Hájí Siyyid Mihdí Shírází from amongst the Shí'ihs; and secondly that of Molvi Abdus Subhan Korishee.¹ Even these, however, were not actually natives of Burma, although they had become naturalized citizens: the former family being from Persia, and the latter from India.

We did our very best to remedy this defect in the establishment of the Cause in Burma, and exerted our utmost to attract the natives to the Kingdom. But our endeavours at this time were not effectual. After the lapse of one year we took a second trip to Mandalay to see the friends, upon their invitation and continual requests, so that we could nourish them with new [XXII:9:273] and higher teachings. A member of the Shí'ih Persian community of Mandalay who was very hostile to the Bahá'í Movement engineered a piece of chicanery which proved quite fatal to our work at Mandalay at this time.

He instigated a professional cook, who had been with us at Hyderabad while we were sojourning in that city, to start, falsely, a civil suit against us for one hundred and seventy six thousand five hundred and nine rubies, stating that he had sold goods to us in Hyderabad for which he had not been paid.

The courts in Mandalay, we were informed, were entirely lawless and unjust at this time and well known for their bribe taking. Many bona fide claims had been dismissed by them as false, and many false claims had been decided in the affirmative. Many defendants, and some of the plaintiffs even, had been sent to jail and violently tortured preliminary to the first court hearing.

Fortunately some of our influential Bahá'í friends managed to secure all of the details of this claim and a copy of the complaint from the Court. We also had an interview with the Prime Minister Kewun Mingyi through the kind intervention of our Bahá'í friend Mullá Ismá'íl, the Chief Commissioner of Customs. After listening to our story, he promised to give us justice upon the following day when the case was called. He was as good as his word, and the case against us was dismissed on the ground that it was not a case for the judiciary of the Burmese Court, but should be presented at the Court where the business transaction had taken place. The Judge stated in his judicial opinion that the case seemed to be nothing but a piece of religious antagonism and hatred toward the revered personage of the defence.

Although thereafter we found ourselves free from this danger, the Bahá'ís of Mandalay had no peace of mind even after the decision of the case in our favour, for they well knew the lawlessness of their courts. Anybody might bring an action, civil or criminal, against any person without much trouble or expense. Therefore it was deemed too risky for us to stay longer in this city, and after a few months we departed for Rangoon although it was a great disappointment to our friends. This was the decision of the Mandalay believers, although it was a bitter disappointment and sorrow to them.

We came back to Rangoon distressed and heartbroken over the results of our trip to Mandalay, but we could not sit down and lament in idleness. We had to earn our living. So the writer was sent with some ponies and some jewellery to Calcutta, from which trip he returned with great profits. He was then sent on another trip of the same kind with livestock and gems to Penang in the Malay Peninsula. This was an entirely new part of the world to him, but I managed to find lodgings, upon my arrival, in the house of a well-known leader of mysticism, Omar Khalidi, a man of Malay descent. He was about sixty years of age with half a dozen grown up sons and daughters, most of whom were able to speak in Arabic. Thus I was able to converse [XXII:9:274] with them and got along very well. Because this island was quite small, I became within a week a conspicuous figure everywhere, and although I had not yet found educated and interesting souls, yet I continued to deliver the message of Bahá'u'lláh to all receptive and intelligent people. Finally after disposing of all my ponies and gems favourably, I returned safely to Rangoon.

After a couple of months I was sent on a similar errand to Calcutta. Now it was decided that Jamál Afandí and the writer should go on a long trip through India, and if possible around the Malay peninsula and to the Java Islands. The friends in Rangoon unanimously agreed to this proposition. Therefore leaving our business in charge of some of the friends, we took the first boat to Calcutta. Here we found that most of the Bahá'í friends had either moved or died, therefore we did not stay long here, but left for Dacca, an important city of Bengal. Here we met with some interesting and important people. From there we went to Bombay where we stayed about three weeks. Bombay at this time was an important centre of the Bahá'í Movement in India.

We next went to Madras where the Cause had a large number of followers, about four hundred in all. The number of believers was considerably increased after our arrival in Madras, and the writer was kept busy delivering public lectures every night in various parts of the town. He was delighted to be again with his aged father, Siyyid Muḥammad Rúmí, then in his one hundred and fourteenth year.¹

During our stay in Madras many eminent persons joined the Bahá'í religion, among them: Nawab Ferooz Hussein Khan, Nawab Muhammad Miyan, Siyyid Kazim Ali, Oman Khan Subadar, Major Bahadur, Siyyid Dawood, and one mulla, Muhammad Ali Rampuree, a very learned sage, also his nephew, Murad Ali, a merchant.

Our next stop was Singapore, where we were the guests of the Turkish Vice Consul, a well-known Arab merchant. From here we sailed for Batavia, the chief seaport of Java. We had great difficulty in getting a passport for travelling in Java, but finally secured one from the British passport office. This allowed us, however, to travel only in seaport towns and for only six months.

During all our travels in Java, we were closely watched by detectives and spied upon everywhere, as the Dutch government was exceedingly afraid of religious propaganda in Java. We were also hampered here by lack of facility in the Javanese language, which Jamál Afandí did not understand.

From Batavia we went to Surabaya where we sojourned for a couple of months, leaving there finally for the island of Bali. The inhabitants of this island had originally been Hindus and Buddhists, but their religion now had become somewhat corrupted; the king of this province could hardly be said to practice any religion except perhaps a corrupted form of

Buddhism. His queen had [XXII:9:275] been a Muslim by birth. This queen was keenly desirous of seeing Jamál Afandí. She sent some high officials to fetch us to the palace, bringing two beautiful ponies for us to ride on as there was not any kind of a vehicle. Accompanied by the palace escort, and by our friend the Chief Commissioner of Customs who served as interpreter for us, we reached the palace and were cordially welcomed. For hours the king and queen questioned us earnestly about spiritual subjects. It was a most interesting conversation. Finally, after partaking of coffee and some sweets, we received permission to retire.

After a couple of days, we sailed for the Sulawesi (Celebes) islands, the chief seaport of which is Makasar, now the seat of the Dutch Governor. We landed here safely and the police instructed the porters to take us with our luggage to the Arab quarters, where we were to be put under the guardianship of the Chief of this quarter.¹

We were greeted cordially by this Arab Chief, who had been born and brought up here. A very large brick building with an iron gate was given us to live in, of which we occupied only two rooms on the top floor, one for Jamál Afandí, and one for our luggage, occupied by the writer.

As experienced travellers, it occurred to us to inspect carefully the whole building. We closed the doors of all vacant rooms, especially we took particular pains to close the huge gate opening on the public road. The wisdom of this precaution will soon be seen. The building, owned by a rich Chinese merchant, seemed to have been abandoned for many years. It took hours to lock the gate with the utmost difficulty. Meanwhile news of our arrival and of the location of our lodgings was being spread over the whole town.

In the morning, to our amazement, when we looked out we saw a throng of citizens outside the building. They asked us with great astonishment how it was that our lives had been spared that night. Had no ghost, demon, or evil spirit disturbed us? How was it that we had been safe from harm? Had we overcome the Monstrous Devil? It had always been the case previously that those who spent the night in this great edifice, were found dead in the morning, and from no known cause. So terrible had been the reputation of this residence that the surviving heirs of the Chinese owner of the building dared not live in it.

We told them that we had driven out the evil spirits, ghosts, demons and devils from the house and made it habitable, thus wiping out the superstitious ideas that the Chinese and natives had had about this house for years.

Knowing that the Chinese have many superstitions and a great fear of demons, we concluded that, owing to some deaths in this household, they had abandoned the place because of the belief that it was haunted. But to our amazement we subsequently learned that their fears were by no means groundless. The Chief of this Arab quarter who [XXII:9:276] was in charge of the residence, had been in the habit, it seems, of bestowing it as a shelter upon inexperienced and unknown fellow countrymen travelling to that city, if he considered them to be rich. They would retire for the night assured of the careful protection of this Arab Chief and would go to sleep without taking any precaution. Once they were sound asleep, some of the Chief's men would creep in, dressed up to resemble demons, and choke the sleeping men until they were dead. The next morning they would be buried by the Chief and their belongings would be taken away by the said Chief for safe custody!

But in our case the evil designs of the Chief were thwarted by our precaution. His men did come to the big gate, it seems, and tried hard to force it open. Jamál had been awakened by the noise and shouted loudly in Arabic, "Who is there?" and looking out he saw men running away from the gate.

In spite of this knowledge which we had acquired of the evil designs of our native Chief, we dared not disclose to him our awareness of his villainy for we needed his help in all of our movements. So instead of confronting him with his crimes, we deemed it best to present him with a gem worth twenty dollars and thanked him for his kind protection.

Bahá'í pioneers

Part VI

Siyyid Mustafa Roumie

A short historical survey of the Bahá'í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

Jamál Afandí, accompanied by the author, Mr Roumie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamál received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously.

In 1878 they left Calcutta for Rangoon. Here their mission was highly successful, and in a short time the Bahá'í Cause was widely promulgated in spite of some instances of attempted persecution.

After establishing the Cause in Rangoon the missionaries went, early in 1879, to Mandalay where they laid a good foundation for the Bahá'í Cause.

Several years were spent in missionary journeys to Burma Mandalay and the chief cities of India. Then Jamál Afandí and the author left for more distant journeys to Singapore, Java and the Sulawesi (Celebes) Islands where they met with extraordinary adventures.

During our stay in Makasar we became well known as experts in the healing of the sick and the soothing of nervous ailments. With the supreme power and help of the Greatest Name we were able to heal many of the sick, and those who thought themselves possessed by evil spirits were also relieved by our prayers. Through this healing work we were able to deliver the message of Bahá'u'lláh to everyone with whom we came in contact; and when the time arrived for us to depart, it was only with the greatest difficulty that we were able to tear ourselves away from these people who had begun to depend so much upon us.

From Makasar we proceeded in a small sailing vessel to a seaport of the Sulawesi islands called Pari Pari, then ruled by a native independent chief called Fatta Aronmatua Aron Raffan, which means "The Great Monarch and King of all Kings". On our arrival I went directly to the customs official to ask permission for landing. The officer in charge gave me a pony on which to ride to the royal palace—a palace built of bamboo—to obtain this permission from their King. The King, who was advanced in age, was eagerly awaiting our arrival and watching with a telescope through the window of his palace. As soon as I entered the royal palace the King got up from his seat and warmly embraced me saying that he was happy to see his honourable guest. Then he eagerly inquired the whereabouts of Jamál Afandí, who, I replied, was still in the ship awaiting for his royal command to disembark.

When I entered the royal presence I saw there two envoys sent to the King by the Dutch Governor of Makasar with a private letter to the King indicating the arrival of the two visitors—Jamál Afandí and the writer—and requesting the King to refuse any help that they might request for the purpose of making their journey into the interior of the native states; for the letter stated these two men were necromancers, and would use the art of enchantment to win the chiefs and their subjects for their mystic religious rites.

The King was not favourably impressed with this defamatory letter. [XXII:10:314] In fact he was noticeably annoyed by it and in an angry tone he said to the two envoys, "These venerable visitors are our guests and under our protection, and the Dutch Governor should not interfere with our religious affairs. This is my reply to his offensive letter, and an unofficial message which should be conveyed by you to him." The envoys, thunderstruck, immediately retired disheartened and unsuccessful in their hostile mission.

The King enjoined upon the customs official to apologize to Jamál Afandí on his behalf for not being able to do him the honour of a public reception, and directed the customs official to accommodate the guests in his own house. This was done, and we were honourably received by this official. The day after our arrival we were summoned to the Court to have an audience with the King. We were warmly received by him. He embraced each of us and bade us be seated close beside him. After the usual salutations and politeness he inquired about our voyage and the object of our unexpected and delightful arrival at such an unfrequented spot.

With perfect sincerity and candour, yet with tact and sympathy, we explained to him our whole missionary adventure in a way calculated to produce interest and satisfaction on his part. The King was exceedingly delighted and asked us to call again on the next morning. So on the morrow we were again furnished with ponies and rode a distance of about two miles to the palace, and this time had audience with the Queen and also with the princes. In fact we found ourselves becoming very intimate with the King and all the royal family.

The King was suffering with an ugly disease called psoriasis. His whole body was covered with scales like fish scales which caused constant irritation and itching. His skin was so sensitive that he could stand but little clothing and so he wore but very few garments. Jamál Afandí had inspired such faith and admiration in the King as to make him confident that his spiritual visitor could heal his painful disease, and he requested this of Jamál. The latter replied, "We are not qualified physicians or trained in the healing of material ills. But we will earnestly pray for divine guidance, and by means of that try to find the remedy for you."

When we returned home we consulted and prayed together for the solution of this problem and responsibility which the King's sickness and his faith in us had placed upon us. The results were, as the reader will see, a remarkable confirmation of the fact that no matter what the difficulty, Bahá'ís will find a heavenly guidance through consultation and prayer.

Having sought the guidance, then, we immediately proceeded to act. We went out to the neighbouring jungle to search for medical herbs, as we had nothing of this nature with us. We found many trees of cassia fistula with its abundant fruits which are mildly laxative. We collected some of these fruits; and going further into the jungle found some plants of jungle mint and gathered the leaves of this also. We sought to be guided in the collection of other plants and herbs, continually using the Greatest Name while we were engaged in this extraordinary search. We brought them home, and praying also the [XXII:10:315] while, prepared from them a brew, and also a purgative from the cassia. We had a few cakes of carbohc soap with us fortunately, and we prepared three bottles of oxymel combined with vinegar and sugar, and took all of these preparations and the soap with us to the royal palace the next day. We gave four doses of the purgative to the King on alternate days, and gave him nourishment in between times. Every day he had a hot bath with a strong application of carbohc soap, taking internally some of the herb brew we had made and the oxymel.

As the natives were unable to carry out any of these services, even the bath, the writer personally executed everything necessary. It took more than a month to soften the skin and gradually bring it to a smooth and velvety condition as before this sickness. Finally through divine confirmations and the glorious powerful effects of the Greatest Name, we succeeded to a certain extent in affecting a cure. After all, the faith of the old King was certainly a great factor in his remarkable recovery. Needless to say, the royal family were greatly impressed because of this healing, and were won to our friendship and to attachment to our Message more than ever before.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

War is a grievous calamity. It begins and ends in disaster. ... What is this land, this earth? Is it not this: that for a few years we live on this earth, then it becomes our grave, our cemetery? Eternally shall we be beneath it. Now is it beneficial or kind to engage in war and strife for an eternal cemetery? Many generations have come and have lived for a short time on this earth and are buried under it. It is the universal graveyard of humanity. Is it praiseworthy that we engage in warfare, shedding blood, destroying homes, pillaging the wealth of nations and killing little children ...? Is it worthy that we sacrifice eternal life and the everlasting soul of man for the sake of a little dust?

There is no doubt that God is displeased with this. There is no doubt that the perfect man will not approve. Justice and equity will not permit it.

Bahá’í pioneers

Part VII

Siyyid Mustafa Roumie

A short historical survey of the Bahá’í Movement in India, Burma, Java Islands, Siam, and Malay Peninsula.

Jamál Afandí, accompanied by the author, Mr Roumie, during two years of pioneer missionary work in India, found no difficulty in obtaining access to the leading people of many important Indian states including high government officials and rulers themselves. Everywhere Jamál received a warm reception and his message was listened to courteously.

In 1878 they went to Rangoon, where their mission was highly successful. In 1879 they started on an extensive missionary tour of Burma, Mandalay and the chief cities of India. They then undertook a still more distant journey to Singapore, Java and the Sulawesi (Celebes) Islands where with the primitive people they met with extraordinary adventures and success.

After several minor trips we reached the province of Padalia, ruled by Fatta Chikourdi. When our boat, after a rather alarming trip through a crocodile infested river, reached the town in which the King resided, his officers met us at the landing and took us to a commodious guest house on the river side. They then presented to us the formal greetings of the King and took in return our greetings to His Majesty. The next day we were summoned to the palace. King Fatta Chikourdi, of Padali and his Queen Diammarala welcomed us warmly and invited us to visit them and have audience with them daily. In our judgement, however, this place was utterly devoid of spiritual souls. The people were not at all interested in our mission, nor did they have capacity, it would seem, for receiving our declaration of the divine dispensation. So we made up our mind to move further on to the province of Boonay as soon as the King should deign to provide us with canoes and other requisites for our trip. We could not of course ask for this immediately as it would be rude to make too short a visit.

As we were waiting an opportunity to tactfully talk of our departure, to our surprise a serious epidemic of smallpox broke out in the principle towns of Padalia. The houses around the palace had many victims, especially among children, and the loss of life was very great.

The King felt uneasy about this and [XXII:11:343] asked us to do something to arrest the ravages of the plague. We had no instruments or medical material to handle such a situation. We found ourselves forced, however, to take some steps to oblige the King. I was instructed by Jamál Afandí to procure some ordinary needles, tie them up tight and put them in a small vial together with some ripe scabs from long affected children, adding to this the milk of some woman who was giving suck to a male child. With this I was to vaccinate the children of the province. I carried out the instructions to the letter and later I vaccinated daily upwards of five hundred children. Of these only one per cent died; all the rest were saved by this treatment.

Through this medical work we found opportunity to deliver the Message to all. We were not able to stay long enough however, to prove the results of this missionary activity, for we soon left for the province of Boonay. The King generously supplied us with all the necessary travelling equipment and three long canoes with full escort. He affectionately bade us adieu, and we started down the crocodile infested river once more. Before sunset we reached our destination and were warmly received by the King and his officials and given the guest house opposite the palace for our residence. After dinner we were invited to the audience chamber where we were received enthusiastically by the King and Queen. In this very first interview we became intimately acquainted with each other, and the King as simply as a child put all sorts of questions to us, both material and spiritual.

With our party, as it happened, was an Arab from the province of Yemen. He happened to journey with us down the river. The King undertook to recite a prayer known in Islám mystical denominations as Jeljelutich. This Arab suddenly interrupted and impertinently attempted to correct the pronunciation of an Arab word in the prayer which the King had, in reality, pronounced correctly. The King, very much annoyed, told him that he was mistaken as to the proper pronunciation but the Arab, who was quite impolite and rude and even insane in his obstinacy, continued to contradict the King. So irate did the King become that he ordered the Arab put out of the palace, and gave instructions that he should never be admitted again. He then turned to us and asked us if we had brought this monster in our company. We explained the facts as to how he happened to be with us, and the King became appeased.

The King was so attracted by the stirring talks of Jamál Afandí that he kept him answering religious questions until the late hours of the night; in fact, it was not until two o'clock in the morning that we were permitted to retire.

Every day and evening we were now in the audience chamber holding religious conferences with the King, continuing to solve his spiritual problems. After a few days the King asked us to write a handbook in Arabic outlining principles for the administration of his State, as well as a booklet for teaching Arabic colloquial conversation. This gave us an unusual opportunity to present the principles of Bahá'í administration and government to the [XXII:11:344] King, for we based our handbook upon the universal laws of Bahá'u'lláh.

Meanwhile the Arab, really partially insane it would seem, deprived of the privilege of entering the palace turned his grudge upon the writer. It took a good deal of precaution on my part to avoid trouble, but one day as I was working on the manuscript of the handbook above mentioned, the Arab, sitting upon his bed, started to vehemently shake the bamboo floor of the house in such a way as to prevent my writing. Upon my polite request to him to desist, he suddenly appeared quite naked from behind the curtain of his bed and struck me upon the head with a heavy block of wood. Fortunately the Queen, happening to look out from her palace window, saw this attack and informed the King who with a large corps of his followers rushed in and arrested the Arab. He also had my wound treated and dressed. Then he gave orders to have the Arab executed. As Bahá'ís, Jamál Afandí and myself both begged the King to forgive the criminal; and after a long entreaty upon my part, it was granted and the order was given that he should not be executed but banished with a criminal record to the Dutch settlement. The King and Queen, great admirers of Jamál Afandí and the writer, kindly permitted us to present to the insane man some gifts for his journey, about ten dollars in cash and five dollars worth of native cloth.

The books were finally completed and presented to the King and Queen respectively. Also we gave the King lessons in the translation of his books into the Malay language which were exceedingly appreciated.

The King and Queen accepted the Bahá'í Cause and made a vow to promulgate it in all the provinces of the Sulawesi (Celebes) Islands as soon as they should receive confirmation for this missionary effort.

Thus having raised the standard of Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá, we made our preparations to return. With great sorrow at our departure, the King and Queen had all necessary preparations made for our voyage. The atmosphere was very melancholy when we went to bid adieu to their Royal Highnesses.

White roses of Persia

Part I

Martha L. Root

Here is told one of the most moving stories, tragic yet noble, among the many martyrdoms of the Bahá'ís in Persia the story of Varqá. The material for this article was gathered by the author on her recent visit to Persia. This is the first of three instalments.

Ṭihrán, Persia, has so many faithful Bahá'í families that to go among them makes one think: "O Persia, your famous attar comes not alone from your roses, the perfume which diffuses itself through the lives of your believers is a fragrance still not equalled in other countries." If there is a more sweet or tender story of devotion to 'Abdu'l-Bahá and the great Bahá'í Cause than the lives of 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá and his little son Rúḥu'lláh Varqá of Persia, I have not heard it. When I was visiting in Ṭihrán I used to meet 'Azízu'lláh Varqá and his younger brother Valíyu'lláh Varqá, sons of 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá, and often I used to ask them about their father and brother. All this narrative is absolutely true and in it the reader will see how God prepares souls to come into this world.

'Alí Muḥammad Varqá was an ardent Bahá'í of Tabríz, Persia, in the days when Bahá'u'lláh was a Prisoner in 'Akká, Palestine from 1868 until His passing in 1892. He was exiled and imprisoned because His Teachings which are now being studied by some rulers, many statesmen and millions of other people, were, like those of other World Teachers, very far ahead of His time. To begin at the beginning, 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá had one son, 'Azízu'lláh, two years old, when one day in April another little son was born in his home, and he and his wife named the child Rúḥu'lláh which means "the Spirit of God".

There was glad rejoicing when Bahá'u'lláh from 'Akká sent these parents a Tablet (a letter) about this new babe and in it the reader with insight will discern the introduction to this thrilling story which follows. Bahá'u'lláh wrote:

“O Varqá! It is for thee to chant in both ears of this little one three times:

“Verily, thou hast come by the Command of God! Thou hast appeared to speak of Him, and thou hast been created to serve Him Who is the Dear, the Beloved!”

“We mentioned this before when his mother implored us, and now We are mentioning it again. We are the Generous and the Giver!” (His mother sent no petition by letter, but it was perhaps when this little one was coming into this world that she cried out to Bahá'u'lláh.)

While Rúḥu'lláh was still a little child, Bahá'u'lláh sent a second Tablet. It read:

“He is the Hearer and the Seer!

“Blessed art thou, for thou hast witness the grandeur and greatness of God while still a child. Blessed is the mother who nursed thee and has arisen to do what is becoming of her! We beg God to write for thee from His Supreme Pen that which is fitting to His Generosity, Bounty and Favour. Verily, He is the Generous and the Bountiful! Praise be to God, the Lord the Worlds!”

Another Tablet to Rúḥu'lláh from Bahá'u'lláh was:

“O thou Rúḥu'lláh! Verily, the Greatest Spirit has inclined towards thee from the [XXIII:3:72] Prison and is mentioning thee with such a station that its fragrance will continue as long as My Kingdom and My Grandeur endure!

“Thou, when thou bindeth and knoweth (the mention) say: ‘Praise be to Thee, O Ocean of Bounty! Thanks be to Thee that Thou hast made me to appear and in my first days speak Thy mention and Thy praise. Verily, Thou art the Forgiving and the Compassionate!’”

Later, another little son came to bless their home and he was called Valíyu'lláh.

“What kind of a Bahá'í father was ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá?” you may ask, and “How did he train his sons spiritually?” All fathers who read this tale will see in the life of this Persian the highest ideal of fatherhood, a height not reached in every home, and too high to be understood by many fathers. He, himself was a Bahá'í teacher. The picture of the Báb is preserved to the world today because ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá led a great painter to become a believer. The narrative of the Yazdí family so distinguished in Egypt for their Bahá'í services is another fruit of the many souls to whom he first brought the Teaching in Persia. He was never outside his country except to go to Palestine, yet his pupils have served with glory in the Near East and in Europe.

Being a wise young father, recognizing in what highest education really consists, he took his two little sons, ‘Azízu'lláh and Rúḥu'lláh (little Valíyu'lláh at that time was too young to go, he was only a babe in arms) for a pilgrimage to Bahá'u'lláh in 'Akká. Other parents could with profit follow this same plan and today take their children to meet Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause in Haifa, Palestine. If children can glimpse the highest ideals while they are still very young, these ideals may be their lofty inspiration throughout life. Certainly this story shows how one little boy developed into a teacher, a poet, a great philosopher and a world hero before he had hardly crossed the threshold of his twelfth year. Educators must see in the life of this son an astounding Power in the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh!

Many were the incidents of that historic visit to Bahá'u'lláh but I only tell you a few of them. 'Azízu'lláh Varqá told me that when the maternal grandfather, the father and Rúḥu'lláh arrived in 'Akká, they went to the room of the secretary of Bahá'u'lláh. It was furnished with a mat and they sat down on this, for they had been told that Bahá'u'lláh would come to this room to meet them. In the distance there were steps leading to an upper room and the father told 'Azízu'lláh to go and stay near those steps to watch the approach of the Blessed Beauty and then to inform them. The child went but when he looked and saw Bahá'u'lláh at the head of the stairs he mounted several steps and knelt at the feet of His Lord. He was crying so hard his very bones were shaking. Bahá'u'lláh stopped and made him [be] happy and they came down the stairway together, the little boy just behind Bahá'u'lláh. It was a great meeting, but when the visitation was over, the father said to his little son: "Why did you not do what I asked you to do? Why did you not run and tell us?" 'Azízu'lláh replied: "I do not know. I do [XXIII:3:73] not know how I mounted those steps, I was not conscious that I went up the stairs." We know how moved Professor Edward G. Browne of Cambridge University, England, was, when he first met Bahá'u'lláh but here is an account of what it meant to a very young Persian boy.

The next day they were all invited, the grandfather, father, and two small sons to visit Bahá'u'lláh in His own room. Then when the visit was over, the two boys were invited to the room of Bahá'u'lláh's daughter, Bábíyyih, known throughout the world as the Greatest Holy Leaf. She was then perhaps about forty-five years old. She said to her little guests: "What are you doing in Persia?" and Rúḥu'lláh replied: "We are teaching the Bahá'í Cause in Persia" "What do you say in speaking to people she queried, and Rúḥu'lláh answered: "I tell them God has appeared again on this earth." The Greatest Holy Leaf smiled but said: "When you are speaking you must not say this openly." The child replied: "I do not say it to everybody, I know to whom I must say it." "How do you know the people to whom to speak?" she continued, and he said: "I know people from their eyes; when I see their eyes I know." In fun, Bahá'u'lláh's great daughter said: "Rúḥu'lláh look into my eyes and see if you could speak to me?" Naively he searched her eyes and told her: "No, I cannot speak to you, because you know everything."

Two young men sitting and doing their writing lessons in the other part of the room began to laugh over the conversation and the Greatest Holy Leaf said: "Look into their eyes and see whether you could speak with them and convince them." The child looked at them long and carefully, and then answered: "It is very difficult and it is of no use to try to convince them." (These two young men were Zia'u'llah¹ and Badí'u'lláh who afterwards turned against the Cause. When this conversation was told to Bahá'u'lláh He said: "Rúḥu'lláh is a Bahá'í teacher."

The little group stayed for several months in 'Akká and in Bahjí. Rúḥu'lláh studied Persian writing every day and every Friday he used to show a copy of his writing to 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who often praised it. Rúḥu'lláh's father was very insistent about their lessons and very severe when they did not study, for he knew the importance of education.

'Azízu'lláh recounted another incident of the visit saying that when Bahá'u'lláh wished to reveal (dictate) a Tablet, he used to dismiss everybody with great haste. He, 'Azízu'lláh, said:

"One day I was in Bahá'u'lláh's Presence with the whole family and He called for the secretary to bring ink and paper quickly and in the same moment He requested us all to go. I was just a child, but seeing this haste to send every one away, I had a great longing to be present sometime when a Tablet is revealed. I had asked from one of the members of His family to ask Bahá'u'lláh if I could come, please, to see a Tablet revealed. A few weeks later in the Garden at Bahjí, when I was playing with some children, the door of the home was opened and one member of the family called me and said that Bahá'u'lláh wished to see me. I ran to His room and entering I saw that He was chanting revealed Tablets and poems. So entering His room that day, I thought everything was the same as on other days, that Bahá'u'lláh was only chanting. I stood near the door which I had entered, and [XXIII:3:74] was only a few moments in the room when I began trembling in my whole body. I felt I could not stand any more on my feet. His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh turning to me said 'Good bye'. As I lifted the curtain to go out, I fell on the threshold and was unconscious. They took me to the room of the wife of His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh where they poured rose water and cold water on my face until I revived. The members of the Family asked me what had happened and I told them about going to Bahá'u'lláh to hear the chanting. When I was relating this, the lady who had called me first, came in, and she said to me: 'You, yourself, had asked me to permit you to be present, now that was the time when a Tablet was being revealed.'

"Then I understood why Bahá'u'lláh in haste dismissed everybody. It is because the people cannot endure it, there is such a Power in the room."

'Azízu'lláh Varqá said that his father had a similar experience during this visit to 'Akká. His own words are: "Father had been asked by someone to implore Bahá'u'lláh's help concerning a certain matter and to beg that a Tablet be sent. When my father presented this petition, Bahá'u'lláh called a secretary to bring ink and paper, and He also sent for His brother Músá Kalím and another one of the relatives. He put a hand on each one's shoulder and began to walk up and down revealing the Tablet. Father began to tremble and he said he couldn't say what was happening. He heard Bahá'u'lláh's voice but He could not understand His Words. Some minutes passed and He dismissed them all. Then outside they began to discuss and none of the three had understood Him, they had only felt the Power. It is certainly interesting to hear about Bahá'u'lláh from those who saw and spoke with Him. They said they could not look upon His Face, it was so glorious, the eyes so shining. There was such a vibration that everyone began to tremble and they could not understand His Words; there was such a Power there."

One evening in 'Akká, Bahá'u'lláh called 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá alone to His Presence and said: "I wish to speak with you alone tonight. There is something in the existence that in most of the Tablets We have named the greatest Ether. When any one is endowed with that Ether all his deeds and words will be effective in the world."

Then Bahá'u'lláh arose and walked a few steps and He continued: "Even this walking of the Manifestation is effective." Again sitting down, He said: "Christ declared His Mission. The Jews crucified Him and they thought what they had done was a very unimportant matter, and Christ was buried; but as Christ was endowed with that Ether, that Ether did not stay under the ground; It came up and did Its great work in the world."

Then Bahá'u'lláh turned to 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá and said: "See 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Master, what a wonderful effect His deeds and Words have in the world! See how kind and patiently He endures every difficulty." The Bahá'í, 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá felt that Bahá'u'lláh really was showing him the Station of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that He would be the Successor spoken of as the Greatest Branch, and 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá asked to become a martyr in the path of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The Blessed Beauty Bahá'u'lláh, accepted this sacrifice and promised the pilgrim that he should give his life in service to 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

The supreme affliction

A study in Bahá'í economics and socialization

Alfred E. Lunt

This article is printed in complete form at the request of the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada, and has been passed by the Reviewing Committee. It presents a very complete treatment of the economic plight in which the world finds itself today, and describes the perfect solution as found in The Order of Bahá'u'lláh.

“And We desire to show favour to those who were brought low in the land, and to make them spiritual leaders among men, and to make of them Our heirs.”¹

The primal necessities

God has created hunger and thirst, the need of warmth and shelter as essentials of the very existence of the human race, and has deposited within man an ever present consciousness of these needs. Throughout the countless ages of man's occupation of the earth, these necessities have, to an overwhelming degree, been his taskmasters, the seat of his ambitions, the source of his joys and sorrows. Since food, drink and housing are vital needs of his physical existence, and these have never been attainable except through individual effort—these primitive needs have wielded an enormous influence in the history, progress and destiny of our race. In the hope of gold, men have yielded life. For the power of money to purchase these necessities, men have frequently laid aside honour, and have not fallen short of the commission of detestable crimes. The dethronement of God, in the human consciousness, and the enthronement of gold as a cherished idol, is not a mere play upon words in the past and present history of the race.

The unbalanced distribution of necessities

As the individuals of society, because of this primitive urge, identified happiness with the possession of the goods of this world, and tasted of the power that comes with the attainment of property in excess of their actual needs, the distribution of means gradually became unbalanced. This unbalanced distribution, however, is by no means a modern phenomenon. The emergence of humanity from the patriarchal state marked the taking on of individual responsibility for livelihood, and was the signal for a steady encroachment upon property by the more capable, more ambitious, or more unscrupulous members of society. We must remember that up to comparatively recent times, huge masses of humanity were either slaves, possessing no right to property of any kind; serfs, with [XXIII:4:98] an inchoate right at best to a meagre ownership; or feudatories, holding their fiefs, lands or properties conditioned strictly upon an oath of unrestricted service to their lord or baron. As a consequence, the favoured classes held all property in their sway, and vied with each other, often by private war or foray, to attain larger and larger possessions. Many of the medieval wars had their rise in these inordinate contentions of barons and princes, in which the hapless serf or feudatory bore the brunt of the fighting.

The emergence of innate differences in economic capacity

With the successive destruction of feudalism, serfage and slavery, the struggle for existence devolved upon all men. Theoretically each man had his chance, but, here, the innate differences in the character and capacities of men became disclosed in a universal sense and for the first time. Initiative, education, ability, ambition for fame and power, cunning, cruelty, greed found abundant contrast with sloth, timidity, incapacity, ignorance and resignation. These innate differences, excellencies and defects, being part of the natural order, appeared insurmountable, and opened the way for a kind of economic slavery. Money being a seed for the reproduction of itself, tended to multiply in the hands of its possessor. Monopolies became the order of the day. In monarchical countries, the nobility held tightly to their landed estates, and wielded power over the commoner. In the republics, the wealthy classes, fortified by the laws of inheritance, and tending to accumulate ever larger ratios of the available wealth and to control it, have gradually consolidated their position, to the weakening of the agricultural element, the office worker and the day labourer.

Economic insecurity

Although the universal, public school system of the west unquestionably fits the average boy and girl for a higher level of social living, and has greatly diminished the illiterate percentage, the levels above have, at the same time, proportionately advanced in wealth and power, so that the grades and degrees of society have not materially changed. The average graduate of the public schools finds his or her economic level as a mechanic, a factory worker, a clerk, a farmer, or as proprietor of a small business. While this represents a striking improvement over the condition of the poorer classes of past centuries, it is, nevertheless, a fact that the vast majority of the inhabitants, even in the western countries of the globe, are not economically secure, beyond the weekly receipt of their pay envelopes, and when confronted with disaster, sickness or unemployment soon deplete their small reserves.

This is strikingly illustrated in the current wave of economic collapse and its consequent unemployment which has numbed the financial nerves of every country. The normal unemployment ratio has swelled to a three or four fold extent, and hardships and anxieties multiply. Self-respecting family heads discharged from employment and unable, after urgent quest, to find remunerative jobs, reluctantly turn to the charitable agencies. The City of Boston,¹ alone, is disbursing [XXIII:4:99] $24,000 daily² to an ever increasing number of destitute families. This is but an instance of what is taking place in hundreds of American cities and communities. Doles and public aid in other countries have brought great nations to the verge of national bankruptcy. The over production of commodities which followed and had its source in the feverish war period, has failed to adjust itself to the requirement of peace, and the demand for goods, seriously impaired by the diminished pay rolls, gives no promise of restoring the economic balance of the past decade and returning the workers to the factories in the numbers and with the earnings to which they had become accustomed since 1914.

The old order changeth, but mankind remains its prisoner

In the face of these conditions, industrial leaders and statesmen have proved themselves largely impotent. The old order, developed from the feudal system, enchains and blinds those who are at once its beneficiaries and its victims. While it would be idle to say that no recovery can be expected from the present economic crisis, since the economic law of supply and demand ultimately re-establishes a balance, it is, notwithstanding, equally true that such a system, susceptible, as history proves, to these repeated debacles in our economic life presents grave defects. The prime, devastating element that at present dominates the economic life of the nations is their supine and abject surrender to the natural laws of the survival of the fittest, and the struggle for existence. The claws of nature are unyielding and essentially cruel. The vegetable and animal world are its truest exponents. But is humanity likewise forever condemned to the cruelties of this soulless law of the lower levels of the creation? This point we shall endeavour to unfold.

The tyranny of natural law

“I am not my brother’s keeper”, by which Cain sought to escape the questioning of the Supreme Judge, has been adopted and made a part of man’s daily life. Granted that countless exceptions exist among us, the fact remains that in the economic relationships, this purely natural law has full sway. We salve our conscience with various forms of charitable aid and poor relief, but this is but an evasion of the issue. A fundamental malady in the human body can be lastingly healed only by ascertaining the real cause of the malady, then by a prescription that meets the exact conditions. May it not be that definite human rights are being ignored, that divine relationships exist which, recognized and applied, contain the solution?

Organic disease and health

We know that any undue separation of functions in an organism, any impairment of the reciprocal relations between its parts, is a certain cause of disease. This is equivalent to disorder and discord, and may be termed the operation of the law of decomposition in the organism. Its course, unless interrupted, is ever towards the dissolution and death of the organism. On the other hand, the unity and health of the organism is synonymous with the [XXIII:4:100] perfect reciprocity of its parts, their full co-operation each to each. Happiness, welfare and efficiency, according to the creative plan under which the organism came into existence is thereby bestowed. Under these conditions, the beneficent law of composition pours its blessings of life and health upon the creature. These primordial laws of composition and decomposition are rooted in the creation and are not inherently controllable by man. They bestow life and death, and constitute the inevitable fate of all created life in a world of “becoming” and contingency.

Decomposition, the unerring agency of destiny

But although these basic laws of destiny are inviolable in their sphere of action, they are powerless to operate except under the exact conditions that call them forth. They are compulsory and selective but neither voluntary nor fickle. Like the arrow to the mark, they obey only the law of attraction and unerringly choose the habitations of their affinities. And by this I mean it is impossible for the law of decomposition to operate in a healthy body. Like maggots or fruit flies arising in a basket of decayed fruit or a heap of animal refuse, spontaneously appearing within rather than from without their host, decomposition enters an organism only because it is attracted by the disordered condition that exists therein. In other words, disorder, disunity, discord—the three ds of a dismal triad—invite decay. As Bahá’u’lláh said: *“Listen truly: mortal eye shall never perceive the Everlasting Beauty, and the dead mind delights only in lifeless clay; for like seeks like and has affinity with its own kind.”*¹

The body of man represents and is the highest organism we know. Logically, and by corollary, the body of humanity, homo sapiens as a race, is likewise entitled to this distinction, in the collective or racial sense.

Nature’s dualities—life and death

The picture we have endeavoured to paint but dimly and faintly depicts the vast cosmic forces that proceed from the inmost recesses of Nature, governing, limiting, expanding and controlling every material atom in the universe. Whether composition or decomposition, fire or humidity, sour or sweet, ebb or flow, or any of the great natural dualities, these colossal forces are, in a word, the unyielding arms, the adamant jaws, the very claws of Nature, and at the same time—since the duality persists and its other aspect must be translated into terms of human consciousness—they are the tireless servants of humanity, furnishing heat and moisture, cooling water to parched lips, life and movement to the blue ocean, and delectable fruits and grains to the taste. Are these forces friends or foes? Shall we fear and shun them, content in a palsied ignorance of their true origin and function—or shall we approach closely and examine them with faith and assurance, conscious of a certain oneness with them, mindful that the Lord of all Being is our common Author? And more important, shall we submit utterly to their dominion, or shall we examine carefully the reality of these forces? Perchance, we may possess weapons by which to conquer and subdue them.

Man, more ferocious than nature

If we treat Nature as we have been accustomed to treat our foreign nations of various colours and origins, [XXIII:4:101] with fear and poorly concealed detestation, it is certain she will, in her time, turn and rend us, or at least will have the last word. This is because only by studying her changing moods, born of the duality, in a sympathetic and dauntless spirit, can we adapt these forces to the up building of civilization. As we cannot control or change the inherent properties of the laws of life and death, as was previously stated, so we cannot change natural elements such as fire into moisture, or water, per se, into something lacking humidity. But we can, and have, converted the action of fire into grateful warmth, and diverted it from turning into a destructive conflagration; we have transformed certain chemical elements into a humane, soothing anaesthetic, and we, also, have, shameful to say, utilized other natural elements and cunningly and cold heartedly converted them into deadly and devastating vapours today threatening, with the menace of potential war, millions of living men, women and children. Man has done this. And it is a fair question to ask, whether Nature, workshop of the mysteries of creation as she is, hurler of the thunderbolt and the twisting tornado, is to be feared as are those men to be feared who consciously and deliberately in the name of an abandoned, rejected and false patriotism, hideous in their ferocity and cruelty, today forge the implements which, should war come again, will break the heart of mankind?

Nature yields to science certain aspects of her sovereignty

To resume. The purpose of this apparent diversion from the subject is to provide the basis upon which to certify to two outstanding verities. First, that man can adapt the blind, unintelligent forces of nature to purposes apparently contrary to their normal uses, as, for instance, sending his body under and beneath the sea in a submarine containing oxygen, which defeats the natural law that has for ages barred the body of man from the ocean depths; or imprisoning within a storage battery or confining to wires, the rampant force of electricity whose nature, undisturbed, is to be elusive, free, cosmic and unrestrained. In a word—man possessed of a power unknown to Nature, superior to Nature and transcending Nature even as the mind transcends the mere instinct, bends the natural forces to his own ends.

A new and greater conquest now required

And, second, that while we cannot change or recreate the inherent properties of the natural elements, such as converting a basic element into another element, we can, to a degree not yet wholly understood and determined as to its scope, formulate and prepare the conditions in a particular device, or, (and this is the all-important issue) within our (man's) own organism, both individually and racially, which will attract the beneficent, kindly, life giving forces of nature, rather than those containing the elements of destruction. And this is but the first step. For behind these beneficent and kindly forces, the Sun of Truth which is the Word of God pours forth a love and a knowledge compared to which the greatest light of Nature is but a guttering candle. It is these divine powers that are our ultimate goal. [XXIII:4:102] A point of receptivity for these reposes in the breast of man. But the fortifications of Nature must first be stormed.

The Equilibrium of health and the law of decomposition

It may, here, be objected that we are confusing the disease itself with the process or law of decomposition, or attributing to every disease two major causations. That the disease sets up its own pathology and no force enters from without in the sense of an all embracing law. Furthermore, that all diseases are self-communicatory and do not, and cannot, per se, constitute an affinity which attracts anything whatsoever.

We submit, however, that the equilibrium of the elements within an organism is the point from which all deviations from the normal must depart. As we conceive this abstruse problem, and take as the most perfect example, the body of man, it is plain, for example, that if, in such a body, the prime elements of organic iron, calcium or manganese, or any of these, are either in excess of the normal or abnormally diminished in volume, in the blood stream, a departure from the health equilibrium is thereby instanced which sooner or later must produce a disordered functioning. This is the first step toward what we call disease. The resistant factors within the body do their utmost to combat and neutralize the poisons that are automatically created by the disturbance, but if the conditions setting it in motion are not drastically changed, through a dietary and regime adapted to the need, and then only in case the organic functions are not too greatly impaired, the disorder is progressive and death intervenes. Because of this basic law of life and health, 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in an illuminating and profound Tablet at one time stated that when material medical had advanced on scientific lines sufficiently to become competent to analyze a drop of blood, to the extent of disclosing the presence and ratio of every essential element there present, each to each, medical science would at that moment have within its hands the key to health. Once knowing the degree of the departure or deviation from the normal of the elements requisite to health, and comparing this with the known proportions which each element should occupy in the blood flowing through a healthy body, the restoration of health was to be found in the assimilation of those organic aliments necessary to restore the equilibrium, or, conversely, in the reduction of intake of those aliments which had been found to be in excess in the blood of the patient.

There remains to be proved the part played by the natural disintegrating force at the focal point of the disease we have instanced. This force ever seeks to break down and destroy any composed organism. It is antithetical to that which draws together and composes the essential particles that, as units, we know as living beings. It is separative, disorganizing and ever tends to resolve the combination of elements back into their original, unrelated, and independent status. Thus, the decomposition of water releases the molecules of hydrogen and oxygen, hitherto held together by the sanction of composition—into their original loneliness. The affinity that [XXIII:4:103] drew them together as moisture, is shattered. Similarly, the more complex organisms, such as the animal, in the transformation of death yield up their elements which had been conjoined during the life of the animal. The moving force in this process is this natural law of change and death. Other demonstrations exist of which lack of space prevents the details, but the essential process has become clear.

The forces of decomposition within our economic life are powerless unless man opens the door to their visitation

But, in all this, the application of our thesis is primarily that a departure from the equilibrium of health and composition must exist before the destructive element can assert its power and accelerate the progress of the disease through the inflow of the separative impulse. Without this departure, the organism is immune. Secondly, that an intelligent organism, as is man, may, through this knowledge, and the power of self-analysis, become cognizant of three things: 1) The existence of a diseased state within his collective or racial body, in its economic relationships; 2) His recognition of a power which he innately possesses to change voluntarily, and in accordance with these basic, universal laws, the disorder within himself for which he, alone, is responsible; and 3) By thus applying the eternal axiom “Physician, heal thyself” employing those economic remedies that are the true “aliments” for the restoration of economic equilibrium, he will rout the enemy of his well-being by depriving it of the nutrition it must have for the accomplishment of its fell purpose. The situation calls for a racial adaptation of the story of Hercules and the earth-giant Antaeus. The giant’s strength became atrophied and impotent when deprived of the vitalizing forces of his earth mother. May humanity shake off the tentacles of this strangling power by summoning its God given resolution, drinking deep of the Cup of Knowledge which God has extended to this storm tossed planet in this New Day, and with the divine weapon of heart and soul destroy forever the selfish and egotistic veils that have made him lose hope in successfully changing what he calls “human nature” which is in reality but a base surrender to the natural law that holds him in its grip. The being who has succeeded in harnessing the fire and the lightnings of Nature, will not fall short in subduing the more interior and subtle natural force that has so long tyrannized over the use and distribution of the vital necessities of his life, such as food and drink, shelter and comfort. He, man, will not, must not fail in this greatest of all conquests even though, to thus finally assert his divinely bestowed spiritual sovereignty over the power of Nature, he must pay the full price, by sacrificing and yielding up the doubtful guerdon¹ of living unto himself alone. The New Age calls him to this greater happiness; the law of unity, deposited by the Ancient of Days in every infinitely small and infinitely great created being, calls him to establish now his own unity; to put aside the playthings of the past and lay hold of the strong rope that God has revealed in this dawn of human maturity; to place himself under a law greater than Nature, a law emanating from Him who created Nature [XXIII:4:104] and all her works through His Wisdom and Power. Why should mankind, possessing attributes and powers directly derived from Divinity Itself, and never possessed by Nature, the intelligence and will to conquer Nature’s cosmic forces, be content to subject himself any longer to her domination over his most precious material relationships? The installation of love for his fellow men, the assertion of his divinely given will are invincible forces, that no merely natural power can withstand. The Way is open. Shall we walk therein, or continue to wander in the gloomy morasses of self-delusion?

The thesis

Our thesis, then, is—that since humanity, through its noble and gifted inventors and scientific discoveries, has proved its God given right to invade the darksome cavern which is Nature’s fastness and stronghold, bringing forth therefrom, bound and captive the titanic forces which he, mankind, has proceeded to adapt to his material service upon the earth—it is certain, that through a spiritual power he even now possesses, he will apply this same process, on a higher plane, to release and free millions of his own race, made in the temple and image of Almighty God, and still held fast within the claws of nature, from the economic shackles that, today, deprive them of inherent and innate rights, withhold from their out reached hands the little comforts they crave, confine them to factory, office building and mine unnecessarily long hours, and deny them that vital interest in the great businesses they have assisted to up build to which, under the law of God, they are entitled. To remedy these diseases that, in this century, have brought low the industrial and commercial structure over well-nigh the whole earth, is the task and duty of every soul informed of the divinely spiritual basis upon which the economic relationships rest; of every far seeing business man who has realized even a trace of the organic unity of mankind; and of every labour leader whose vision is big enough to see beyond the ranks of his own group and to identify their true interests with those of every other basic element of the industrial fabric.

The reason for this is because “The fundamentals of the whole economic condition are divine in nature and are associated with the world of the heart and spirit."¹ Without knowledge of the principles contemplated in this preceding quotation, no improvement in the economic state can be realized.

Nature is powerless to confer upon men the knowledge of how to achieve this new economic freedom. Nay, rather, the mind and heart of mankind, derived from a Source that is supernatural, even from God, possess those keys that will unlock the treasuries of knowledge that have been prepared against this very use in this New Age. But let not man suppose he can, in this, underestimate the power of Nature which has for so long defeated and enslaved him. He must watch her (in her interior workings within his social and economic life) even as the cat watches the mouse, or, more accurately, the mouse watches the cat. Up to now, the cat has toyed with the mouse almost as it willed, in the great economic kitchen of [XXIII:4:105] humanity. Man, unwittingly or urged on by greed, has left wide open the door through which the similitude of Nature delights to stalk. This door is no other than human covetousness, ignorance, strife and discord, the cutting off, by violent and harsh means, of the essential relationship that exists within the Kingdom of Man and between its component parts (individual men). This essential relationship is that which, in the Divine Mind, has made of humanity, as a whole, an organism of sacred and highest destiny. Put in another way, every human being, white or coloured, it matters not, is a cell within this vast organism and entitled by divine right to the co-operation and reciprocal aid of every other cell, without exception or possibility of error; even as he in turn contributes of his full strength and function to the welfare of the whole. Who is so blind, after consideration of this strictly accurate and dynamically scientific fact, as to deny its truth?

We have previously demonstrated the unanswerable truth that the human body is the archetype of all organisms. Can the aggregate of human beings, fortified as they are by the possession of mind and soul, be less organically one than is a single cell of this great collective racial entity?

Applying these sacred and basic truths, and emphasizing again the deadly accuracy of that spiritual science that informs man of the divine reality of his own essential oneness, we would now apply it as the sole and inevitable formula for the healing of our economic life. Wise men of all nations will grasp this formula, even as the sore athirst seizes the cup of cool water. From countless sources, today, men of vision are recorded in expressions that prove their awakening to the penetrating power of this irrefutable, universal axiom. Even as "My people perish for lack of knowledge" equally it may be said: "My people are revived and made whole by accepting and applying the advices of Him who is the Knower, the Generous."

In this demonstration, full recognition must be given to the fact that the law of decomposition in its long sway over the psychology and egoistic consciousness of mankind, is not so easily overpowered as are some of nature's lesser children, such as chemical elements, fire and electricity. This is because that death dealing law, in its purely human phase, is associated with the ultimate destinies. There are strict limits to which mankind can guide its operations; although even in its more terrifying aspects it is, in reality, as are all natural laws, the symbol of Divine Providence, and the pathway to His Nearness and Good Pleasure.

Man's supreme affliction

Since the decompositional phenomena invariably and solely appear, as has been mentioned in detail, within an organism which has, consciously or ignorantly, allowed its original functions to become disordered, we must, in fairness, admit that these reappearing economic upheavals, this present state of suffering and threatened starvation in which millions of human beings today find themselves, comprise unerring evidence that the economic life of humanity has become the prey of the destructive, obdurate, negative [XXIII:4:106] power of nature, the sinister element of its duality. What can humanity do to stem this tide, which engulfs not only our industrial life, but is also the prime cause of every war that history records? Must the race perish for lack of knowledge?

The answer is plain. The causes contributing to the disease that has sapped our industrial strength must be resolutely uncovered and the remedy administered. Without attempting to enumerate every pathological lesion in our economic system, it will suffice to point out some of the major elements that, at present, operate to attract the destructive forces which have assailed the world.

Let us begin with the greatest constructive remedy, in a general sense—following this with an enumeration of the existing maladjustments that are opposed to economic health:

Fellowship and unity

The inculcation of love and of unity between all men is a mighty restoring agency for all these ills. This must be realized. It is, in reality, the essence of the divine elixir, which has been prescribed by the Divine Physician of this Age. The oneness of mankind, our essential brotherhood, is the hope and promise of every one of the great, universal Teachers and Prophets. This century marks the dawn and the practical expression of this great truth in the life of humanity. This is the reality of man. Every strife and discord in our common life together arises from the conflict of personalities. But the realities of the souls are in accord. The leaders of the business world must investigate this resplendent reality, and apply this unity in the business life of the world. On this point, 'Abdu'l-Bahá says: *"Science cannot cure the illness of the body politic. Science cannot create amity and fellowship in human hearts. Neither can patriotism nor racial allegiance effect a remedy. It must be accomplished solely through the divine bounties and spiritual bestowals which have descended from God in this day for that purpose."*¹ Arrayed against this truly divine elixir for social and economic health, are these traditional, ingrained and sadly disordered states of present day civilization, centring largely in the business and political fields.

1. The principle of trusteeship

Failure to recognize and apply the trust relationship essentially existing between the poor and rich, the fortunate and the unfortunate. Since in every trust, there must be a trustee, a trust fund, and a beneficiary, no room is left under this arrangement for further continuance of the laissez faire policy by which man contemplates his fellow man as a creature apart, admitting no responsibility towards him. Pauperism, wretchedness and misery cannot exist in the same world with this trust principle, which is based upon the right of every member of the human family to the necessities of life, provided he, in turn, contributes his part as a worker in the world. This basic remedy will, further on, be elaborated, as will certain of the other headings of this section.

2. The tithe

Almost entire ignorance of the divine and basic law governing the tithe or income tax. [XXIII:4:107]

3. Organic relationship between labour and capital

The barrier which has been built up between labour and capital, employee and employer. This is, in effect, a lack of unity and understanding among the leaders of both classes of their real organic relationship.

4. Taxation

A system of taxation which ignores the true principle upon which contributions to the state or government should be based.

5. Strikes and profit sharing

Strikes and lockouts in industry are a symptom, merely, of the faulty relations of worker and employer. The bargaining power of the great trades unions is based upon the collective influence of multitudes of workers whose only protection against injustice has been conceived to lie in the creation of a class bound together by a community of interest. But this community of interest is wrongly placed. It should be with the employer whose success and profit depends upon the worker's faithfulness and efficiency. Classes are an indication of separation in the business organism, and this has attracted the destructive forces of which strikes and labour troubles are but an inevitable result. The conflicting elements, therefore, must be bound together in unity through a common interest. This interest is attained through true profit sharing which contemplates a type of partnership or ownership in the business, on the part of the worker. This means, rightly worked out, a new and hitherto unknown peace will come to the industrial ranks, which no outside force can break. Besides this, the principle of wages sufficient to assure the workmen of an adequate support should be supplemented by the adoption of a method of pensions to be accorded to faithful workers who have become feeble and helpless. The purpose in all this is to confer a sense of security upon the worker who comprises the vast majority of all men. This is brotherhood illumined by the light of justice. Wages, alone, fall short of justice to the man or woman whose hands, skilled or unskilled have become calloused and hardened by countless hours and successive years of faithful service to his or her employer, firm or corporation.

The class theory in industry, an organic disease

Without this toil, the wheels of industry cannot turn; without this daily grind of human tissues and energies, no profits will appear. These workers are a component and essential part of the business organism with which they have allied themselves and are entitled to their part in its ownership. Only a blind and unsound reasoning can justify the continuance of the class theory, in industry. To do so is to descend to the level of inorganic life, the lowest mineral state. No—man, and his economic relationships with his fellow man, is organic, inter related, cohered. The lowly functions of the nails, hair and skin in the human body are essentials to bodily health and efficiency. The finer organs of the brain and heart, the eye and the ear all contribute instant succour and unflinching co-operation to those lowlier parts, which, in turn, protect and round out the perfection of the whole. No neglect appears in a true organism for any of its parts. The welfare of each is the vital concern of all. And, conversely, the affliction or impairment of any is a menace to the health of the whole body. It takes but little acumen to apply this example of a universal solvent of industrial harmony to the present confused, uncoordinated industrial picture.

6. The upliftment and security of agriculture

At the present time, the economic status of the farmer has suffered owing, in part, to overproduction in a world-wide sense, and the lessened demand which characterizes the present impoverishment of the general population. Agriculture is of first importance in the modern state. Plans of a co-operative nature must be applied to strengthen and fortify the producer through the application of the new principles of trust relationship, mutual aid and taxation, to the agricultural communities. Encouragement and assistance must be extended to the large mass of our urban floating populations, now economically insecure, to return to the land, where many of the necessities of life may be provided through scientific farming. The present unbalanced artificial and highly abnormal life of the cities is, at best, a symptom of immoderation, and has built up false standards of living for millions who are thereby deprived of the blessings of that normal existence which is synonymous with a country life. Moderation, without which the truly balanced life is impossible, is a vital feature of the civilization now dawning upon humanity.

7. Labour saving machinery should be in part an asset of labour

The failure of employers, generally, to grant the workers any part of the savings in the cost of operation of a business effected by the enormous increase in the use of labour saving machinery, and, its corollary, the retention of schedules of working hours which are a survival of conditions existing before the advent of the machine age.

8. Injustice to workers no longer young

Servile and selfish submission of the business world to the unchecked operation of the natural law of the survival of the fittest which is cruelly and unwittingly applied to the elimination from industry of workers who have passed a certain age, regardless of their ability or physical fitness.

9. Provision for work—its spiritual and real significance

The present faulty system of provision for work, due, in part, to the maladjustment now existing between the urban and the agricultural occupations. In this New Age, arts, sciences and all crafts are considered as worship, when undertaken in the right spirit. The basis for this is that all effort and exertion put forth by man from the fullness of his heart is worship, if prompted by the highest motives and the will to do service to humanity. Since all men are commanded to work and engage themselves in some one occupation, the avenues of permanent occupation must be opened through suitable enactments and provisions. Bahá'u'lláh tells us: *"We have made this—your occupation—identical with the worship of God, the True [XXIII:4:109] One."*¹ This will release into the fields of production and wealth vast numbers of persons at present occupying, economically speaking, a purely parasitic status.

10. The tariff

Brief mention has been made of the tariff barriers that separate the nations. This subject is of baffling complexity unless the touchstone presented in this thesis is courageously, unflinchingly and universally applied. Granted that every tariff, other than nominal, constitutes a barrier between the nations who are, from this point of view, interdependent cells or functions of the grand organic body of the race, it is clear that such unnatural and purely provincial enactments must, inevitably, set up a pathology quite outside and contrary to the fundamental and divine proposition that humanity is essentially one family. The reprisals visited by other countries upon an inordinately high tariff made into law by a particular country, the resentments that are set up, and, more practically speaking, the boomerang like effect upon the particular country in the impairment of its foreign trade as a consequence of the inability of foreign nations to pay their commodity debts in goods because of the high premiums exacted by the tariff impositions, is an evidence of this truth. This fact is well known, and is a material contribution to the present international economic catastrophe. There is a growing realization of this which the rapid reproached of nations together, in recent years, has engendered.

The old order justified itself in its tariff policy because it was founded upon the conception of nations as independent entities, supremely sufficient unto themselves. Other nations were foreign, untrustworthy, or, at best, precariously inimical to the fatherland. Racially they were of a different order, according to this view, ever hatching sinister designs against the fatherland, and in some strange way less human than ourselves. The strange and unknown is ever synonymous in the human mind with fear and distrust. But the new world order instituted by Bahá'u'lláh knows neither strangeness nor foreignness. Under its dynamic impulse, nations are being drawn together, while in the process the scales of superstition and fear fall from the eyes of the different peoples, as the snow flake melts and vanishes under the warm sun. This is because of the universal action of the Sun of Truth whose powerful rays are penetrating the densest veils.

The liquidation of the tariff question will necessarily be a gradual process; paralleling the attainment of homo genesis by the nations. The strongest bulwark of the tariff is its appeal for the preservation of the standards of living in a country fortunate enough to enable its people to utilize a larger degree of comforts and luxuries than is possessed by less favoured nations. Only as the sharing of benefits is applied, only as the consciousness of the organic oneness of the whole race is implanted, only to the degree that the entire body of mankind becomes sensitized to the needs of its weaker members, will the appeal of the argument for the sustainment of a specialized and strictly localized standard of living lose its force. But since this fundamental spiritual precept is an essential element of the new world order, that transforming power is certain, in the coming days, to eliminate every outworn element, even as the mighty surges of ocean cast upon the shore every impurity.

11. The unconscionable levies of war

The demands and exactions of national governments for military and naval expenditures, which consume the major part of all governmental income, based upon both direct and indirect taxation of the people, and are a moving cause of tariff walls between countries, enacted for the purpose of revenue production for the payment of these crushing and unhallowed obligations.

12. A universal language

The reinforcement of industry in the international relations by concentration, without further delay, upon the selection of a universal language, through which improved communication and understanding with foreign business houses and industries will result, is an important remedy to the existing confusion and misunderstandings witnessed in international business dealings.

The need of an *aqua fortis*¹

Let us now elaborate, somewhat, certain of these major headings that are of special importance in the readjustment aimed at. It must not be supposed that a deep seated disease, which has baffled the best economic specialists by its stubborn and frequently violent symptoms, a disease that is so chronic that those whom it has made ill have, indeed, confused its manifestations with those of normality, can be cured with mere bread and water or sugar pills. Nay, the patient, in this case, is so near dissolution that a strong and bitter remedy must be administered, an aqua fortis as it were, and the reactions may be, at first, convulsive, and akin to the agonies of resuscitation.

The reader will have already noted those of the above headings that constitute the point of adjustment, or moderation, between the crystallized theories of extreme capitalism and its polar opposite, socialism. This balance, in the midst of unbalance, is one of the greatest contributions in economic thought to be unfolded by Bahá'u'lláh. Fundamentally stated by Bahá'u'lláh, its teaching was extended and applied practically by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Many, perhaps most, of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's most profound discourses on the economic phase of life, were declared on American and Canadian platforms, and in western pulpits.

Capitalism and socialism

The sternest and most unrelenting objection to the adoption of the maxims of socialism has been and is its supposed assault upon the right to hold private property, and its feared interference with the vested right of individual initiative. In western countries this threat to an ancient inheritance of individual rights has produced a determined resistance that has successfully curbed any noteworthy political advance of the socialist state. No socialist political party, even in the brief days of power it may have attained in a few instances, has applied to the government of the state the full impact of socialism. This is because of this inherent, somewhat unaccountable urge within the [XXIII:4:111] human breast, which instinctively opposes any undue limitation of its alleged right to self-expression and self-advancement. Russia alone has succeeded, through the terrorism of revolution and regicide, in implanting a new theory of government, pseudo-socialistic in its nature, but only by the institution of a new ruling class deriving its power from a minority of the population. But the differentiation of class is not, per se, a basic doctrine of true rather, an average levelling of all society, and the ultimate elimination of economic class distinctions.

The prime defect of capitalism

The Bahá'í Economic Plan supplies the remedy for two major defects in the capitalistic and socialistic conceptions. As stated above, it is the moderating force that ever seeks the equilibrium of the two extremities or opposing polarities. The defect of capitalism has been its unwillingness to apply the doctrine of human unity in its relationship with the working class; its failure to recognize its interdependence, which calls for sharing and co-operation, with the other integral elements of the business organism. Regardless of the increase of profits in favourable times, notwithstanding the lowering of the cost of operation and production through the wholesale discharge of workers occasioned by new labour-saving machinery, the capitalistic idea has, in the main, been to absorb for itself, its owners and stockholders, every dollar of net profit. The true theory, however, is that the benefits derived from new inventions be distributed, in a reasonable and just way, to those directly affected, in this case both employer and employee. Every invention adapted to industry is, in reality, clothed with a public interest in which the worker has a share. Both justice and equity require that the employer, alone, be not permitted to absorb 100% of the benefits. Independent of the profit sharing plan, elsewhere treated, this blow to labour may be at least in part redressed by new and diminished schedules of working hours, thus making unnecessary the discharge of workers, while at the same time preserving wage schedules so far as possible. Such action would have an intensely stabilizing effect. Very recently, one of the largest industrial corporations in America has announced its intention to place its workers on a six hour basis, while simultaneously increasing its working forces to correspond with the new conditions.

The fundamental defect of socialism

The inherent defect in the socialistic philosophy, on the other hand, is its philosophical inability to recognize the innate and created differences in human capacity and attainment. Any departure from the conception of humanity as an organism, merely confuses the issue. The organic relationships are synonymous with the differences in capacities; and each proves the existence of the other. This being true, no dead level can be successfully brought about in human society. The function of the heart can never be imposed upon the function of the liver, or the finger nails. To attempt this is only to repeat the dubious experiment of Lycurgus, King of Sparta, who divided all the property of the king- [XXIII:4:112] dom equally, and assigned to each man his place. After Lycurgus left the kingdom, believing it to be permanently established in accordance with his plan, these innate differences of capacity among his former subjects speedily reasserted themselves, and the old order was re-established.

Reciprocal and organic co-operation essential to human happiness

The problem, therefore, is to build, in accordance with the new order of this century, the true reciprocal co-operation between all the human cells of this vast organism, in closest mutual service. This is the true law of being; this is the condition basically essential to the happiness and welfare of humanity. Under such a condition, there will be no extreme poverty, no man without the necessities of life. Nor will it be possible for a wealthy man, possessed of means far beyond his needs, to live in happiness side by side with one who is starving and wretched. The trust principle as applied to the economic world is inclusive of the rights of all; it is not only protective of the rights of private property and initiative, but at the same time destroys pauperism and insures the necessities of life, as a right rather than a dole, to every willing worker and to every unfortunate one who without fault on his part is the victim of economic disaster. This truly divine law is the point of reconciliation between the contending forces of capitalism and socialism. It destroys fear and will draw men together in the solution of their common problems. It is the solvent of the chemistry that has arrayed its elements against each other in fear and distrust, leaving itself wide open to the influx of the destructive forces.

The ingredients of the Divine Remedy

Let us turn at this point to the utterances of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and see of what the remedy of the Divine Physician is composed. We are painfully aware of the disease, and the only question is whether we have suffered enough to awaken us to acceptance of a real remedy, rather than to continue to imbibe mere nostrums and sedatives.

We have hitherto refrained from excessive quotation from these Words of Life and Guidance, realizing that this matter must be capable of expression in its practical applications, by a simple layman who may be assumed to represent, to some degree at least, the viewpoint of students of this world wide problem. But any inspiration we have received is due to the power and justice of these Words about to be quoted:

Bahá’u’lláh says:

“O ye rich ones on earth!

“The poor in your midst are My trust; guard ye My trust, and be not intent only on your own ease.”¹

“O children of dust!

“Tell the rich of the midnight sighing of the poor, lest heedlessness lead them into the path of destruction, and deprive them of the Tree of Wealth. To give and to be generous are attributes of Mine; well is it with him that adorneth himself with My virtues.”²

“O son of man!

“Bestow My wealth upon My poor, that in [XXIII:4:113] heaven thou mayest draw from stores of unfading splendour and treasures of imperishable glory. But by My life! To offer up thy soul is a more glorious thing couldst thou but see with Mine eye.”³

“O son of spirit!

“Vaunt not thyself over the poor, for I lead him on his way and behold thee in thy evil plight and confound thee for evermore.”⁴

“O son of man!

“Thou dost wish for gold and I desire thy freedom from it. Thou thinkest thyself rich in its possession, and I recognize thy wealth in thy sanctity therefrom. By My life! This is My knowledge, and that is thy fancy; how can My way accord with thine?”¹

“O son of being!

“If poverty overtake thee, be not sad; for in time the Lord of wealth shall visit thee. Fear not abasement, for glory shall one day rest on thee.”²

“O son of man!

“Should prosperity befall thee, rejoice not, and should abasement come upon thee, grieve not, for both shall pass away and be no more.”³

“O quintessence of passion!

“Put away all covetousness and seek contentment; for the covetous hath ever been deprived, and the contented hath ever been loved and praised.”⁴

“O my servants!

“Ye are the trees of My garden; ye must give forth goodly and wondrous fruits, that ye yourselves and others may profit therefrom. Thus it is incumbent on every one to engage in crafts and professions, for therein lies the secret of wealth, O men of understanding! For results depend upon means, and the grace of God shall be all-sufficient unto you. Trees that yield no fruit have been and will ever be for the fire.”⁵

“O my servant!

“The best of men are they that earn a livelihood by their calling and spend upon themselves and upon their kindred for the love of God, the Lord of all worlds.”⁶

“O oppressors on earth!

“Withdraw your hands from tyranny, for I have pledged Myself not to forgive any man’s injustice. This is My covenant which I have irrevocably decreed in the preserved tablet and sealed with My seal.”⁷

“O children of negligence!

“Set not your affections on mortal sovereignty and rejoice not therein. Ye are even as the unwary bird that with full confidence warbleth upon the bough; till of a sudden the fowler Death throws it upon the dust, and the melody, the form and the colour are gone, leaving not a trace. Wherefore take heed, O bondslaves of desire!”⁸

“It is enjoined upon every one of you to engage in some form of occupation, such as crafts, trades and the like. We have graciously exalted your engagement in such work to the rank of worship unto God, the True One. Ponder ye in your hearts the grace and the blessings of God and render thanks unto Him at eventide and at dawn.”⁹

“O children of men!

“Know ye not why We created you all from the same dust? That no one should exalt himself over the other. Ponder at all times in your hearts how ye were created. Since We have created you all from one same substance it is incumbent on you to be even as one soul, to walk with the same feet, eat with the same mouth and dwell in the same land, that from your inmost being, by your deeds and actions, the signs of oneness and the essence of detachment [XXIII:4:114] may be made manifest. Such is My counsel to you, O concourse of light! Heed ye this counsel that ye may obtain the fruit of holiness from the tree of wondrous glory.”¹

“... through the ideal power he should be free and emancipated from the captivity of the world of nature; for as long as man is captive to nature he is a ferocious animal, as the struggle for existence is one of the exigencies of the world of nature. This matter of the struggle for existence is the fountain-head of all calamities and is the supreme affliction.”²

“Religion is the outer expression of the divine reality. Therefore, it must be living, vitalized, moving and progressive. If it be without motion and non-progressive, it is without the divine life; it is dead. The divine institutes are continuously active and evolutionary; therefore, the revelation of them must be progressive and continuous. All things are subject to reformation. This is a century of life and renewal. Sciences and arts, industry and invention have been reformed. Law and ethics have been reconstituted, reorganized. The world of thought has been regenerated. Sciences of former ages and philosophies of the past are useless today. Present exigencies demand new methods of solution; world problems are without precedent. Old ideas and modes of thought are fast becoming obsolete. Ancient laws and archaic ethical systems will not meet the requirements of modern conditions, for this is clearly the century of a new life, the century of the revelation of reality and, therefore, the greatest of all centuries.”³

“The essence of the matter is that divine justice will become manifest in human conditions and affairs, and all mankind will find comfort and enjoyment in life. It is not meant that all will be equal, for inequality in degree and capacity is a property of nature. Necessarily there will be rich people and also those who will be in want of their livelihood, but in the aggregate community there will be equalization and readjustment of values and interests. In the future there will be no very rich nor extremely poor. There will be an equilibrium of interests, and a condition will be established which will make both rich and poor comfortable and content. This will be an eternal and blessed outcome of the glorious twentieth century which will be realized universally. The significance of it is that the glad tidings of great joy revealed in the promises of the Holy Books will be fulfilled. Await ye this consummation.”⁴

“If wealth were a necessity, Christ would have wished it for himself: He lived a simple life, and one of the titles of Bahá'u'lláh was ‘the poor one’. In Persian His title was ‘darvish’ and that means one who has not a slave.

“All the prophets of God were poor, His Holiness Moses was a mere shepherd. This will show you that in the estimation of God, poverty is greater than the accumulation of wealth—that the poor are more acceptable than the lazy rich. A rich man who spends his wealth for the poor is praiseworthy.”⁵ [XXIII:4:115]

“What could be better before God than thinking of the poor? For the poor are beloved by our heavenly Father. When His Holiness Christ came upon the earth those who believed in him and followed him were the poor and lowly, showing the poor were near to God. When a rich man believes and follows the Manifestation of God it is a proof that his wealth is not an obstacle and does not prevent him from attaining the pathway of salvation. After he has been tested and tried it will be seen whether his possessions are a hindrance in his religious life. But the poor are especially beloved of God. Their lives are full of difficulties, their trials continual, their hopes are in God alone. Therefore you must assist the poor as much as possible, even by sacrifice of yourself. No deed of man is greater before God than helping the poor. Spiritual conditions are not dependent upon the possession of worldly treasures or the absence of them. When physically destitute, spiritual thoughts are more likely. Poverty is stimulus toward God. Each one of you must have great consideration for the poor and render them assistance. Organize in an effort to help them and prevent increase of poverty. The greatest means for prevention is that whereby the laws of the community will be so framed and enacted that it will not be possible for a few to be millionaires and many destitute.”¹

“Then it is clear that the honour and exaltation of man must be something more than material riches. Material comforts are only a branch, but the root of the exaltation of man is the good attributes and virtues which are the adornments of his reality. These are the divine appearances, the heavenly bounties, the sublime emotions, the love and knowledge of God; universal wisdom, intellectual perception, scientific discoveries, justice, equity, truthfulness, benevolence, natural courage and innate fortitude; the respect for rights and the keeping of agreements and covenants; rectitude in all circumstances; serving the truth under all conditions; the sacrifice of one’s life for the good of all people; kindness and esteem for all nations; obedience to the teachings of God; service in the Divine Kingdom; the guidance of the people, and the education of the nations and races. This is the prosperity of the human world! This is the exaltation of man in the world! This is eternal life and heavenly honour!

These virtues do not appear from the reality of man except through the power of God and the divine teachings, for they need supernatural power for their manifestation. It may be that in the world of nature a trace of these perfections may appear, but they are unstable and ephemeral; they are like the rays of the sun upon the wall.

As the compassionate God has placed such a wonderful crown upon the head of man, man should strive that its brilliant jewels may become visible in the world.”²

“The disease which afflicts the body politic is lack of love and absence of altruism. In the hearts of men no real love is found, and the condition is such that, unless their susceptibilities are quickened by some power so that unity, love and accord may develop within them, there can be no healing, no agreement [XXIII:4:116] among mankind. Love and unity are the needs of the body politic today. Without these there can be no progress or prosperity attained. Therefore, the friends of God must adhere to the power which will create this love and unity in the hearts of the sons of men. ... This is an exigency of the times, and the divine remedy has been provided. The spiritual teachings of the religion of God can alone create this love, unity and accord in human hearts.

“Therefore, hold to these heavenly agencies which God has provided so that through the love of God this soul-bond may be established, this heart-attachment realized and the light of the reality of unity be reflected from you throughout the universe.”³

“The fundamentals of the whole economic condition are divine in nature and are associated with the world of the heart and spirit. This is fully explained in the Bahá’í teaching, and without knowledge of its principles no improvement in the economic state can be realized.”¹

“Among the results of the manifestation of spiritual forces will be that the human world will adapt itself to a new social form, the justice of God will become manifest throughout human affairs, and human equality will be universally established. The poor will receive a great bestowal, and the rich attain eternal happiness. For although at the present time the rich enjoy the greatest luxury and comfort, they are nevertheless deprived of eternal happiness; for eternal happiness is contingent upon giving, and the poor are everywhere in the state of abject need. Through the manifestation of God’s great equity the poor of the world will be rewarded and assisted fully, and there will be a readjustment in the economic conditions of mankind so that in the future there will not be the abnormally rich nor the abject poor. The rich will enjoy the privilege of this new economic condition as well as the poor, for owing to certain provisions and restrictions they will not be able to accumulate so much as to be burdened by its management, while the poor will be relieved from the stress of want and misery. The rich will enjoy his palace, and the poor will have his comfortable cottage.”²

“The mystery of this phenomenon, the cause thereof is this, that mankind has been created from one single origin, has branched off from one family. Thus in reality all mankind represents one family. God has not created any difference. He has created all as one that thus this family might live in perfect happiness and well-being.

“Regarding reciprocity and co-operation: each member of the body politic should live in the utmost comfort and welfare because each individual member of humanity is a member of the body politic and if one member of the members be in distress or be afflicted with some disease all the other members must necessarily suffer. For example, a member of the human organism is the eye.”³

The sympathetic nervous system of the body of mankind

“If the eye should be affected that affliction would affect the whole nervous system. Hence, if a member of the body politic becomes afflicted, in reality, from the standpoint of sympathetic connection, all will share that affliction since this (one afflicted) is a member of the group of members, a part of the whole. Is it possible for one member or part to be in distress and the other members to be at ease? It is impossible! Hence God has desired that in the body politic of humanity each one shall enjoy perfect welfare and comfort.”⁴

A disordered household

“Although the body politic is one family yet because of lack of harmonious relations some members are comfortable and some in direst misery, some members are satisfied and some are hungry, some members are clothed in most costly garments and some families are in need of food and shelter. Why? Because this family lacks the necessary reciprocity and symmetry. This household is not well arranged. This household is not living under a perfect law. All the laws which are legislated do not ensure happiness. They do not provide comfort. Therefore a law must be given to this family by means of which all the members of this family will enjoy equal well-being and happiness.

⁴ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Foundations of World Unity, p. 38.

“Is it possible for one member of a family to be subjected to the utmost misery and to abject poverty and for the rest of the family to be comfortable? It is impossible unless those members of the family be senseless, atrophied, inhospitable, unkind. Then they would say, ‘Though these members do belong to our family—let them alone. Let us look after ourselves. Let them die. So long as I am comfortable, I am honoured, I am happy—this my brother—let him die. If he be in misery let him remain in misery, so long as I am comfortable. If he is hungry let him remain so; I am satisfied. If he is without clothes, so long as I am clothed, let him remain as he is. If he is shelterless, homeless, so long as I have a home, let him remain in the wilderness.’

“Such utter indifference in the human family is due to lack of control, to lack of a working law, to lack of kindness in its midst. If kindness had been shown to the members of this family surely all the members thereof would have enjoyed comfort and happiness.”¹

“God is not partial and is no respecter of persons. He has made provision for all. The harvest comes forth for everyone. The rain showers upon everybody and the heat of the sun is destined to warm everyone. The verdure of the earth is for everyone. Therefore there should be for all humanity the utmost happiness, the utmost comfort, the utmost well-being.

“But if conditions are such that some are happy and comfortable and some in misery; some are accumulating exorbitant wealth and others are in dire want—under such a system it is impossible for man to be happy and impossible for him to win the good pleasure of God. God is kind to all. The good pleasure of God consists in the welfare of all the individual members of mankind.”²

The infinite design of universal brotherhood

“The purport is this that we are all inhabiting one globe of earth. In reality we are one family and each one of us is a member of this family. We must all be in the greatest happiness and [XXIII:4:118] comfort, under a just rule and regulation which is according to the good pleasure of God, thus causing us to be happy, for this life is fleeting.”³

The selfish man is lower than the animal

“The man who thinks only of himself and is thoughtless of others is undoubtedly inferior to the animal because the animal is not possessed of the reasoning faculty. The animal is excused; but in man there is reason, the faculty of justice, the faculty of mercifulness. Possessing all these faculties he must not leave them unused. He who is so hard-hearted as to think only of his own comfort, such a one will not be called man.

“We ask God to endow human souls with justice so that they may be fair, and may strive to provide for the comfort of all, that each member of humanity may pass his life in the utmost comfort and welfare. Then this material world will become the very paradise of the Kingdom, this elemental earth will be in a heavenly state and all the servants of God will live in the utmost joy, happiness and gladness. We must all strive and concentrate all our thoughts in order that such happiness may accrue to the world of humanity.”⁴

“The solution begins with the village, and when the village is reconstructed, then the cities will be also. The idea is this, that in each village will be erected a store-house. In the language of Religion it is called the House of Finance. That is a universal store-house, which is commenced in the village. Its administration is through a committee of the wise ones of the community, and with the approval of that committee all the affairs are directed.”¹

The storehouse and the trust fund—its receipts and expenditures

“First, whatever contributions are necessary, they obtain from the bank at interest. For instance, they borrow from the bank at three per cent and loan to the public at four per cent. Any farmer who is in need of implements, they supply and give him all his necessities. When the crop is harvested, it will be the first income (of the store-house). The first revenue is this. But this revenue is not equally distributed. For instance, a person may have a crop of one thousand kilos and this is only sufficient for his wants and living. From him nothing will be taken because he needs it all. If something is taken from him, he will remain hungry. But again, there may be one whose needs require one thousand kilos and his income is two thousand kilos. From him one-tenth is taken. Again, one needs two thousand kilos, but his income is ten thousand kilos. From him two-tenths will be taken. He needs two thousand kilos. If two thousand are taken from him he still has six thousand remaining. One has fifty thousand kilos, from him one-third is taken. One may have ten thousand kilos expenses, but has one hundred thousand kilos income. One-half is taken. The greater the income, the greater is the ratio (of taxation).

“Second: It is also the same with the cattle. They take proportionately the revenue from the cattle. For example, if a man has two cows necessary for his wants, nothing is taken from him. The more he has, the more is taken from him. [XXIII:4:119] This is the second revenue.

“The third revenue of the store-house comes from one who dies without heirs.

“The fourth revenue comes from mines. If a mine is found upon the land of a person, one-third of it belongs to him and the remainder to the store-house.

“The fifth revenue is hidden treasure. If a person finds a hidden treasure (in the earth) he takes half of it, and the other half goes to the store-house.

“The sixth revenue. If it (treasure) is found on the way, also half of it belongs to the store-house.

“The seventh revenue is voluntary contributions. Of their own free will and with the utmost willingness, the people will give.

“These are the seven revenues, but there are seven fixed expenditures.

“The first expenditure: The store-house ought to give one-tenth to the Government, to the public treasury for the public expenses.

“The second expenditure is for the poor. The poor who are in need, those who are exempt, not those who are idle. For instance, if a person’s crop is burned or he has a loss in his business, and for this reason has become poor; these poor people are to be taken care of.

“Third: The infirm, who come to want and cannot work.

“Fourth: The orphans. To them also help must be given.

“Fifth: The schools. The schools must be organized for the education of the children.

“Sixth: For the deaf and blind.

“Seventh: Public health. Whatever is necessary for the public health must be arranged.

Swamps should be filled up, water should be brought in; whatever is necessary for the public health.

“If there is something left over (after these expenditures) it should be given to the Great House of Justice. And thus there will be no want in the village. The people will not remain hungry, they will not remain naked. All will be in the utmost welfare and comfort.”¹

“The right of every human being to the daily bread whereby they exist, or the equalization of the means of livelihood.

“The arrangements of the circumstances of the people must be such that poverty shall disappear, that everyone, as far as possible, according to his rank and position, shall share in comfort and well-being.”²

“A financier with colossal wealth should not exist whilst near him is a poor man in dire necessity. When we see poverty allowed to reach a condition of starvation it is a sure sign that somewhere we shall find tyranny. Men must bestir themselves in this matter, and no longer delay in altering conditions which bring the misery of grinding poverty to a very large number of the people. The rich must give of their abundance, they must soften their hearts and cultivate a compassionate intelligence, taking thought for those sad ones who are suffering from lack of the very necessities of life.”³

“Bahá'u'lláh has revealed principles and laws [XXIII:4:120] which will accomplish the adjustment of varying human capacities. He has said that whatsoever is possible of accomplishment in human government will be effected through these principles. When the laws he has instituted are carried out there will be no millionaires possible in the community and likewise no extremely poor. This will be effected and regulated by adjusting the different degrees of human capacity. The fundamental basis of the community is agriculture, tillage of the soil. All must be producers.”⁴

The principle of tax exemption

“But here is the real solution. The rich should be merciful to the poor, but with their free-will, not with force. Should it be with force it would be useless. It should be according to law and not by violence, so that through a general law every one might know his duty. For example, a rich person has a large income and a poor person a small income. To put it in a more explicit way: a rich person in this case must be exempt from taxes. If the poor person gives one-tenth of his income and the rich person one-tenth of his income, it will be unjust. Thus in this way a law should be made that the poor person who has only ten kilos and needs them all for his necessary food, be exempt from paying taxes. But if the rich person, who has ten thousand kilos, pays one-tenth or two-tenths taxes on his products, it will not be a hardship to him. For example, if he gives two thousand kilos, he will still have eight thousand kilos. If a person has fifty thousand kilos, even though he gives ten thousand kilos he will still have forty thousand kilos. Therefore, laws must be made in this way. These laws must do away with the present system of wages and earnings. If today the owners of factories increase the wages of their employees, after a month or a year, they will again cry and strike and ask for more increase. This work has no end.”⁵

The farm community

“For example, the farmers plant near a village. They get products from their cultivation.

They take one-tenth from the rich and the poor according to their income. A general store may be built in that village for all the incomes and products to be brought therein. Then it will be considered who is rich and who is poor. The farmers whose incomes are sufficient only for their food and expenses must be free from paying taxes. All products and incomes gathered and collected must be put in the general store. If there is a helpless one in that village his daily needs must be given to him. On the other hand a rich person who needs only fifty kilos of products and still have five hundred thousand kilos, after all his expenses are paid, should be taxed two-tenths and at the end of the year whatever remains in the store should be distributed for the general expenses.”¹

Protection for every class

“The seventh teaching [universal education] suggests a plan whereby all the individual members may enjoy the utmost comfort and welfare. The degrees of [XXIII:4:121] society must be preserved. The farmer will continue to till the soil, the artist pursue his art, the banker to finance the nation. An army has need of its general, captain, and private soldiers. The degrees varying with the pursuits are essential. But in this Bahá’í plan there is no class hatred. Each is to be protected and each individual member of the body politic is to live in the greatest comfort and happiness. Work is to be provided for all and there will be no needy ones seen in the streets.”²

“He [Bahá’u’lláh] has set forth the solution and provided the remedy for the economic question. No religious Books of the past Prophets speak of this important human problem.”³

“... Bahá’u’lláh set forth principles of guidance and teaching for economic readjustment. Regulations were revealed by Him which ensure the welfare of the commonwealth. As the rich man enjoys his life surrounded by ease and luxuries, so the poor man must, likewise, have a home and be provided with sustenance and comforts commensurate with his needs. This readjustment of the social economy is of the greatest importance inasmuch as it ensures the stability of the world of humanity; and until it is effected, happiness and prosperity are impossible.”⁴

Voluntary service by the wealthy—the true equality

“But in the divine teachings equality is brought about through a ready willingness to share. It is commanded as regards wealth that the rich among the people, and the aristocrats should, by their own free will and for the sake of their own happiness, concern themselves with and care for the poor. This equality is the result of the lofty characteristics and noble attributes of mankind.”⁵

“One of the most important principles of the Teaching of Bahá’u’lláh is:

“The right of every human being to the daily bread whereby they exist, or the equalization of the means of livelihood.

“The arrangements of the circumstances of the people must be such that poverty shall disappear, that everyone, as far as possible, according to his rank and position, shall share in comfort and well-being.

“We see amongst us men who are overburdened with riches on the one hand, and on the other those unfortunate ones who starve with nothing; those who possess several stately palaces, and those who have not where to lay their head. Some we find with numerous courses of costly and dainty food; whilst others can scarce find sufficient crusts to keep them alive. Whilst some are clothed in velvets, furs and fine linen, others have insufficient, poor and thin garments with which to protect them from the cold.

“This condition of affairs is wrong, and must be remedied.”¹

Equality in capacity is impossible

“The remedy, however, cannot consist in the bringing to pass of equality, absolute equality among men; this would be impossible. There is needed some organization which will bring about an order in this disorder. Equality is a mere dream and absolutely impracticable. If Equality existed the whole order of the world would be destroyed. In mankind there is always a difference in degree. Since creation men have never been the same. Some have superior intelligence, others are more ordinary and some are devoid of intellect. How can there ever exist equality between those who are clever and those who are not? Humanity is like an army. An army must have a general, captains and soldiers, each with their appointed duties; it cannot consist of generals only, or captains, or soldiers only—there must be degrees in the organization.”² [XXIII:4:122]

The tyranny of starvation

“Some are too rich, some are too poor, some have millions and some have nothing. An organization is necessary to control this state of affairs. It is necessary to limit riches or it is necessary to limit poverty. Either extreme is wrong. There should be a medium state. If it is right for a capitalist to possess a great fortune, then it is also just that a workman should have means of existence. If poverty is allowed to reach a condition of starvation, it proves that there is a tyranny. Men must see that this does not happen in any case. There must be special laws. The rich must give of their plenty. If they have more than they need they must think of those who are in want.

“The government of a country should make laws which conform to the Divine Law. The Law of God exacts that there should be neither excessive wealth nor excessive poverty.”³

Excessive wealth and excessive poverty alike are forbidden

“There is need of an equalization so that all may have an apportionment in the comforts of life. For example, the wealthy man, whose table is adorned with all kinds of delicacies, must allow the poor to have at least his necessities. It is not right that one should have all the delicacies and all foods on his table when another is in want of the necessities of life. The rich must be merciful to the poor and out of their own willing hearts should they uplift them, they should not be forced. There must be a readjustment and legislation which shall equalize conditions until humankind may have composure and rest with utmost ease.”⁴

“O people of wealth and riches! If you see a poor man suffering from any calamity, do not run away from him, but sit with him and ask him about the things heaped upon him from the seas of determination and predestination.”⁵

Legislation essential

“The Bahá’í Cause covers all economic and social questions under the heading and ruling of its laws. The essence of the Bahá’í spirit is that, in order to establish a better social order and economic condition, there must be allegiance to the laws and principles of government. Under the laws which are to govern the world, the socialists may justly demand human rights but without resort to force and violence. The governments will enact these laws, establishing just legislation and economics in order that all humanity may enjoy a full measure of welfare and privilege; but this will always be according to legal protection and procedure. Without legislative administration, rights and demands fail, and the welfare of the commonwealth cannot be realized. Today the method of demand is the strike and resort to force, which is manifestly wrong and destructive of human foundations. Rightful privilege and demand must be set forth in laws and regulations.”¹

The cementing of the hearts through love

“While thousands are considering these questions, we have [XXIII:4:123] more essential purposes. The fundamentals of the whole economic condition are divine in nature and are associated with the world of the heart and spirit. This is fully explained in the Bahá’í teaching, and without knowledge of its principles no improvement in the economic state can be realized. The Bahá’ís will bring about this improvement and betterment but not through sedition and appeal to physical force—not through warfare, but welfare. Hearts must be so cemented together, love must become so dominant that the rich shall most willingly extend assistance to the poor and take steps to establish these economic adjustments permanently. If it is accomplished in this way, it will be most praiseworthy because then it will be for the sake of God and in the pathway of His service. For example, it will be as if the rich inhabitants of a city should say, ‘It is neither just nor lawful that we should possess great wealth while there is abject poverty in this community,’ and then willingly give their wealth to the poor, retaining only as much as will enable them to live comfortably.”²

“... man should know his own self and recognize that which leadeth unto loftiness or lowliness, glory or abasement, wealth or poverty. Having attained the stage of fulfilment and reached his maturity, man standeth in need of wealth, and such wealth as he acquireth through crafts or professions is commendable and praiseworthy in the estimation of men of wisdom, and especially in the eyes of servants who dedicate themselves to the education of the world and to the edification of its peoples. They are, in truth, cup-bearers of the life-giving water of knowledge and guides unto the ideal way. They direct the peoples of the world to the straight path and acquaint them with that which is conducive to human upliftment and exaltation.”³

Wages and a share of the profits to employees

“For instance, the manufacturers and the industrialists heap up a treasure each day, and the poor artisans do not gain their daily sustenance: that is the height of iniquity, and no just man can accept it. Therefore, laws and regulations should be established which would permit the workmen to receive from the factory owner their wages and a share in the fourth or the fifth part of the profits, according to the capacity of the factory; or in some other way the body of workmen and the manufacturers should share equitably the profits and advantages. Indeed, the capital and management come from the owner of the factory, and the work and labour, from the body of the workmen. Either the workmen should receive wages which assure them an adequate support and, when they cease work, becoming feeble or helpless, they should have sufficient benefits from the income of the industry; or the wages should be high enough to satisfy the workmen with the amount they receive so that they may themselves be able to put a little aside for days of want and helplessness.”¹

“Good God! Is it possible that, seeing one of his fellow-creatures starving, destitute of everything, a man can rest and live comfortably in his luxurious mansion? He who meets another in the greatest misery, can he enjoy his fortune? That [XXIII:4:124] is why, in the Religion of God, it is prescribed and established that wealthy men each year give over a certain part of their fortune for the maintenance of the poor and unfortunate. That is the foundation of the Religion of God and is binding upon all.

“And as man in this way is not forced nor obliged by the government, but is by the natural tendency of his good heart voluntarily and radiantly showing benevolence toward the poor, such a deed is much praised, approved and pleasing.

“Such is the meaning of the good works in the Divine Books and Tablets.”²

An international assembly should concur on a wise and moderate law for the protection of both employers and employees

“Now I want to tell you about the law of God. According to the divine law, employees should not be paid merely by wages. Nay, rather they should be partners in every work. The question of socialization is very difficult. It will not be solved by strikes for wages. All the governments of the world must be united, and organize an assembly, the members of which shall be elected from the parliaments and the noble ones of the nations. These must plan with wisdom and power, so that neither the capitalists suffer enormous losses, nor the labourers become needy. In the utmost moderation they should make the law, then announce to the public that the rights of the working people are to be effectively preserved; also the rights of the capitalists are to be protected. When such a general law is adopted, by the will of both sides, should a strike occur, all the governments of the world should collectively resist it. Otherwise the work will lead to much destruction, especially in Europe. Terrible things will take place.”³

How to procure sincerity and efficiency among the workers

“For instance, the owners of properties, mines and factories should share their incomes with their employees and give a fairly certain percentage of their products to their workingmen in order that the employees may receive, beside their wages, some of the general income of the factory so that the employee may strive with his soul in the work.

“No more trusts will remain in the future. The question of the trusts will be wiped away entirely. Also, every factory that has ten thousand shares will give two thousand shares of these ten thousand to its employees and will write the shares in their names, so that they may have them, and the rest will belong to the capitalists. Then at the end of the month or year whatever they may earn after the expenses and wages are paid, according to the number of shares, should be divided among both. In reality, so far great injustice has befallen the common people. Laws must be made because it is impossible for the labourers to be satisfied with the present system. They will strike every month and every year. Finally, the capitalists will lose. In ancient times a strike occurred among the Turkish soldiers. They said to the government: ‘Our wages are very small and they should be increased.’ The govern- [XXIII:4:125] ment was forced to give them their demands. Shortly afterwards they struck again. Finally all the incomes went to the pockets of the soldiers to the extent that they killed the king, saying: ‘Why didst thou not increase the income so that we might have received more?"¹

The message of love, peace and unity for our social and economic life

The above quotations are but a few of those that might be adduced from the writings and discourses of Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá, if space permitted, directly applicable to this intimate study of human relationships. We have, however, had to rest content with these basic extracts from a source whose every utterance is a call to humanity's inmost reality; a message of love, peace, and unity for the race; a universal diagnosis and prescription. The true physician penetrates the veil of symptoms into the field of causation. Likewise, when he finds the body overcome with a complication of diseases, he is not concerned with one disordered function only, but seeks the remote cause that has also affected or infected the other organs. The dawn of its maturity has come upon the race. The playthings and crass ignorance of childhood days have been set aside. The newly understood unity of science and religion calls for the adaptation of scientific principles to our economic life. These principles, being essentially divine, cannot conflict with the fundamental religious foundation which is the love of God and of mankind, (which Christ defined as both "the law and the prophets" and the knowledge of God, the eternal search for which is the revealer of science and heavenly mysteries. It is the lack of this love, and ignorance of this knowledge that the Wise Physician has declared to be the primary cause of man's present turmoil and ravaging illness.

A new economic axiom

The introduction of the trust principle, i.e. that the poor are a divine trust, possessing certain rights as contrasted with mere charity, establishes a new economic axiom: That every human being, who is willing to work, is entitled, as of right, to the necessities of life. Since the Creator has made sufficient provision for all, and has deposited in the earth the elements essential to the production of food and shelter, it is no longer allowable that any man should starve or be without the means of existence. Man, generically speaking, is a beneficiary of the bountiful trust confided to nature by the Lord of men. More than this, he is, in the sight of God, a beneficiary of the soul impulses of his fellow men. If a beneficiary, he is entitled to a share in the proceeds of this trust endowment. In his turn, he must contribute to the general enrichment through his labour, art or calling, and be not found wanting in this.

War expenditures doomed by the new world order

The governments and communities must make work available when ordinary means fail. Relieved of the enormous burden of war expenditures, which will surely come to pass, the internal adjustments of a people will be subjected to a far deeper scrutiny than has yet been possible, and the surplus wealth of governments and general co-operative contributions [XXIII:4:126] alike devoted to the constructive up building of the New Order.

A new emphasis upon the evolvment of individual destinies

Poor houses, and pauperism, would be erased from the picture. The millions of underfed and under developed, now deprived of normal development both of body and soul, will find transformation through attaining to their destined place in the organic life. The innate qualities of growing children will be lovingly and carefully studied by a new type of teacher, so that the God given talents may be early ascertained, and the divers capacities encouraged and led to their special goal of service. New knowledge and new scientific means of determining the innate capacity of a soul will be uncovered. Poor bankers will no longer be made out of good mechanics; and boys and girls who love the soil and the sweet tang of country air will not, for lack of this knowledge, find themselves in a clerical position. The inner realities of human beings will tend to a greater revealment for the abundance they attract.

The right to the necessities of life

The second important change in our social structure is the principle of mutual assistance. This has already been referred to as the right to necessities. A farmer whose crop is ruined by forces beyond his control, a widow with young children, a cripple unable to work, a worker ill and without means, an orphan lacking kind relatives, an unemployed though willing and self-respecting worker or artisan, all these and a hundred other types of misfortune that are daily encountered, are protected under this plan from the loss of self-respect, or from sinking into criminality, or from the humiliation of poor relief and the cognomen¹ of pauper. These possess a right to share in the abundance of their common mother, earth. God does not withhold from such His rain and sunshine. The children of men must not withhold from their neighbours and brothers of the race, these rights which the Mercy of God bestows, nor classify them as outcasts. Under this system, a man can, with head up and eyes unashamed, reveal to his village House of Justice his needs, his woes, his hopes, and be conscious that, in so doing, he is but receiving what is due him as a child of God. His need is usually but temporary and let it not be supposed that the vast majority of mankind fall short in self-respect. He offers to work, and work is given, but his crushing temporary burden of debt and anxiety has been lifted, and he breathes a prayer of thanksgiving for this evidence of Divine Providence among his fellow men. A year hence he may be contributing to the funds of the common storehouse. The new consciousness that will be built through experiences like these, will enrich humanity for the bars of individual and isolated selfishness have been rent asunder; the sharp claws of nature have been clipped.

A new principle of taxation

Two sweeping changes appear. One is limitation upon the taxing power; and, by the same token, an expansion of that power. In the first case, the power of the community or government to tax would come into being only when the income of [XXIII:4:127] the citizen exceeds his actual necessary expenses. Up to that point, he is exempt, since to tax him would be an act of tyranny, in that it would automatically deprive him of at least a portion of his necessities, thus defeating the essential purpose. This is a new principle in taxation.

The expansion of the tax power, however, as it would apply to the incomes in the higher levels, is not a new principle, at least in certain western countries. The graduated income tax has become almost a tradition. The tithe, moreover, has a most ancient inheritance, even to the days of Melchizedek, King of Salem, to whom the patriarch and prophet Abraham rendered the tithe. Originally the rights of God—the tithe, through this new and merciful command, becomes the means of succour to the unfortunate, as well as the salvation of the state.

When we speak of the tithe or income tax under the Bahá'í plan the meaning is an inclusive one. In most countries today where the income tax is in effect, enormous holdings of tax exempt securities are in the hands of the people and no revenue is derived from the holders in respect to the actual income from these intangibles. This is inconsistent with the just application of the spiritual and universal principle involved in the income tax as set forth in the Bahá'í writings. Not only tax exempt securities but a vast quantity of other intangible personal property, upon which taxes should rightly be paid at present, escape these levies. In one great commonwealth or state of America, the Tax Commissioner estimated that while the State was receiving taxes on approximately three billion dollars worth of real estate, there was at least nine billion more of intangibles escaping or exempted from taxation. This was before the income tax was enacted. What proportion of the taxable property of this particular state still escapes taxation under the income tax statute is not accurately known, but there can be no question that it is very large. It follows that a system of income taxation imposed under the high spiritual standards which have been stated as flowing from the Bahá'í plan, would greatly benefit the community, would equalize and perhaps minimize the rate or percentage of taxation now necessary under the partial application of the law, and would, above all, spread the tax into those areas hitherto untouched, whose responsibilities have had to be assumed by the middle classes of wage earners, professionals and businessmen. The fact that since the inauguration of income taxes, the volume of tax exempt securities has grown to an enormous extent, lends added emphasis to the need of the introduction of an impartial and universal system under which all income producing property be disclosed and assessed. Applying such a principle, the right of states or nations to issue tax exempt intangibles must be subjected to the closest scrutiny. The principles of interdependence and co-operation cannot admit of any indirect evasion which results in laying upon any class or level of income a burden greater than justice permits.

In this plan, however, emphasis is laid upon the preservation of the right of individual initiative, capacity, and private ownership. Whatever expansion the taxing power achieves, it will always fall short, substantially short of confiscation. An abundant residue is retained by the wealthy man who has generously contributed to the welfare of the commonwealth, and his initiative [XXIII:4:128] is never deprived of its reward. Nevertheless, through his recognition of his innate relationship with the living organism of his community, he has furnished that co-operation and reciprocal help that the organic life requires for its health and well-being. For example, the brain demands and receives the largest volume of blood, in the entire circulation of the body. For this, it renders the most vital and commanding service. Similarly, those in the high places of the tower of humanity, must reciprocate.

Capitalists and socialists meet at the balanced point of moderation

And here, I believe, we will hear the "well done" of the socialist. Capital, so long entrenched, will, under this plan, step into its true place in the economic organism. It will have taken a long step toward the middle position, the path of moderation. Socialism, which is essentially a justified protest against the hardships of the present economic system, likewise, will advance toward that greatly to be desired equilibrium—and the two contending theories of social and industrial life find union in their common sacrifices. The principle of individual ownership and initiative, the degrees of capacity and service have been maintained, and on the other hand, the recognition of a common humanity, organic co-operation, and the rights of all men, have been subserved and instituted. Meditate upon this divinely practical and practically divine plan, ye who are at present full of fear of the future, and ye who have become almost disheartened and discouraged over the intractable abyss that has separated you from your brothers! Adopt this plan and invite the warming life giving forces of composition, health and happiness, for this is one picture of human unity and mutuality.

The dole

In the face of this system, the dole loses its appeal and fades away to nothingness. The plan, through which a nation, or state virtually chloroforms its unemployed into quiescence by opening its treasury to weekly unearned stipends, is both faulty and dangerous. It is only another symptom of social disorder. Ignoring the law of work and self-respect, the dole is an artificial political remedy with reactionary final results. Outside the law of compensation for services rendered, it cannot be regarded as a permanent or effective means of solving this all embracing problem. The principle involved differs widely from that herein set forth, which affirms the sacredness and essentiality of work, and provision for work. Although seemingly parallel to the Bahá'í plan, in providing means from the public treasury to those in need or unfortunate, the parallelism fades because the basis upon which aid is given is, in the one case, based upon charity, and in the other, upon right. Moreover, the dole deals mainly with unemployment, while this plan covers the entire field of misfortune. The dole is the extended hand of the state to its unemployed, needy ones, but it does not confer employment. The hand of labour is nerveless, for lack of available work. No service appears, to balance the payment. More basically, the need and excuse for the dole is brought about by the existence of the very disorders in our [XXIII:4:129] general economic life, which are alone responsible for these terrific fluctuations in the demand and supply of labour, these recurring industrial depressions whose cure depends upon the administration of all the ingredients of the divine prescription, not one only. While the dole is a gesture along the line of least resistance, to quiet a threatened revolutionary impulse on the part of the hungry and destitute, it is admittedly ineffective in any permanent sense. That prosperity which in current parlance is always "just around the corner" if too long delayed, will come too late to preserve the financial integrity of a state weakened and emasculated by the employment of a purely artificial device as a substitute for employment. We readily admit that in the present state of the economic consciousness, some such method was inevitable. We are not criticizing those who invented the dole. No other avenue was at hand. We are, however, criticizing the hit or miss system which made it necessary. The new consciousness of man's real organic life, which sees the material and spiritual civilizations indissolubly joined, which rejects and denies the right of purely material interests to dominate, any longer, the destinies of mankind, will insist upon the establishment of the balance. Material and selfish interests have deprived this organic body of its soul, notwithstanding that the body without the soul is as a lamp lacking both oil and light. To join these once more together is as 'Abdu'l-Bahá expressed it—"light upon light". The day of overweening material dominion is swiftly passing. Love and brotherhood will attract and establish the spiritual elements of civilization side by side with our material necessities.

The challenging statistics of depression

In the industrial depression of 1920–21, the wages of workers in the United States were cut approximately 23%, but dividends decreased but 3%, while at the same time interest paid on investments increased $71,000,000. In this current depression, 1930–31, the aggregate wages paid in 1930 diminished to the extent of $9,600,000,000, while during the same period, astonishing to relate, interest payments and dividends rose from the 1929 figures of $7,500,000,000 to a total of $8,000,000,000. This is stated on the authority of a recent article in Collier's, by Mr Owen P. White. These figures, if accurate, disclose the protection which employers in industry accord themselves in troublous times, and illustrate the fact that the worker, discharged or on half time, pays the real price of the depression, and is, in effect, its principal victim. It is fair to assume, as well, that the use of labour saving machinery, without regard to the just interests of labour, has played a substantial part in this inequality of distribution of the earnings of industry. No more concrete example of the doctrine of living "unto oneself" need be adduced than these amazing statistics. This is the direct application of the theory of separation, and the denial of organic reciprocity.

Unemployment reserves

Now, in paying out these huge sums to stockholders and investors during depressed periods, it must be assumed that industry at least to some [XXIII:4:130] extent, drew upon corporate reserves accumulated in more prosperous years. The author of the article referred to, cites several illuminating facts on this subject, and applies the existence of such reserve funds directly to the subject of unemployment reserve insurance. 'Abdu'l-Bahá, in one of His discourses on the matter of profit sharing, says that other means of alleviating the lack of work should also be employed. In good business years, this unemployment reserve plan has built up, in several major instances in America, a solvent fund which, in the present crisis, has operated to keep the unemployed workers from these factories from the bread lines. Three per cent of the payroll was set aside in this fund by the employers, one and one-half per cent by the employees, during the favourable years, and from this, during the existing depression, thirty per cent of full time wages was paid each entitled worker. Were this system allowed to operate during a reasonably long term of favourable years, it would undoubtedly accumulate, through investment and interest, to a point enabling an even larger percentage of normal earnings to be paid in the time of need. But as Mr White points out, this thirty per cent has preserved the self-respect of these workers, and is the best argument against the dole, or even the charitable community chest.

Another large and well known corporation, which put this system in operation in 1915, found the accumulation, in 1930, warranted a payment to its unemployed workers, with dependents, of eighty per cent of their normal wage, and sixty per cent to those without dependents. Numerous other examples are cited, in which large, fore sighted corporations have installed this beneficent plan. These reserve funds must always remain solvent, and in case of unduly protracted periods of unemployment, the depletion of the fund would terminate its benefits until it again became solvent. This constructive and humane plan is an example of what unemployment insurance can accomplish. Stabilization in industry is an attainable goal once the minds and hearts of employers are opened to the influx of the spirit of the age. Every such measure will surely attract the divine confirmation.

The love of God

In one of His Tablets Bahá'u'lláh says:

“The fear of God hath ever been the prime factor in the education of His creatures. Well is it with them that have attained thereunto!”¹

“The fear of God hath ever been a sure defence and a safe stronghold for all the peoples of the world. It is the chief cause of the protection of mankind, and the supreme instrument for its preservation.”²

“Religion is, verily, the chief instrument for the establishment of order in the world, and of tranquillity amongst its peoples. The weakening of the pillars of religion hath strengthened the foolish, and emboldened them, and made them more arrogant. Verily I say: The greater the decline of religion, the more grievous the waywardness of the ungodly. This cannot but lead in the end to chaos and confusion.”³

These statements of reality penetrate to the innermost heart of our problem. In this sense, “religion” is used as identical with the divine foundations revealed by the Prophets in all ages, as contrasted [XXIII:4:131] with the religions systems later established by human agencies. “Religions are many, but the reality of religion is one.”⁴ [This statement] is a divine utterance furnishing the key.

Deeds show the station of the man

There is but one way a man can show his love for God, and that is the degree of his service to his fellow men. As it is written: “Deeds show the station of the man” for all are partners in mere words. It is the practical application of this truth in the field of industry and within the social structure of humanity that will rout the decompositional process just now so firmly fastened upon us all. A deepening consciousness of man as the most sacred of all created organisms, and the destruction of the superstitious, imaginary, false belief that he is individually independent and inorganic, is essential. Herein, the educators of mankind must play a leading part. While true consciousness is the light of heart and soul, the education of the mind is a pathway thereto. The new education will guide and illumine this path, and will be a powerful aid to this end in the very near future.

Fear, one of nature's most satanic forces, is powerless before love and faith

The eradication of fear, which holds the most of humanity in a grip more relentless than death, itself, and is, alas, only too well founded, in view of the unrestrained and selfish disregard of the rights of men by those who at present control the means of livelihood—can be accomplished only by the adoption of the balanced principle of moderation we have endeavoured to set forth. By the eradication of fear, Bahá'u'lláh says “the very nature of man will be changed”. Fear, an inheritance of the animal world, is, like darkness, a manifestation of the sinister, negative power of Nature. When hope and happiness arise side by side with it, it vanishes, even as darkness is found to be non-existent when the light shines. The economic gloom of today nourishes and vitalizes fear to the nth power. What is this fear that blights the countenances of millions of men with its livid and ghastly infection? It is the fear of pauperized old age; of closed doors of opportunity while the wolf crouches upon the doorstep of the workman's cottage; of the widow with little ones wending her way disconsolately to the office of the Poor Relief; of the unemployed worker turned away again and again from the door of factory and shop; of the wounded and maimed returned from the wars; of the hard toiling farmer whose crops Nature has blighted in a single night, or upon whose fields swarms of insects have descended, raised up perchance by this very disorder that flourishes in our social structure; of the cripple who looks forward only to a lifetime of dependency; of the fifty year old worker denied the right to give of his strength and experience; yes, of the business man oppressed with anxieties as his books reveal the red ink entries of deficit.

Because of this fear, because of impending bankruptcies and the fancied loss of financial standing, how many suicides are recorded as the iron wheels of industry turn day by day? Visualize, if you may, the faces of countless thousands of the children of men, by which I mean [XXIII:4:132] men and women, endowed as are all humanity with heart, soul and mind, white and drawn, in whose lineaments the cruel knife of fear and anxiety has carved deep and ineradicable furrows. The juggernaut of a feverish and unrestrained industrial machine has turned these children of an all loving Father into unrecognizable shadows of their true humanity. The claws of Nature have sunk deep into their vitals, numbing the finer forces, preventing the achievement of the divine destinies they might have attained. In truth, have we surrendered to the natural law of the survival of the fittest, the “supreme affliction”. Indifference worse than hate itself, the shame of Cain flaunting itself in the face of the Divine Command to keep and cherish his brother, selfish greed that seizes the results of toil—are these not the insignia of man's degradation, of the terrible forces of decomposition hovering ever nearer to the scene of final dissolution? These agonies and this truly satanic condition are not of God, for they are blind, unintelligent, unloving, while He is the Seer, the Knower, the Loving. His Love has poured forth in this New Time, His favour to the poor and oppressed is evident. In the sight of God, man has no justification for longer living unto himself alone. Nor can he find excuse in pleading “human nature” in this light. For this disorder is not of human origin. Rather is it of a world lower than the animal. This is because man has been endowed with a power to know the Divine, while the animal does not possess that power. Man is responsible, the animal is not responsible since it has no means of knowing God.

Humanity bows before a usurping sovereignty

Indeed, Nature herself, is “uninformed of God, the Almighty”. By surrendering, therefore, to the natural law, humanity has accepted the sovereignty of a blind and unintelligent force. Reflect, then, upon this word from Bahá'u'lláh:

“O son of spirit!

“I created thee rich, why dost thou bring thyself down to poverty? Noble I made thee, wherewith dost thou abase thyself? Out of the essence of knowledge I gave thee being, why seekest thou enlightenment from anyone beside Me? Out of the clay of love I moulded thee, how dost thou busy thyself with another? Turn thy sight unto thyself, that thou mayest find Me standing within thee, mighty, powerful and self-subsisting.”¹

This moving appeal is directed to the slumbering spiritual consciousness of humanity, to that capacity within with which the world of nature has no part, to the human reality itself, a reality that transcends Nature and is destined to achieve sovereignty over her, even as today she has been permitted to usurp sovereignty over a being superior to her both intrinsically and innately. Ignorance of this supreme fact has humbled and retarded the race. But the hour has arrived when this tyranny is to be conquered. Happy are they who awaken to the divine gifts of nobility, spiritual wealth, knowledge, and love that have been deposited within them, and gird up their loins to enlist in the army that is gathering to carry the last and strongest redoubt in Nature’s dark citadel.

Part II

Martha L. Root

This is the second instalment in the series relating the story of the martyrdom of Varqá, the Persian Bahá’í. In the first part the author gave a summary of Varqá’s family history including copies of the Tablets (letters) of Bahá’u’lláh addressed to them.

The great visit in ‘Akká came to an end and the little group started for Tabríz. On the way they went by Mazra’ih, near ‘Akká to visit the grave of ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá’s father; for years before his father, Ḥájí Mullá Mihdí, with the latter’s two sons, one of whom was ‘Alí, had started to visit Bahá’u’lláh in the great Prison in ‘Akká. They had walked the long distance from Persia, but the journey was too hard and Ḥájí Mihdí had died here in Mazra’ih so near to his heart’s destination, ‘Akká, which place he never reached. The others had gone on to see Bahá’u’lláh. So the reader will see that ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá had had the great bounty to visit Bahá’u’lláh when he himself was still a boy. It is no wonder then that he had come again and brought his little sons. They prayed at the grave of Mr Varqá’s father, and they remembered with thankfulness that Bahá’u’lláh Himself had come several times to that tomb in Mazra’ih to pray for their beloved relative.

When they were home again in Tabríz matters did not go quite smoothly. ‘Alí Muḥammad’s wife’s mother was very much against the Bahá’í Cause. She instigated one of their servants, brought up in the home from childhood, to kill her son-in-law. Secretly, however, the servant was a Bahá’í, so he went and told his master to leave the house, because if he stayed the mother-in-law would certainly get someone else to put her son-in-law to death. So ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá left home and went to stay with a Bahá’í believer. His mother-in-law went to the Mullá and asked him to give an order that her son-in-law might be killed because he was a Bahá’í. The Mullá replied, “He has not confessed to me that he is a believer, I cannot condemn him. If you can prove to me that he is a Bahá’í, I could issue a death verdict against him.”

So the grandmother took little Rúḥu’lláh with her to see this Mullá. Rúḥu’lláh used to speak to everybody and he was a celebrated little teacher. His grandmother told him she was taking him to the home of a friend of his father and that their host was a Bahá’í. So when the child went in he held out his little hand and said: “Alláh’u’Abhá!” The Mullá was astonished at such a salutation, but the grandmother made a sign to him not to say anything. She asked Rúḥu'lláh to pray some of his Bahá'í prayers which his father had taught him. The child at once prayed the daily prayer and then he prayed a long one, one of the most deep and beautiful prayers ever revealed by Bahá'u'lláh. After the little boy had finished the Mullá said: "Those prayers are wonderful, no father should be put to death who has trained a child like this one!" and he refused to issue a verdict for the death of 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá, [XXIII:6:180] Rúḥu'lláh's grandmother on his father's side of the house was very different. Her husband had had a Bahá'í teacher come to speak with her (which he did without seeing her, for she sat behind a curtain to receive her lessons). When she heard about the Bahá'í Cause and that a Prophet had appeared she said, "We are not waiting for a Prophet; I have studied all the Books, and we are waiting for a Manifestation of God." The teacher had used the word "Prophet" so as not to startle her, but to try to tell her gradually that the great World Teacher was here, but she was an apt pupil and more ready than he thought to receive the Truth. She at once became a believer.

One day in Tabríz, a group of distinguished Bahá'ís were speaking together about who would be the successor of Bahá'u'lláh. 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá said it would be 'Abdu'l-Bahá. Another said it would be the secretary and a third held the opinion that it would be Muḥammad 'Alí, another son. 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá said, "Bahá'u'lláh has stated that if there is anything which we do not understand we should write to Him," so he sent a petition asking this question. Bahá'u'lláh at once wrote back saying that it would be 'Abdu'l-Bahá. 'Azízu'lláh Varqá has this Tablet.

Then 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá wrote a second letter to Bahá'u'lláh asking that not only he but that one of his sons might be a martyr in the path of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the Greatest Branch. Bahá'u'lláh replied to this petition and accepted their sacrifice, which means that they could become martyrs. The family moved about from place to place because he was a Bahá'í teacher and travelled throughout Persia.

Once, when the times were very dangerous a lovely Bahá'í woman near Ṭihrán took 'Azízu'lláh and Rúḥu'lláh into her own home to try to protect them. This was when the Varqá family was living in Ṭihrán. The husband of the Bahá'í, who was not a believer, though he was a celebrated lawyer and a great statesman, objected to having the children in the house. He said: "You cannot do this, we too, shall be killed."

His wife replied: "Let me ask you something. If a man has been a butcher for forty years and in a dark night someone gives him a dog to kill instead of a lamb, do you think he would make a mistake and kill the dog instead of the lamb?" Her husband said, "No." Then she answered: "Be assured you will not be murdered instead of a Bahá'í." She kept the children for several weeks and during that time nothing happened to any of them.

'Alí Muḥammad Varqá took his two children, 'Azízu'lláh Varqá, who was thirteen years old, and Rúḥu'lláh Varqá who was eleven, and went again to 'Akká in 1895 to visit 'Abdu'l-Bahá. (Bahá'u'lláh had passed on in 1892.) Valíyu'lláh Varqá the youngest child was left at home. There were many happy incidents during the days spent with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but I wish to relate one which though not quite so pleasant at the moment, reveals 'Abdu'l-Bahá's great character, the quickness of a father to obey and the wisdom of little Rúḥu'lláh.

A large group of Bahá'í children [XXIII:6:181] were playing together when one little boy uttered a naughty word; Rúḥu'lláh quickly slapped him on the mouth saying he deserved punishment. This child who had said the word was the son of a great martyr and since he had come to 'Akká he had been very favoured by the Holy Family and all the believers. The other children marched in a body with this little boy to tell Rúḥu'lláh's father and to complain about this matter. Rúḥu'lláh, when he saw them going, ran into the court and up the prison stairs, through the open door into ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s room and sat down close beside Him. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was by the window writing Tablets. As soon as ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá heard the children’s story he started out to find his son. Going into the court, he saw Rúḥu’lláh sitting beside ‘Abdu’l-Bahá upstairs near the window. He motioned him to come down. Rúḥu’lláh was vigorously nodding “no”, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá attracted by this motion said, “Why are you nodding out the window?” Then Rúḥu’lláh related the whole story of how he had slapped the little boy on the mouth and said he knew if he went down to the court his father was going to punish him. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá called the father to come upstairs and said very sternly: “No one must say anything to Rúḥu’lláh about this matter!” Usually ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was very careful that children must obey their parents, but He repeated it a second time: “No one must say anything to Rúḥu’lláh about this matter!” From that time on ‘Alí Muḥammad was very respectful to his little son Rúḥu’lláh and he never again reproved him for anything. He was a good father and Rúḥu’lláh was a good son; he never consciously did wrong.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá during this visit gave Rúḥu’lláh the title “muballigh”—which means “a teacher of religion” a Bahá’í teacher. When the family returned to Persia they went to live in Zanján which is situated in the northern province of Ádharbayján. The father, ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá, wrote to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá from Zanján and Rúḥu’lláh who was continuing diligently his study of Persian writing, sent two lines of copy for ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to see what progress he had made. When the answer came to the father’s letter, there was a Tablet enclosed for Rúḥu’lláh who at that time was eleven years old. The Tablet was in ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s own handwriting and was as follows:

“He is the Most Glorious!

“O thou who art nearer to the sucking age! The impression of the musk like writing of that sign of the Love of God (Rúḥu’lláh) was seen. Verily, in a short time thou hast improved greatly, and seeing this great progress is the cause of my joy and happiness. Certainly thou must try thy utmost that thy writing may become better day by day and in the world of writing it may become the glory and the bounty of the Supreme Pen!

“Always I must hear from thee, and thou must describe and explain about those whom thou dost teach (spiritually). Upon thee be Bahá!” Signed: ‘Ayn-’Ayn¹

When ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá read this Tablet, with great reverence and solemnity he knelt with forehead to the floor and said: “This is the son who will give his life as promised by Bahá’u’lláh, because a pen of wood could not have such an effect, the effect of the Supreme Pen would be the mighty pen of martyrdom.”

Bahá’íyyih Khánum—an appreciation

Ella Goodall Cooper

The author, a loyal Bahá’í for many years—one of the pioneers of the Bahá’í Cause in this country has made visits to the Holy Land, (several times accompanied by her mother, Mrs Helen S. Goodall) and is numbered among the very first American pilgrims to visit ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. She has had advantages which enable her to draw a fine pen picture of the noble and saintly sister of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá who was known as the Greatest Holy Leaf. This is a story which will be dear to the heart of every Bahá’í.

It is now thirty-three years since that never to be forgotten first pilgrimage to the Most Great Prison² was undertaken by a group of believers from the West and, while many details of the visit have faded into the background, there are certain events and personalities that remain clear and vivid in my memory, and which time seems powerless to efface. Next to meeting the Beloved Master Himself¹ was the privilege of meeting His glorious sister, Bahá'íyyih Khánúm, known as the Greatest Holy Leaf. Her personality is indelibly imprinted upon my memory. Tall, slender and of noble bearing, her body gave the impression of perfect poise between energy and tranquillity, between wiry endurance and inward composure, imparting to the beholder a sense of security, comfort and reliance, impossible to describe.

Her beautiful face was the feminine counterpart of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's the lines of suffering and privation softened by the patient sweetness of the mouth; the dominating brow, bespeaking intellect and will, lighted by the wonderful understanding eyes, in form like those of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, but deep blue rather than hazel. Watching their expressive changes—as one moment they darkened with sympathy or pain, the next moment sparkled with laughter and humour only served to deepen the impression of her irresistible spiritual attraction.

The ladies of the blessed family eagerly explained to us the loftiness of her spiritual station, which we instantly felt but could not analyze. They told us that Bahá'u'lláh had written for her a precious Tablet (letter) in which He had stated that so great was her spiritual attainment that her prayers would always be accepted at the Throne of God, and that her supplications and interventions for others would never fail to be answered. Thus she was set apart as the purest and most saintly of women, and through her He glorified the position of woman in this New Day. All this was recognized by the maidservants, whether wise or simple, high or low. It was touching to witness their humble homage, scarcely less than that accorded 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself as, reverently touching her shoulder with lips and forehead, they would beg her to supplicate at the Holy Threshold in their behalf, the while their tears fell like rain.

Small wonder that such a strong [XXIII:7:203] yet gentle quality of authority made her naturally the head of the household group that circled about 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She presided over the room called Ladies Room which was the centre for all family gatherings, and where the women visitors were entertained. From the hour of the early morning tea, at which 'Abdu'l-Bahá was often present, to the last good night, whispered by some weary yet grateful traveller, Khánúm (as she was affectionately called) was ever in demand. During the long day, which began before six in the morning and rarely ended before eleven or twelve at night, there were frequent spontaneous gatherings in this general room, and save for the brief midday siesta, this association with the women constituted the only variation in the monotony of their prison lives. The spiritual peace and joy pervading these simple meetings was a new and unbelievable experience to us—the Western pilgrims.

The chanting of the sacred tablets by the Persian ladies, at the request of the Greatest Holy Leaf (who had thus made them happy) the murmur of low voices as news, generally tragic, was imparted, the bubbling of the friendly samovar as tea was handed around by the young serving maids, and, above all, the impalpable yet vibrant atmosphere of love and service made these meetings attract all including the children—Shoghi Effendi among them, who slipped in for a little while and knelt quietly to listen. Even the birds seemed to feel the friendly spirit for they flew freely in and out through the open door leading to the court which was open to the sky.

The Greatest Holy Leaf was also custodian of the spiritual treasures of the family—they had no material riches—such as the sacred Writings of Bahá'u'lláh and other revered relics belonging to Him and to some of the lamented martyrs. Under her care were the precious attar of rose, symbolizing the “fragrance of the Love of God”, the favourite perfume of Bahá'u'lláh, the collection of gold rings, set with stones of carnelian carved with the Greatest Name, the devout handiwork of the poor Bahá'ís of Persia, who sent them to Khánum to be given to the pilgrims or new believers, at her own discretion.

Her authority, so real yet so humble, was instinctively accepted by the family of the Master, who sought her wise and loving counsel upon every occasion. In this way all co-operated to save the time and strength of 'Abdu'l-Bahá Whose life must be given to the service of all mankind, as they well realized. Even the believers of other lands, having come to know of her power through the accounts of the early pilgrims, have been wont to write her of their problems and beg her prayers at the Holy Shrines. And although she neither spoke nor wrote English, yet her influence, subtle and beneficent, has penetrated even to the far West, bringing courage and assurance to many a distressed soul.

During a later pilgrimage to 'Akká, when I accompanied my mother, we were privileged to [XXIII:7:204] view another aspect of the life of Bahá'íyyih Khánum. Having in mind the first picture of her purely spiritual activity, we found her life, like a finely cut gem, had many facets, some of which we were yet to know. It happened that there were many Eastern pilgrims to be cared for and, consequently we had little opportunity of seeing Khánum, whose time was fully occupied with household tasks.

One day we caught a glimpse of her in the kitchen seated on a low stool, her firm, capable hands busy with a large lamb that had just been brought in from the market. Quickly dividing it, she directed which part was to be made into broth, which part served for the evening meal, which part kept for the morrow, and which sent to those poor or incapacitated friends who were daily supplied from 'Abdu'l-Bahá's table. On the shelves were huge pans holding rice soaking in clean water to be ready for the delicious pilau (a famous Persian dish) and there were many other visible evidences of the hours of preparation necessary to provide for the material welfare of the visitors.

It was then we learned of her practical efficiency. The enormous amount of work attendant upon such entertaining with only the crudest and most primitive facilities, must be seen to be appreciated. We learned that she had organized the household affairs, and each one of the Master's daughters took her turn at directing them for a week—planning the meals and marketing, and seeing that all was cooked and served to the different groups twice each day. Without running water, with only charcoal for fuel, with no gas or electricity for lighting, only oil, the cleaning and filling of the lamps alone consumed a large amount of time and energy. I well remember seeing one day the array of lamps waiting to be filled and returned to their respective rooms. The tired little sigh with which one of the ladies was regarding them, told the story, and I thought how true it is that here in the East as well as in the West, “Woman's work is never done!”

Seeing this side of the character of the Greatest Holy Leaf, we recalled the answer made by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to one in this country who said to Him: “Please explain to me the story of Martha and Mary.” He did not do this, but said: “It is My hope that you will revive the lights of both those revered women.” In Bahá'íyyih Khánum we found this exquisite balance between the practical and spiritual teachings perfectly exemplified, and once more could be thankful for the privilege of becoming witness to the possibility of actually living the life of a true believer, fully and joyously, even in a Turkish prison, under the most trying and difficult conditions that could possibly be conceived.

When the dreaded moment came to say goodbye, the sorrow of parting from the beloved ladies was lessened only by the hope of a future visit. The last face I remember was that of the Greatest Holy Leaf, calm, gentle, radiant, her deep understanding eyes shedding the light of the Love of God upon us, that light which only glows brighter with the passing of the years.

White roses of Persia

Part III

Martha L. Root

This is the third part in the serial story of the martyrdom of Varqá and his little son Rúḥu'lláh, early Persian Bahá'ís. The preceding chapters gave a summary of the family history; copies of the Tablets (letters) of Bahá'u'lláh addressed to them; a brief account of the wonderful visit of the father and his two sons to 'Akká to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá; and a copy of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's Tablet to Rúḥu'lláh. The story will be concluded in the November number.

Rúḥu'lláh, a boy so timid that he would never even go alone into the garden in the evening, was always remarkably courageous when it came to doing anything for the Bahá'í Cause. He thought a great deal about becoming a martyr, and in this connection wrote the following poem which he sent to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. One can see in reading it, how the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh train even a child into becoming a savant and a philosopher. No translation from the Persian can give the exquisite meter nor an adequate interpretation of the Persian metaphors alluding to literature and letters which the cultured people of Írán know so well. Here is his poem:

“In the Name of our Great Lord Abhá!
O Cup Bearer, fill the cup to the brim
Make this Zion of my heart full of fire with your Wine.
It is the time of receiving Bounties and the day of help.
Face O friends of Bahá
Towards the world with the banners of Guidance.
Any one rising to serve God,
The Lord of Mankind will help him,
The one who sacrifices his life in the Covenant of God,
The Face of God will turn towards him.
O Cup-Bearer, give a cup from Thy Bounties
That I may be pure from sin,
Although my sins cannot be counted,
Still I am hopeful through the Favour of God.
Welcome, O Cup Bearer of the Ancient Gathering.
Let fall a drop to this earth (body) through Thy Favour Till through Generosity, this ray may shine
And be worthy of sacrifice.
O God, when the time will come that at Thy Door
I may give my life for the Love of Thy Face
What a happy day it will be,
That in the square of love
I may give my life
In the path of the Beloved's Love!
What a happy moment it will be, That I may say openly
The praise of King Bahá on the cross!
O God, when shall come that time
That I may be severed from this fated body,
Facing towards the eternal Rose-garden
Becoming verdant from the Bounties of seeing God?
I am burning in the desert of privation

And inflamed from the sparks of remoteness.
 Take the veil from Thy Face ('Abdu'l-Bahá)
 O King of the Worlds
 In order that from the Light of Thy Face
 The heavens may become illumined. [XXIII:7:227]
 O Prince of Covenant!
 O King of Covenant!
 From your fire the Párán of Covenant is on fire.
 O Thou, who hast named Thyself "'Abdu'l-Bahá" (The Servant of Bahá).
 Through Thy Commands the banners of Guidance are uplifted.
 Thou art the Dawning Place of the secrets of God;
 Thou art the spring of the rivers of God,
 Like the letter A thou hast stood to uplift the Cause of God
 O powerful King of Kings!
 But like the letter B, thou art humble in service near the door of the Shrine of Lord Bahá.
 O Thou who art the Greatest Branch of the Tree of the Cause,
 O Thou who art Branched from the Ancient Root,
 O Thou who art the Dawning Place of the Inspiration of God,
 Through Thee the eyes of Abhá people are enlightened.

"Give a cup from the divine wine, that I who am sleeping may become conscious;
 Rend asunder the veils of doubt and superstitions,
 Soar to the zenith of the Seventh Heaven,
 Pass from this dark cage of earth and water
 Going to the pure spiritual Kingdom;
 Become free from this world full of torture and pain,
 Facing the spiritual Native Land,
 Inhaling from the Rose-Garden of the soul
 The fragrance of the Beloved;
 Returning like a wind from the Land of the Beloved,
 Blowing fragrant and life giving breezes
 Bearing sorrow sweeping Glad-Tidings;
 Saying openly to the friends of the world
 It is the Day of the Covenant!

"Friends be on your guard,
 O lovers of the Face of the Beloved,
 Turn your souls toward the Land of the Beloved,
 O comrades, grasp the opportunity,
 Help and assist the Cause of God,
 Try, O friends, that there may be spread in the regions of the earth
 The Teachings of the Powerful God
 Until the sleeping creatures may become conscious,
 May lay aside superstitions and prejudices,
 Their eyes becoming enlightened with the Light of God;
 The thorn gardens of their hearts becoming rose-gardens,
 Try, O friends, it is time for service.

"Give a glance through Kindness to this yearning, sorrowing bird,
 Who, being far from Thee, is restless and inconsolable.
 Through being so distant from Thee, my heart is on fire,
 Being away from Thee has inflamed my whole being,
 Help, O King, of the Kingdom of hearts!

Being far from Thee has put my heart into flames;
I am burning, O King, from being so far from Thee.
Here, in this desert of loneliness and longing,
Liberate this bird from the trap of sorrowfulness
O King of Bounty and Sovereign of Favour!
Do not look unto my station and capacity
But look unto Thy Favour, O Bountiful One!"

White roses of Persia

Part IV

Martha L. Root

This is the fourth and concluding part in the serial story of the martyrdom of 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá and his little son, Rúḥu'lláh, early Persian Bahá'ís. The preceding chapters gave a summary of the family history, copies of Tablets (letters) of Bahá'u'lláh addressed to them, a brief account of the wonderful pilgrimage of the father and his two sons to 'Akká to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá, and in the last number the poem which the little son, Rúḥu'lláh wrote in connection with his desire for martyrdom.

O Bahá'u'lláh: you are worth a thousand Náṣiri'd-Dín Sháhs! Náṣiri'd-Dín Sháh was the Sháhansháh King of Kings) who ruled when the Báb was shot with a thousand bullets, when Bahá'u'lláh was exiled with His family; and he was the Ruler in Rúḥu'lláh's day.

Persecutions quickly increased in violence in Zanján and 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá was urged to bring his family and come to Ṭihrán to teach the Bahá'í Cause. He sent 'Azízu'lláh, who was then fourteen years old, on ahead to stay with the grandfather, and he and Rúḥu'lláh started one month later. They were arrested with other Bahá'ís when they were about half way to Ṭihrán and were taken back to Zanján with heavy chains about their necks and their feet in stocks. The governor of Zanján spoke with them and asked if they were Bahá'ís. 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá spoke first and said, "Yes." Little Rúḥu'lláh when questioned said, "Yes, I am a Bahá'í." But one old man denied the Faith saying "No, I am not a believer." The Governor in disgust struck him saying, "Everyone knows you call yourself a Bahá'í and now you deny it; but this little boy who is just at the beginning of his life and has so many hopes in the world, has had the courage to say he is a Bahá'í."

The Governor asked the Mullás to come and talk with these Bahá'ís. The Mullás said that they must be killed because their faith, their Teachings were against Islám. The Governor sent to ask the Prime Minister in Ṭihrán what should be done and the Prime Minister said to send the Bahá'í prisoners to the capital. So they were sent in their chains to Ṭihrán and a photograph was taken as soon as they arrived. It was the custom to take photographs of prisoners and send them to the state. The description was written on the picture. Rúḥu'lláh's 'abá' (coat) and kuláh (cap) had been taken away from him and the ones that appear in the photograph were hastily borrowed from another prisoner and put on the child. They were much too large for him. They are not his own clothes at all. Now the family actually has the original photograph that was filed with the prison record. (In the revolution of 1908 when all the old archives and records were thrown out, a Bahá'í official saw this photograph and took it to 'Azízu'lláh Varqá and the indictment, the crime, written is that they had become Bahá'ís, Bábís). After arresting 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá the policemen had gone to his home and carried off his beautiful painting of the Báb (and there is only one other in the world) taken many of his precious Tablets, plundered the family books, even the register that gave the dates of [XXIII:8:256] their birth so that some of the family do not know when their birthdays are. They confiscated their property.

When all this had taken place and they were settled in the prison, ‘Azízu’lláh succeeded in getting permission to go and see his father and brother in the prison. “Rúḥu’lláh, what do you need, what can I bring you?” asked ‘Azízu’lláh and the little brother said eagerly: “Please bring me a Book of Tablets and the Book of Prayers to read in the prison, for they took away all my books.” The food was very bad in that prison and the child had very few clothes, but he did not ask for any material things.

One of the prisoners who is still living told ‘Azízu’lláh Varqá that one night in the dungeon when all the others were sleeping he saw ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá lean over his little son, Rúḥu’lláh, look at him so long and so lovingly, pray, and then he said: “O Bahá’u’lláh, I thank Thee that Thou hast accepted our sacrifice.” This was not human love for his boy. It was divine love!

‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá was thirty-eight years old and his little son, Rúḥu’lláh, was just beginning his twelfth year. They had been in the Tīhrán prison just two months when one Friday, Náṣiri’-d-Dín Sháh, ruler of Persia, went out to Sháh Zádih ‘Abdu’l-‘Azím, a village near Tīhrán where there is one of the Muslim holy Shrines. He had ruled from 1844 until this Friday in 1896, when at the holy Shrine he was shot and killed by a Muslim revolutionary.

Everything that ever occurred in Persia at that time was blamed upon the Bahá’ís. The Prime Minister knew that the murderer was a Muslim and said so. However, the Chief of the Court without consulting the Prime Minister commanded the executioner to come into one room of the dungeon with him and the Bahá’í prisoners to be brought into the long dark corridor leading to this room. There the men stood in a row waiting their turn to enter. First to go in was ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá while his little son Rúḥu’lláh stood in the open doorway as he was second. The Chief of the Court cursed ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá, saying: “It is you Bahá’ís who have murdered the Sháh!” The prisoners had had no news, they had not heard that the Sháh had been shot that day. ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá answered him: “Bahá’ís would never kill His Imperial Majesty the Sháhansháh.” Angered by this, the Chief of the Court ordered the executioner to put ‘Alí Muḥammad’s head into the stock and to cut his body to pieces. Rúḥu’lláh witnessed the marvellous heroism of his great father as he suffered this horrible death. Then the Chief of the Court turned to the child who had stepped into the room to receive his own death, and said: “You must curse Bahá’u’lláh; if you do, you can go free and I will give you whatever you wish.” Rúḥu’lláh, looking into his eyes said solemnly: “I have seen Bahá’u’lláh! I could never curse Him! I will go with my father.”

The Chief of the Court whispered to the executioner to strangle the boy well in order to frighten him, but not to kill him. This was done. They put the rope about his neck so tightly he swooned and it looked as [XXIII:8:257] if he were dead, but after some time he slowly regained consciousness and the Chief of the Court again ordered him to curse Bahá’u’lláh, “No, I will never curse Him, I will go with my father,” said this child and intuitively he threw himself on his knees and began to pray to God. The Chief of the Court was so unnerved and upset, that he shouted to the executioner to kill the child quickly and he himself ran out of the room past the other Bahá’í prisoners and out of the place to his own home. The executioner quickly cut Rúḥu’lláh’s throat and the supreme sacrifice of two of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s great heroes was over.

Many have been martyred in the Cause to establish the Bahá’í religion, but the eternal glory of ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá and little Rúḥu’lláh is, that they voluntarily offered to give their lives to help establish the Teachings of the Báb, Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. The other Bahá’ís in that corridor were never killed, they were set free. The Prime Minister was very angry with the Chief of the Court. He called him and demanded why he had done this hideous deed. The only answer was: “I thought perhaps Bahá’ís had killed the King and I wanted revenge!” The Prime Minister replied: "You knew the murderer was a Muslim!" That Chief of the Court still lives, a miserable, unhappy, trembling man when the Varqá name is mentioned. He still walks the streets of T̄ihrán.

The story of the martyrdoms of 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá and Rúḥu'lláh is absolutely true. It is told by the third prisoner in that line in the corridor who was standing on the threshold just behind Rúḥu'lláh and he was still residing in Zanján until his death two years ago.

Also, the Chief of the great Bakhtiyári Tribe whose son today has an important place in the government, wishing to hear the truth about this atrocious crime, a few year ago invited that former Chief of the Court to dine in his home. His sons were present and a few other men relatives. They asked him to tell them the whole story about the killing of the Varqá father and son. There was a reason why they wished to hear because the host's own brother had become a Bahá'í years earlier through the teacher, 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá. The former Chief of the Court did tell them everything and it was exactly as the third prisoner had related it. The Bakhtiyári Chief and his relatives wept, and they were so angry they beat the former Chief of the Court and kicked him out into the street.

In the thirty-three years since the holy blood of these two martyrs was shed, a new white rose has begun to be cultivated in Persia, a rose whose perfume will be more heralded than all the 'aṭṭár of Írán, for this is the rose of "tolerance in religion". For more than a thousand years Persia had not known this rose.

I had longed to visit the graves of these two great martyrs, to bow my head in humblest, tenderest reverence where their dear hurt bodies are laid to rest. One day the opportunity came very unexpectedly. We were driving out to see the Bahá'í cemetery and friends said "There in the distance where you [XXIII:8:258] see the trees and the garden is the mausoleum of 'Alí Muḥammad Varqá and his son Rúḥu'lláh; we are going to take you there after we visit the Bahá'í cemetery." I had expected to go there with the Varqá family, but in the busy days of speaking and writing there had never been a free hour, so it seemed good to go now and we went. In the days of the passing of these martyrs there was no Bahá'í cemetery and in fact their bodies were hid for a number of years. Then 'Azízu'lláh Varqá and his younger brother Valíyu'lláh bought a little estate near T̄ihrán (about twenty minutes ride by motor car from the Yúsuf Ábád Gate of the city. It is enclosed by high walls and divided into two parts by another high wall. The first part is like a miniature farm or very large garden with little houses for the caretaker and his family. Each member of this peasant family was so clean, so sweet, so spiritual, one could but feel that they had been refined and ennobled by their cherished task of caring for the garden where such glorious saints are resting.

Going through the first garden into the second was like stepping into paradise. It was still winter, but the trees, the vines, the rose bushes showed plainly that in the spring and summer the place is a haven of shade and perfume. It was a typical Persian garden with a stately little lake and the birds were singing softly. The mausoleum is a beautiful nine-sided building approached with nine paths through the garden and within are nine sides and the whole is in pure white.

O, what a real peace in that place! The sun poured through the windows as if it loved to come and dwell there! I knelt to pray and whispered first: "O Bahá'u'lláh Thou art here with them! It is the same kind of peace that I experienced in Bahjí at Thy Tomb! Thou hast never left them, living and dead Thou art with them always!" Truly it was a spiritual communion to pray in this holy spot!

Silently we passed out from that holy shrine, pressed the hands of the kind caretakers, and came back into the world of service in Ṭihrán.

It is lives like these of ‘Alí Muḥammad Varqá and little Rúḥu’lláh that mirror forth the power and the beauty of the Bahá’í Teachings.

As the aftermath to this story, would you not like to hear of the two other sons, ‘Azízu’lláh and Valíyu’lláh? They are two of the most spiritual and efficient Bahá’ís of Ṭihrán. ‘Azízu’lláh went to Paris to help ‘Abdu’l-Bahá when He journeyed to Europe, and Valíyu’lláh was called to be one of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s secretaries during the historic journey to the United States and Great Britain, in 1912. Friends in New York will remember that the night before ‘Abdu’l-Bahá started to California, a great many friends had called to say good bye. Valíyu’lláh Varqá was down in the drawing room greeting them and serving tea to each one. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá came down the stairs from His apartment into the drawing room and called out: “Valíyu’lláh, come my soul, my dear!” He took his hand. Then He went over and sat down by the window and addressed the friends, saying: “Tonight I shall introduce [XXIII:8:259] to you Mírzá Valíyu’lláh Khán Varqá. He is my son, whatever he says it is true. Believe it.” Then ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told the story of the grandfather of Valíyu’lláh, the story of his father and little brother Rúḥu’lláh ending with their martyrdom. When He had finished He went upstairs and below the silent guests heard Him weeping. So, darling little Rúḥu’lláh, you and your good father were not only teaching the Bahá’í Cause in Persia, you are teaching it down the ages and in every continent. Every eye that reads of you, every ear that hears of you is urged forward to action!

The meaning of Christ

A compilation from the revealed Words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the divinely appointed authoritative Interpreter of the teachings of Bahá’u’lláh.

Christ’s birthday is a glorious day. It is necessary that these anniversary celebrations be observed, else man in his negligence would forget all about his Creator. But we should seek to penetrate the dark veils of custom and imitation of ancestors, perchance we may discover the reality of the meaning.

The advent of Christ on this earth was a blessed day for it was the day on which the Sun of Reality dawned; the day on which all beings were revived. In the world’s calendar, it was the beginning of a Heavenly Spring. ... When He was on earth He was not thought much of notwithstanding they were awaiting His coming with great impatience. They thought that they would be His intimate friends. When He came they knew Him not; they persecuted Him and finally killed Him.

(Unity Triumphant, p. 111.) [XXIII:9:268]

Christ said that nothing could ascend into heaven except that which came down from heaven. He also said, “I came from heaven and will return to heaven,” and “The Son of Man is in heaven.” He said this while still upon the earth and notwithstanding the fact that he had been born from Mary. There is no doubt Christ came from heaven and always was in heaven, but when He spoke He did not mean the literal sky. What then is meant by heaven? Science proves that there is no heaven or sky, but all is limitless space and one universe. In this limitless space the heavenly spheres revolve and have their orbits. But the “heaven” of Christ is that invisible world which is beyond the sight and comprehension of mere man. It is the spiritual condition. Therefore the “heaven” of Christ is the Will of God. The Sun of that heaven will never set. In it the moon and stars are always shining. It is the limitless Kingdom of God. It is sanctified from all place. Christ is always there.

Count Leo Tolstoy and the Bahá'í movement

Martha L. Root

When I was in Prague, Czechoslovakia, in 1927, I met the secretary of Count Leo Tolstoy, Mr Valentin Bulgakov; we had a long talk about Count Tolstoy and his contact with the Bahá'í Movement. Later, in December 1930, I met Miss Alexandra Tolstoy, the youngest daughter of this great Russian writer and humanitarian. She said to me then, "What Mr Bulgakov has told you about my father's interest in the Bahá'í Movement is true. He was with him during the last four years of my father's life; he was his secretary and arranged his library." Then, too, I corresponded with Mrs Isabel Grinevsky of Leningrad in 1927 and she wrote me about Count Tolstoy.

It is through these kind friends that I have the facts for this article. An added interest was given to the subject for me when only a few days ago, 31 May 1932, I interviewed the president of a Roman Catholic university in Poland who had met 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 1914, in Haifa, Palestine. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to him that there was no greater writer in Europe than Count Leo Tolstoy. "What a pity that Tolstoy, who so admired the Teachings of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, never had the privilege of meeting Him."

"Count Tolstoy knew the Bahá'í Teachings through literature. I think he did not know any Bahá'ís personally," said Mr Bulgakov in his talk with me. "He first heard of the Bahá'í Movement in May 1903, when Mrs Isabel Grinevsky brought out in Leningrad (the former capital of Russia that then was called St. Petersburg) a great drama called Bab; it was in verse and gave the illumined history of the Forerunner of the Bahá'í Movement, a young man called [the] Báb and His disciples called Letters of the Living; the scenes were laid in Persia. This drama was played in one of the principle theatres of St. Petersburg, in January 1904, and given a remarkable reception. Some of the critics went far in its praise. For example, the poet Fiedler (who afterward translated the drama into German) said: 'We receive from the five acts of the poetical drama Bab more information about the Bahá'í Movement than from the deep, scientific researches of Professor Edward G. Browne, Gobineau and Russian scientists and historians. As the Herold has already published two full feuilletons¹ about the poem, we shall speak only of the performance of the play. Rarely has the renown of any play preceded the performance as has this of Mrs Grinevsky."

The Herold of January 1904, printed the following:

"The drama appeared in May of last year, 1903, the most inconvenient time for the coming out of a book, but nevertheless pens of critics began to move in the journals and magazines in praise of the author's work. Moreover, enlightened Persian society sent an inspired letter of thanks; and above all, Isabel Grinevsky had the high spiritual satisfaction that among those who praised her drama was the lion of contemporary Russian literature, Leo Tolstoy."

Mr Wesselitzky, a Russian journalist and president of the Foreign Press Association in London, gave an address about this drama Bab in London, in English and the lecture was published in pamphlet form in French and English. I quote one paragraph from this speech: "Amidst the sorrows of disastrous war and those dreadful inner troubles, that book, Bab, was my only happy impression and it has remained since a permanent source of joy and comfort as a manifest proof of the vitality of Russia and its creative genius."²

² Taken from a pamphlet, the speech delivered by Mr Wesselitzky, President of the Foreign Press Association of London, published in French and English. London, 1907, at the press of 'Chronide', 29 Besborough Street, London, S.W.

“Count Tolstoy read this drama Bab with great interest,” Mr Bulgakov told me, “and sent a letter to Mrs Grinevsky praising her work and telling her he was in sympathy with these teachings of the Bahá’í Movement.” His letter to her was published in the press of Russia. Mrs Grinevsky also wrote me about this letter from Count Tolstoy which she has preserved.

Next Count Tolstoy read a booklet by Mr Arakewian that described further the history of the early followers of the Báb and gave a short account of the teachings. He studied it with eager interest, his secretary told me, and sent a copy of it to one of his friends, Mr Boulanger, who was writing a book about all religions. Count Tolstoy urged Mr Boulanger to include a chapter on Bahai-ism in this new [XXIII:10:304] book. Unfortunately the book was not published before Count Tolstoy passed on, then came the world war and it was never printed. “Count Tolstoy’s heart and soul were in all universal movements like the Bahá’í Movement that aim at the unity of all mankind,” said Mr Bulgakov.

He also told me that Count Tolstoy read with deep appreciation the book, “The Voices of the Peoples” by Ivan Nagivin, in which the author writes much about different religions, the old Christian sects in Russia, the Indian Religions, and about Bahai-ism. Tolstoy liked this work because it opposed militarism and all fighting and stood for universal peace. He gave copies of this book to several of his friends sending them from his home in Yasnaya Polyana.

When I asked Mr Bulgakov if Count Tolstoy had Bahá’í books in his library, he replied: “Certainly, he had Bahá’í books in several languages. After he had read the drama Bab and knew of the Bahá’í Movement, he sent and bought what books he could get. I remember a picture in one of the English books—a picture of a young man who looked like Christ, and was the Founder of this movement.”

The secretary said that Count Tolstoy had studied the Bibles of all religions profoundly.

As one of the principles of Bahá’u’lláh is a universal auxiliary language, I asked the secretary what Count Tolstoy thought about such a language to help promote world peace, and quickly he replied: “He thought it was very important, and when he heard for the first time about Esperanto he was so delighted that he took an Esperanto grammar, studied it two hours and wrote a letter in Esperanto! He was then about seventy years old. He knew many languages, Russian, English, French, German, Italian, Hebrew, Greek, Latin.”

Count Tolstoy, I feel, was a Bahá’í in spirit, for the word signifies in the Persian language “Light-bearer”, even though he heard of the Teachings late in life.

He was born 10 September 1828, and so was nearly seventy-five when he first learned through the drama Bab of this universal religion for peace which had its rise in Persia about the middle of the nineteenth century. He passed on 10 November 1910, but in one of his last writings, I hear, he penned these words which will be read not only by this generation but by millions yet unborn: “We spend our lives trying to unlock the mystery of the universe, but there was a Turkish Prisoner, Bahá’u’lláh, in ‘Akká, Palestine, who had the key!”

Glimpses of the New World Order

Part I

Notes on a visit to Haifa and ‘Akká
Mabel and Sylvia Paine

“The sea has innumerable pearls in its depths. A good and trained diver will obtain therefrom abundant pearls.” ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

A little party of four boarded the Carnaro at Trieste on 4 November 1931. We were bound for Haifa, Palestine, where we expected, through meeting Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, and the family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and through visiting the shrines of the Founders of the Bahá'í Faith—the Báb, Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá—to gain light on the problems that so vex the world, to make contact with the universal love that had instilled into those who associated with Him and to deepen our faith in the invincible power which has characterized that Faith from its inception.

On 9 November, in the afternoon, the city of Haifa came into view. It lies at the foot of Mt. Carmel, the mountain famed in Old Testament annals as the abode of the Prophets of God. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries it has again become the centre from which spiritual teachings have gone forth. And its spiritual revival has been accompanied by considerable material progress, for it is already the chief shipping centre for Palestine. Our first impression on entering its harbour was of a commercial activity which had been distinctly lacking at the older and more Oriental port of Jaffa, where we had anchored a few hours earlier. Work on the deepened harbour is in constant progress and 'ere long ships will dock at Haifa.

After landing, some of us chose to walk through the narrow crooked streets with Rúhí Afnán, grandson of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and cousin of Shoghi Effendi, who was at the dock to greet us. Haifa streets show a mingling of the Oriental and the cosmopolitan. Its inhabitants—Jews, Arabs, Germans, French, English, Persians, and Americans—all retaining to some extent their distinctive dress, language, and customs, give the city the charm of diversity. It was interesting to note the disappearance of one former Oriental feature, the traditional black dress and veil covering the whole head and face of the Arab women. Of the Arab women we saw nearly all were unveiled.

Our walk brought us at last to the Bahá'í Western Pilgrim House situated near the edge of the city a little way up Mt. Carmel. About this house is a very delightful blending of the Orient with the Occident, the beautiful and dignified with the homey and comfortable. The circular central hall with its marble pillars, the lofty ceilings, the fiat roof, sun-drenched by day and moonlight bathed at night, seem apart from our workaday world of the West. But the furnish- [XXIII:12:375] ings of bedrooms, reading, writing, sitting, and dining rooms are Occidental. In the gardens on three sides of the house are magnificent poinsettias, roses, jasmine, chrysanthemums. Soon the freesias will be blossoming. We are indebted to Fugeta from Japan for these carefully tended gardens as well as many a kind personal service. Effie from Australia, of Scotch ancestry, is responsible for the beautiful order of the interior of the house. Both help to maintain the pervasive atmosphere of kindly cheer which is neither of the Orient nor the Occident, but, of the Kingdom.

Tuesday, 10 November. Today at luncheon Shoghi Effendi was present and, through his conversation, we were given a view as from a mountain top of present conditions in the world and the relations of Bahá'ís to these conditions. Bahá'ís, he says, are loyal to the government, but eschew party politics. They are eager to serve their country through devoting themselves to the welfare of the people. They hold administrative posts only when these are not dependent on party politics. Some Bahá'ís in Persia have been appointed to important posts of this type. One is chief magistrate in a city, one head of an imperial bank. Gradually, as the Bahá'í Faith develops and spreads, it will number among its supporters outstanding citizens. The early history of the Bahá'í religion in Persia reveals the fact that it had many notables in its ranks.

In each country the Bahá'ís have an especial problem. In Germany it is the Semitic question; in Persia polygamy and opium; in France, alcohol; in England, class prejudice; in America, racial prejudice. The teachings 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave on interracial relations are so sound, kind, and sincere, and the Bahá'í teaching of the oneness of mankind so thoroughgoing that Bahá'ís have a stronger programme and deeper sincerity than other workers for harmony between races. The Bahá'ís need to be more courageous in applying these principles. Especially should they convince the Negro and the world at large that they stand for lack of prejudice in social ways.

At three in the afternoon we went to the Shrine of the Báb and 'Abdu'l-Bahá on Mount Carmel. It is only five or ten minutes walk from the Pilgrim House. The road brings one to the foot of some terraces. One enters a gate and climbs alternately by flights of stone steps and paths of red crushed stone. On either side are scarlet geraniums and palms. The approach to the shrine is steep. And this steepness I liked, thinking of it as a bit of symbolism.

Near the shrine is a circle of cedars where Bahá'u'lláh used to sit. A larger circle has been planted outside to protect the original trees. The view from here is one of extreme beauty, embracing this part of the Mediterranean, 'Akká Bay, and, nine miles across the bay, the city of 'Akká which is always catching the light and reflecting it in some new way—truly like a jewel on a diadem.

Coming down the mountain we went into the house of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, now Shoghi Effendi's. Here [XXIII:12:376] we had the privilege of meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá's sister, His widow and two of our stay in Haifa, we realized more what the true beauty and nobility of womanhood may be. The face of the sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Bábíyyih Khánum, although shadowed by age, was so full of love and a genuine interest in life and people that we did not think of her as old, but rather as ageless and eternal. The freshness of the beauty of love radiating from her captivated us. And from all these women one sees an intensely bright reflection of the Spirit of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The fact that there are several of them and that each one has a strong individuality helps to broaden one's conception of the ideal Bahá'í character, for each is thoroughly lovely in a different way.

When we were in Geneva earlier in the autumn we had the great privilege of meeting Munírih Khánum, the youngest daughter of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She showed us then both in word and deed the nature of the love which 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life exemplified. For nearly eighty years, she told us, 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived a life of perfect love, each thing He did being a lesson to teach us how to love. Realizing how difficult it is to attain such love, we questioned her a little further. It must be real, she answered. In this quality of genuineness it is like the love we have for our children. If they do wrong we are eager to excuse them.

Then, dwelling a little also on the intellectual side of love she pointed out how necessary is understanding. Most hatred comes from lack of understanding. It is to aid in understanding that Bahá'u'lláh decreed the "parliament of nations, the federation of the world". She spoke in a simple and profound way of the condition of the world. It seemed to her like a wayward child. Through Bahá'u'lláh God has shown it the way of salvation, the same way that Christ and other great religious Founders have pointed out, the eternal path which every religion in its pure and early stages shows. But the world is slow to recognize the old path made new by the clearing away of the debris of age-long superstition and imitation. And because of this slowness of apprehension God allows suffering to come in order that through suffering this child may learn. In the same way a kind parent would allow his child to suffer in order that its understanding might increase.

But to come back to this afternoon in Haifa. The conversation turned on relations with people, and the importance of not interfering with the religious beliefs of others was brought out. "Leave them alone as to their religious belief, but be very kind to them." Words like these were spoken by the wife of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. She told an incident to illustrate what she meant. When a young girl she wanted to keep both the Muslim and the Bahá'í fast, but her mother thought that this would be too great a strain on her health as one fast followed immediately after the other. Her father said, "Leave her alone and it will come to her." [XXIII:12:377] And so it did, when she was fifteen or sixteen. She said The Kitáb-i-Íqán (Book of Certitude) by Bahá'u'lláh helped her much. She wanted us to be sure to read it in the new translation by Shoghi Effendi.

Rúhá Khánum, one of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's daughters, spoke of joy and sorrow, wondering which brought us nearer to God. She thought, sorrow. She told of an American woman who came a long way to see 'Abdu'l-Bahá because she had heard that He was a great spiritual teacher. She was suffering intensely because her loved ones had died. Her love for them consumed all other thought and she longed only to have them again. But in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá she obtained the real comfort none else had been able to give.

That evening at dinner Effie told a story illustrating another side of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, His love of fun and happiness. He and His entourage were staying in Lady Bs¹ house in London. One evening there was a sound of much laughter below stairs. It was so gay and arresting that Lady B. went down to find the occasion of the mirth, and 'Abdu'l-Bahá followed. They found Khusraw, 'Abdu'l-Bahá's servant, and one of the maids laughing and joking very happily. Khusraw was telling how women in the Orient have to obey the men and how if he and the maid were there she would have to do just what he told her and the maid was answering that in England things were different and, since they were in England, he must do what she said, etc. 'Abdu'l-Bahá gave them each two shillings for being happy.

Letters home

Persia: Visit to a Bahá'í village

Keith Ransom-Kehler²

In her world travels in behalf of the Bahá'í Movement the author takes time to write to friends impressions derived from her varied experiences. These "Letters home" we have been privileged to present to the readers of the Bahá'í Magazine at different times during the past year. The first "letter" appeared in the January 1932 number [XXII:10:310–12], and described the author's visit to Nikko and other places in Japan. The April number [XXIII:1:10–14] gave some of her impressions of China; the December issue [XXIII:9:270–4] contained an interesting description of her contacts with the Maoris of New Zealand; and the January number [XXIII:10:308–12] her observations while traveling through India. Herein begins a new series on her fascinating material and spiritual experiences in Persia.

Crossing the western boundary of Persia, from 'Iráq, we behold at once the gaunt and troubled grandeur of her sterile mountain chains. Her landscape presents this profile wherever we may go; a thousand valleys past which the mountains are ever marching, sometimes stepping imperiously across our path and forcing it to fling its tortuous way to their very summits; often lifting their lofty peaks and snowy diadems to peer majestically over the clouds; in Mázindarán luxuriantly wooded—elsewhere barren and wrinkled; in Khurásán, now ancient and indifferent, their transfixed writhings bear mute testimony to the agony of earth's youth. Purple at dawn, blue at midday, rosy at dusk, feeding the countless rivulets that fling diamonds when spurned by our flying wheels, these mountains—which are Persia—have listened for ages to the inarticulate prayers sent up, from her desert valleys, in verdure and gardens and produce for the divine bounty of water. You have to get the feel of this landscape, before you can know Persia.

² Keith Ransom-Kehler (1876–1933), born Nannie Keith Bean (known later solely by her mother's maiden name of Keith). American Bahá'í lecturer and world traveller; designated by Shoghi Effendi as the first American Bahá'í martyr and, posthumously, the first woman appointed as a Hand of the Cause of God. Shoghi Effendi sent her on a special assignment in Iran to 1. represent the National Spiritual Assembly of the Bahá'ís of the United States and Canada, and on behalf of Shoghi Effendi; 2. to petition Riḍá Sháh Pahlaví to remove the ban on the entry and distribution of Bahá'í literature in Iran and also to secure the lifting of all the limitations that had for years been imposed on the Iranian Bahá'í community. Died of smallpox in Iṣfahán.

Her people, still pastoral and archaic, have for ages been surrounded by these almost insurmountable physical barriers. Caught as it were in a geographical back-wash, Persia has not been on the beaten path of travel, except for slow-moving caravans, or exploitation and conquest, since those ancient days when “Ships in thousands ... and men in nations” attested to her unchallengeable grandeur.

Even a short journey in Persia today is arduous. The mountains are jealous guards of the secrets and mysteries that lie beyond their confines. How infinitely more difficult was communication in days before improved roads and methods of transportation had arrived. Unfriendliness, timidity and provincialism have ever been the price of segregation and homogeneity.

Due to this isolation Persia up to the time of the Báb's proclamation was in a pre-logical, pre-scientific, pre-international condition. The magical progress that has taken place since that date has been enormously heightened in the past few years under the regime of Riḍá Sháh Pahlavi.

In order to understand what the Bahá'í teachings have done for [XXIII:12:379] Persia it is only necessary to visit a Bahá'í and a non-Bahá'í community.

Tucked away in the mountains of Ádhirbayján is the Bahá'í village of Saysán,¹ a community of about fifteen hundred souls, I would say, of whom twelve hundred and fifty are Bahá'ís. So great is their reputation for justice, understanding and enlightenment that the Muslims of the community frequently submit their conflicts and problems to the Bahá'í Assembly rather than to the Muslim Courts.

In arranging my program the Spiritual Assembly of Tabríz included a day in this heavenly place. A farsang² back from the main-travelled highway, a road built for Martha³ two years ago leading to the village, had been rebuilt and newly repaired for the large convoy of motors that accompanied me on this occasion. Any path is good enough for a donkey, and a camel needs none at all; so I suppose the road will lapse again until the next western visitor is expected.

A little group of villagers were waiting at the fork of the road to direct us, and then began a triumphal progress so extravagant that it will remain forever, not an episode, but an acute emotional experience.

As our car turned into the crude new-made roadway, from every field and farmstead, from every lodge and pasture they came running—all those who perforce must remain at their work, unable to join the holiday-makers in the village. “Alláh-u-Abhá”⁴ rang from every side: “Alláh-u-Abhá” joyously cried the little shepherd as his frightened flock fled away. “Alláh-u-Abhá” pealed the stalwart young farmer leaving his stolid bullocks in the half-finished furrow; old men ran breathlessly from their herds calling “Alláh-u-Abhá” as they came; “Alláh-u-Abhá was the shout of the donkey boy, and “Alláh-u-Abhá” the glad greeting of the camel-driver who had hurried all night to arrive at this rendezvous until at last the very birds, trees, streams, yes, rocks, had joined the mystic chorus and the earth herself was pulsating with the power of the Greatest Name. It was as if the Heavens had descended and all the company of men and angels had joined “the four living creatures” and “the four and twenty elders” bowed before that august throne and chanting with them, in incommunicable ecstasy, their eternal song “Holy, Holy, Holy Lord God of Hosts! Heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy Bahá.”

And then, turning sharply to enter the main road of the village there in two mighty rows were drawn up before us these hundreds of men and women rocking the houses with their joyous welcome of “Alláh-u-Abhá”.

I still have the feeling that this day is something that I have read somewhere; it doesn't seem as if it could actually have happened.

Unlike the hideous black chuddar worn by the women of the towns and cities, these villagers were alive with colour, and vivid, almost barbaric, it gave a very dramatic background to the scene. [XXIII:12:380]

We stopped in front of a villa set on a hill with a very long narrow garden in front. Not only was the entire facade of the house covered with choice rugs but the whole garden wall around the entrance gate had been similarly decorated, and lovely rugs had been spread upon the dusty pathway leading to the residence.

Seating myself in an upper window I watched with dazed awe the happy, reverent throngs who crowded through the gate to do me honour. Strangely enough the women came first, every one of them carrying a baby, the mothers their infants, the grandmothers the “second youngest”.

Above the marvel of this sight my senses danced with delight at the gorgeous colourings, orange, red, grass-green, magenta, Chinese pink—it was none too brilliant for the occasion.

It took about twenty minutes for the women to file in, in orderly fashion; they stood to the right, around the pool. The men followed more rapidly to the opposite side and then I was to come down to the garden and speak.

Turkish is the vernacular of the whole province of Ádhirbayján. It was very complicated: Mr Cayvais, the interpreter who accompanied me from Ṭihrán, translated to Mr Frután¹ (a national teacher stationed in the village at the time) who in turn rendered it into Turkish.

When I had finished I came from the terrace down several steps to the garden level in order to mingle with the friends and have a picture taken with them. Alas! the whole roll of films was a complete failure so that the pictorial record cannot accompany my letter, as I had hoped.

As I was standing with the men's group the chanting of the final *munáját*² started; I was astonished, after a little while, to feel shy hands touching my dress, my scarf, my shoulder. One boy, with a radiant face, had placed his finger-tips on my arm. I warmly covered his hand with mine, until the prayer was finished.

Then just as picturesquely, just as dramatically as they had come they melted away, and we were called to the feast that had been prepared for us.

This village was significant to me not only because it has already established a reputation for Bahá'í justice and progress, not only because for three generations it has stood firm and staunch in the Covenant of God, not only because of the loving kindness which was so bountifully showered upon me, but because it is the native village of my dear friend Yadu'lláh, caretaker of the mansion and Shrine at Bahjí. He had long since endeared himself to me as a sincere, selfless and devoted Bahá'í, and it was like meeting those already near to me to meet his brothers and sister here.

A pathetic little group stood apart on an adjoining housetop as I was speaking. Who are those? Why don't they come into the garden?" I asked. "They are Muslims," I was told. "Alláhu-Akbar,"¹ I shouted to them to the delight of the Friends. [XXIII:12:381]

Luncheon over and high mountains to climb before we could find a resting place for the night, I went at once to the Ḥazíratu'l-Quds to meet the Spiritual Assembly and say farewell.

The place was packed and lined with old and young, many who had been in the fields having been replaced by those who had attended the morning session.

As I walked between these rows of shining faces the real meaning of Bahá'í solidarity suddenly penetrated me. Here were Persians speaking Turkish, fixed in a tiny town in the mountains of Ádhirbayján, and I, a sophisticated and effete Occidental, peripatetic, artificial, cosmopolitan; but we were bound together by ties "more lasting than bronze and higher than the exalted site of the Pyramids". For knowledge of the coming of Bahá'u'lláh and knowledge of His All-enfolding Covenant is not a question of locality, education or preferment but an unshakable spiritual reality that welds those who know it into an indissoluble human brotherhood. Here is a true solidarity that can withstand all the forces of disruption in the universe.

Yadu'lláh's sister came in for a few moments to the Assembly meeting and on her behalf and theirs I was presented with two beautiful pieces of hand-woven jájim,² embroidered with my name.

As I was leaving the assembly room a little idiot child, who had been causing some confusion, ran up to me and pulled at my clothing. I remembered the words of 'Abdu'l-Bahá that mental disorders may be healed by the power of prayer. And in a dim, remote way there stirred in my soul a faint shadow of the mighty compassion that must have seized our blessed Lord Jesus, that stern Master of tenderness, when He healed the demoniac boy. Dropping on my knees beside him I lovingly clasped the little fellow in my arms and repeated the healing prayer. He seemed mystified, quieted and happy; while in the breasts of all of us was cemented that essential unity that is attained when we touch "the depths and not the tumults of the soul". In face of such great verities as prayer and love and divine compassion, we realize that "there is neither East nor West, border, nor breed, nor birth."

The farewells were just as moving as the welcome had been. I was tremendously agitated for fear someone would be hurt; women running, with babies in their arms, to touch my hand as I waved from our moving motor, men jostling, boys under the very wheels it seemed to me, shouting their goodbyes.

And once again the two long brilliant lines raising the glad paeon "Alláh-u-Abhá". Once more the fields streaming with those leaving their occupations to give "Alláh-u-Abhá" as their Godspeed; babies in their mother's arms swelling the chorus "Alláh-u-Abhá"; again the skies were raining back the great refrain with which these simple, earnest, devoted souls were assaulting heaven.

All Persians are poets. Our Bahá'í chauffeur was stilled with [XXIII:12:382] the significance of the wondrous. "I never realized before," he said, "that nature could speak, but tonight the universe is crying Alláh-u-Abhá."

¹ "God is the Most Great"; the opening words of the Adhán or Muslim call to prayer.

² Jájim, jájím: Pers. a fine bedding or carpet (often wool and with vertical stripes).

"The quiet-coloured end of evening" approached as we said farewell to our kind convoy of friends from Tabriz.

Our faces set once more toward Tīhrán, the solemn lovely tone of camel bells rang from the passing caravans; the donkey trains were afoot again after the noon-day rest; the sky was peach and amethyst with the recollection of sunset; the mauve mountains, remembering their age, grew chilly; kneeling by the roadside offering the evening prayer, the resigned figure of a devout Muslim symbolized the spirit of ancient Persia. But I had seen that today which assured me that Persia was arousing from her age old lethargy, from her fanaticism, from her resignation, and that through the assistance of this great Bahá'í army of faith and strength she was already moving forward to conquer the old evil things of her past—"Not by might nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts."¹

Letters home

Persia

Keith Ransom-Kehler

In her world travels in behalf of the Bahá'í Movement the author takes time to write to friends impressions derived from her varied experiences. These "Letters home" we have been privileged to present to the readers of the Bahá'í Magazine at different times during the past year. The first "letter" appeared in the January 1932 number [XXII:10:310–12], and described the author's visit to Nikko and other places in Japan. The April number [XXIII:1:10–14] gave some of her impressions of China; the December issue [XXIII:9:270–4] contained an interesting description of her contacts with the Maoris of New Zealand; and the January number [XXIII:10:308–12] her observations while traveling through India. Last month [XXIII:12:378–2] appeared the first instalment in a new series on her fascinating material and spiritual experiences in Persia. Herein she describes certain historic points and principles "which are essential to a full understanding of the spirit animating the followers of the Báb."

In an hour I must be on the platform and I am not even dressed, but I have an irresistible urge to start this promised letter to you; for once I have started a thing I write until it is finished; and the stories of Persia within me are struggling to be told.

If ever I undertook to write anything formal on Persia I would be nonplussed as to whether I should call it "White Rooms", "Dream Gardens", or "Mud Fences". For this country is one astounding and fascinating contradiction. The ugliest thing on earth, a mud fence, encloses the most beautiful, a Persian garden; the (to us) shocking dislocation of taste, a white room, houses the matchless design of a Persian carpet; in an old ramshackle, tumble-down bazaar one finds the loveliest things inlay and lacquer from Shíráz, brass or silver from Işfahán, silk and prints from Yazd, the turquoise tiles and pottery of Hamadán, embroideries and rich brocades—all divinely beautiful.

God has conferred upon Persia an unquenchable spirit; to whatever depths she may descend she carries with her a mysterious redemptive power. Within the brief confines of history she has given to the world three Manifestations² of God: Zarathustra, the Báb and Bahá'u'lláh. In less than a hundred years after the coming of the Promised One³ profound, yes, fundamental changes, are wiping away the obvious evidences of her fanaticism, her cruelty, her ignorance and her degradation, and are preparing her not slowly, but with magical rapidity, for an era of enlightenment, urbanity and fluent self-expression.

To the Bahá'í the most venerated spots are not those where the two Manifestations of our Faith lie buried¹ but Shíráz in Persia, and Baghdád in 'Iráq where their respective missions were revealed. Surely no other place than Shíráz on Persian soil is more sacred to us than the Shrine at Shaykh Ṭabarsí where first "The Dawn-Breakers" of our Revelation gave "the last full measure of devotion", entrusted to history her most lustrous and heroic page, and "rapt in holy [XXIV:1:11] ecstasy, writ with their life-blood upon the tablet of the world the verses of God's Divine Unity."

Ṭihrán, the birthplace of Bahá'u'lláh, is indeed a Holy City, and Núr,² His family seat, but we are told to reverence Baghdád especially in His commemoration.

The names of those exalted beings who happily wooed death and were wedded to the Station of self-sacrifice in the Pathway of God have left the overwhelming evidence of their sanctity and devotion forever enshrined within the humble little memorial at Shaykh Ṭabarsí.

As we were quitting Khurásán I recalled how Mullá Ḥusayn and his small but valiant band of followers, encamped under the "Black Standards", awaited Divine Guidance and then went down the rocky deifies into Mázindarán—their Karbilá.

It seems a thousand pities that only the special student of history or comparative religion should know those events and episodes in the great religions of the world that, through the centuries, have made their adherents ready to die for them.

Certainly one of the outstanding events of secular as well as of religious history was the martyrdom of the younger son of Fáṭimah (the only daughter and the only child of Muḥammad) the Imám Ḥusayn.

All sects of Islám agree that the Prophet informally appointed His cousin and son-in-law 'Alí, together with His lineal descendants, to succeed Him. But since the words of the Prophet were oral and traditional, since they were not written, a group of His followers after His death feeling that Muḥammad has been too much swayed by His affection for His family, and fearing their influence, at once swept aside His command and elected those democratically—[XXIV:1:12] the Caliphs—who were to act as defenders and custodians of His Faith.

'Alí, finally, after three predecessors had been chosen, was elected Caliph. His tempestuous career ended with his murder, his older son Ḥasan, according to the explicit utterance of Muḥammad, succeeding him as the second Imám. 'Alí was the first Imám and the fourth Caliph.

Hasan was poisoned by order of Mu'avíyih, leader of the opposing party, and when some years later his younger brother who had now returned to Arabia was summoned to send his allegiance to the newly elected Caliph, an office not provided for by Muḥammad, he quite deliberately and with the sublime intent of giving his life in obedience to his Grandfather's behest set out to Mesopotamia with seventy-two of his followers there to offer up his soul for the great principle of the Imamate.

For Imám means Guardian and the Imamate alone could have protected the Cause of ² Bahá'u'lláh's ancestral home (36.198842, 52.010238) is in the village of Tákur (36.200164, 52.010178), 40 km south of Núr and 47.5 km NE of the village of Afjih.

Muḥammad from schism, sectarianism and strife. If, in the Qur'án, Muḥammad had written this succession as an indubitable part of His Teaching; if His followers were constrained to recognize one authorized person to whom they must give allegiance there could, of course, never be any division, any disunity, for division or challenge of the explicit written word of the Founder would at once put them outside His Faith; so there could be no split within it.

The sincere follower of every religion must see that the weakness of His Faith lies in this fact: that it has no authoritative interpreter, none to whom the faithful can turn as representing the authentic successor of its Founder.

The statement of Jesus concerning Peter is subject to half a dozen interpretations including the charge of interpolation in the Gospel, and the great majority of Christians reject His statement as establishing any unchallengeable succession or as conferring the right of interpreting His words. Nobody, whom all alike will accept, can tell us what He really meant. We have in Christendom three hundred and fifty-two sects, each insisting that Jesus meant a different thing. And to whatever degree these sects may protest against succession and interpretation, each has arrogated to itself the letter, excluding any who dare question its interpretation, and hands down through succeeding generations its own decision and decree concerning the Teaching of our Lord. So that every sect is practicing interpretation and succession however much it may deny it.

If Jesus, Muḥammad, or the Founder of any other religion, had written an unassailable document in which He specifically named an individual, together with his successors, and said to His followers, "What these say I meant, you must accept as what I did mean; to reject him or them is to repudiate me"; we see, with perfect clarity, that the rivalries, misunderstandings and bloodshed promoted in the name of religion would have been absolutely impossible.

It was to defend this great prin- [XXIV:1:13] ciple of an Interpreter, a Guardian, a Rallying Centre which would obviate schism, that the Imám Ḥusayn became a voluntary martyr.

As he neared Kúfih,¹ the great Islamic stronghold where his father had been martyred, he was informed that an army of twenty thousand was marching out against him. He deflected his course to the then small settlement of Karbilá, and there his little band was practically annihilated and he became the great redemptive figure of Shí'a Islám.

Three times before Shimr, his murderer, dispatched him, he cried to those assembled, "Is there any who will assist me?" extending to them their last opportunity for submission and obedience to the request and desire of Muḥammad.

On several occasions Mullá Ḥusayn referred to Shaykh Ṭabarsí as Karbilá.² Those who cast in their lot with him had no illusions as to the outcome of their enterprise. They, too, deliberately sacrificed their lives to prove to a negligent and vicious world the Reality of that One in Whose Pathway suffering was a joy and death a triumph.

It is a long time since, at the beginning of my letter, I mentioned the Bábu'l-Báb's³ descent into Mázindarán; but an understanding of the historic points and principles to which I have been referring are essential to a full understanding of the Báb.

For many years in those strange hallucinations that come with encroaching sleep, in reveries, and in dreams, I have seen, not a score of times but a hundred times or more those now familiar mountain passes that wind down into Mázindarán. Once when we were driving in California I remember telling you that I had seen that road before, although it was the first time I had traversed it. But it was not until I travelled from Ámiriyyah to Shahíd ('Alí-Ábád) that a profound inner delight and agitation coupled with scene after scene of my well-remembered fantasy assured me that this was the place of my visions. Suddenly we shot between high stone cliffs that the sun would only penetrate for half an hour at noonday, and the mysterious sense of unreality that seized me brought back the thought of heavy lids and drowsiness; and then a stabbing joy of recollection. To see luxuriant verdure again—Mázindarán is sub-tropical after the starved, stark mountains of Khurásán—added to my sense of unreality. Being, as you have often said, a realist, I am not in the least addicted to this sort of thing, which made it all stranger.

Letters home

Persia

Keith Ransom-Kehler

The second to last instalment of Mrs Ransom-Kehler's "Letters" giving an account of her missionary travels in Persia—brought to an end by her tragic and untimely death—here find posthumous publication. The reader will note in this article a description of the strain and stress incident to travel in the East, to which she lent herself a willing martyr, but which lowered her resistance and made her susceptible to the contagion which caused her demise.

As I lay in a state of collapse from the rigors of my journey between Bábul and Rasht, I opened my Moffatt Testament and read the words of Paul to the Corinthians:

"I have been often at the point of death. Five times have I got forty lashes (all but one) from the Jews; three times have I been beaten by the Romans; three times ship-wrecked; once pelted with stones, adrift at sea for a whole day and night; I have been often on my travels, I have been in danger from rivers and robbers, in danger from Jews and Gentiles, through danger of town and desert, through dangers on the sea, through danger among false brothers, through labour and hardship, through many a sleepless night, through hunger and thirst, starving many a time, cold, ill-clad, and all the rest of it. And then there is the pressing business of each day." ... "I am satisfied for His sake with weakness, insults, trouble, persecution and calamity."¹

It was now the middle of November and the winter rains had started relentlessly by the time we were ready to leave Bábul. Dr Bassár and the Spiritual Assembly urged us to stay lest we meet great difficulty on our journey but we decided that it was wiser to start before conditions got worse.

We left in a downpour at nine o'clock Friday morning hoping to reach Shabsavar,² after a brief meeting with the believers enroute, in that evening.

The rain stopped again miraculously, as it had on our return from Arabkhayl,³ while I spoke from the porch of my host's home to what seemed to me the entire village of Fraidunkavár.⁴

A great procession of cars convoyed us to the next town and there, with tears, I parted from the glorious Bahá'ís of Bábul.

Soon our road was skirting the beach of the Caspian Sea and so continued until we crossed the Sefridroud (Wide River)¹ in the Province of Gílán.

Throughout the length and breadth of Persia there is no such thing as a navigable stream; but in Mázindarán hundreds of creeks and rivulets flow from the perpetual snows of the Alburz range into the great sea.² These are spanned by as many bridges, rather flimsy, temporary affairs; for the road commissioner at one point told us that that particular bridge was being replaced for the fourth time in a year. The earth is a rich loose gravelly alluvial soil that gives way under any undue pressure.

After an hour or two of rain the creeks and streams begin to roll like torrents, gutting their banks and even washing rocks along to the furious sea. Both the works of nature and the works of man combine in threat and insecurity, that very soon become a menace and a devastation. The bridges range from three or four loose boards to about sixty feet in length, and fly by when “the going is good”, like telegraph poles past a train. But at this season and [XXIV:10:309] under these circumstances we had to stop and examine every structure.

The first bridge that we attempted to cross, after parting from our friends, had lost from its centre enough planks to permit the front end of the car to drop through. Here began the tedium and exertion of searching for heavy boards and putting them in place. That continued to be a quite regular part of our journey from then on.

By now the rain was pouring and the car was heaving through sheets of muddy water. It was an old model loaded to the gun-holes with our luggage, camping kit, bedding and all the necessities for just such an emergency.

Stopping every few hundred yards to examine roads and bridges we found their condition growing steadily worse as we neared the sea, for the whole push and weight of the torrents were dashing to their outlet with cumulative violence. We came to the first of many bridges dismantled and crumpled by the flood. A crude temporary structure had been thrown over the stream twenty feet lower than the bridge bed, which spanned it on a trestle at the level of the highway. To go from this level to the water’s edge in the deep mud of an unpaved descent, and on the opposite bank to reach the highway again was problem enough in itself; but the temporary bridge, only loosely anchored on the crumbling banks, presented a very grave danger.

‘Alá’í and Najmiyyih³ crossed first on foot; Váḥid and I stood in the rain and mud on the near side praying fervently. Water was already dashing furiously over the tottering boards and as the heavy car rolled onto it, it began to wave like a flag.

“Alláh-u-Abhá! he is clear,” we cried to each other as the car miraculously mounted the opposite bank, and we followed across with mincing steps and baited breath, hoping to be equally fortunate. As we step- [XXIV:10:310] ped ashore Váḥid and I agreed that the bridge couldn’t last much longer, and in a short time, we later learned, it was washed out to sea.

The car stalled on the hillside: finally enough stragglers appeared to push it over the crown on to the road. All of them were dripping and plastered with the mud and filthy water showered over them from the rear wheels trying to get traction. ‘Alá’í looked like an Abyssinian chieftain. But this, which would ordinarily have seemed a bad experience, went almost unnoticed in the midst of the actual dangers that confronted us.

Ḥasan Áqá ground his brakes and jammed on the emergency just in time to keep us from plunging into a deep stream where the road approach to the bridge had been swept away by the chafing eddies of a backwash.

Another interminable wait while road-menders, who luckily were passing, found long stout timbers to cover the gap. When these were nailed to the exposed beams of the bridge that were barely the width of the wheels apart, the car made a perilous crossing without two inches to spare, right or left.

But we still had the cheering thought that though late we could arrive in Shahsavār—only one hundred kilometres from Bábul—that night, and rest from our labours.

The rain nagged wearily on; the sea on our right was turgid and wild, the mountains on our left sodden and gravy, the road beneath us spongy and treacherous, and all man's friendly efforts were nullified by the elements. We made a conscious attempt at cheerfulness and nonchalance, which deceived neither ourselves nor each other, and as each fresh danger was passed chanted a prayer of gratitude.

For two kilometres we ploughed on without mishap, then another devastated bridge confronted us, but this time with no temporary structure to replace it.

Raḥmatu'lláh (whose other name is 'Alá'í) and Ḥasan Áqá went to find a ford in the stream but returned to say that it was rolling higher than the car and that crossing was absolutely impossible.

So here we were hemmed in by the now impassable bridge that we had miraculously crossed behind us and this furious wall of water before us to a little spit of land about a mile wide. There was no village in sight. A man on horseback passed us going inland and we told him to send food and aid.

As a bounty of Providence an old deserted tumble-down shack by the roadside offered shelter for the night. An abundance of wood, left in a corner by its former occupant years before, enabled the men speedily to build two fires, one in the enclosed room, and one in the open thatched pavilion adjoining, where food was cooked, water heated and clothes dried. Camp cots were opened and our bedding, all too scanty for five adults on a bitter night, was spread in the enclosed room.

At length we saw lanterns coming through the wood, and by-and-by three men from a distant village appeared. We hastily sent them back for samovar, utensils and provisions, and after an unconscionable time spent in coming and going a great steaming pilau¹ was served and life took on a brighter aspect.

The villagers brought tea, chicken [XXIV:10:311] and a huge bowl of mást² or clabber with sticks of charcoal crossed on it.

"Why the charcoal?" I inquired. "Nothing black must be brought into the house after sunset," they explained, "and nothing white must be taken out of it." So they covered the mast with charcoal to deceive the evil spirits into believing that no opening had been left for them by the removal of a colour which they hate.

Váḥid and Ḥasan Áqá slept in the car. They said that it would have been stripped by morning, even in this uninhabited place, if they had not done so.

² Mást (US clabber): sour, coagulated milk.

The skies wept their last and through the serried yellow clouds of their troubled recollection a dazed, bleared moonlight fell. The sea throbbed and beat like a mighty engine, and the superstitious visitors, who are very weather-wise told us that that sound betokened the end of the rain.

We were all nipped to the marrow with the stabbing cold and were early astir to rebuild the fires, breakfast, and thaw out before our next adventure.

True to its reputation Mázindarán was rapidly forgetting the sullen violence of her storm, for the sun was now shining brilliantly and the waters were rapidly subsiding.

Our dilapidated shelter was only a few hundred yards from the creek and when we arrived we found the road-force already busy repairing the bridge. 'Alá'í and Váhid walked the beams of the dismantled structure to the opposite shore, had the heaviest luggage carried across, and left Najjie and me in the car to ford the stream. As we started to mount the banks after crossing, the engine stalled, the rear of the car not only formed a dam that sent the water mounting but also was sinking in the muddy bed of the river. The road-menders hastily came to our assistance as the water swilled over the floor of the car. As many as could find hand space lifted, while a dozen of them pulled violently on a rope attached to the front bumper. With a mighty effort they heaved up the rear wheels, the men in front pulling the car ashore; Ḥasan Áqá started his engine while the men at the ropes, uninitiated in the Life and Habits of the automobile, continued to run ahead pulling, even after it was under its own power. I was frantic lest some of them be hurt, and at last as the car gained momentum they all cast loose and we reached the highway without accident. At the very moment that we passed, the superintendent received instructions from the engineer to permit no one to cross there until the bridge was repaired.

Whenever a Persian undertakes anything difficult it is to the rhythmic refrain: "Yá 'Alí! Yá Muḥammad! Yá Alláh!" (Oh 'Alí, oh Muḥammad, oh God), very much as sailors cry "Heave ho". As the car was visibly sinking I kept repeating with great fervour "Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá." When they heard me they all stop- [XXIV:10:312] ped dead in amazement wondering perhaps if this was the familiar name of one of the Imams. They would have left us to drown I suppose if I had told them that it was the Name of the Promised Ḥusayn who had come to establish peace and justice in the world.

Full of hope and gratitude for clear weather and sunshine we passed a little thatched village and came to the Amír Rúd (river of the Minister). The heavy mail car was stuck fast near the shore, the lighter road car had been turned over three times and lay on its side in the swollen current; the bridge was gone.

So we turned back to find accommodation in the village¹ until the flood abated or the bridge was finished.

Letters home

Persia

Keith Ransom-Kehler

This concludes the series under the title "Letters home" begun by Keith Ransom-Kehler in the January 1932 issue [XXII:10:310-12] of this magazine. In this series we have traced her world pilgrimage through Japan, China, Australia, New Zealand, the Holy Land, and then her prolonged travels in Persia, a pilgrimage terminated by her sudden and tragic death in that land last October. Following is the second part of the author's description of difficulties encountered in her travels through rural districts between Bábul and Rasht.

The keeper of the Coffee House welcomed us to his home, the most pretentious in the village. The better houses are built of logs plastered with thick mud; the roofs are high gabled (not flat as in the desert portions of Persia), and thatched. When I inquired how much it would cost to build such a house the man said thirty túmán; the túmán at par is worth one dollar.

There were two rooms and a partially enclosed porch. We took the living-room and kitchen-porch where all the cooking was done. There were no windows in the house and even Najmiyyih had to stoop to pass the low lintel. This small opening furnished the only light and ventilation, making the room warmer in winter and cooler in summer.

At one side was a mud ridge under a mud mantel and a hole in the ceiling just above the door some distance from this hearth furnished the only outlet for the smoke of the newly kindled fire. The opening led to the attic reached by stairs improvised from an oblique tree-trunk in which regular notches had been cut for a foot-hold. The light from the opening in the roof, where the smoke finally emerged, revealed the rafters hung with dried fruit and vegetables, pickled I would think, beyond nourishment from hanging in that chimney.

The wood stood upright against the wall the thick flange of dried mud holding it in place. The beams and ceiling were burnished the most beautiful vivid black by constant incrustations of smoke. I never knew that black could be so vibrant and lovely!

There was a narrow mud platform or dais on one side of the room, on which stood a chest, the only piece of furniture in the house; a triangular shelf about four feet from the ground spanned every corner and a little thick lip of mud extended from the west wall marking the Kiblah, or direction of Mecca; on it was kept the mohr¹ or sacred earth from the blessed spot compressed in a tablet on which the forehead is pressed at the time of the frequent daily prayers. An iron kettle suspended by three chains from a rafter kept the dried meat from marauding animals.

Once more the cots were set up, and since it had now begun to rain again and walking was impossible, we reclined nearly all day to keep below the level of the smoke whose stinging acrid bite penetrated eyes and nostrils with a sharp hurtful tang.

The women of this village of Amirrud (named for the river)² are extremely comely. Our hostess had refined regularity of features and beautiful even teeth. The costume was picturesque: a very full bright skirt reaches the knees, a loose [XXIV:11:339] blouse covered with a sleeveless Eton jacket embroidered in silver or strong colours is worn atop, while a snug little pill-box of a hat from which dangles the woman's dowry in silver is covered with a small head-shawl.

When we first arrived, while 'Alá'í was making the arrangements, I sat in the car the cynosure of un-cramped village curiosity. The woman nearest, with her brood hovering round her, announced frankly, "In the village we don't see many sights!" And I certainly looked one with my unwashed face, uncombed hair and muddy, mussed clothes.

When I told our hostess that she is pretty she said simply, "Sorrow has aged and changed me; I have never been able to bear a child; five have now been taken; but Inshá'alláh (God willing) this one will live.”

² Amír Rúd: a village (36.633470, 51.567460) on the Caspian Sea coast, Mazandaran Province. It named after the river to its east. The village they stayed overnight in must be Najjár Dih, since they had not crossed the Amír Rúd.

The women do all the hard work, the men idly watching as they tug their lives away.¹ Children are not an economic responsibility but an actual commercial asset, and the family fortunes are built by having one every year. It is a common sight to see a young woman, an infant tied to her back, one astride her shoulders, a third, the eldest trudging behind, a fourth expected, walking with her produce or weaving to the distant village fair.

Our hostess climbed up the steep tree-trunk ladder to transact business in the attic, twenty times a day. She lifted enormously heavy containers of water or rice for the coffee-house, brought wood for the fireplaces, washed, cooked, carried, never sat down. Hordes of women in America of a corresponding social class would pick up the first loose object and break a man's skull if he ever suggested her working like this.

Once she came into our room and with great ceremony unlocked the chest with a key tightly fastened on a cord to her girdle. It seemed a quite solemn occasion as she un-hasped and unstrapped it lifting the lid carefully removing what appeared to be very precious objects, until she found a small bag which I thought must contain the family wealth if not diamonds or pearls. After everything had been painstakingly replaced and the chest secured again, I discovered that she had extracted a package of black pepper! If by accident I ever found any of that vile condiment in my possession I would hastily bury it for fear the dog might get it, since I do not consider it fit for consumption by man or beast; and here was this dear soul treasuring it.

The corner shelf nearest the fireplace contained a copy of the Qur'án. “My husband can read it, but he can't read anything else,” said the wife naifly.² When questioned he said that though a Muslim he knew nothing about the history of Islám, nor when or where Muḥammad lived. We tried to speak to him of Bahá'u'lláh, but he had no idea what we were talking about.

The long rainy day drew to a close and a muggy night fell. We could neither go nor return. Our gasoline had been greatly depleted by our frequent stalling and heavy going. We paid no more attention to punctures and engine trouble than to mosquito bites under such circumstances. Reports from the river told us that the mail car was still washed by the rolling waters; the road car drifting nearer the sea. [XXIV:11:340]

'Alá'í hired a man to go with his son to a nearby village across the river, one of the king's villages, supervised by a young Bahá'í. “Tell him of our plight and don't return without gasoline,” was the command.

At four o'clock, the rain having again stopped and the sun come out, we were delighted to have the rescued road-car draw up and say that the river was now passable. “Then we ought to go right away,” I said, “before the rains start again.” “And spend another night like last night by the roadside?” inquired Raḥmat.

“I'm sure we were all very happy by the roadside,” I said smilingly. “We were so grateful for warmth and shelter, so thankful to God for having safely passed such dangers, so joyful for any experience in the pathway of His service. But it is true that we might not be so fortunate another time. Whenever there is any question or doubt among Bahá'ís they must invoke the great principle of consultation,” I continued.

Though Ḥasan Áqá left Ṭihrán a Muslim he was by now a Bahá'í, so the five of us prayed, offered our opinions and voted. There were the two opposite views; first, that the man hadn't come with the gasoline; it was late and the road-menders had gone; so that if we stuck we would have to stay there; and secondly, the possibility of being confined to this village for a week if the rains started again.

There were three votes to stay against two to go, so we settled down with perfect satisfaction to fleas, inadequate covering, smoke-saturated atmosphere and all the comforts of home, for another night.

Great cosmic forces are evidently embraced in consultation. It never fails that where it is used exactly as directed "all its ways are happiness and all its paths are peace". Though this was one of the most formidable streams that we crossed we forded it easily and without assistance the next morning.

About fifteen kilometres farther on there was a three day accumulation of cars on either side of the stream. If we had left our village the night before we would have had only the ardour of loading and unloading for our pains for we could have come eleven kilometres and no further, provided we had safely crossed the Amír Rúd.

Here was a wide river¹ with the bridge partially swept away. The ford was a 400 meters from the highway nearer the sea. An army of men were lined up to reap a harvest pushing the cars across.

Najjie and I rode over on horseback, 'Alá'í and Váhid were carried pick-a-back by stout peasants, the car was stripped, the engine muffled and with a great shout of "Yá 'Alí" the dangerous passage was begun. It rolled three-fourths of the way without trouble and then all the king's horses and all the king's men couldn't budge it. I couldn't bear to look at the strained and futile efforts of the crew to start it. At last after I had given up the idea of its completing the passage, they pulled an enormous bundle of drift wood from under the front wheels and made the shore.

The greatest peril that we encountered was still ahead of us, however: reaching the highway again. The grade to and from the river brink to the road had been [XXIV:11:341] hastily made by loose, fresh, wet loam carried in donkey panniers and lightly dumped to form a fill down the hillside. As the car started up, the men still pushing, the road simply rolled away under the weight of the car and there was imminent danger of its turning over and crushing the men on that side. They had no firm place on which to stand to steady the car and it was inclining at a treacherous angle. "Yá Bahá'u'l-Abhá," I cried in a frenzy of apprehension lest someone be killed. By another evident miracle it righted itself and made the highway.

We had now spent three nights, cold, bedraggled, covered with fleas, without removing our clothes, half suffocated with wood-smoke, on flimsy cots, but except when in actual peril, we had managed to keep remarkably cheerful and happy. Some way, in our hearts we felt that such hardships were a very little thing to gauge the reality of our devotion to the service of Bahá'u'lláh; and remembering the "last full measure of devotion" offered by thousands at His Threshold in martyrdom that His Faith might live, this all seemed very trivial and ordinary. Whatever apprehension we had was quite evidently for each other. All except me had families of growing children; I was the only one who could really be spared for my family is grown and scattered; each felt a great responsibility for the other, however. In the whole course of our adventure I did not hear one complaint—one regret; though I confess we were all too preoccupied to laugh when 'Alá'í, like a motion-picture comedy, turned pot-black with mud in a twinkling while trying to push our mired car, which showed that our attitude at last was not superficial.

This is only the merest outline, the high-lights of our experience; there were a score of other things that seem too slight to mention although ordinarily we would think that they had spoiled a trip. Unfortunately we were unable to get the right films for our camera in Bábul, so that this experience must go unrecorded except as I have written it.

At last by the grace of God we found the Friends waiting for us in Shabsavar, where I rudely left them to bathe and sleep the clock around in a quiet little room high in an orchard of orange blossoms.

How grateful we were to Bahá'u'lláh for providing against every need of our journey. How near such experiences bring us to Him. The promise of the Báb that "God will assist all those who arise to serve Him", had been spectacularly fulfilled.

Russia's cultural contribution to the Bahá'í Faith

Part I

Martha L. Root

The author, well known as a Bahá'í travelling teacher and lecturer, here relates the story of the Russian poet who gave to the world three celebrated writings about the Bahá'í Teachings. Miss Root has succeeded in giving us a marvellous bit of history and a story of surpassing interest. The second part will follow next month.

Mrs Isabel Grinevsky, a Russian poet in Leningrad, gave a great impetus to the Bahá'í Movement and to world art in her three celebrated writings, the two dramas, Bab and Baha'u'llah and a narrative called A Journey in the Countries of the Sun. The last named is an account of her visit to in 1911 when He was in Ramleh, Egypt. While the last is in prose it has verses introduced so that we might almost say that the three form a trilogy in poetic form presenting the new universal religion of the oneness of mankind proclaimed by those three heavenly personages, the Báb the Forerunner, Bahá'u'lláh the Revealer of the Word and 'Abdu'l-Bahá the Centre of the Covenant of the Bahá'í Movement.

From the point of view of art the dramas rank high. Russian critics affirm that these works have proclaimed their author a poet of the first order. One of her countrymen, Mr Wesselitzky, President of the Foreign Press Association of London, said that he read the drama Bab on a railway train when he was returning to England from Russia in August 1905. His own words were: "I was at once attracted by the rare combination of philosophical thought with a great power of expression, beauty, imagery, and harmony of verse. I keenly felt the delight of reading a new, great poem and discovering a new first rate poet. I should have felt so on broad, general grounds from whatever country the poet came! However, my joy was intensified by the fact that the poem had been written in my own language and that the author was a country woman of mine."

This article purports to give a little history of these works, for 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself praised these dramas. (I do not know that He saw the narrative.) When He held the manuscript of the drama Baha'u'llah in His hands, He blessed it and prophesied to the author that these two dramas would be played in Tíhrán!

The drama Bab was published in May 1903, and was played in one of the principal theatres in St. Petersburg in January 1904. It was this drama that first brought to Count Leo Tolstoy a knowledge of the Bahá'í teachings. He read the book and at once wrote to Mrs Grinevsky his appreciation of her great drama and his sympathy with the Bahá'í Movement; the letter was printed in the Russian press and the poet has his letter in her possession now.

I have before me as I write a clipping from the Herold of [XXIV:1:15] January 1904: "The play Bab appeared in May of last year, 1903, the most inconvenient time for the appearance of a book. Nevertheless the pens of the critics began to move in the journals and magazines in order to compose hymn songs of praise to the author. Moreover an enlightened Persian society sent her an inspired letter of thanks; and above all, Mrs Isabel Grinevsky had the spiritual satisfaction that among those who eulogized her drama was the lion of contemporary Russian literature, Leo Tolstoy. The impression was such that it made us think that amidst the statists representing the Persian throngs were real Persians; it seemed as if the scene exhaled the perfume of the roses of Shiraz!"

Mr Wesselitsky, whom I mentioned earlier in this story, gave a lecture in London in 1907 about this drama and his speech was afterwards published in pamphlets in English and French.¹ I quote two paragraphs: "Amidst the sorrows of disastrous war and those dreadful inner troubles, that book Bab was my only happy impression, and it remains since a permanent source of joy and comfort as a manifest proof of the vitality of Russia and its creative genius.

"The romantic side of this drama, too, is quite original. The plot is not based on adultery as in French drama and not on seduction as in 'Faust' but on renouncement and self-sacrifice. The romantic side of the Bab is closely allied with the metaphysical-ethical side. The drama has so much of the latter that every act may seem to be a sermon and the drama itself a suite of sermons. Yet all that preaching is relieved by genuine enthusiasm, eloquence of the heart and real passion. The conflict in the soul of the hero is not between passion and reason, but between two passions—human love and love divine—the latter being stronger and more ardent than the former. It is that manifestation of the power of the higher aims in the heart of man which is the chief feature of this book and the secret of its irresistible charm."

Celebrating the decade of the first performance of Bab in January 1914, Mrs Grinevsky gave a great conference on the drama in one of the most beautiful concert halls of Leningrad. The "St. Petersburg Informations Paper" gives the event a long review praising the author and her reading of selections from the poem and her address. One paragraph particularly I remember: "As a characteristic of the frame of mind of the poetess during the creation of her poem, the following words of her own may serve as an illustration: 'A well-known professor told me that the name of my poem, Bahai does not sound well to the ears of Russians. I answered that the names of the people who preached the ideals of love, paying for those ideals with their lives, must sound well to all those who have ears to hear. All noble ideals are so few in these days that it [XXIV:1:16] would be worth while to renew the performance of Bab in order to awaken the remembrance of these ideals. We, the people of the West, rise too late, we do not know the East where the sun shines!'"

The play was presented again in the Folk Theatre in Leningrad in April 1917, after the Russian Revolution. People came even from Moscow and Turkistán to see it. Diplomats from foreign countries were in the audience; the ambassador from China was one. A second edition of the drama had been published in 1916, and these books were sold at the entrance of the theatre; many spectators sat with the open books in their hands during this performance. It is a long drama in five acts, equal in the number of verses to "Don Carlos" of Schiller and "Cromwell" of Victor Hugo.

When I wrote asking Mrs Grinevsky about these dramas she sent me several letters. I should state that she has written many works along different lines of thought and lectured on many subjects in Russia, and had often spoken in conferences on these two dramas, Bab and

Baha'u'llah. She was a member of the former Philosophic Society of the University, an active member of the former Oriental Society, and is a member of the present Bibiological Society and several literary societies and unions. She said that before she wrote her poem Bab the Russian public generally had not heard much about the Bahá'í Movement. She herself knew about it only from reading. The critics thought she had travelled much in Persia, she was so well informed about the life there, but as a matter of fact she had not been in Írán. She had heard that some Bahá'í believers from Persia had been driven out of their land into Turkey and India, and that some had come to Turkistán and were residing in the cities of Tashkent, Ishqábád and Mary and in the city of Baku in the Caucasus.

"Still, I thought" she says, "these believers in the Báb now called Bahá'ís had mingled with other nations, and perhaps had ceased to exist as a religious entity. The description of Professor Edward G. Browne seemed to me a fairy tale. How astonished I was when, after my drama Bab made its appearance in 1903, I received one day a letter with the following address: 'To the author of the book Bab, Mrs Isabel Grinevsky in St. Petersburg.' Neither street nor number of the house was marked, yet thanks to the careful postal authorities, that letter though unregistered, reached me safely."

Both the handwriting and signature proved unknown but she relates: "That letter was from Ali-Akbar Mamedhanly from Bákú who wrote that he was a believer in the Báb, that he had read in the News of Bákú about my poem, the account of which had interested him greatly and that he would like to get the book. He asked that if he found any mistakes against the Teachings of the Báb, could he perhaps point them out? It was like a star falling from heaven at my feet! As if I had found a precious stone where I [XXIV:1:17] had not expected to find one."

The book was mailed to him at once and she explained to that Bahá'í that she had had to deviate just a little from a few of the historical facts for the sake of a dramatic whole. She added: "I wrote for a public all unprepared to hear moral, religious and philosophical ideas from the stage; it was accustomed to lighter plays, not a theme about God, of religion, especially about the conception of a new religion or rather, I would say religion renewed!"

The Bahá'í from Bákú politely replied to Mrs Grinevsky's letter as follows: "The impression which I received in reading your drama was such that I could not see any mistakes of any kind, even though I read it many times. We read it in the Bahá'í Assembly (meeting) and the believers send you sincerest thanks. They feel sure that the literary world will soon unite in a general solemnizing of your creative powers."

She said that he also wrote beautifully about the Bahá'í life in Caucasus stating among other points: "We live here cherishing the tenets for which our grandfathers, fathers and brothers shed their blood maintaining the chief principles: pardon, patience and love to mankind." Mrs Grinevsky said that these letters were written in Russian and showed that the Bahá'ís were very enlightened in literature and science. She also added: "It was such a joy to me to find that there are in the world people so congenial to me in feeling and in vision. I loved with my soul those spiritual people who, just like the people in my drama, were holding those principles of pardon, patience and love to all mankind, holding them not as a dead dogma but as a living truth!"

Glimpses of the New World Order

Part II

Notes on a visit to Haifa and 'Akká

Mabel and Sylvia Paine

"We cannot conceive of a star without light, a tree without seed. If we claim to be followers of light we must diffuse the light through our actions. To label ourselves will not be sufficient. ... One who is wise in the ways of God sees that his words and deeds reflect the glory of God.”¹

In the first instalment of these “Diary Notes” of a visit to Haifa and ‘Akká, published last month, the authors told of their arrival at Haifa and of their meeting with Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá’í Cause; with Bábíyyih Khánúm, the sister of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, and other members of His family, and of their conversations with them concerning Him. The present instalment definitely concerns a visit to ‘Akká the old Prison quarters where Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and seventy followers were incarcerated with unspeakable hardships and sufferings.

Saturday, 14 November. Today at luncheon the subject of the divinity of Christ came up. This phrase, Shoghi Effendi pointed out, is ambiguous. If it means God incarnate it is unscientific. A truer word is Manifestation. This word implies the true Trinity, which consists of God, Whom we may compare to the Sun; the Prophet—as Christ, Moses, Muḥammad, Bahá’u’lláh—is like a perfect mirror catching the sun’s rays and reflecting even its disc; and the Holy Spirit, which may be compared to the sun’s rays connecting sun and mirror.

In the afternoon at tea with the ladies the talk was about bringing up children. One of the ladies counselled, “Don’t force them to take a certain course, however praiseworthy and desirable, but take the stones out of that path, make it as easy for them as you can.” She told how her children were taught to pray. She didn’t tell them to pray, but they saw and heard her pray. One day when she was praying her little boy asked what she was doing. She told him she was talking to God, asking Him to help them to be good. After a day or two he said he would like to talk with God.

She said she thought what was needed, even more than people to talk and write about the Bahá’í teachings, was people to live them. “How sad ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was,” she added, “when He heard of one who professed to be a Bahá’í yet did not live in the right way. She told of a Persian Bahá’í who spoke rudely to his wife. His little son noticed this and one day remarked to him, ‘You can’t be a Bahá’í, or you wouldn’t speak in that way.’”

Another story she told was of a young Bahá’í in Persia to whom the cashier in a bank gave by mistake fifty pounds too much. As soon as the young man discovered the mistake he returned the money. The bank official was so much impressed that he asked the young man what his religion was. [XXIV:1:19]

No one who witnessed the life of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá could doubt that the Bahá’í Faith is first of all the noble living of life. Still, the memory of His teachings, reinforced by His life of loving service, remains in Haifa. The other day this conversation was overheard in a Haifa shop. A woman came in to make a purchase and asked the storekeeper how he was getting along.

“Just well enough,” he replied, “to keep soul and body together. But I am contented. Life is short and happiness is not dependent on having many material things. Abbas Effandi² used to tell us so and make us realize it.”

“Yes,” answered the woman, “it seems to me ‘Abbás Afandí is still living with us. His body passed away but His life and influence still go on among us.”

A Christian came to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s house shortly after His passing. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s life, he said, impressed him more profoundly than did the life of Christ. He told his bishop this and the bishop reproved him for not being more loyal to Christ. He replied that it was simply that

² The name (‘Abbás Afandí) by which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was known in Palestine.

Christ's life was further removed and so did not touch him so closely. The quality of life he believed was the same.

One of the ladies described the evening when 'Abdu'l-Bahá returned to Haifa after His long journey through Europe and America in 1912. When the ship anchored almost everyone in Haifa was down at the water's edge to greet Him, although people had been requested not to come because He was so very tired. Some went aboard the ship, lifted Him in their arms and carried Him to the small boat for landing.

Friday, 13 November. Today at luncheon the subject of institutions was discussed. Any idea or movement, Shoghi Effendi said, needs an institution. For instance educational ideas must be carried out in schools, social and political movements find expression in institutions. Inherently an institution is a necessary and a good thing. The trouble creeps in when institutions, with the lapse of time, become corrupt. Then they need to be renewed.

In the same way any movement needs a creed. A creed is not a bad thing. What is bad is when men add non-essentials to a creed.

The supposed quotation from 'Abdu'l-Bahá that the Bahá'í Cause is not an organization should read, "You cannot limit the Bahá'í Cause to an organization." The Bahá'í Cause must be organized just as everything must be. Institutions are necessary. All institutions now are decadent, but without institutions we should have nothing but anarchy. Bahá'ís regard institutions not as ends, but as means.

Monday, 16 November. Late this morning we drove in an automobile the nine miles drive around the edge of the Bay of 'Akká to the vicinity of 'Akká.

'Akká, the ancient fortress and prison city is a scene of some of the greatest tests as well as triumphs of the little group of leaders of the Bahá'í Cause in its early days. Here [XXIV:1:20] seventy Bahá'ís, exiles from their native land, were sent by the Sultán of the Ottoman Empire in the hopes that this greatest prison would prove to be the end of the leaders and the religious faith which they were spreading. Vermin infested, filthy in the extreme, it was a place where the worst criminals were sent to languish and die. Strangely enough the little band of Bahá'ís after living herded together in an unspeakably filthy room in the prison for two years, suffering from malaria, as well as insufficient food and water, were given more liberties. Instead of being forgotten, the Cause for which they were sacrificing their freedom spread.

The road lay along the sandy beach by the sea. The day was clear and it was an especially impressive experience to ride on the sand with the sparkling blue sea on the left, past Arab fishermen drawing their nets, travellers on donkeys and camels as well as in motor cars. The white buildings of the ancient city of 'Akká gleamed out as our journey's goal. 'Akká was Napoleon's goal when he came with his army from Egypt. He hoped to make it the gateway to conquering the Near East, but found it instead an insurmountable obstacle which turned him back.

We had left Mount Carmel, where the Jewish prophets and Jesus walked, and ahead of us in the far distance we could see the snow-capped mountains of Lebanon. Soon we arrived at the gates of the city of 'Akká. At one time there were three walls around the city and the gates were closed at sundown. Although now the entrance to the city is open at all times, we noticed as we went in the "needle's eye" a small opening in the wall beside the main gate about five feet high. Late travellers could enter through this opening and their camels, too, if unloaded, could get in by a process of kneeling and squirming through. The streets of 'Akká are narrow and dirty, paved with worn stones and filled with men and women, mostly in Oriental garb, and children playing and fighting or going to the bakery with enormous flat trays filled with loaves of bread of a tannish hue, looking something like our pancakes. The children's clothes, the streets and bread all shade into a light greyish tan hue and perhaps it is just as well not to be too germ conscious.

Russia's cultural contribution to the Bahá'í Faith

Part II

Martha L. Root

This is the concluding part of the author's story of the Russian poet who gave to the world three celebrated writings about the Bahá'í Teachings. Herein we find reference to the poets book on Bahá'u'lláh, her visit with 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Ramleh, Egypt, and further comment on the remarkable reception her books have received.

Now I shall speak of the tragedy poem Baha'u'llah. Mrs Grinevsky wrote me how she received the inspiration to write it. She said: "Among the many letters which I received from unknown people, all writing me about my play, Bab was one from a gentleman who to my astonishment had a profound knowledge not only of the Báb but also of Bahá'u'lláh. Like the Báb, until 1903, Bahá'u'lláh was generally unknown even among the cultured classes, professors sometimes asking me who my hero was. Even one (Czarist) politician had once asked me, 'What is Bahá'u'lláh?' Not who, mind you, but what! So I was all the more impressed to hear from my Russian provincial correspondent the name of Bahá'u'lláh. He said in his note: 'I was fascinated by the poem Bab like a youth though I am not a youth in years. I have passed two faculties of the university and have in my library all the available works which appear in the literature of the world.'"

"He counselled me" Mrs Grinevsky says, "to compose a tragedy about the life of Bahá'u'lláh. I myself had thought of it but had been so occupied I had never attempted it; now I determined to undertake this big work. I always remember with gratitude the memory of this Russian gentleman who was not a Bahá'í but a man of great heart. He passed on before my work was published, and I never met him. His name was Nicolas Zazuline; he, as I knew, was president of the nobility in Kishinef and the author of several philosophical treatises."

She continues: "When my work was finished and notices about it appeared in the press, a number of people who had assisted at the representations of my poem Bab and had heard my conferences about that poem which I gave many times, asked me to prepare a lecture about my new composition. The first address about it was given in our summer capital Siestroretzk and afterwards I also lectured in the capital itself at the Society of Oratorical Arts' Hall, in the year 1910."

Mrs Grinevsky explained that when her Bahá'í correspondent of Bákú, Mirza Ali Akbar Mamedhanly, read in the newspapers that the work was finished, (he had known from her that it was being written) he asked to have a copy sent to him. She mailed to him several excerpts from the poem. A few weeks later she was amazed to receive a telegram from him saying: "'Abdu'l-Bahá permits us to visit Him in Egypt.'" 'Abdu'l-Bahá was at that time making a short stay in Egypt.

She writes in her letter to me: "That had been my secret, my innermost desire, to see with my own [XXIV:2:58] eyes those people whom I had described, who, as my correspondent said, 'love all mankind'. I had thought it absolutely impossible, and yet, unexpectedly, wonderfully, it had come to pass that I could go to see even the greatest of those people! I started from Russia with my manuscript of the poem Baha'u'llah in December 1910, my aim being to see the surroundings of my dreams, of my fancy, about which my former respectful correspondent and present fellow traveller in that journey to Egypt had spoken—to see ‘Abdu’l-Bahá!”

Seven years had passed between the appearance of the drama Bab and the concluding of the tragedy Bahá’u’lláh followed by this memorable journey. Mrs Grinevsky spent two weeks in Ramleh, Egypt, as the guest of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. After she returned to Russia she had several letters or tablets from Him. In one of these He speaks of an article which He had just received about her poem Baha’u’llah. From the Tablet (or letter) addressed to Madame Grinevsky and signed by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, I quote:

“The article which was published in the Saint Petersburg Journal about thy recent book (Baha’u’llah) was in the utmost eloquence and fluency. It was an indication of thy praiseworthy services. The publication of such articles is very useful. They are conducive to the promotion of the divine Call. Praise be to God that thou art assisted in the service of the world of humanity and art spreading the summons of the Kingdom of God. Day and night thou must praise God that thou art assisted to perform such a great service. Rest thou assured that that which is the utmost desire¹ of thy heart shall come to pass concerning this matter.

“This seed which thou has sowed shall grow. If the means are not available at present, unquestionably they will become realized. I pray in thy behalf that thou mayest become confirmed in the uninterrupted service of the Kingdom of God.”

The article which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá mentions in His tablet had been published in the French newspaper Journal de Saint Petersburg January 1912. The headline was Baha’u’llah. I quote paragraphs from this review: Bahá’u’lláh means the Glory of God—such is the title of the new tragedy with which Mrs Isabel Grinevsky has enriched Russian dramatic literature. We must praise without restriction a work whose high, dramatic significance is combined with admirable form. The author of the drama Bab, that work of such strong thought, has never attained such a powerful conception as this poem.

“The mind of the reader, attracted by a rhythm of an unspeakably harmonious poetry, rises imperceptibly to summits where the most grave problems are discussed, problems over which thoughtful humanity bends with fear and despair, helpless to solve them. The characters are analyzed with great psychological insight.

“Bahá’u’lláh, the central figure, is depicted with the clearness and power of an antique high-relief. The complexity of that elect-nature is presented with the authority and truth of the great masters of the classical theatre. What a lofty lesson, what eloquence *Sursum corda*² in that life of pure bounty, of selflessness in that wide desire to spread peace!

“How not to be moved, fascinated by the nobility of this Apostolic character? [XXIV:2:59]

“As in the Bab, the events touch the great religious movement which roused the country of Persia in the middle of the last century. The historical part is exact. Mrs Grinevsky did not limit herself to the studies of documents, the great quantity of which we can hardly imagine; she knows the country very well. Her knowledge gives to the characters an intensive life and a warm colouring.

“The origin of a faith analyzed with the help of true science is carried forward with great art beginning with the first thought which moves the heart of the Apostle, who loves mankind as He loves His family and His own country.

² The words addressed, in Eucharistic liturgies, by the celebrant to the congregation at the beginning of the Eucharistic Prayer: “Lift up your hearts”.

“The author gives a vision, a revelation of all that is hidden of moving, precious depths in that supreme struggle. The liberating pain, the majesty of effort, the active bounty—all these elements of that struggle remain ordinarily unattainable for the crowd which cannot fathom under their austere dogmas, one of the beautiful forms of human unity.

“The love, the deep necessity which lives in each human heart passes throughout the tragedy as an undercurrent, the fountain-head of which, never drying, remains hidden to the exterior world.

“That beautiful and bold work points a return to the school of majesty and aesthetic morality, the aspiration to the eternal truth, which are the indelible character of permanent works. We foretell for this book a most merited success. Humanity, be it to its credit, is tired of the histories of the impure which spoil the taste and soil the mind. It cannot but receive with enthusiasm a work of which the most civilized countries of Europe will be proud.”

Mrs Grinevsky, returning from Ramleh in January 1911, gave interviews to the press at Odessa, the Russian port of the Black Sea, and as soon as she reached home she began her book, ‘A Journey to the Countries of the Sun’, which is an account of her visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This was interrupted because in the summer of 1912 she was called to Paris by the French translator of Bab, Madame Halperin. When she came again to Leningrad she immediately began the publication of the drama Baha’u’llah so that it was not until 1914 that she completed the manuscript of “A Journey to the Countries of the Sun”. It is interesting to note that when she completed it, three Persians, Asadu’lláh Namdor of Moscow, ‘Alí Akbar Kamalof of Tashkand and an old Persian Bahá’í friend whom she had met at Port Said came to call upon her and she read to them many parts from the “Journey”, the central figure of which is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. This book of 550 pages has not yet been published because at this time the world war commenced; neither has it yet been translated into other languages.

May this great Russian poet, Mrs Isabel Grinevsky, who has made such a cultural contribution to literature and to the Bahá’í Movement someday see all her works translated into European languages! The English reading world eagerly awaits them, I know, for many inquiries come from the United States asking where it is possible to get these books in Russian, in French, or in German!

‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s visit to Budapest

Martha L. Root

The following article, which was translated into Hungarian by Mrs Irma Szirmai, appears as an introduction in the first Hungarian edition of Dr Esslemont’s book, Bahá’u’lláh and the New Era, recently published in Budapest. The translation of Dr Esslemont’s book into Hungarian was made by Mr Georgy Steiner of Győr, Hungary.

The readers of the Bahá’í Magazine will be interested to know of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s historic visit to Budapest, Hungary, from 9–18 April 1913. Several distinguished statesmen, scholars and business men of Budapest hearing that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Son of Bahá’u’lláh the great World Educator, was passing through Europe from the United States enroute to His home in Haifa, Palestine, sent a most cordial invitation urging Him to come to the Magyar Capital and speak of His Father’s Teachings for the oneness of mankind and universal peace.

When ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, this great teacher belonging to one of the noblest families of Persia, the illumined expounder of the Bahá’í Teachings, arrived at the railway station with His party, He was met by Dr Ignatius Goldziher, the renowned Orientalist; by Professor Julius Germanys, professor of Persian, Arabic and Turkish languages in the Oriental Institute of Budapest University; by Director Leopold Stark, a very well-known engineer, and others. They escorted Him to the Ritz Hotel¹ where He took rooms facing the beautiful Danube River. With Him were His Persian secretaries, Persian interpreter and two or three other companions.

A few minutes after their arrival, a delegation of citizens came to welcome this Eastern Visitor officially and He met them in a most friendly way in the lounge. The group included Prelate Alexander Giesswein, one of the most honoured and learned thinkers and pacifists of Hungary, then President of the Peace Society and of the Hungarian Esperanto Society, Professor Robert A. Nadler, the renowned painter, the family of Director Stark and several others, among them an American and an Indian notable living in Budapest. They addressed 'Abdu'l-Bahá saying: "In the name of all present we welcome the blessed Presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. We admire your great life and we offer You our thanks and deep gratitude, that at Your age, You take upon Yourself these long journeys for the sake of helping and comforting humanity. Such labours, such sacrifices as 'Abdu'l-Bahá endures are our great examples, that we may know how to live and to serve humanity."

This beloved Visitor responded that thanks be to God, He hoped all of them would be confirmed in the service to humanity! He said that we can render no greater service to man than to spread unity in the world of mankind, and to work for universal peace. He showed how, when the East was in black dark- [XXIV:3:85] ness and was surrounded on all sides by the gloom of fanaticism, Bahá'u'lláh arose like a sun from the sky of the East and proclaimed the unity of mankind.

Reporters were present and asked many questions about the Bahá'í Teachings for world understanding. Members of the Theosophical Society invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to speak at their meeting the next evening, 10 April. Also, a joint invitation was extended to Him to give a public lecture 11 April, the event to be under the auspices of the Theosophical Society, the Women's organizations and the Esperantists. 'Abdu'l-Bahá smilingly accepted.

Early the following morning 'Abdu'l-Bahá prepared tea Himself and praised the marvellous view from His window overlooking the broad, blue glistening Danube with its immense and wonderfully ornamented suspension bridges, its gaily decorated steamers and the beautifully laid out promenades. Then 'Abdu'l-Bahá took a walk across one of these large bridges to Buda. His personality and dignity attracted the attention of all who saw Him; many stopped to greet Him with reverence and to ask questions.

All day people visited Him in the hotel and He spoke with them about the spiritual unity of the East and the West. He voiced to them this remarkable thought that it was his hope that Budapest might become a centre for the reunion of the East and West, and that from this city the light might emanate to other places. He also said that thanks be to God the conception of spiritual life was alive in Budapest, that men search for truth, that they care for the Word of God and long to be guided to the Kingdom Everlasting.

When callers spoke to about the buildings and the sights of the Hungarian Capital, He kindly replied to them that He came to Budapest to see the objects of interest and buildings of human hearts, and not the buildings of stone and of the city. He said to them speaking symbolically, that He knew of a Country in which there are glorious cities; that in that Country there is but one universal language spoken, and therefore, they would all understand one another without an interpreter. He said they would see There His Holiness Christ and the Prophets and would find good people There just as were around Him here. He told of the delicious fruits There and said they were for them. His visitors were astonished, but when asked if they would like to go with Him to that beautiful Land, they replied: Yes, we will go

Professor Germanus, a young but already celebrated Orientalist, brought a group of young Turkish students to call upon 'Abdu'l-Bahá and these youth presented Him with a letter of solemn welcome signed by all students of the Turkish language in Budapest. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke to them in perfect Turkish. They marvelled at His eloquence and His command of this tongue. He told them that it was His highest hope that the East and West might be united completely. He made it very clear to them that in [XXIV:3:86] reality, East and West do not exist—that each point on this terrestrial globe is equal, with the same rights; that any point in relation to another point is either East or West; that all are points of one sphere, one country, one humanity. Therefore, He said, He was very happy to visit this country of Hungary which is the standard bearer of progress to the East, and which unites with the Western culture the Eastern feelings of cordial hospitality to people of other countries. He blessed them and hoped they would, day by day, become more confirmed in service and progress.

Others called and in the afternoon 'Abdu'l-Bahá visited the homes of several families. He went, in the evening, to the Theosophical meeting where fifty people were awaiting Him. The Chairman greeted Him in these words: "We welcome 'Abdu'l-Bahá in the name of all our brothers and sisters, we are extremely happy that this blessed One has visited us. ..."

"'Abdu'l-Bahá replied that He was greatly pleased to address such a noble spiritual assembly. He called them a noble, spiritual gathering because they were most diligent in their endeavours for peace and fellowship, and He spoke to them about the oneness of mankind. His words were so appealing that the Chairman again thanked Him and in the name of all present invited Him to come to them again on Saturday evening, 12 April. (He did go to this second meeting and all present again felt His mighty spirit, especially when He prayed for the people of Hungary; in closing He prayed that God would give them heavenly strength, surround them with heavenly happiness!)

Only glimpses of events can be given in this brief introduction, but on the evening of 11 April, 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke in the old Parliament Building to more than one thousand people. This great hall was formerly the Hall of the Parliament; it has two platforms, a higher and a lower, 'Abdu'l-Bahá stood on the higher one directly underneath the coat of arms of Hungary—those ancient, historical arms held by two white winged angels. This great holy teacher was introduced to the audience by Prelate Giesswein as Dr Goldziher stood at 'Abdu'l-Bahá's right. Suddenly the people, as if sensing the deep significance of the moment, burst into tremendous applause. They felt, if they did not understand, that 'Abdu'l-Bahá standing between the Catholic Prelate and the Jewish Orientalist represented the reconciliation of these two great religions.

Dr Germanus who interpreted 'Abdu'l-Bahá's words into Hungarian said that he never saw a more interesting audience. He said that all seats were occupied while many stood in the gallery; aisles and corridors were crowded and a line extended even to the street! Members of Parliament, members of philosophical and philological societies, university professors, artists, Catholic priests, Protestant clergymen, representatives of modern religious movements, women's organizations, Esperantists, members of social and humanitarian so-[XXIV:3:87] cities, many nationalities, many races were present—in a word the gathering reflected the Teachings of Bahá'u'lláh: one must unite everything that is good and precious in mankind, one must give equality to women, must help the ignorant and oppressed and must lead all humanity to mutual understanding!

After the lecture many approached 'Abdu'l-Bahá to express to Him their reverence and their delight in what He had said to them. His reply had in it one of the great truths of the Bahá'í Faith. He told these eager listeners that the influence of the words spoken and the confirmation from the Kingdom of God are two perfectly different things: the influence of spoken words on the soul, and the elevation of the soul which can be attained only by the blessing of the Heavenly Kingdom. Words alone cannot bring the great spiritual transformations, only Bahá'u'lláh's favour and help and the victory of the Holy Spirit can give that great spiritual experience.

After the lecture a dinner was given for 'Abdu'l-Bahá in Hotel Pannonia.

'Abdu'l-Bahá saw many friends at His hotel the following day, 12 April. Mr Alajos Paikert, founder and Acting Vice President of the Turanian Society called and invited this great Visitor to give an address before the members of their society and friends, on Monday evening, 14 April, Mr Paikert who is also one of the founders of the Society for Foreign Affairs and organizer of the celebrated Agricultural Museum in Budapest (also of the Agricultural Museum in Cairo, Egypt) praised 'Abdu'l-Bahá's high aims for peace. 'Abdu'l-Bahá told him He hoped that he would attain great spiritual power and do much to promote peace and universal brotherhood. He showed how many ways there are to unite souls but none has such a power as the Word of God.

This lecture arranged by the Hungarian Turanian Society took place in the majestic hall of the former House of Magnates in the National Museum Building. As Mr Paikert told me: "Abdu'l-Bahá was introduced by me, and as He ascended the tribune and began to speak, the entire audience of two hundred prominent gentlemen and their ladies, listened breathlessly to Him. He spoke in Persian and His thoughts were interpreted into English, and then Mr Leopold Stark gave them in Hungarian language. 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke of the high culture of Turan about which He knew so well, and showed how it was destroyed by religious inharmony and conflicts. He outlined a constructive plan for enduring peace. When asked which place would be chosen for the centre of peace, 'Abdu'l-Bahá replied that it would be the country in which the standard of peace will be established first, that will be the centre! After the lecture 'Abdu'l-Bahá took supper in the home of 'Alí 'Abbás Abhá Tabrízí, and the Turkish Consul was one of the guests.

"Abdu'l-Bahá, next day, accepted the invitation to honour my home in Budapest with a visit," said Mr Paikert. "He came with His friends and we gathered in our [XXIV:3:88] reception hall in my villa on the slope of God's Mountain, overlooking the Hungarian Capital. He spoke with my family and friends in His mild, dear voice, about the high virtues of family life in the different countries, of lofty moral and spiritual ideals and of understanding among the nations. We listened, deeply impressed by the extraordinary spiritual personality of 'Abdu'l-Bahá."

Several visits were made by 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He went to the homes of Professor Nadler and of Mr Stark, and He visited the late Count Albert Apponyi in Buda. These two discussed the highest problems of mankind. The writer of this introduction interviewed Count Apponyi and heard him speak twice. He said that his aim too, is an assured peace, based upon justice, peace of soul not at the mercy of unforeseen political changes. He said: "Hungary has been, as it were, on the high road of the conflicts that have shaken the world for centuries past. If there is any nation to whose interest it is that a new order should be set up, based upon law and not upon force, upon concord and co-operation, and not upon rivalry, if there is any nation to whose special interest it is that peace should be established and consolidated, that nation is Hungary. Peace is not an isolated problem. It is a central star around which all other social problems revolve, as the planets revolve around the sun."

Professor Arminius Vambery, the outstanding Orientalist and erudite scientist, whom both

Queen Victoria and King Edward of Great Britain distinguished for many years with their friendship, invited 'Abdu'l-Bahá to his home several times. In a subsequent letter of Professor Vambery to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, one feels the heat of a flame breaking forth from the heart of a man who has always sought for the great Truth.¹

Professor Robert A. Nadler who in 1913, was Professor of Painting at the Royal Academy of Art (and later became Professor in the University of Technical Sciences) has painted a wonderful portrait of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. He said to the writer of this introduction: "When I saw 'Abdu'l-Bahá, He was in His seventieth year. I was so impressed and charmed with His Personality that I had the great longing to paint His portrait. He consented to come to my studio, but said He could not give me much time because He was so busy. I marvelled at His expression of peace and pure love and absolute good will. He saw everything with such a nice eye; everything was beautiful to 'Abdu'l-Bahá, both the outer life of Budapest and the souls of all. He praised the situation of our city, our fine Danube in the midst of the town, good water, good people. Oh, He had so many beautiful thoughts I was inspired, and I knew I did not have much time, so I concentrated very much. He gave me three sittings."

It will interest readers to know that 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself and His Persian companions said that the portrait was a success. Professor [XXIV:3:89] Nadler is one of only two painters who ever had the opportunity to have 'Abdu'l-Bahá Himself sit for a portrait. This painting is not only a strong likeness of showing His spiritual power and majesty, but every detail is pleasing. His hand which has blessed and helped so many thousands is shown full of tenderness, the whole portrait vibrates in harmonious colours. In the centuries to come, Hungary will be distinguished as the home of this historical portrait. It now hangs in the Studio of Professor Nadler in the University of Technical Sciences in Budapest, and he says that he is so happy to have the Presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá always with Him in his studio!

'Abdu'l-Bahá was ill for two days as the cold weather and a sudden snow storm so unusual at that time of year, brought on a severe grippe. However, He insisted on dressing and meeting all the friends who knocked at His door. All the friends, including several families, came. Among the many words that 'Abdu'l-Bahá said to them were these, that they must never forget the history of Bahá'u'lláh which He had related to them. He showed them how much Bahá'u'lláh's Teachings had spread in the past sixty years, how the Bahá'í Movement is known in the East and in the West. 'Abdu'l-Bahá said that since He had been in Budapest He had set a flame aglow, and the day would break when its light would shine visibly to everybody. He explained that the origin of a tree is only a small seed, but if it develops and begins to grow, it will bear a beautiful fruit. 'Abdu'l-Bahá told them that souls would come who would rejoice their hearts and the Cause of God would make great progress in Hungary. He assured them that if they arose in the service of the holy Teachings as they should, that the Hosts of the Omnipotent would come to their assistance and they would be victorious. When asked about meetings, He told them very clearly just how to arrange Bahá'í meetings.

On the morning of 18 April, 'Abdu'l-Bahá and His party went to the railway station to leave Hungary. A great number of devoted friends were there to bid them farewell—many Hungarians and also some Turks, Americans, and Indians. They were very sad that He must go, but He consoled them and asked them to follow the Holy Teachings, spread the Glad Tidings and lead people to unity. Each one in his own language begged for a blessing in his endeavour to serve. Then as the train moved out, they continued to gaze at His holy countenance with their arms outstretched in longing!

¹ This visit will be described in a subsequent article on 'Abdu'l-Bahá's visit to Budapest.

Glimpses of the New World Order

Part III

Notes on a visit to Haifa and 'Akká
Mabel and Sylvia Paine

“Yet in spite of all difficulties, he [Bahá'u'lláh] was ever in an exalted state; his face shone continually. He had the presence of a king. One cannot imagine such majesty. One never thought of him as a prisoner—on the contrary, one would have said that he was enjoying the greatest triumph, for he drew his strength from divine power.”¹

The first instalment of these “Diary Notes” was published in the March number. Therein the authors told of their arrival in Haifa, their meeting with Shoghi Effendi, Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause, and the members of the family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. The second instalment published in the April number gave a description of their visit to 'Akká and the old prison quarters where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá were incarcerated for so many years. Herein is a further description of the barracks at 'Akká and a brief description of Bahjí the house in the country outside of 'Akká occupied by Bahá'u'lláh during the later years of His life.

From 'Akká we drove to the Garden of the Riḍván, the garden which Bahá'u'lláh had made and which He frequented during all the latter years of His life after He had been freed from the strict imprisonment of 'Akká and when He occupied the house in the country known as Bahjí.

He Himself describes this garden in one of His works:

“One day of days We repaired unto Our Green Island. Upon Our arrival, We beheld its streams flowing, and its trees luxuriant, and the sunlight playing in their midst.”² The vision which He there beheld was such that “the pen fails to describe”. Later He beheld in holy vision in this garden, “... one of the Beauties of the Most Sublime Paradise, standing on a pillar of light, and calling aloud saying: ‘O inmates of earth and heaven! Behold ye My beauty, and My radiance, and My revelation, and My effulgence. By God, the True One! I am Trustworthiness and the revelation thereof, and the beauty thereof. ... I am the most great ornament of the people of Bahá, and the vesture of glory unto all who are in the kingdom of creation. I am the supreme instrument for the prosperity of the world, and the horizon of assurance unto all beings.’”³

With such associations is the Riḍván Garden hallowed. The island which Bahá'u'lláh refers to is made by the separation and confluence of the river Belus.⁴ The flowing streams are little runlets of water from a fountain which plays at intervals. These runlets flow through the centre of the garden under a large mulberry tree. It was here Bahá'u'lláh used to sit. Surrounding this central, most sacred portion are green lawns, borders of scarlet geraniums, lofty palms and other sub-tropical trees. In the gardener's house is the room which Bahá'u'lláh sometimes occupied containing His chair kept in a cedar box. [XXIV:3:91]

From the Riḍván we drove back to 'Akká.

The barracks where the Bahá'ís were thrown on their arrival in 1868 are thus described by the sister of 'Abdu'l-Bahá:

“The season was summer (1868) and the temperature very high. All our people were huddled together on the damp earth floor of the barracks; with little water to drink, and that very bad, with no water with which to bathe, and scarcely enough for washing their faces.

³ Bahá'u'lláh, Epistle to the Son of the Wolf, pp. 136–7.

⁴ The Riḍván Garden is a small island in the Na'mayn Stream that once flowed into the Nahr Na'mayn (Hebrew Na'aman River), the river that was once known as the Belus or Belos River of Phoenicia.

Typhoid fever and dysentery broke out among them. Everyone in our company fell sick excepting my brother, an aunt, and two others of the believers. We were not allowed a physician; we could not procure medicine. My brother had in His baggage some quinine and bismuth. With these two drugs and His nursing, He brought us all through with the exception of four who died. These were two months of such awful horror as words cannot picture. Imagine it if you can. Some seventy men, women and children packed together, hot summer weather, no proper food, bad water, and a general attack of the terrible diseases of typhoid and dysentery.

“There was no one with strength to be of any general service but my brother. He washed the patients, fed them, nursed them, watched with them. He took no rest. When at length He had brought the rest of us—the four who died excepted—through the crisis and we were out of danger, He was utterly exhausted and fell sick Himself, as did also my mother and the three others who had heretofore been well. The others soon recovered, but ‘Abbás Afandí¹ was taken with dysentery and long remained in a dangerous condition. By His heroic exertions He had won the regard of one of the officers, and when this man saw my brother in this state he went to the Governor and pleaded that ‘Abbás Afandí might have a physician. This was permitted and under the care of the physician my brother recovered.”²

Bahá'u'lláh was confined in a separate room in these barracks and this room is now much altered and used as part of a prison hospital. Over the door is a brass plate with a statement of Bahá'u'lláh's confinement there from 1868–1870. One might think of the change in this scene of suffering as symbolic of the kindly action of the hand of time, which so often covers and beautifies a place otherwise too horrible for weak human hearts and minds to contemplate. But surely the sincere soul cannot gaze upon the scenes of such dire sufferings and recall that they were endured patiently and even joyfully, without becoming very thoughtful concerning a faith thus cradled.

After two years spent in the barracks the Bahá'ís were removed to a fairly comfortable house with three rooms and a court. The Governor of ‘Akká had been so impressed with their lack of resentment, their kindness and uprightness, and their sorrow at being unable to meet the Bahá'í pilgrims who were constantly coming from Persia in order to meet Bahá'u'lláh that He allowed them this change and freedom to go and come in the city. To this first real dwelling [XXIV:3:92] place of Bahá'u'lláh in ‘Akká we now directed our footsteps. Here we saw the room where Bahá'u'lláh wrote The Kitáb-i-Aqdas or Book of Laws.

Although the others had the freedom of the city Bahá'u'lláh was confined to the house. Here He remained for seven years. One day He remarked “I have not gazed on verdure for nine years. The country is the world of the Soul, the city is the world of the bodies.” When ‘Abdu'l-Bahá heard this remark He felt moved, in spite of the strict imprisonment, to prepare a place for Bahá'u'lláh in the country. This He accordingly did, renting a large house on the plains of ‘Akká from an absentee landlord at a very low price, sending labourers to put the garden in order and repair the house and finally, in spite of the strict injunction to the contrary, walking out through the city gate.

Father and Son both seemed possessed of the same kind of power that shone out from Christ, the power that the people felt when no one dared to lay hands on Him for His hour was not yet come. At first Bahá'u'lláh was reluctant to use this power, but finally yielded to the entreaties of a certain Muslim Shaykh, who loved Him very much and pleaded persistently that He go out from His long imprisonment. There the rest of His days were spent in that “world of the soul” He so loved.³

³ See J. E. Esslemont, Bahá'u'lláh and the New Era, for a full account in the words of ‘Abdu'l-Bahá of this beautiful incident.

It was to Bahjí the second house He occupied on the plain of 'Akká that we next drove. This house has within a few years come into the possession of the Bahá'ís and has been restored by Shoghi Effendi to the condition in which it was during the time of Bahá'u'lláh. Here we spent the evening and night. Near Bahjí is the shrine in which lie the remains of Bahá'u'lláh. Its court contains an indoor garden of fresh greenness, trees pushing up to the open skylight which lets in the gentle motion of outdoor air, vines embroidering all with luxuriant leaf and blossom. Between the shrine and the house are broad stretches of lawn, lofty trees, flowered borders. Everything shows signs of perfect care and cultivation, such care and cultivation as come from deep devotion. About all is an atmosphere of deep, creative peace. One is reminded involuntarily of the scriptural lines with their beautiful symbolism: "the Valley of Achor¹ (shall be) a place for the herds to lie down in, for my people that have sought me."²

In these beautiful gardens and lawns around the shrine one sees a new and unique kind of place of worship, one which extends the atmosphere of the sanctuary to the surrounding out-of-doors. The spiritual charm of this arrangement at Bahjí is that the brilliant and stately beauty of the surrounding gardens gently woos the soul away from earthly thought and prepares it for the yet more intense spirituality of the shrine itself. Just in front of the shrine are many interlacing paths where one may prolong the time of preparation before stepping from the kindly beauty of nature to the more lofty and searching worship which the shrine itself inspires. [XXIV:3:93]

It was in the house at Bahjí that Bahá'u'lláh received Prof. Edward G. Browne the distinguished Orientalist from the University of Cambridge who was the first person to come from the Western world to investigate the Bahá'í Faith. Before entering the room in which this significant event took place, the visitor may pause and read from the framed copy hanging beside the door Prof. Browne's account of this meeting. The large apartment with its low divan and few chairs is just as it was on that memorable occasion. Fresh jasmine blossoms strewn on a white square of cloth mark the place where sat the wondrous and venerable figure of Bahá'u'lláh. Of this meeting Prof. Browne wrote: "The face of him on whom I gazed I can never forget, though I cannot describe it. Those piercing eyes seemed to read ones very soul; power and authority sat on that ample brow; while the deep lines on the forehead and face implied an age which the jet-black hair and beard flowing down in indistinguishable luxuriance almost to the waist seemed to belie. No need to ask in whose presence I stood, as I bowed myself before one who is the object of a devotion and love which kings might envy and emperors sigh for in vain!"³

As we entered the room we seemed to realize somewhat the tremendous power which sustained those early followers of Bahá'u'lláh, the power which centred in Him placing Him among those few who, as Carlyle puts it, "through having a higher wisdom, a hitherto unknown spiritual truth are stronger than all that have it not."

The words which Bahá'u'lláh uttered on this memorable occasion reveal this higher Wisdom which He possessed. They have been often quoted but are so great and timely that they should ring in the ears of every one in these disastrous days, spurring us on to attain a new world order!

"We desire but the good of the world and happiness of the nations; yet they deem us a stirrer up of strife and sedition worthy of bondage and banishment. ... That all nations should become one in faith and all men as brothers; that the bonds of affection and unity between the sons of men should be strengthened; that diversity of religion should cease, and differences of race be annulled—what harm is there in this? ... Yet so it shall be; these fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away, and the ‘Most Great Peace’ shall come. ... Do not you in Europe need this also? Is not this that which Christ foretold?”¹

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

“O ye people of the world! The virtue of this Most Great Manifestation is that We have effaced from the Book whatever was the cause of difference, corruption and discord, and recorded therein that which leads to unity, harmony and accord. Joy unto those who practice!”

An interview with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Mary Hanford Ford

The author, a pioneer American Bahá’í, has made the teaching of the Bahá’í Cause her life work.

In these difficult days when the entire economic system of the world is in confusion, and when ordinary life has become so hectic as to be almost unbearable, I am reminded again of the memorable visit I made to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in the prison of ‘Akká, Palestine in 1907. He had been held there as a prisoner ever since He was incarcerated with the family of Bahá’u’lláh after their exile from Persia.

The great story of the Bahá’í Cause was just beginning to be recognized at that time, and very little of its spiritual and economic teaching was translated and known in the Western World. People who heard the strange tale of the distinguished prisoner of ‘Akká often hastened to visit Him. He was held there by the Sultán of Turkey because He taught ideas out of harmony with the prevailing creed of Islám though in perfect accord with the system of Muḥammad Himself.

These people returned to the Western World with such strangely varying accounts of their interviews, so evidently coloured by their own previous conceptions and theories, that one felt confused and realized that any sacrifice was desirable through which one might visit the prison of ‘Akká and speak face to face with its illumined inmate.

So like many others I journeyed across the seas and presented myself at the door of ‘Akká on the date upon which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had given me permission to come. I did not know then, what I only learned some time later, that at this very moment, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was enduring especially rigorous persecution. He had been living for some years as a political prisoner in His own house within the walls of the town and was even permitted at times to visit Haifa and the Bahjí, where was the tomb of Bahá’u’lláh. But the powerful Muslim priesthood of Persia and Turkey had long been determined to accomplish His martyrdom and, enraged at His continued escape from this, they finally sent the police to His home, just one month before my arrival, commanded every guest to leave the place instantly, and forbade ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to receive any western friends henceforth. Meanwhile a questionnaire was drawn up to be sent to ‘Akká by a special committee. According to its plan if ‘Abdu’l-Bahá filled out the questionnaire His answers would be so incriminating, that there could be no difficulty in obtaining the Sultán’s signature for His sentence of death. All these danger threats were in the background of my rendezvous with ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, but I knew nothing of them.

At that time I had heard various histories of the emotional experiences of those who came into the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá at 'Akká. [XXIV:4:104] Some had fainted, some had fallen at His feet in uncontrollable weeping, all of which behaviour I was sure disturbed Him greatly. So I considered carefully how I might avoid such calamitous exhibitions. I was familiar with the story of Victor Hugo and his antagonists of the classic drama in 1830. I remembered that the young Romanticists selected the word Iron as indicative of their invincibility and self-control in contact with their classic opponents. Cold, impenetrable as iron, they met their enemies, successfully. So I decided when I came into the presence of if my lips began to tremble and my knees to shake, I would mentally repeat the little word Iron, Iron and become unimpressionable as its black substance. Of course had I prayed at such a moment the emotional disturbance would have been intensified instead of eliminated.

Sure enough as the wonderful figure of 'Abdu'l-Bahá appeared in the doorway the expected result arrived with Him, but I gazed upon Him, squaring my shoulders, while my mind fastened itself purely upon the black little word Iron, Iron! Can I ever forget how He looked at me with laughing eyes, and began to relate all the tortuous journey that had brought me to 'Akká, meeting plague and quarantine at every port, and pouring out the contents of my thin pocket book, until it seemed as if nothing would be left in it if I ever reached the bleak walls of the ancient town.

He laughed at me saying: "Many people come here in a gala journey. They stop at the best hotels. They come here when they have nothing to fear, they travel in a company of friends and are a gay crowd! They do not realize they are on a pilgrimage to a holy place—and that they must pray much before they can understand it. If they do not pray before arriving, they must pray after they come here, but you have been forced to pray for guidance during the entire route, and so you are filled with the sense of prayer. You have lived and attained only through prayer."

Then he went on telling one amusing story after another, perceiving all the perturbation of my poor nerves, until my knees no longer shook and I was at peace.

But one thing was registered disconsolately in my mind: This radiant and powerful person, this centre of wisdom and love! I knew that I could never ask Him a question, and how should I ever discover all the facts I wanted to know about His great teachings, those teachings which were not yet in printed words for the world to study, but the realities of which were constantly pouring into my consciousness.

Then began the marvellous days which followed, days which transformed and rebuilt, creating certainties from doubts, and eternal realities from ephemeral possibilities.

Can I ever forget the setting of this phenomenal drama? A little gallery ran all around the second story upon which the family of 'Abdu'l-Bahá lived, and each chamber opened upon the gallery. Also the door of each room was a different and gay colour. There were pink, yellow, green and white doors, but no black ones. I asked once why the [XXIV:4:105] doors were all different colours, and was told it was because the family never had money enough for more than one door at a time in those dark and dubious days of imprisonment!

The little room in which I stayed and in which the significant conversations with 'Abdu'l-Bahá took place, was of the simplest description. The floor was covered with matting, the narrow iron bed and the iron wash stand with larger and smaller holes for bowl and pitcher were of that vermin proof description with which I had become familiar. Everything was scrupulously clean, and there was an abundant supply of sparkling water for bathing and drinking. A wide window looked over the huge town wall upon the blue Mediterranean and before this stretched a divan upon which 'Abdu'l-Bahá sat when He came to see me.

Upon my arrival in 'Akká my mind was filled with pain caused by the vivid description I had heard in Paris of another terrible martyrdom of Bahá'ís that had occurred in Persia. These martyrdoms continued from the period of the Báb's Declaration until the advent of the present Sháh of Persia, who put an end to all religious persecutions. The description of these particular atrocities was so detailed that finally I could bear no more and cried out my protest, exclaiming "but don't you realize that the martyrs are in a state of bliss from the moment the torture begins, and feel none of the pain inflicted upon them?"

Where upon the assembled company turned upon me in deep disgust, and reproached me severely saying: "How dare you say such things! You are taking away all the glory of martyrdom!"

I remained abashed but not convinced, and felt that I must ask 'Abdu'l-Bahá for the settlement of this disturbing question, but I never asked it. The first morning that He came into my little room He did not sit down, but walked back and forth in the narrow space and presently remarked, while I listened with awe, "There are many kinds of martyrdom. How many times have I prayed for it, but instead of that I have lived on in prison as if with the sword of Damocles suspended by a hair over my head! Each morning as I waken I feel that before the day ends I may be dragged to the public square and shot to death. But nevertheless I have been very happy in this long martyrdom, for no victim suffers from the cruelties inflicted upon him. The instant the torture begins he is in a state of bliss, and feels nothing but the joy of Heaven which surrounds him."

He paused, looking out through the wide windows at the blue Mediterranean, the view of which beyond the huge walls seemed to eliminate their imprisoning power. Then he added, "So Christ never suffered upon the cross. From the time the crucifixion began His soul was in Heaven and He felt nothing but the Divine Presence. He did not say, speaking in Aramaic: 'O God; O God why hast Thou forsaken me?' But this word Sabacthani¹ is similar in sound to another which means glorify, and he actually murmured, 'O God! O God! How thou dost glorify me.'" [XXIV:4:106]

Then He repeated to me such a story of martyrdom as I have never heard elsewhere and which I have not time to relate here. But I can never forget its dramatic expression of joyous deathlessness.

Of all these hours spent with 'Abdu'l-Bahá however, the most memorable and eloquent were those in which He described the economic future of mankind. At that period, in 1907 the labour saving machines had not yet affected the labour market to a serious extent, nor produced what must be generally recognized as a high degree of permanent unemployment but the change was working and 'Abdu'l-Bahá well understood its righteous conclusion.

Sometimes He sat still as He discoursed, speaking in that marvellous, colourful voice, such as none has used I am sure since Christ talked upon the mountainside or in the homes of His friends. Then He would rise in the excitement of what He portrayed, and walk back and forth conscious of nothing but the ideals which possessed Him.

He said: "Today the dynamic energy of the Holy Spirit has poured in such volume through the Messenger of God that even the masses of men have received it, and that was not possible before. Always in the past specially sensitized souls received the influence and acted upon it. But today for the first time the minds of all people have been touched by the spirit, and the result is that the designs of labour saving machines have been clearly revealed to them. It may seem strange to you that the Holy Spirit should give designs for labour saving machines," he added, "but in reality every creative impulse of the brain can arise only through contact with the spirit. Without that the brain is merely capable of conventional and traditional action.

"The civilizations of the past have all been founded upon the enslavement of mankind and the poor working class has suffered every oppression for the sake of the enrichment of the few. This limited wealthy class has alone had the privilege of developing individuality. The down trodden worker after labouring long hours each day, has not had sufficient mental capacity at the conclusion of his task to do anything but eat and sleep.

"That all mankind might have opportunity, it was necessary to shorten the hours of labour so that the work of the world could be completed without such demand of strain and effort, and all human beings would have leisure to think and develop individual capacity.

"The labour saving machines were given to create leisure for all mankind." 'Abdu'l-Bahá repeated this several times. He was so deeply impressed with this fact that as He spoke He arose and walked back and forth in the little room, His face and eyes shining with joy over the happy future into which He gazed.

"The first decided shortening of the hours will appear," He declared, "when a legal working day of eight hours is established," and this of course took place in 1917 when Woodrow Wilson enacted the legal day of eight hours for all federal workers, and really for the workers of the United States.

"But this working day of eight hours is only the beginning," went [XXIV:4:107] on 'Abdu'l-Bahá. "Soon there will be a six hour day, a five hour, a three hour day, even less than that, and the worker must be paid more for this management of machines, than he ever received for the exercise of his two hands alone."

Speaking in 1907, 'Abdu'l-Bahá said, "You cannot understand now, how the labour saving machines can produce leisure for mankind because at present they are all in the hands of the financiers and are used only to increase profits, but that will not continue. The workers will come into their due benefit from the machine that is the divine intention, and one cannot continue to violate the law of God. So with the assurance of a comfortable income from his work, and ample leisure for each one, poverty will be banished and each community will create comfort and opportunity for its citizens. Education will then be universal at the cost of the state, and no person will be deprived of its opportunity." All these eloquent words and many others which I have not time to note here, were spoken to me by 'Abdu'l-Bahá without the asking of a single question. His utterance, as always, was directed toward the inner urge of the mind He addressed, and He was perfectly aware that the mentality seeking Him at the moment was deeply interested in the problem of banishing poverty.

There is not space to mention many incidents connected with this visit to 'Abdu'l-Bahá. One was very curious. Invariably as I sat with Him I was conscious of a growing lightness of body, so that I said to myself, if He stays much longer, I shall not be able to keep my feet on the floor, I shall float up to the ceiling! Invariably then He rose and swiftly left the room with that rapid gliding movement which made one feel He was flying rather than walking. On the last day of my visit He left me in this fashion, and I stood by the little table in the centre of the room. As I gazed after Him the words flashed through my mind, "I have been here, I have seen Him, and everything is just as I knew it would be." 'Abdu'l-Bahá paused on the threshold looked back at me with His eyes full of laughter and repeated the words that had in the same instant passed through my mind: "You have been here, you have seen me and everything is just as you knew it would be!"

The wonderful words He said to me in farewell I can never forget. In expressing my profound appreciation for all His gracious kindness to me and the wealth of knowledge and illumination he had given me, I finally cried out, "O 'Abdu'l-Bahá! Why cannot all the world come here to see You as I have done and receive this understanding of life and its meaning, this light of the Spirit!"

He looked at me for a moment with a sort of sadness, and then replied, "Dearly beloved, many people cross the ocean and cross the desert and come here to see me. They stay sometimes a week—a month—a year and then they go away. They have not seem me at all." He paused a moment with a far away look in His eyes and added, smiling as He took my hands—"It is better to meet me in the worlds of love!"

Glimpses of the New World Order

Part IV

Notes on a visit to Haifa and 'Akká
Mabel and Sylvia Paine

"O ye people of the world! The virtue of this most great Manifestation is that We have effaced from the Book whatever was the cause of differences, corruption and discord, and recorded therein that which leads to unity, harmony and concord. Joy unto those who act in accordance therewith!"¹

*In this fourth instalment, the conversation of Shoghi Effendi to the pilgrims is on the subjects of international government and education, especially with reference to an important letter written by Shoghi Effendi to the American Bahá'ís, later published under the title The Goal of a New World Order. The first and second instalments of these "Notes" were published respectively in the March and April numbers, and told of their arrival in Haifa and the meeting with Shoghi Effendi and the members of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's family; also of their visit to 'Akká and the old prison quarters where Bahá'u'lláh and 'Abdu'l-Bahá and Their followers were incarcerated so many years with unspeakable hardships and sufferings. The third instalment which appeared in the June number gave a further description of the barracks at 'Akká and a brief description of Bahjí.*

Tuesday, 17 November. Shoghi Effendi told us a little of the last and happiest part of Bahá'u'lláh's life spent at Bahjí, visited by us the previous day. It was there that He wrote the Epistle to the Son of the Wolf in which He summarized His former Writings. He died in that same room in which He met Prof. Browne. His death was the peaceful ending of a life Whose constantly extending influence our generation but faintly comprehends when it comprehends at all.

The conversation dwelt a little on prayer and Shoghi Effendi emphasized the importance of an unconstrained approach to God. Pour out your heart freely and fully. Then do something. God cannot work through you unless you act. Of prayer for health he said that prayer helps, but we must not lose sight of the fact that ill health may be good. Suffering, he thought very helpful both to individuals and nations. What is important is to pray always with a willingness for God's will to be done.

Apropos of the recent death of Dr Forel, the distinguished Swiss scientist, and the publication of his will, in which he declared himself a Bahá'í, we discussed Dr Forel's idea of God and the Bahá'í idea of God. Bahá'ís believe in a personal God. This of course does not imply an anthropomorphic God, but a conscientiousness God.

Wednesday, 18 November. At tea with the ladies the talk was about our plans to go to

Nazareth, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine. The ladies told how 'Abdu'l-Bahá always longed to go to Jerusalem but never was able. One time He asked someone who was going to Jerusalem to touch its walls for Him, to touch the walls of that city made sacred by Christ's sufferings. I have heard a Bahá'í returned from a visit to Haifa in 'Abdu'l-Bahá's life time tell how 'Abdu'l-Bahá told him when he was in Jerusalem to walk the Via Dolorosa. This Bahá'í said he never could describe to any one the depth and the poignancy of the experience as he trod that way. [XXIV:4:127]

But today all who had been to Jerusalem agreed there was another side to it. One said she always felt oppressed with another sorrow when she came near Jerusalem, a sorrow caused by the strife of the sects. Not so different a sorrow after all from what pierced the heart of Christ as He walked His Via Dolorosa, for did He not pray that same night before He parted from His followers, "Not for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me through their word; that they all may be one?" The strife of the sects, not the oneness for which the world is sick unto death, we found in Jerusalem.

But the open country with its simple villages, its vineyards, the survival of ancient modes of travel and labour, its rugged hills, still are the ideal setting for Hebrew and Christian story[s] and many a cherished phrase from the Psalms and many an incident from the life of Christ came vividly to mind as we drove from Nazareth to Jerusalem, Bethlehem, the Jordan River, and the Sea of Galilee.

Monday, 23 November. Shoghi Effendi is writing a general letter¹ to the Bahá'í friends of the Occident. We have the privilege of getting glimpses of its growth. Evidently it will emphasize political conditions of the world at large, show their inevitable progress toward another world war, after which will emerge the new world state. He spoke of Bahá'u'lláh's prophecy revealed in 1878, in which He refers to the turmoil and agitation of the world, its waywardness and irreligion, as it hastens to a plight too grievous to be disclosed. The prophecy ends with a beautiful promise of the unfurling of the Divine Standard.

At last appears on the horizon the "parliament of nations" the "federation of the world". Americans particularly should be much interested in two passages in this great document which has just come from the pen of Shoghi Effendi: one giving the interview between 'Abdu'l-Bahá and an American congressman, in which answers the congressman's question, "How can I best serve my country?" with the reply, "if you strive, in your capacity as a citizen of the world, to assist in the eventual application of the principle of federalism underlying the government of your own country to the relationships now existing between the peoples and nations of the world,"² and the passage in which Shoghi Effendi compares the formation of the future world state to the unification of the states of the North American continent. "It would indeed be no exaggeration," he writes, "to say that the absence of those facilities which modern scientific progress has placed at the service of humanity in our time made of the problem of welding the American states into a single federation, similar though they were in certain traditions, a task infinitely more complex than that which confronts a divided humanity in its efforts to achieve the unification of all mankind."³

In this latter passage one sees the [XXIV:4:128] dominant spirit of faith which animates the Guardian of the Bahá'í Cause as it did 'Abdu'l-Bahá, Who replied to those "few, unaware of the power latent in human endeavour, consider this matter [true civilization, universal peace through a federation of the governments of the world] as highly impracticable, nay even beyond the scope of man's utmost efforts. Such is not the case, however. On the contrary, thanks to the unfailing grace of God, the loving-kindness of His favoured ones, the unrivalled endeavours of wise and capable souls, and the thoughts and ideas of the peerless leaders of this age, nothing whatsoever can be regarded as unattainable. Endeavour, ceaseless endeavour, is required. Nothing short of an indomitable determination can possibly achieve it. Many a cause which past ages have regarded as purely visionary, yet in this day has become most easy and practicable. Why should this most great and lofty Cause—the daystar of the firmament of true civilization and the cause of the glory, the advancement, the well-being and the success of all humanity—be regarded as impossible of achievement? Surely the day will come when its beauteous light shall shed illumination upon the assemblage of man.”¹

Monday, 23 November. The conversation at tea this afternoon was about schools. The Bahá’í teachings emphasize universal education and the equality of men and women. As these principles are new to Oriental Bahá’ís and difficult for them to apply, the women of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s family feel an especial obligation to observe them conscientiously by giving their children a very complete education. This often means sending them to Europe, as educational opportunities there are greater than in the Near East. Often these young people have to transfer from one school to another. These transfers are difficult, as there is not even so uniform a curriculum as in Europe and America. One of the interesting points in the Bahá’í educational program is that it calls for “a standard, universal system of instruction.” This will certainly make for greater convenience as well as furthering the attainment of the more important ideals of mutual understanding, sympathy and unity among different nations, races and between the sexes.

Glimpses of the New World Order

Part V

Notes on a visit to Haifa and ‘Akká
Mabel and Sylvia Paine

This instalment will conclude these “Diary Notes” which have appeared from month to month consecutively beginning in the March number. We regret that we were not able, for lack of space, to publish these informing “Notes” in full.

Tuesday, 24 November. A young pilgrim asked advice about studying the Bahá’í literature. Shoghi Effendi recommended an intensive study of The Kitáb-i-Íqán by Bahá’u’lláh and Some Answered Questions by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. These books will repay thorough study, mastery, even to the point of memorizing certain passages. It is well, too, to read contemporary books, selecting the best, dealing with the same subjects, in order to become thoroughly acquainted with the subject and be able to clarify the Bahá’í teachings. The Dawn-Breakers, a narrative of early events in the Bahá’í movement recently translated by Shoghi Effendi will also repay careful study. This book was written between 1890 and 1892 with the encouragement of Bahá’u’lláh, Who made some suggestions to the author, Nabíl. [XXIV:5:145] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá revised certain passages in the book. It shows that the Bahá’í Faith has already its noble army of martyrs and the parts which introduce Bahá’u’lláh and the Báb are priceless material translated with extreme beauty and power.

Someone asked whether Bahá’ís should support the League of Nations and Shoghi Effendi replied that the League is not on the foundation that it should be to be the ultimate league, but that it will develop into that. As far as possible, without becoming involved in politics Bahá’ís should support it.

Wednesday, 25 November. Today we talked a little about food and health. In Some Answered Questions 'Abdu'l-Bahá shows that health is a matter of proper balance of the numerous elements in the human body. When this balance is disturbed disease enters. The readjustment can be effected by foods or by medicines. When the science of medicine becomes perfected, doctors can supply the missing element through foods. But in the meantime, Shoghi Effendi pointed out, we are in a confused and transitional state. Consequently it is better not to be dogmatic on the subject. The Bahá'í teachings, in this as in other matters, stress loyalty to science. Thus 'Abdu'l-Bahá always advised people in ill health to consult an expert doctor.

Friday, 27 November. This is the tenth anniversary of the passing of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. About six pm we went across the street to 'Abdu'l-Bahá's house. We were to enter His room, the room whence His spirit passed to the heavenly realm. A group of women were gathered outside the door, waiting to go in. They went in one by one and knelt with beautiful reverence at the bedside where the tired body of the great Servant of God and of mankind last lay. Little incidents of His last days came to my mind. How full of generous kindness and servitude, though the body was well-nigh exhausted! His insisting on gathering the garden fruit with His own hand, though He ate it, seemingly, largely to please the gardener. How having eaten of the fruit He turned to the gardener and asked, "Do you desire anything more?" Then with a pathetic gesture of His hands touchingly, emphatically and deliberately said: 'Now, it is finished, it is finished!'"¹ His receiving visitors and showing them extraordinary courtesy on the last evening of His life, giving them presents, going with them to the door.

As 'Abdu'l-Bahá passed away at one-fifteen in the morning, the memorial service held each year occupies the evening and night up to about two. About eight-thirty we walked up the side of Mt. Carmel to the shrine. It was a night of full moonlight with many soft white clouds. Across the bay 'Akká looked like a diadem in the heavens. We found gathered around the shrine and on the broad south terrace a considerable group of Bahá'ís. This terrace, we were told, was a favourite walk of the Master's. Soon all went within the shrine and listened while different Bahá'ís, one at a time chanted prayers. One of the most beautiful prayers chanted was the one re- [XXIV:5:146] vealed by 'Abdu'l-Bahá to be chanted at His shrine beginning:

"He is the All-Glorious!

"O God, my God! Lowly and tearful, I raise my suppliant hands to Thee and cover my face in the dust of that Threshold of Thine, exalted above the knowledge of the learned, and the praise of all that glorify Thee."²

After coming out from the shrine all sat on benches and chairs on the terrace and listened to the chanted recital of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's last days and His funeral, as related in the touching account written by Shoghi Effendi and Lady Blomfield. The funeral, we recalled, had drawn together an immense concourse of mourners from all over Palestine from the High Commissioner and other officials and heads of various religious communities to the vast multitude of all sorts and conditions who revered and loved Him. For 'Abdu'l-Bahá had been a kind father to all in that region.

After this long and beautiful chant on the terrace, beautifully lighted both with electric lights and with the soft moonlight, all went again into the shrines and, during exquisite chanting of prayers, felt again the mighty power of the Servant of God, Who through His supreme and lifelong exemplification of the spirit of servitude made plain to the world the very heart of the Bahá'í teachings.

Tuesday, 1 December. At luncheon today Shoghi Effendi spoke of the great future which lies ahead of Germany and Russia. A reaction will come eventually in favour of religion and against democracy.

Touching upon the main idea of his letter to the Bahá'ís of the West, called the "Goal of the New World Order" that "the principle of the Oneness of Mankind—the pivot round which all the teachings of Bahá'u'lláh revolve" is more than "the enunciation of an ideal" and "stands inseparably associated with an institution adequate to embody its truth, demonstrate its validity, and perpetuate its influence",¹ he spoke of the necessity for a new world order. This new world order cannot rise while national sovereignty is still so strong.

The immediate future for humanity, he said, is indeed dark, but in the not very distant future shines an infinitely better social and political order. Thus our last days at Haifa gave us bright glimpses of "the New World Order visualized by Bahá'u'lláh—a World Order that shall reflect, however dimly, upon this earthly plane, the ineffable splendours of the Abhá Kingdom."²

Haifa calling

Florence E. Pinchon

'Abdu'l-Bahá, as early as 1914 when Syria was still in the possession of the Turks, made remarkable prophecies about the commercial development of the harbour of Haifa. As so significant a part of the prophecy has now come to pass, it is easy to conceive as its complete fulfilment the vision of the magnificent metropolis which will one day arise from the slopes and approaches of Mt. Carmel. Haifa, because of its geographic situation, possesses such immense advantages for commerce with the Hinterland of the Near East that in the future it may well become the chief emporium of Western Asia.

"Some day 'Akká and Haifa will be connected as one large city, with a long breakwater sheltering harbour and docks, and a driveway, through orange groves, skirting the sea. The ships of all nations will be seen here, commerce will thrive, and the Bay of 'Akká will be the centre of the pilgrimage of the world the sovereignty of world reverence." 'Abdu'l-Bahá

It was a thrilling moment when, on the morning of the 31 October 1933, we paused in the business of the day, to listen to the voice of Haifa, Palestine, calling the British Isles.

The broadcast was taking place on the occasion of the opening, by the High Commissioner of Palestine, of the new harbour, whose construction now makes the port of Haifa one of the finest and most sheltered havens in the Mediterranean.

However, to Bahá'ís generally, the ceremony meant something far more than the mere inauguration of a harbour. For not only does it mark the opening of a new door between the Eastern and Western worlds—in itself an event of outstanding consequence both to world communications and world relations—but to those who could trace, however dimly, the working out of a divine plan and purpose, the happening seemed fraught with a profound spiritual significance.

The masterly description given in the broadcast of the beautiful and historic scene in which the ceremony took place, with all its ancient and sacred associations, and now its new world importance, filled one with a deep content. For were we not actual witnesses of the beginning of the fulfilment of those glowing predictions, uttered long ago by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, concerning the brilliant destiny that awaited this, the home of His lifelong exile and labours?

Authoritative writers suggest that the immediate future is likely to witness a re-awakening of the whole of the region formerly known to us as Asia Minor. In Palestine this renaissance is already well begun, with its radiating point at the port of Haifa. Symbolic of this progressive spirit, the new harbour here will constitute a landmark in the annals of world intercourse, and play a leading part in the developments that are taking place in the Near and Middle East.

The ancient town of Haifa lies on the southern horn of a magnificent bay, three miles deep and nine miles wide, just where the green promontory of Mt. Carmel breaks the two hundred miles of inhospitable coast line and yellow sand dunes stretching northwards from Port Said.

At the other extremity of the bay, the grey fortress of ‘Akká—the Acre of the Crusades, and Christianity’s last stronghold in Palestine—stands out into the blue Syrian Sea. The great semi-circular harbour so formed is now spanned by a breakwater about one and a half miles long, which runs out from Rasel Kerim¹ at the northern extremity of the base of Mt. Carmel, eastwards, in a line parallel to the town front. The leese side of the harbour is formed by another breakwater, about half a mile long, running out at right angles to the main one. The sheltered haven so constituted encloses an area about the size of Genoa harbour, and can afford accommodation to every class of vessel navigating the Levant.

Yet contrary to what has happened in the case of most other seaports, the harbour does not overshadow the town, but has been designed to suit the landscape and fit with due proportion into the whole noble picture.

All who have visited this spot seem to agree that, as Sir Cunliffe Lister observed in his reply from London to the High Commissioner, it is a monument to British engineering genius, and an achievement of which they may be justly proud. And, in this connection, it may not be without interest to note, that if two imaginary lines were drawn across the globe, passing through the widespread British dominions and colonies, they would quite naturally meet and intersect at this point of the Holy Land. While Haifa, in the near future, is likely to become an important naval, land and air base of the Empire.

Yet in spite of its unique position and rich associations, until [XXIV:10:305] within quite recent years this particular part of the Near East has lain all neglected and forgotten by men.

In the days of the Canaanites, Haifa was known as Shikmona,² and later, to the Jews, as Hephah or haven. Among the Medes and Phoenicians it was famed as an important station on the highroads of the nations. For Nature appears to have endowed it with advantages granted to no other seaport on the Eastern Mediterranean.

About half a century ago, a group of prominent Englishmen, recognizing the immense possibilities of this locality, agitated for the cession of Haifa to Great Britain. And later, the author of “New Old Land” and founder of the modern Zionist Movement, sailed along its shores and envisioned for it a brilliant future.

But it was in 1868, at the time when the whole country lay under the indolent Turkish rule, that the first flush of another dawn broke above these ancient hills of God, and a breeze of a new morning ruffled its sleeping waves. For when ‘Akká was but a grim penal settlement—a home of the owl and the bat—and Haifa, a small obscure town, a Messenger of God was sent here by the Persian and Turkish governments, as a life long prisoner and exile. And so, here, beneath the shadow of Mt. Carmel, in the land of Jesus Christ and of the Prophets, Bahá’u’lláh lived and suffered, and finally triumphed, delivering to men His message of world unity and peace, and pointing out the spiritual and practical means by which such a consummation might be achieved.

Visiting pilgrims tell us that, from this time onward the whole district began to change; that even the atmosphere seemed charged with a purer and more vibrant quality. So intimately related are the things of earth and heaven, things temporal and things eternal.

Amid these fateful days of darkness and chaos, we find ourselves turning, with ever increasing longing, towards the heavenly Light that once shone from that lonely fortress, hearing again across the world’s troubled waters the reassuring voice of the Counsellor of Nations: “Be not afraid.”—“These fruitless strifes, these ruinous wars shall pass away and ‘the Most Great Peace’ shall come!”

Today we are witnessing in the steadily growing importance of Haifa and its magnificent harbour, the materialisation of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s predictions, and the justification of all those who have dared to dream greatly concerning her. Planted at the feet of green and majestic Carmel she is beginning to blossom like the proverbial rose.

One of the principal causes contributing to this prosperity is, of course, the fact that at Haifa the gigantic pipe-line of some 600 miles, through which will pour the petroleum from the oil fields of Mosul, will find its outlet to the refineries and to the sea. This vast enterprise and the implications that oil—the igniter of the nations—brings in its wake would alone entitle Haifa to be called the “City of Light and of the Future”.

It is also anticipated that for economic, political and strategic reasons, ere long a railway will follow the route of the oil pipes, crossing the wide stretches of desert that lie between Haifa and Baghdád, and tapping the trade of Upper Meso- [XXIV:10:306] potamia, the Euphrates valley and Eastern Turkey, and so forming a truly golden link between the Eastern and Western Worlds.

A link that, as some of us realize was forged spiritually long ago, when Bahá’u’lláh journeyed across these same deserts in hardship and suffering in order that a path might be blazoned for the kinship of East and West, and differences of race be annulled.

So comes today the wheel of destiny full circle, and Haifa is again about to fulfil her ancient purpose as a highway for the nations, as well as a great distributing centre for the world’s merchandise. Soon, as a certain writer has predicted, “We shall hear of wool from Mosul, barley and grains from ‘Iráq and Palestine, dates from Amara, potash and phosphates from the Dead Sea, rice, skins and hides from Persia, oranges from Jaffa ... precious articles from Central Asia and India, all passing through Haifa to the markets of the West.” In short, as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá foretold, it will become one of the first emporiums of the world.

And the story does not end here. It is, indeed, only the beginning. Few of us can imagine the high destiny that awaits this “radiant white spot” from which has flashed forth, in this new cycle of human power, the guiding Light of the Spirit.

*"The flowers of civilization and culture from all nations will be brought here to blend their fragrances together and blaze the way for the brotherhood of man."*¹ 'Abdu'l-Bahá prophesied in 1914: *"The entire harbour from 'Akká to Haifa will be one path of illumination. Powerful searchlights will be placed on both sides of Mount Carmel to guide the steamers. Mount Carmel itself, from top to bottom, will be submerged in a sea of lights. A person standing on the summit of Mount Carmel, and the passengers of the steamers coming to it, will look upon the most sublime and majestic spectacle of the whole world."*²

The searchlight, that shines across the harbour from 'Abdu'l-Bahá's shrine on the mountain side, is itself a witness that the word of God is being accomplished. As the Psalmist sang: "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mt. Zion"—because it has been and is destined increasingly to become—"the City of the great King".

The Mount Carmel of the future

Various prophecies of 'Abdu'l-Bahá concerning the development of Haifa, Palestine.

"In the future the distance between 'Akká and Haifa will be built up, and the two cities will join and clasp hands, becoming the two terminal section of one mighty metropolis. As I look now over this scene, I see so clearly that it will become one of the first emporiums of the world. This great semi-circular bay will be transformed into the finest harbour, wherein the ships of all nations will seek shelter and refuge. The great vessels of all peoples will come to this port, bringing on their decks thousands and thousands of men and women from every part of the globe. The mountain and the plain will be dotted with the most modern buildings and palaces. Industries will be established and various institutions of philanthropic nature will be founded. The flowers of civilization and culture from all nations will be brought here to blend their fragrances together and blaze the way for the brotherhood of man. Wonderful gardens, orchards, groves and parks will be laid out on all sides. At night the great city will be lighted by electricity. The entire harbour from 'Akká to Haifa will be one path of illumination. Powerful searchlights will be placed on both sides of Mount Carmel to guide the steamers. Mount Carmel itself, from top to bottom, will be submerged in a sea of lights. A person standing on the summit of Mount Carmel, and the passengers of the steamers coming to it, will look upon the most sublime and majestic spectacle of the whole world."³

'Abdu'l-Bahá visited by great Catholic scholar

Martha L. Root

"Through each and every one of the verses which the Pen of the Most High hath revealed, the doors of love and unity have been unlocked and flung open to the face of men. We have erewhile declared—and Our Word is the truth—'Consort with the followers of all religions in a spirit of friendliness and fellowship.' Whatsoever hath led the children of men to shun one another, and hath caused dissensions and divisions amongst them, hath, through the revelation of these words, been nullified and abolished."⁴

When this generation is gone, none will be left who can tell the world about meeting 'Abdu'l-Bahá, [the] Centre of the Covenant of the Bahá'í Movement, and what He said to them and how His great and gracious presence impressed them. It was on 31 May 1932, in Lublin, Poland, that I met a distinguished Roman Catholic, Dr Joseph Kruszynski, President of the celebrated Roman Catholic Theological University, Lublin University. What he told me of his visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in 1914, what the latter prophesied for Poland, and the conversation of these two men about the relation of the Bahá’í Movement to Roman Catholicism is thrilling and I relate to you very simply.

I found President Kruszynski a tall, handsome, scholarly, kindly interesting man with eyes full of light. Any one just to look at him would say: “He lives the life!” His whole expression beamed a welcome and hospitality to the writer because he knew that she too, had known ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

“Please tell me all about your meeting [with] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá,” I said, “and may I ask too, if you are the Roman Catholic priest who visited Him in Palestine in 1914 and was the first, so far as is known, who ever knew and wrote about the Bahá’í Movement in Poland?” He replied that he was that priest. This University President said that on his second visit to Haifa, Palestine, in 1914, a Russian Doctor one day mentioned to him about ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, such a world renowned spiritual teacher living there. The Roman Catholic Priest said: “I shall go to call upon Him;” and the Russian Doctor pleaded: “O father, if you go, I wish to accompany you!” Together they went to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s home in Haifa.

“How well I remember that day,” said President Kruszynski, “it was 14 July 1914, the fete day of the French Revolution; I went at eleven o’clock in the morning, to visit Him. My card, I recall, read “Joseph Kruszynski, Roman Catholic priest, Doctor and Professor of Old Testament in Włocławek Roman Catholic Seminary, Włocławek, Poland.” He received me so courteously and with such friendliness. He led me to his drawing room and had me sit at His right, beside Him on the divan. He expressed how glad He was that I was in His home and we spoke of many matters; our discourse was very interesting!” [XXIV:11:335]

The President explained to me that with them, that morning, was a secretary who was also an interpreter, but they did not have him interpret as both the Catholic and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá knew Arabic. “And ‘Abdu’l-Bahá knew Persian and Arabic extremely well; I was impressed by His command of these languages,” said the President, “and He always used the intimate word ‘thou’ in addressing me, it was very pleasant.”

First they spoke of Poland and Polish writers, and the Catholic said He was astonished that this Persian scholar knew so much about the history and sufferings of the Poles and that He had read their literature. He said that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá told Him that Sienkiewicz’s works had been translated into Arabic, he had read them and considered Sienkiewicz a great man, but added: “Tolstoy was a great man too; there was no greater writer in Europe than Tolstoy.”

Dr Kruszynski asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá what He thought of conditions in Europe and the latter replied: “There will be a great war in all Europe and after the war, Poland, thy fatherland shall be free. I will pray to God that thy fatherland shall be free!” The President said that this touched him profoundly and he always remembered it. He related to me how, on the voyage when the Russian ship on which he travelled had left Constantinople, some Russian passengers had loudly proclaimed that there must be war and that Constantinople must belong to Russia; it was necessary for the greatness of the Russian Empire.

These remarks about political, national affairs and about writers only were the introduction to the real topic of the visit which was religion. “I asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá,” said Dr Kruszynski, “what is Bahai-ism?” And He told me that it is a religion of brotherhood. He explained to me about a Mashriqu’l-Adhkár, a great Bahá’í Temple which is being built near

Chicago, and He gave me a picture of it; I have it here. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá said that after many years the Bahá’í Faith will be very great, that there will be many believers in this religion; He said it was His hope that all people can be united in these Teachings. He foretold that many in America, later, will believe. [XXIV:11:336]

The President told me how ‘Abdu’l-Bahá served them Persian tea and then after many farewell greetings, they left. They visited His beautiful garden, and later they went to ‘Akká to see the Prison where Bahá’u’lláh, His Father, had been incarcerated, and they went last to Bahjí, just out from ‘Akká to visit the Tomb of Bahá’u’lláh. Dr Kruszynski said that the custom in the Orient is that the first born son bears the name of his father, but ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ‘Abbás had taken the name of the Servant of His Father. “You see,” he said, “Bahá was His Father’s name and ‘Abdu’l means servant; so He was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá—the ‘Servant of Bahá’. ‘Abbás His last name means Master. He was evanescent, selfless, humble; He always spoke of His Father, ‘not My Teachings, but those of My Father Bahá’u’lláh’.”

Dr Kruszynski said that as soon as he returned to Poland he wrote an article describing his visit to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá in Haifa, Palestine; he stated in this article that there would be a great world war in all Europe and at its close, Poland would be free, because ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had said so. He took this article to the editor of a Warsaw paper, but the editor did not wish to print it, he refused it. “Just one week later the war exploded,” said President Kruszynski, “and I kept the article in my library till the end of the war and when Poland attained her independence, I took this same article to a Polish editor and it was published in full in Słowo Kujawskie, in Włocławek. I have seven volumes of this newspaper, I shall try to find the article and send it to you.”

Certainly it was illumining to hear from one of the great Catholic University Presidents of Central Europe that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had made this prophecy about the independence of Poland and that this Rector of the university had seen it fulfilled before his very eyes. This New Poland, this nation of 32,000,000 people, statesmen think, is becoming a bulwark of Western civilization and a powerful factor making for the equilibrium of Europe and the peace of the world.

This gracious President showed me his university, introduced me to some of his students and then I dined with him before taking the train back to Warsaw. He was so hospitable, so thoughtful, it gave me a picture of Polish courtesy at its highest. During the dinner we spoke of religion, of Roman Catholicism and the Bahá’í Movement. “What do you, a Roman Catholic scholar, think of the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh?” I asked, and he replied: “Bahá’u’lláh as a reformer of religion and as a philosopher is very great. From my viewpoint as a Catholic, I can say that I like this Bahá’í concept of religion because it is a religion of brotherhood, and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wished all men to be united as brothers.”

“I asked ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, ‘who is Christ?’ and He answered that Christ was only one of the great Prophets, World Teachers, that Moses was a great Prophet but that Jesus Christ was greater than Moses and came to make the world better than it was in the time of the Jews. He said that Muḥammad came to make the people better and now in our time all these religions are not sufficient, and Bahá’u’lláh [XXIV:11:337] came (‘not I, but My Father Bahá’u’lláh came’, He said to me) to make better the Muslim religion, the Christian religion, the Jewish religion, all the religions. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá also said that Bahá’u’lláh’s religion was better for this epoch than Christianity and Islám.”

“I told Him,” continued Dr Kruszynski, “that the correction of His Father is very great, but only for the Islamic religion, because the Islamic religion is an exclusive one, but His Father has made religion less exclusive and more a religion of brotherhood. However, in the Christian religion, we believe in a revealed religion; we believe the Bible is a Revelation direct from God and that Jesus Christ is God and man in one, and this cannot be changed. I know that among the Christian believers are abuses, faults, but the idea of our religion is correct. And ‘Abdu’l-Bahá considered that the religion of His Father, Bahá’u’lláh, is the last and best religion.”

“So between our viewpoints,” the President concluded, “there was just this difference, that I cannot think that Bahai-ism is the last and best religion. I honour the religion of Bahá’u’lláh but I cannot believe it is the best and the last. I believe the Bahá’í religion has many principles for the social life. I believe the foundation of Bahai-ism is suited to our times; questions of the social life in our age are very great. The relation of Bahá’u’lláh to Moses and Muḥammad I think is correct, but the relation to Christ is not correct. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá knew very well about Christianity, I was convinced of this, but the Teachings of Christ are inspired, the Books of the New Testament are inspired and I believe in these Revelations.”

Again Dr Kruszynski said: “I believe the Teachings of Bahá’u’lláh are the Teachings of a very great philosopher. I consider that Bahá’u’lláh has been the greatest philosopher in our times. He has given the world a system uniting religious beliefs with social foundations. I remember one sentence I said to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, I believe your reformation is very great, very good for Muslims because they are intolerant, very exclusive, they will not participate in or associate with other religionists; Christians are more tolerant. For example, I believe in my religion, but I myself honour your religion. A Muslim would be intolerant to all other religions. You have reformed religion so that your believers will be more friendly, more cordial to the Catholics. I thank you very much, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, because you are bringing people nearer to the Catholic religion than Muḥammad brought them.” And ‘Abdu’l-Bahá responded, “Yes, yes, you are right! Our believers are more cordial to the Catholic faith than Muslims are!”

My conversation with this kind, great Catholic President was so interesting that the hour came all too quickly to leave Lublin, but it was train time. He had served me so generously with delicious Polish foods, though he himself had eaten only yogurt. He blessed me, wished me success and put me into his own carriage and his own coachman drove me to the station. Sitting in the railway carriage returning to Warsaw from this ancient city of Lublin, I pondered in my heart all that he had told me.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

“A man begins with a little selfish view of Good limited to himself; after a time he learns more wisdom and his view of Good enlarges to his own household. Then with more wisdom comes the realization that Good must include his family, no matter how large. Again more wisdom, and his family becomes his village, his village his city, and in turn, his city his country. But this is not enough; as his wisdom grows, his country becomes his continent, and his continent the world his family has become mankind. It is the duty of the Press to teach this wisdom to mankind for it is the wisdom of God. It is the work of a true Press to teach this wisdom of God.”

‘Abdu’l-Bahá—the Servant of God

Part I

Z. N. Zayn¹

¹ Mírzá Núri’-d-Dín-i-Zayn?

The author, a teacher in the American University at Beirut and a graduate of said institution, presents herewith a brief, but intensely interesting picture of the life of 'Abdu'l-Bahá. What Mr Zayn states about his article gives it great historical value. "I have made an attempt in this article, very imperfectly perhaps, to record some of the impressions of my childhood days when I had the privilege of meeting almost daily in Haifa. When once one had met 'Abdu'l-Bahá, whether old or young, one could not forget Him.

"The personality of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, the magnetism that permeated Him and radiated from Him, will always remain a mystery. Even those around Him did not and could not understand Him. Indeed it will be long before mortal and limited minds can grasp the real entity of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's divine nature."

The second and concluding part of this article will follow in the May number.

Ever since the dawn of history, I whenever there have been famines, plagues, earthquakes and eclipses, whenever a barbarian invasion or a terrible war has devastated a country, whenever terror and distress and misery and corruption have increased in the world, people have believed that "the world was dying, passing away, falling to pieces" and that the millennium, the dawn of a new age was at hand. Here are a few instances.

In the sixth century CE it is said that Pope Gregory the Great, urged the building of the Church of Apostles at Rome, "although the world was ending". During the tenth century, the phrase "the end of the world drawing near" was frequently used at the beginning of donations and charters to monasteries. The opinion of the thirteenth century is voiced by Dante: "We are already in the final age of the world." In the latter half of the seventeenth century, Abbot Joachim of Fiore a mystic visionary, believed in religious progress and dreamt of a new age when "the knowledge of God would be universal, because revealed directly in men's heart by the Spirit, without the need of teachers."

Two hundred years later, in the nineteenth century, the age of scientific achievements and mechanization of life, the belief in the millennium becomes even more intense. William Miller interpreting the "two thousand three hundred days" mentioned in Daniel 8:14, as 2,300 years, calculated that this period would come to a close about 1844, "at which time the world would fold up, the righteous be transported directly into Heaven and the rest of the race destroyed."

By a most remarkable coincidence 'Abdu'l-Bahá Who was destined to become the recipient and the promulgator of a new Spiritual Light, was born on the twenty-third of May 1844.

This article is not intended to be biographical in nature. But it is almost impossible to write about 'Abdu'l-Bahá without at least referring to the sufferings and privations which He endured for sixty years, from the time He was a child of eight. If Christ on Calvary once said: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do", 'Abdu'l-Bahá could have said it almost every day of His life, so great and numerous were the oppressions showered on Him. At eight years of age, is brought before the dusty [XXV:1:9] and rusty iron bars of an underground cell to see His Father, Bahá'u'lláh, then a prisoner of Násiri'd Dín Sháh in Tíhrán, and persecuted for teaching such "seditious" messages as, the following:

"O ye beloved of the Lord! Commit not that which defileth the limpid stream of love or destroyeth the sweet fragrance of friendship. By the righteousness of the Lord! Ye were created to show love one to another and not perversity and rancour. Take pride not in love for yourselves but in love for your fellow-creatures. Glory not in love for your country, but in love for all mankind."¹

A year later, we find in a caravan accompanying His Father on His journey of exile to Baghdád. At that tender age, He is already entertaining the princes and the ‘Ulamás of Islám who could not resist the temptation of calling on Bahá’u’lláh to listen to His teachings. When He was nineteen, He is banished again, this time to Constantinople. Shortly after He is in Adrianople. At twenty-four He is sent with a guard of soldiers to the fortified city of ‘Akká with Bahá’u’lláh and a small band of followers, children, men and women. For a time they seemed to be buried alive, for they had no communication whatsoever with the outside world. “During the intense heat, malaria, typhoid and dysentery attacked the prisoners, so that all, men, women and children, were sick at one time. There were no doctors, no medicines, no proper food, and no treatment of any kind.”¹ Only one man remained in good health and that was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. Speaking of those days, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá once said laughingly: “I used to make broth for the people, and as I had much practice, I made good broth.”²

For a brief account such as this, we cannot go into details. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá spent the flower of His youth in the Prison City of ‘Akká. Twenty-three years passed dwelt-well-nigh a quarter of a century!

On 14 April 1890, the monotony of events in ‘Akká was temporarily broken by a non-Bahá’í traveller, an English scholar and professor in Cambridge University,³ who came to visit Bahá’u’lláh for the first time. His description of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Who was then forty-six, is worth being repeated here:

“A tall strongly-built man holding himself straight as an arrow, with white turban and raiment, long black locks reaching almost to the shoulder, broad powerful forehead indicating a strong intellect combined with an unswerving will, eyes keen as a hawk’s, and strongly-marked but pleasing features—such was my first impression of ‘Abbás Afandí, ‘the master’ (Áqá) as he par excellence is called by the Bábís. Subsequent conversation with him served only to heighten the respect with which his appearance had from the first inspired me. One more eloquent of speech, more ready of argument, more apt of illustration, more intimately acquainted with the sacred books of the Jews, the Christians, and the Muslims, could, I should think, scarcely be found even amongst the eloquent, ready, and subtle race to which he belongs. These qualities, combined with a bearing at once majestic and genial, made me cease to wonder at the influence and esteem which he enjoyed even beyond the circle of his father’s followers.”⁴

Then came 1892. Bahá’u’lláh ascended to the Kingdom of Light whence He came. He left a Will in which He declared ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the Centre of the Covenant. On His shoulders fell the mantle of leadership and the great responsibility of promulgating the Most Great Peace advocated by Bahá’u’lláh, of “hastening thereby advent of the Golden Age” anticipated by Him, and in short of establishing a New World Order “Divine in origin, all-embracing in scope, equitable in principle”.

But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was still a prisoner, still surrounded by enemies and spies and ungrateful friends. Nay, His enemies became now more [XXV:1:10] dangerous, their hatred increased while at the same time the government’s restrictions multiplied.

“Sometimes we were better off and sometimes very much worse,” said ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. “It depended on the governor, who, if he happened to be a kind and lenient ruler, would grant us permission to leave the fortification, and would allow the believers free access to visit the house

[where ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and family were permitted to stay]; *but when the governor was more rigorous, extra guards were placed around us, and often pilgrims who had come from afar were turned away.*¹

Sixteen or seventeen more years passed.

Meanwhile ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had ordered the erection of a building on Mount Carmel to become the resting place of the sacred remains of the Báb, the Forerunner of the Bahá’í Faith. But His enemies stirred the government to bring against Him the ridiculous charge of building fortifications on Mount Carmel “armed and garrisoned secretly”. Whereupon the neurotic and suspicious Sulṭán ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd sent successively two commissions from the Sublime Porte. The second one was “an extremely overbearing, treacherous and insulting Committee of investigation”. It included commanders of varying ranks, one of them a general.

The Committee, helped by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s enemies, drew up a long report full of seditious libels and false accusations against ‘Abdu’l-Bahá. He was even threatened that upon the return of the Committee to Constantinople, the Sulṭán would issue an order to either send ‘Abdu’l-Bahá to Fízán² or to have him “hanged” at the gate of ‘Akká.

As the time was drawing nigh for the Sultan’s farmán to reach ‘Akká and the sorrow and anxiety of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s family and His friends grew more intense, one evening a mysterious person presented himself to ‘Abdu’l-Bahá and said that an Italian ship was at ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s disposal. He could leave on it that same evening if He wanted to, and could choose to land at any safe place He desired. But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá Whose courage was ever unyielding and Who never ran away from justice or refused to meet His enemies smiled and said: “The Báb did not run away; Bahá’u’lláh did not run away; I shall not run away”. For three days and three nights the ship tossed up and down on the waves some miles off the coast of ‘Akká. But ‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not change His mind and the ship sailed away.

However, before the members of the Committee reached Constantinople, revolution had broken out. The Chairman of the Committee “was shot with three bullets, the general was exiled, the next in rank died and the third ran to Cairo where he sought and received help from the Bahá’ís”. ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd lost his throne. Constitutional government was declared in Turkey. All political prisoners of the Ottoman Empire were set free and amongst them was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá.

It was 1908. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s family moved to Haifa, at the foot of Mount Carmel.

Three years later, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, bearing still the indelible marks of fatigue and sorrow on His face, [XXV:1:11] after forty years of imprisonment left the Mediterranean shores for Europe and America. He was a youth of twenty-four when He entered the Citadel of ‘Akká. He left it with the weight of sixty-four years of age.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá toured Europe and America for two years, from 1911 to 1913. Wherever He went, people of all denominations and social classes gathered around Him to listen to His words. With His unusually charming diction and most remarkable versatility, He conversed with those who had sought His presence. One instance picked out of many will convey to the reader some idea of the popularity and the respect that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá enjoyed in Europe and America.

“Arriving at Vanners,³ he found a large, strangely mixed crowd, assembled about the gate to welcome him, from the quite poor to the wealthy who had motored over from their country places.”¹

“All day long people of every condition gathered about the gate for a chance of seeing him, and more than sixty drove or cycled to Vanners to see him, many wishing to question him on some special subject. Among them were the clergy of several denominations, a head master of a boys’ public school, a member of Parliament, a doctor, a famous political writer, the vice-chancellor of a University, several journalists, a well-known poet, and a magistrate from London.

“He will long be remembered as he sat in the bow window in the afternoon sunshine, his arm round a very ragged but very happy little boy, who had come to ask ‘Abdu’l-Bahá for sixpence for his money box and for his invalid mother, whilst round him in the room were gathered men and women discussing Education, Socialism, the first Reform Bill, and the relation of submarines and wireless telegraphy to the new era on which man is entering.”²

In America, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá stayed for nine months and visited no less than thirty-two towns and cities spreading day and night the message of love and universal peace. He addressed people of all denominations and social classes in schools and universities, in clubs and halls, in private homes and grand hotels, in churches and synagogues.

And then came 1914 when the so-called God fearing and God loving nations of the world plunged into the dreadful holocaust of the Great War, when man fought against man with more than beastly and pagan cruelty. And the tragedy of it all was that every side prayed for divine assistance to win the war! Indeed it was not prayer but a shameless blasphemy! And what eloquent expression of our folly and stupidity is found in the following words uttered by a field marshal of the Allies towards the close of the war:

“With our backs to the wall, and believing in the justice of our Cause, each one of us must fight on to the end. ...”

At no time, perhaps not even during His long imprisonment was ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s heart so pulsating with grief and sorrow as during the World War when a high percentage of fallacy and irrationality darkened the human mind and when the poison of hate filled the soul of man—man ‘whom ‘Abdu’l-Bahá believed to be “the highest creature of the phenomenal world, is endowed with continuous bounty bestowed by divine generosity without cessation.”³

‘Abdu’l-Bahá did not live long after the World War. “I have done all that could be done,” He wrote. “I have served the Cause of Bahá’u’lláh to the utmost of My ability. I have laboured night and day, all the years of My life.”⁴ He passed away on the 28 November 1921, in Haifa, Palestine, shortly after mid-night. “His face was so calm, His expression so serene, they thought Him asleep.”⁵ intimate contacts with 'Abdu'l-Bahá, describes His mission and its expression toward humanity as seen at first-hand.

As we study the life of we cannot fail to realize that it was a strange kaleidoscope of events. The pendulum of His days swung from episode to episode unparalleled and unrivalled in the history of the world. A prisoner in the citadel of 'Akká, surrounded by spies, enemies and evil wishers, we find Him later a free man in the western hemisphere addressing great and heedful audiences in places of worship and of social service. In England, at St. John's Church, Westminster the congregation kneels to receive 'Abdu'l-Bahá's blessing! In 1920, Great Britain confers upon Him the honour of Knight of the British Empire, so profoundly impressed were the government representatives by His noble character and His great work in the interests of peace, conciliation, and the prosperity of the people!"

'Abdu'l-Bahá seemed to have one great task to live for, the task of loving mankind and teaching mankind to love one another. "The lovers of mankind," He wrote, *"these are the superior men, of whatever nation, creed or colour they may be."*¹ One of the western believers visiting 'Abdu'l-Bahá in 'Akká wrote:

"Five days we remained within those walls, prisoners with Him Who dwells in that 'Great Prison'. It is a prison of peace, of love and service. No wish, no desire is there save the good of mankind, the peace of the world, the acknowledgment of the Fatherhood of God and the mutual rights of men as His creatures, His children."²

A native of 'Akká hated for well-nigh ten years. And yet 'Abdu'l-Bahá showed him every kindness and amiability. At last, one day, the man came into His presence, helpless and bewildered: "Master," He said, "why is it that you are kind to me when you know that I hate you?" 'Abdu'l-Bahá laughed cheerfully and said: "My son, it is because I love you. But you don't understand me." 'Abdu'l-Bahá loved man because He believed that man was created in the image of God.

One of the familiar sights witnessed in Haifa was the Master walking in the streets accompanied by a group of followers and friends. But what a picturesque and colourful group it was! Men in red fezzes, in black caps, in felt hats; men in oriental cloaks, in European dress, in Indian attires; brown men, yellow men, black man, fair men! What a variegated agglomeration of assorted members of the human family accompanied 'Abdu'l-Bahá! And all of them with folded arms, bowed heads and responsive hearts walked behind Him and listened to Him. It has been truly written:

"To 'Abdu'l-Bahá, as a teacher and friend, came men and women from every race, religion and nation, to sit at his table like favoured guests, questioning him about the social, spirit-[XXV:2:53] ual or moral programme each had most at heart; and after a stay lasting from a few hours to many months, returning home, inspired, renewed and enlightened. The world surely never possessed such a guest-house as this."³

At times, early in the morning, at noon or towards sunset, would be seen walking alone with firm steps and in a pensive mood. Where was He going to? Where was He coming from? Perhaps one could read the answer in the eyes of the little children who stopped their play and looked at Him with tender and reverent eyes. "He is the father of the poor," one would whisper to the other.

Much has been written about 'Abdu'l-Bahá's giving alms to the poor. Little has been said about the way He did it. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá knew the poor, knew them by their name. And many indeed they were, of all sects and groups, orphans, blind, crippled, sick and suffering, they all came to Him. Whatever He gave them, food, corn, clothes or money, He gave it to them with a sunny smile and a cheerful word. His was not a cold, passive, mechanical and impersonal way of helping the needy. He was never too busy or tired to stop and say a happy word to the miserable pauper who rushed to kiss the hem of His cloak. How often in rainy, cold and dreary winter days, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá would be visiting unexpectedly the dingy shed or dilapidated shelter of some poor and wretched human being! How truly people could say of Him: “We love him because he first loved us.”¹

It is futile to make any attempt to describe the joy, the feeling of exaltation, of wonder and awe, of spiritual tranquillity, of elation that one experienced when in the presence of the Master! What utter oblivion of self one plunged into when one met ‘Abdu’l-Bahá! And with what inexhaustible energy insisted on meeting, night after night, in His own house, the handful of sorrow stricken believers that stayed around Him, His guests, and His visitors! He never refused to see anyone, friend or foe, no matter at what season of the year, or at what time of the day one called.

Those meetings were unique and unparalleled in the spiritual history of the world. The friends would gather in the drawing room of the Master’s house, and occupy all the places on the floor and on the chairs, except one sofa, half way up and to the left of the entrance, which was the habitual place where sat. Eagerly and longingly the eyes would be looking towards the open door and the ears would be strained to be the first to see the Master approaching and to hear the rhythmic sound of His footsteps. But it was most remarkable that often none of those present could even tell how the Master had come. For He would appear suddenly as if from nowhere. And at times, before, one had time to spring to one’s feet, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s voice would be ringing in the room: “Marhabá, Marhabá” (You are welcome, greetings be upon you.) And then for the rest of the hour, the soul in communion with the Spirit forgot its self, and was utterly unconscious of the material world around it. ‘Abdu’l-Bahá often closed His eyes in meditation and remained for a while as if in communion with the [XXV:2:54] Universal Spirit of creation which permeated His own being. Then after an hour or so, one would be conscious again that there were people in the room, that in fact one’s self was in that room, that outside the windows it was black and the wind was blowing—then one realized that the Master had left the room!

About the greatness of this man and His power,” wrote Professor Edward G. Browne, “no one who had seen Him could entertain a doubt.”

Perhaps it was His remarkable understanding and grasp of human suffering and misery and discord and hatred, His patience, long and enduring, His most lucid and penetrating insight, the depth of His knowledge and wisdom rivalled only by His own spiritual way of life, and His humility so compelling and so mighty—perhaps these were some of the attributes that made of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá the perfect Exemplar of the quintessence of creation—Man.

But great and inspiring as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was in the truest sense of the word, He never referred to or admitted His greatness. Nay, on the contrary, His greatest joy was being called ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, i.e. the “Servant of Light”.²

“My name is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá,” He wrote, “my identity is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, my qualification is

² Bahá’u’lláh—‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s Father—literally means the “Light or Splendour of God”.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá, my reality is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, my praise is ‘Abdu’l-Bahá ...”¹

A believer once asked Him, saying: “Master, who art thou? Art thou the Christ?”

“Verily, I say unto thee, that I am indeed an humble, submissive and imploring servant of God; a servant of His Beloved; ... a promoter of the greatest peace among all nations and tribes; ... a herald of the Kingdom of God among the sects of all horizons. This is my station and condition; ... because my servitude to the Holy Threshold is my brilliant light, my shining star and my drawn sword; and beside this I have no other name.”²

‘Abdu’l-Bahá lived at such a remarkable period in the history of civilization that one cannot help stopping a moment to review very briefly some of the most important incidents of world history between the years 1892 and 1921, when ‘Abdu’l-Bahá alone and single-handed faced humanity with His message of peace and love and light.

In 1894, the Sino-Japanese war broke out. Four years later, Germany, Great Britain and Russia seized Chinese provinces and thus “a flame of hatred for the Europeans swept through China”. With remarkable intelligence and energy, Japan westernized its people in an astonishingly short time, until in 1899, it was “on a level with the most advanced European powers”. In 1905 Russia declared war on Japan. At this time, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was so disappointed with the Hague Peace Congress that He said later: “It resembles many drunkards gathered together to protest against the drinking of alcohol. They say drink is horrible and they straightway go out from the house to drink again.”³

Three years later came the fall of Sultán ‘Abdu’l-Ḥamíd, and the establishment of constitutional government in Turkey. From 1914 to 1918, the world witnessed the spiritual, moral and physical collapse and bankruptcy of the nations. Two Western monarchs, the Emperor of Germany and the Tsar of Russia, dramatically lost their thrones. In [XXV:2:55] 1919, Russia in particular suffered from disorganization and revolution. In 1920, one year before the passing away of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, the League of Nations met for the first time.

Thus a keen observer cannot fail to notice that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lived at one of the most momentous periods in the history of the world, at a time of narrow and obsolete moral creeds, dead and dying political ideas. In fact it was a time when people lived on ideals of autocracy, of brute force, of triumphant capitalism, of physical and spiritual slavery. No wonder then that ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote:

“Today the world of humanity is walking in darkness because it is out of touch with the world of God. That is why we do not see the signs of God in the hearts of men. The power of the Holy Spirit has no influence.”⁴

Well-nigh thirteen years have passed since ‘Abdu’l-Bahá left this travailing world. Where do we stand now? To begin with, let us remember these prophetic words written by ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, in January 1920:

“The ills from which the world now suffers will multiply; the gloom which envelops it will deepen. The Balkans will remain discontented. Its restlessness will increase. The vanquished Powers will continue to agitate. They will resort to every measure that may rekindle the flame of war. Movements, newly born and worldwide in their range, will exert their utmost for the advancement of their designs.”¹

We do not need to stretch our imagination in order to understand the foregoing passage. Even a casual observation of the events of the last fourteen years reveals to us most glaringly the astounding truth underlying ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s pregnant words.

Whether we admit it or not, economically and politically, we still consider the injury of others the measure of our success and welfare. We still believe in the military catechism which says: “The way to make war impossible is to make victory certain,” in other words that “when each can beat the other, both will be safe”. False and nugatory² promises that self respecting nations give each other are not things of the past, yet.

We have seen months and years of endless conferences, congresses and conventions to remedy the ills of our social, political and economic conditions, not to mention the “vast mountains of documents, reports, discussions, accusations, counter charges” which are stored in drawers and safes and do not seem to get us anywhere.

There is so much passion in the world, at present; passion of individuals against individuals which makes them hate one another and the organized passions of nations which make them responsible for the wholesale murder of innocent people. It was this passion which ‘Abdu’l-Bahá condemned when He said:

“All the peoples of Europe, notwithstanding their vaunted civilization, sink and drown in this terrifying sea of passion and desire, and this is why all the phenomena of their culture come to nothing.”³

To sum up, no words better describe the conditions of the present age than those of Shoghi Effendi, the Guardian of the Bahá’í Faith when he writes of “... disintegrating institutions, the discredited statesmanship, the exploded theories, the appalling degradation, the follies and furies, the shifts, shams and compromises”⁴ [XXV:2:56]

We cannot help saying with Sir Norman Angell:

“Are we to continue to struggle, as so many good men struggled in the first dozen centuries of Christendom spilling oceans of blood, wasting mountains of treasure to achieve what is at the bottom a logical absurdity; to accomplish something which, when accomplished, can avail us nothing, and which, if it could avail us anything, would condemn the nations of the world to never-ending bloodshed and the constant defeat of all those aims which men, in their sober hours, known to be alone worthy of sustained endeavour?”⁵

How long will it take us to learn that “... human happiness,” as ‘Abdu’l-Bahá wrote, “consists only in drawing closer to the Threshold of Almighty God, and in securing the peace and well-being of every individual member, high and low alike, of the human race ...”⁶

And again, He said:

“True civilization will unfurl its banner in the midmost heart of the world whenever a certain number of its distinguished and high-minded sovereigns—the shining exemplars of devotion and determination—shall, for the good and happiness of all mankind, arise, with firm resolve and clear vision, to establish the Cause of Universal Peace.”⁷

As this brief and all too inadequate account of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s life draws to an end, we cannot fail to remember His last and stirring words addressed to a group of believers and friends gathered around Him on board the steamship Celtic, the day of His departure from New York on the 5 December 1912. These words sum up the mission of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá on this earth and the principles of love and peace and unity for which He lived and died:

“This is my last meeting with you, for now I am on the ship ready to sail away. These are my final words of exhortation. I have repeatedly summoned you to the cause of the unity of the world of humanity, announcing that all mankind are the servants of the same God, that God is the creator of all; He is the Provider and Life-giver; all are equally beloved by Him and are His servants upon whom His mercy and compassion descend. Therefore, you must manifest the greatest kindness and love toward the nations of the world, setting aside fanaticism, abandoning religious, national and racial prejudice.”¹

“Until man reaches this high station, the world of humanity shall not find rest, and eternal felicity shall not be attained. But if man lives up to these divine commandments, this world of earth shall be transformed into the world of heaven, and this material sphere shall be converted into a paradise of glory.”²

The World Order of Bahá’u’lláh

Hasan M. Balyuzi

“The creative energies released by the Law of Bahá’u’lláh, permeating and evolving within the mind of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, have, by their very impact and close interaction, given birth to an Instrument which may be viewed as the Charter of the New World Order which is at once the glory and the promise of this most great Dispensation.”³

While in London, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá was asked by a journalist to relate His experiences of prison life. He smiled and said: *“There is no prison save the prison of self.”*⁴ Perhaps this sentence may give us a clue to the remedy for the world wide ailments of the body politic today. We need only to glance around us to realize that today individuals live in self, families reside in self, communities dwell in self and nations abide by self. All are deaf and blind to realities surrounding them. What can be the first and foremost task of the Bahá’í Cause but to liberate the human race from the bondage of self?

Someone might say that ascetics and hermits have had this same end in view. In the seclusion of their caves and cells they have struggled to purge themselves of “self”. Their object has been the elimination of the ego but with no thought of their fellow men—a stupendous and impossible task, as impracticable and harmful as undesirable. The Bahá’í Cause aims at mastering and subduing the ego and employing its huge reservoirs of initiative and energy and its colossal potentialities in the service of humanity. Fierce competition is a natural corollary of selfishness. It is the fashion to call it “struggle for existence”, and wrap it in the gossamer disguise of biological necessity. Nothing is more alien to the spirit of Bahá’u’lláh’s World Order than unbridled competition. This must be abandoned and co-operation must take its place.

Some of the basic instructions of Bahá’u’lláh concern work. Work done in the right spirit is ranked by Him as worship. “The basest of men,” He asserts, “are that yield no fruit on earth.

² ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, The Promulgation of Universal Peace, p. 470.

³ Shoghi Effendi, The World Order of Bahá’u’lláh, p. 144.

⁴ ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, Divine Philosophy, p. 23.

*Such men are verily counted as among the dead, nay better are the dead in the sight of God than those idle and worthless souls.*¹ “The best of men,” again He says, “are they that earn their livelihood by their calling and spend upon themselves and upon their kindred for the love of God, the Lord of all worlds.”² What stronger indictment against social parasites need we have?

This at once brings us to the cardinal question of capital and labour. Let me dispel all doubts by stating at the outset that the Bahá’í Cause stands on a higher and vastly larger plane than either of our principal schools of economic thought. Whereas Capitalists are impelled by the interests of the more favoured few, and the Socialists demand the rights of the great mass of workers, the Bahá’ís take a detached view, and consider the two contending factions of capital and labour as inevitable and indispensable organs of the body politic. It is both disastrous and criminal to suppress one at [XXV:6:167] the expense of the other. No solution can be obtained, unless both the capitalist and the labourer admit frankly their interdependence, and start afresh on that solid and firm basis. Bahá’u’lláh’s thesis is a wise and just system of taxation and of distribution of public funds, combined with voluntary sharing in industry. Bahá’u’lláh would dismiss from human minds the very idea of deprivation whenever the social well-being of all conflicts with individual comfort and luxury. The rich should not be stripped of their property and wealth. The poor man must not be in want of necessities. Rather the rich should feel in themselves that no ease and peace can be imaginable as long as abject misery is the lot of millions of their fellow men.

But how can this spirit of responsibility of the fortunate for the unfortunate be brought about Human nature, we are told, cannot be changed. But if mankind is to live on, it must undergo a great unprecedented transformation. What we term human nature and view oftentimes with resigned repugnance is only a faint shadow of the ruling traits of jungle life. However appalling and beastly man was years ago, his predatory and wicked instincts were limited in their application by the lack of efficient method and instrument. Today we live in a world rampant with dangerous possibilities. Man has in his possession the most devilish means of destruction. Thus the very preservation of the human race decrees subordination of this dreaded human nature.

There are people who believe that under harsh discipline and external pressure, man can be reformed. They assume that force and suppression can induce men to visualize the common weal. These zealots lose sight of a secret. We can blow air into a balloon but not indefinitely. A limit passed, it will burst. If we wish to proceed with our pleasure, we have first to increase the capacity of our plaything. And so it is with humanity.

The only way to correct conditions is through just laws; but, in order to have just laws, and also complete obedience to law, man must be changed from within. This change of human nature makes possible a willing and intelligent obedience. Without this inner growth some become scheming and resentful.

Both Bahá’u’lláh and ‘Abdu’l-Bahá lived long lives of suffering and deprivation in order to show us that the spirit within can conquer so-called human nature and substitute love for hate and justice for greed.

But a desire for justice for all does not mean absolute equality. This is a chimera that has decoyed men into baseless assumptions and deleterious experiments. Bahá’u’lláh is emphatic on this point: we cannot have absolute equality. But the fact that ranks and degrees are inevitable does not entail oppression and irresponsibility. Bahá'u'lláh declares unequivocally for equality of opportunity and absolute, unconditional equality in the sight of God. Compulsory universal education affords equal chances to all.

² Bahá’u’lláh, The Hidden Words, Persian No. 82.

Furthermore, God recognizes no distinction of colour, race, language, nationality religion, wealth and [XXV:6:168] position. *“O children of vainglory! For a fleeting sovereignty ye have abandoned My imperishable dominion, and have adorned yourselves with the gay livery of the world and made of it your boast. By My beauty! All will I gather beneath the one-coloured covering of the dust and efface all these diverse colours save them that choose My own, and that is purging from every colour.”*¹

This oneness of humankind, which in the words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá, is “the gift of God to this enlightened age”,² constitutes the cornerstone of Bahá'u'lláh's dispensation. Here a pitfall should be warned against. Unity and uniformity are two different themes. Uniformity is deadening. It paralyzes human faculties, and dries up all fountains of originality and creative thought. Bahá'u'lláh never supported the idea of uniformity. By comparing the world and its multi-forms of race, nationality and language, to a garden effulgent with varieties of plant life, ‘Abdu’l-Bahá showed the undesirability of reducing all to one type. One of the glories of Bahá'u'lláh's World Order is the fact that it sanctions “unity in diversity”.

The Bahá'í Cause, then, champions universal tolerance and appreciation rather than the enchaining of the human intellect to produce one type. No violent move, however, against political order and social equilibrium is permitted. But as long as a movement is peaceful and works through befitting channels, no person or persons should have the right of prevention. Men are free to express what they think and feel. But if on a vital point two should disagree and drag others into the vortex of their conflict, both are deemed wrong. Thus demagogues and charlatans lose their standing.

The World Order of Bahá'u'lláh ordains the establishment of a Supreme Tribunal, a supranational fully-sovereign body exercising control over any and every affair, problem or occasion that affects international relations. The words of ‘Abdu’l-Bahá will best explain the nature of this tribunal:

“... although the League of Nations has been brought into existence, yet it is incapable of establishing Universal Peace. But the Supreme Tribunal which His Holiness Bahá'u'lláh has described will fulfil this sacred task with the utmost might and power. And His plan is this: that the national assemblies of each country and nation—that is to say parliaments—should elect two or three persons who are the choicest men of that nation, and are well informed concerning international laws and the relations between governments and aware of the essential needs of the world of humanity of this day. The number of these representatives should be in proportion to the number of inhabitants of that country. The election of these souls who are chosen by the national assembly, that is, the parliament, must be confirmed by the upper house, the congress and the cabinet and also by the president or monarch so these persons may be the elected ones of all the nation and the government. From among these people the members of the Supreme Tribunal will be elected, and all mankind will thus have a share therein, for every one of these delegates is fully representative of his nation. [XXV:6:169]

When the Supreme Tribunal gives a ruling on any international question, either unanimously or by majority-rule, there will no longer be any pretext for the plaintiff or ground of objection for the defendant. In case any of the governments or nations in the execution of the irrefutable decision of the Supreme Tribunal, be negligent or dilatory, the rest of the nations will rise up against it, because all the governments and nations of the world are the supporters of this Supreme Tribunal. Consider what a firm foundation this is! But by a limited and restricted League the purpose will not be realized as it ought and should.”¹

From these words it is evident that Bahá'u'lláh inculcates the notion of collective responsibility, even in world affairs. More than sixty years ago, He foretold and foresaw the present sad plight of a bewildered humanity. Now, we are beginning to comprehend that no nation can act as the sole judge of its conduct and behaviour. Now, the full connotation of Bahá'u'lláh's warnings and exhortations is being revealed to us. Now, we are forced to admit that unity is the urgent need of the hour. Today we stand at the cross roads, face to face with a critical and momentous decision. Which path are we to take, order or anarchy?

Looking in perspective at the projected World Order of Bahá'u'lláh, three salient features command our immediate attention—Justice, Unity and Love. The followers of Bahá'u'lláh aspire to a new order in which war, discord, jealousy and competition are eliminated, not merely because they are banned and tabooed, but because the human soul will rise to such an elevation of justice and wisdom that greed and carnage will seem childish, brutish and outgrown. The World Order of Bahá'u'lláh is not a negative system. It does not simply forbid. Its richness, potency and animating, revitalizing spiritual power, have not failed those who have enlisted on its side. A structure founded on justice, unity, love and appreciation will inevitably have peace within its walls.

In the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá

(An early pilgrimage)

Rosa V. Winterburn

“Grieve not because of my imprisonment and calamity; for this prison is my beautiful garden, my mansioned paradise and my throne of dominion among mankind. My calamity in my prison is a crown to me in which I glory among the righteous.”²

“You are going to your greatest test,” said a friend as we drove to the station to commence the trip to 'Akká, Palestine, the “White City by the Sea”. The words were unintelligible to me then, and it was not until some weeks later that their real meaning became clear. Scarcely heeding them, in fact, in the happiness of making the start, they were forgotten until their truth came back to me when the visit in 'Akká was moving slowly into the past.

Six days in 'Akká! Six days in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá! Six days in an atmosphere of the most perfect love and peace that it has ever been mine to know. Others may have spent six weeks there, six months. That is nothing, for time is nothing in the presence of the Servant of God. If a thousand years are but as a day in the sight of the Lord, is it not equally true that a day may be as a thousand years? We lived a lifetime in those six days. The outside world disappeared. The past had never been. There was no future. It was as if the moment in that Presence were all of life and that it was eternal. Peace, happiness, calm joy enveloped us from the moment 'Abdu'l-Bahá took our hands in His in a welcoming grasp until He said “Go back and serve,” and we left His Presence, perhaps forever in this world.

Before starting on our journey I had feared being overwhelmed with sadness at the sight of the imprisonment of 'Abdu'l-Bahá; so I had prayed earnestly that I might be enabled to look into His dear face only with smiles. Once in 'Akká the prayer was as completely forgotten as if it had never been breathed, and I found myself wondering at the readiness with which I smiled into those eyes that always smiled back at me in tender love. It was not until 'Akká was fading into the distance beyond the blue waters of the Mediterranean, that I remembered my prayer and marvelled at its complete realization.

The entrance into the Presence of the One called by so many "Mas- [XXV:8:237] ter"—came as simply and naturally as into that of some dear friend. We wondered somewhat, my husband and I, for we had thought it impossible to see Him whom our hearts so revered without being overcome with emotion. Hours passed, we met Him face to face, felt the touch of His hands, basked in the light of His smiles, and still we had not been overcome by any mighty wave of irresistible feeling, and still we wondered. Days passed, the life in 'Akká had received us, had taken us into its loving arms, and still we were wondering when and how was to come that mighty sweep of power. It did not come. The dominance of 'Abdu'l-Bahá spoke to us only through His love. His influence expressed itself to our mortal senses in the peace around us that was always unbroken. His wisdom was manifest in the grey haired men who bowed before its decisions in unquestioning acceptance. The efficiency of His teaching was illustrated in the eagerness of those who had been Zoroastrians, Muslims, or Christians to live all together there in perfect peace and unity, under His sheltering care; and in their determination to carry with them to the ends of the world the same peace and harmony that wrapped them in its folds in that dreary, but gorgeous, little prison city of 'Akká.

The day of departure came. The doors of 'Abdu'l-Bahá's home closed upon us. The grim walls and the defiant gates of the crumbling old city of the Crusaders were behind us. The world and the service upon which we had been sent out were before us. Slowly driving away, two questions perplexed us: What was the "greatest test" to which we had been subjected? We had been unconscious of it. Why had we not felt some overpowering conviction of the sanctity of that Presence in which we had spent six such bliss filled days? Then we almost laughed at our simplicity in asking ourselves the latter question. What experience could we have had more overwhelming in its conviction than the steadily cumulating proof of those six days? For now we realized, as had been impossible while still in the presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá, that every hour, every interview with Him, every observation of the life around us had brought conviction to the reason, to the judgement, to the emotions, to the whole mental, moral, and spiritual nature, that this was indeed the Servant of God for Whom we searched, that this was the Divine Exemplar Who could show the world the way into life eternal.

We realized now that when we first entered His Presence so quietly, it was as if we had been taken up by the first swell of a great tidal wave, raised so tenderly that we had scarcely been conscious of its uplift; we had been carried on and on, higher and higher, until, as the tidal wave may sweep over coast, rocks, and even cities, we had been carried high over all worldly consciousness and it had been as if the world were not. As this realization came, we prayed that we might never again be upon the spiritual level where we had been standing when that wave lifted us and bore us so high into the realms of absolute, common sense, unquestioning con- [XXV:8:238] viction. "By their works ye shall know them," and it was through the works of 'Abdu'l-Bahá and of those who served Him that we had attained to the heights of our conviction of the truth of the Bahá'í Teachings.

There still remained the thought, What had been our "greatest test"? It had sunk into insignificance. That incorporation of the living Spirit of God in a human body could never be a stumbling block now to our steps. We had met a man, it is true, a man with all the needs and elements of humanity. But it had been to realize how perfect an instrument of the Lord the human body may become. How else could God have spoken to us so forcibly as through those human lips, that let fall Divine Wisdom; as through those human eyes, whose tender glances bore into one's soul a conception of the love and tenderness of God; as by that human tongue that never uttered a harsh or an unkind word; as through that stately form, unbowed by all the grievances of the world or by the sufferings of long years of prison life and deprivation? Surely, if man is the greatest work of God, man must also be the most perfect Messenger of God to man.

There had been but six days in 'Akká; but the human world was behind us, before us was the world of God. They had been separated by a faint conception of Eternity, lived in the Presence of 'Abdu'l-Bahá.

A Bahá'í doctor

Luṭfu'lláh S. Ḥakím¹

"Souls have appeared in the world who were pure and undefiled, who have directed their attention toward God, seeking the reward of God, attaining nearness to the threshold of God, acceptable in the good pleasure of God. They have been the lights of guidance and stars of the Supreme Concourse. Consider these souls, shining like stars in the horizon of sanctity forevermore."²

There has recently passed from this world in Ṭihrán, Persia, a man whose noble life and ancestral history give us occasion to pause and reflect upon the influence and widespread importance of the Bahá'í Cause in Persia and upon the many ties which bind Persia with America.

Dr Arastú Khán Ḥakím belonged to the third generation of Bahá'ís. His grandfather, Ḥakím Masīḥ was court doctor to Muḥammad Sháh and the first Jewish Bahá'í. Ḥakím Masīḥ's life takes us back to the very early history of the Cause for he had learned something of the new faith when he was in Baghdád through Ṭáhirih³ herself, during the early days of the Báb's manifestation. From that time on he had searched for the source of her power. Later in Ṭihrán, when Muslim doctors refused, he had offered to visit the prison and treat a Bahá'í child. The father of the child was the famous Ismu'lláhu'l-Aṣdaq and in the course of these visits Ḥakím Masīḥ became a Bahá'í and later achieved much fame in the Cause.

Dr Arastú's father Ḥakím Sulaymán was likewise a Bahá'í and Dr Arastú himself gradually increased his services in the Cause as he grew to manhood. Meanwhile he was carrying on the family tradition, as are his sons today, of practicing medicine. About 1897 he graduated from the American School in Ṭihrán and was working in the American hospital, where he already showed signs of that healing personality which later made him one of the foremost doctors in the capital. At this period knowledge of Bahá'u'lláh's Cause often ended in a martyr's death, and so we find him studying the Bahá'í teachings unobtrusively in out of the way houses in the back streets of Ṭihrán. Soon he began to teach on his own account.

DR ARASTÚ'S BROTHER, AFLÁṬÚN, WAS ALSO AN ARDENT BAHÁ'Í, MUCH LOVED BY 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ, WHO WROTE HIM MANY TABLETS. IN 1900 AFLÁṬÚN DIED AND SHORTLY AFTER THIS ARASTÚ KHÁN WENT TO 'AKKÁ, WHERE IT WAS HIS PRIVILEGE TO REMAIN WITH 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ FOR ONE YEAR. DURING THE FIRST DAYS OF HIS VISIT CONTINUALLY ADDRESSED HIM AS "AFLÁṬÚN". THIS PUZZLED HIM CONSIDERABLY, UNTIL ONE NIGHT WHEN HE AND DR YÚNIS KHÁN-I-AFRÚKHTIH WERE FOLLOWING 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ THROUGH THE NARROW CROOKED STREETS OF THE PRISON CITY, WHEN 'ABDU'L-BAHÁ AGAIN ADDRESSED HIM AS "AFLÁṬÚN" AND SAID, "DO YOU KNOW WHY I CALL YOU AFLÁṬÚN? IT IS BECAUSE I DESIRE HIS TRUTH AND

Dr Arastú developed rapidly in ‘Akká studying ‘Abdu’l-Bahá’s way. He worked with Dr Yúnis Khán translating letters from the American and other Western Bahá’ís. [XXV:11:333] ‘Abdu’l-Bahá had hoped to send him to America, but family concerns necessitated his return to Persia. Here he worked devotedly for the Cause, founding a weekly teaching meeting which continued till his death, and which according to his will is to be perpetuated. He received his medical diploma and became known throughout the capital as a physician most generous to the poor and as one gentle and considerate toward all.

During the very last year of his life his activities were linked with America again through his work of advising and assisting Mrs Keith Ransom-Kehler¹ who was at that time labouring devotedly to bring before the Persian government petitions to insure justice in every way to Bahá’ís, especially in the matter of free circulation of Bahá’í literature. Right here in connection with Mrs Ransom-Kehler’s association with Dr Arastú we find a bit of romance mingling itself with the more serious duties of her service, for it was she who arranged for the betrothal of Dr Arastú’s son, Dr Qulám Ḥusayn Khán and the sister-in-law of Raḥmat ‘Alá’í and officiated at the wedding which will long be remembered in Ṭihrán.

Dr Arastú’s death made a deep impression in Ṭihrán where he was mourned alike by Bahá’ís and non-Bahá’ís. A long procession of several hundred people followed his coffin up one of the main thoroughfares of the capital mourning their loss and honouring his life of loving service and sacrifice. Engraved on the stone which marks the resting place of his body are the well-chosen words from the Qur’án: “O well assured spirit, willing and blessed go thou back to thy Lord.”

Persia is full of such glorious souls as this man who are professionally and practically successful in their careers yet deeply spiritual and mystical in their complete devotion to the Cause of Bahá’u’lláh, willing to sacrifice everything, not only career, but life itself in order that world brotherhood should be carried forward. All the rest of the world of Bahá’í brotherhood know that it is due to the faith and self-sacrificing devotion of such Persians that the Cause of Bahá’u’lláh grew to the point where it could become a world message and a world movement.

‘Abdu’l-Bahá

Music is one of the important arts. It has a great effect upon the human spirit. Musical melodies are a certain something which prove to be accidental upon etheric vibrations, for voice is nothing but the expression of vibrations which, reaching the tympanum, affect the nerves of hearing. Musical melodies are therefore those peculiar effects produced by, or from, vibration. However, they have the keenest effect upon the spirit. In sooth, although music is a material affair, yet its tremendous effect is spiritual and its greatest attachment is to the realm of spirit. Voice is the vibration of air and is like the waves of the sea. The voice is produced through the instrumentality of the lips with the tongue, etc. These cause a wave in the air, and this wave reaches the nerve of the ear, which is thereby affected.
